sideration and those two points are, in my opinion, the only two effective points in the appeals. The first and the most important point is as to the construction of the leases and the second question is as to the legality and sufficiency of the notices served on which, it is alleged by the plaintiffs, the leases were terminated. The leasehold properties—and I need mention only one property and the observations would apply to the other also—consist of a haut, bandar and bazar situated on the bank of a streamlet. The property originally belonged to a zamindar named Bepin Behari Roy. The predecessor-in-interest of the defendants first took a lease of the property on 7th April 1876 for a term of three years at a rent of Rs. 375 per annum. On the expiry of the term of that lease, other leases were taken for different terms from time to time by the same lessees from the landlord which it is unnecessary to mention in detail. The lease just before the one in question was dated 2nd August 1895. This was for a term of six years, which was to terminate at the end of the Bengali year 1307, corresponding to the middle of April 1901. Before the expiry of the term of that lease, the present defendants represented by one of them, Dina Nath Kundu, took the lease in dispute from Bepin Behari Roy, by executing a kabuliyat, in his favour, dated 21st September 1900. The kabuliyat with respect to the other leasehold property was executed by the same defendant in favour of the son and the administrator to the estate of Bepin Behari Roy, who had died in the meantime on 4th August 1903. This lease was executed with regard to some excess land lying contiguous to the land which was the subject-matter of the previous lease of 1900.

The whole question in dispute is whether by these leases the lessees obtained a permanent, heritable right to the leasehold properties subject to certain restrictions as to the use of the properties and with the liability of the rent being variable under certain conditions or not. The plaintiffs in the suits acquired the interest which originally belonged to Bepin Behari Roy by virtue of a purchase at a sale in execution of a mortgage-decree on 25th April 1921. The contention on behalf of the plaintiff is that the defendants hold under a temporary lease or, at the utmost, under a lease 'from year to year which was terminable by six months' notice to quit and, such a notice having been served upon them, they have no right to remain on the land. The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to khas possession by ejecting the defendants. We have thus to see which of the contentions should prevail. The contention of the plaintiffs found favour with the Subordinate Judge. The most important provisions in the lease are these :

I had been till now in possession of the haut, etc., by taking a temporary miadi ijara settlement of the same and realizing rents. I prayed to you for having granted a bemiadi settlement of the haut, etc. . . . and you, on receiving a salami of Rs. 3,500 from me and fixing the annual rent at Rs. 800, granted my prayer and made with me a bemiadi settlement of the haut. . . . I appear before you and, agreeing to pay a rent of Rs. 800 per annum, I execute this deed of bemiadi kabuliyat.

3. If due to my default or neglect of duty the conditions of the haut. . . . deteriorate or are likely to deteriorate instead of being improved, you shall forthwith be able to take khas possession by ejecting me from the haut, etc., and no objection on the part of myself and my heirs shall be entertained.

Paragraph 4, provides that the tenant shall pay all necessary expenses for the improvement of the property.

Paragraph 5 runs thus :

If in future the present condition of the haut, bazar, bandar and ghat be improved, I shall pay without objection the increased rent that may be assessed by you over and above the jama fixed. I shall not be entitled to raise any plea or objection thereto . . . nor shall I be able to make an istafa (surrender) thereof.

Without your permission I shall not be competent to dig any tank or build any permanent masonry structure within the lands of this haut, bazar and bandar or to allow any shopkeeper to do so. I shall not be competent to grant any bemiadi settlement of any land of the haut. . . .

Paragraph 9 restricts the power of transfer, etc.

Paragraph 13 ends in this way :

In default, you shall be competent to bring a suit according to law and realize compensation and to take khas possession of the haut, etc., if you so desire, and no objection thereto on the part of myself or my heirs will be entertained. I and my heirs remain bound by the terms of this kabuliyat.

The learned Subordinate Judge held that this only created a temporary lease. It is argued on behalf of the appellants that the word "bemiadi" is synonymous to "permanent". In support of the contention, they have referred us to a publication by the Government named "A Guide and Glossary to Survey and Settlement Records in "Bengal." There, a "permanent tenure" is translated as bemiadi muthusthuth and the contention on behalf of the appellants is that this is the correct translation of the term "bemiadi".

The next contention of the appellants is that in the record-of-rights the interest of the appellants was recorded as a permanent tenure. The then landlord, Upendra Nath Roy, raised an objection to the record. The objection was to the expression "tenure" and not to the permanency of the right. This appears to be so from the order of the Settlement Officer who decided the objection. The landlord urged that no interest in the land had been created and, therefore, it was only a sayar jama and the Bengal Tenancy Act had no application to this sort of jama. The learned advocate for the respondents very rightly contends, in my opinion, that no inference can be drawn from this, as the landlord took exception to the authority of the Settlement Officer to make any record whatsoever of this property. The appellants next rely upon the case of Forbes v. Hanuman Bhagat (1), where the learned Judges held that the lease which made a bemiadi settlement was, upon its proper construction, intended to be permanent and not from year to year. On the other hand, the learned advocate for the respondents relies upon another case of the Patna High Court, Parshan Kuer v. Tulsi Kuer (2), in support of the contrary contention where the learned Judges held that a bemiadi lease, although the grant included the minerals and was hereditary according to its terms, created only a lease from year to year. The real question seems to me to be to construe the lease according to the expressions used in it taking it along with the surrounding circumstances. It has been held in a series of cases that, unless the words clearly indicate permanency of lease, the surrounding circumstances and the entire terms of the lease must be looked into in order to ascertain the nature of the grant; and I propose to do so in the present case in order to discover what the meaning of the expression bemiadi was in this lease. Beginning from the very beginning, I may refer to the meaning of the word "miadi" as it appears in Wilson's Glossary. According to that authority "miadi" means "limited, terminable, conditional." The prefix "bey" implies "absence"; literally, the word "bemiadi" must, therefore, mean "unlimited, not terminable, unconditional." Now, contrast this lease where the word "bemiadi" has been used with the expression "miadi" as applied to the previous lease which was then running. The previous lease was a lease for a term. The tenant says that instead of a miadi lease, i. e., lease for a term, he was desirous to take a bemiadi lease, i. e., a lease which was not terminable. Add to this fact, that the tenant had been taking terminable leases for certain fixed periods from the year 1876 and the period of the last of such leases was running at the time of the lease in question. It can hardly be reasonable to suppose that the tenant paid Rs. 3,500 as salami and consented to increase the rent to Rs. 800 at that time in order to take a lease which might be terminated the next month or the next year at the will of the landlord. The next question is this: so long as the lease was for a term, the rent fixed was not at all liable to be increased, as would appear from Ex. D (5), the previous lease for the land, dated 2nd August 1895. In the present lease, the landlord has been given the power of unlimited increase of rent on certain grounds. Then again, contrast the right to create subleases. In para. 9, of Ex. D (5) it is stipulated by the tenant:

I shall not be competent to settle any tenant under me for any period in excess of the prescribed term of my ijara;

that is to say, the tenant was entitled to create a sub-tenancy to the extent of six years. Under the lease in question, the corresponding provision is, as I have already stated, "I shall not be competent to grant any bemiadi settlement of any land of haut, etc." Here, again, the word "bemiadi" appears. Now, in my judgment, it cannot be conceived that the tenant was restricted from giving even a temporary sublease. What was provided there was, in my opinion, that the tenant would not be entitled to create a permanent sublease; and that gives, in my judgment, a key to the meaning of the word as understood by the parties. It may then be asked: Why are these restrictions prescribed against the right to dig tanks, build permanent masonry structures, houses, etc.? If the landlord finds that a tenant-at-will is behaving in such a manner as to jeopardize his interest so as to deteriorate the value of the property, it is open to him simply to serve a notice to quit if the lease was terminable at his will. But if the lease was not terminable, then these provisions would be of importance. The land was let out for the purpose of a haut, bazar, etc. Digging of tanks would be incompatible with the purpose of a haut or bazar and necessarily the income derived from the haut or bazar would be diminished and thereby the landlord's interest would be affected as he would not be, under the circumstances, entitled to assess, a higher rent. There was no such restriction in the previous lease for a term: see Ex. D (5), dated 2nd August 1895. The obvious reason is that no tenant would go to the expense of spending money in digging tanks or raising permanent masonry structures on a leasehold property let out only for a short term. Much less would a tenant do so if the lease was not even for a term but liable to be terminated at the will of the landlord.

These restrictions, therefore, indicate to my mind that the lease was such a one that the tenant might find it advantageous to himself to spend money for those purposes, and hence the restrictions were imposed. This leads me to the conclusion that the lease was intended to be a permanent one. Next, there is an indication that this lease would be heritable. From the passages in paras. 3 and 13 of the lease, which I have already cited, it appears that the heirs were also to be bound by the stipulations contained in the kabuliyat. Taking all these facts into consideration, it seems to me the only reasonable conclusion is that the lease was a permanent one, instead of giving the lessee a more precarious right than what he had under the temporary lease which preceded it. This was also the opinion of both the trial and the appellate Courts in the judgments in suit No. 2 of 1913, which, although not binding on the plaintiffs in this case, is entitled to consideration as what was understood by the Judges to be the effect of the lease. I have omitted to mention that some argument was based on the expression "sarasari bemiadi kubuliat" in the last line of the kabuliyat of 4th August 1903. The Subordinate Judge has held that "sarasari" means a summary and temporary settlement. It really means "variable." A "sarasari" lease no doubt connotes the idea of a temporary settlement. But coupled with the expression "bemiadi," it can only mean, in my view, a permanent lease but variable as to rent. If only a temporary lease was intended to be given, it would have been sufficient to call it a "sarasari" lease. In this connexion, I may refer to the definition of a "permanent tenure" in the Bengal Tenancy Act, only as an illustration, to show how these leases are understood. In that Act, a "permanent tenure" means "a tenure which is heritable and which is not held for a limited time." In my view these leases are not terminable on service of notice to quit. This puts an end to the principal contention which has been raised as to the right of ejection in these cases.

But I think I should make my observations with regard to the sufficiency and legality of notices served by the landlord upon the defendants. No question arises before us as to the proper service of the notice. It is, however, contended that the notice is bad on the grounds stated below. The notice runs as follows:

You are hereby informed that the bemiadi settlement (then describes the property and the lease) will expire on 30th Chaitra 1329 B.S., and the said bemiadi settlement shall not remain in force after 30th Chaitra, 1329 B.S. After 30th Chaitra, 1329 B.S. that is to say, from 1st Baisakh, 1330 B.S., you shall give up khas possession

The contentions are these: (1) This notice does not in its terms terminate the tenancy, but only mentions the fact that the lease will expire on a certain date. The intention is to show that the term of the lease will end of its own effect on that date. If that is not the fact this notice is bad in law. (2) The tenancy commenced on 5th Aswin from the date of the kabuliyat and, therefore, any notice served under S. 106, T. P. Act must terminate with the end of the year of the tenancy. The end of the tenancy would be the 4th of Aswin of any Bengali year. As the notice was to terminate on 30th Chaitra, 1329 B. S., it is insufficient. In support of the last contention, the appellants cite the case of Kishori Mohun.

I think it must be at least held that the tenancy was one reserving a yearly rent, and the year of the tenancy commenced on the 14th day of Pous 1294.

The respondents, on the other hand, contend that, although the kabuliyat is dated 5th Aswin 1307 B. S., the rent was payable according to the Bengali year as would appear from the schedule of the kistibandi at the end of the document. Further, it is urged that rents were realized as shown by the rent receipts according to the Bengali year. Therefore, the year of the tenancy should be considered as the ordinary Bengali year. In support of this contention, the learned advocate for the respondents cites the case of Ismail Khan v. Jaigun Bibi (4). In this case, Banerjee and Stevens, JJ., at p. 577, make the following observations with regard to the argument that as the tenancy was created by a kabuliyat, Ex. 3, dated 19th Chait. 1257 B. S., and the notice was served on 23rd Ashw in 1303 B. S. and expired on the last day of Chait of that year, it did not expire with the end of the year of the tenancy and was, therefore, a bad notice. We do not consider this argument valid. For though the tenancy was, as appears on the face of Ex. 3, created by that document, and the document is dated 19th of Chait, rent has all along been paid, as is clear from the rent receipts filed . . . according to the ordinary Bengali year, so that a year of the tenancy would be the ordinary Bengali year.

In this state of divergence of opinion pronounced by the same learned Judge, I do not feel called upon to express any definite opinion on the question in these cases. My inclination is that unless it could be definitely shown that the tenancy was to commence at a particular date different from the date of the document by which it was created, it must be held ordinarily that the year of the tenancy commences from the date of the document. In that view, in this particular case it may be held that the tenancy commenced from the 5th Aswin 1307 B. S.

There is one other point which I need mention and which was raised by the learned advocate for the respondents here for the first time. What he urged was this: that the lease in question being evidenced only by a kabuliyat, which was said to have been accepted by the lessor, under the terms of S. 107, T. P. Act, such a kabuliyat cannot be held to create any lease which was beyond the term of one year. This question, as I have said, was not raised in the Court below either in the issues or during the course of the argument. We have not got here the opinion of the learned Judge below on the question, nor can it be definitely said that no patta was executed. If this point had been raised by the plaintiffs, the defendants might have met that objection by other pleas. The question, however, so far as this Court is concerned, is concluded by the authority of the case of Raimoni Dasi v. Mathura Mohan Dey (5). I may also mention that it has all along been the practice, in this province at any rate, to create large leasehold interests of a permanent nature by accepting a kabuliyat from the tenant, or, in other words, a kabuliyat executed by the tenant and accepted by the landlord is as much a lease as a patta executed by the landlord and accepted by the tenant. Indentures are unknown in the mofussil in this country. From the view that I have taken on the first point the only conclusion that I can arrive at is that these appeals must be allowed and the suits dismissed with costs in both the Courts.

Judgment.—This appeal may be disposed of on the short ground that the plaintiff's suit as framed is not maintainable under S. 42, Specific Relief Act. The plaintiff claims the land in the suit as a cosharer with the defendants. The defendants deny that they were ever the plaintiff's cosharers and say that the properties belonged to them by transfer from the rightful owner. The plaintiff brought the present suit for declaration of his title to the properties in suit and for confirmation of possession. The trial Court found all the issues relating to title and possession against the plaintiff and dismissed the suit. The learned Additional District Judge has not gone into the question of title, but, on his finding on the question of limitation, he is of opinion that the suit is not maintainable. He has found that the plaintiff was never in possession, either actual or constructive, of the properties in suit and, therefore, the present suit, which is brought under S. 42, Specific Relief Act, is not maintainable. The learned advocate who appears for the appellant argues that the view taken by the learned Judge on the question of limitation is wrong and that, as he is a cosharer, the possession of the defendants should be presumed to be his possession; in other words he was in possession of the properties in suit through the defendants. Various objections can be taken to this contention : (1) The plaintiff in his plaint admits that the defendants were claiming the entire moveable and immovable properties on the strength of a will and probate. It is said that this conduct of the defendants has only clouded his title, but the facts cannot be concealed that the defendants were in possession in their own right to the exclusion of all others including the plaintiff. If the defendants were possessing the properties on the strength of a will they were certainly possessing them as against the plaintiff if he had any title to them. (2) The learned Additional District Judge's finding on the question of limitation does not appear to be erroneous in law. The will under which the defendants are in possession is dated 1892. The present suit was brought in 1924. For so many years the defendants were in possession in their own right derived under the will. Every case between co-owners with regard to the question of adverse possession must be decided on the particular facts of that case. Admitting that the plaintiff was ever a co-owner his exclusion from this property for such a length of time under a title inconsistent with the title set up by the plaintiff is enough to entitle the Court to deduce from it that there was an ouster of the plaintiff from the properties. Ayennessa Bibi v. Sheikh Isuf (1). (3) The principle of possession between co-owners is that every co-owner is a tenant-in-common and that possession of a tenant-in-common is not adverse to his co-tenant. But a person cannot be a tenant-in-common with a person whom he never recognized as a co-tenant and probably had no knowledge of his existence. Since 1892 the defendants have been in possession of the property in their exclusive right. They never regarded the plaintiff as a cosharer and it is possible, on the case they have proved before the trial Court, that they were not aware even that he was their cosharer.

The plaintiff was out of possession at the time of the institution of the suit. That being so, the case comes within the purview of the proviso to S. 42, Specific Relief Act, and is not maintainable in its present form. It may be noted that the plaintiff describes the suit in the plaint as one for declaration of title and has affixed necessary Court-fees for such a suit. The appeal accordingly fails and is dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—These two Rules were obtained in respect of two orders in two rent suits setting aside in their entirety two ex-parte decrees. It appears that in these suits there were in all fourteen defendants, five of whom were females. Decrees were passed ex parte and subsequently there were sales, but the finding of fact is that the summons had not been legally served on the five female defendants who also had been kept out of the knowledge of the decrees for a considerable period after the decrees were passed. The learned Munsiff, therefore, set aside in toto the two ex-parte decrees on the application of the five ladies. Against this order these Rules were obtained.

A preliminary point is taken that, as a matter of fact, this is not a matter for the use by this Court of S. 115, Civil P. C., because when the suits are re-tried, the order setting aside the ex-parte decree will be then liable to be attacked in appeal, and in support of that proposition, the learned advocate for the opposite parties has referred me to certain decisions of other High Courts. I am, however, bound by the decisions of this Court, and the decisions of this Court are against the contention that an order setting aside an ex parte decree could be assailed in an appeal which might be brought against the final decree made after the ex-parte decree has been set aside. I would only refer to the case of Chintamani Dassi v. Raghoonath Sahoo (1). This disposes of the preliminary point.

Two grounds are taken before me on behalf of the petitioners. The first is that the whole decree should not have been set aside, but only the decree as affecting these five ladies; and, secondly, that the learned Munsif wrongly put the onus on the petitioners in respect of the plea of limitation. As to the second point: I do not think, there is much substance in it. It appears clear from the findings of the learned Munsif that the ladies were kept out of the knowledge of the decree and the proceedings against them also in execution only till within a few days of the present applications being made. As to the first point: the argument for the petitioners appears to me to have considerable weight. It is now settled that a rent decree can be obtained against some of the holders of a holding without every single holder being impleaded. I would refer to the recent Full Bench case of Kailash Chandra Mitra v. Brojendra K. Chakravarti (2). Therefore, it would not have been illegal to have granted decrees in respect of these rents against the nine male defendants only. It is also not disputed that an ex-parte decree can be set aside as against some defendants and remain a perfectly good decree against the others: see the case of Jadubansa Narain v. Hari Charan (3). It follows, therefore, that, even if the five lady applicants had never been made parties, there would have been perfectly good decrees for rent against the other nine defendants. It is urged, therefore, that the order of the learned Munsif in these two matters should be varied and the decrees set aside only in respect of the five ladies and not as against the male defendants. The learned advocate for the ladies has argued that there is no reason why this Court should invoke its jurisdiction under S. 115, even though the learned Munsif has not acted strictly in accordance with law in setting aside the decrees in toto. I am inclined, however, in the interest of limiting litigation, as I have the power, as the learned Munsif has acted illegally, to set aside his order setting aside the decrees as against the nine male defendants, as I consider it would be in the interest of justice that I should do so.

I, therefore, make the rules absolute to this extent: that the orders setting aside these decrees shall operate as against the Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 105—Rent entered in the record-of-rights—Application to enhance rent—No application to correct the entry under S. 106—Rate of rent is not concluded against the landlord by such an application if tenants agree to pay higher rent.

Revenue Court has no jurisdiction to correct an entry in the record-of-rights in an application made under S. 105 merely to enhance the rent unless there is an application to correct such entry under S. 106, and the rate of rent is not concluded against the landlord by reason of his having made an application under S. 105 when the tenants have agreed to pay a higher rent. [P 399 G 2]

Hiralal Chakravorthy for Bankim Chandra Mukherji and Sailendra Nath Bannerjee—for Appellants.

Shamdas Bhattacharjya and Jyotish Ch. Sirkar—for Respondents.

Page, J.—The suits out of which these appeals arise were brought to recover arrears of rent. The issue which fell for determination was whether the rent payable was at the rate alleged by the tenants or at the rate alleged by the plaintiff. The difference between the two rates is equivalent to a sum which at some remote period was collected as an abwab. Since 1865 the tenants have paid, and have received rent receipts, upon the footing that the rent payable was at the full rate claimed by the landlord; and there is a finding of fact by the lower appellate Court (having regard to the evidence adduced on the one side and on the other) that there was a valid agreement proved between the landlord and the tenants that they would pay the sum which was made up of rent proper and abwabs as consolidated rent. That is a finding of fact which we are not prepared to disturb in second appeal. The learned vakil on behalf of the appellant, however, has urged that the rate of rent is concluded in favour of the tenants by reason of the fact that an application was made by the landlord under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, for an enhancement of rent. Now the record-of-rights sets out the rent as being the rent proper and not what I may call the consolidated rent now claimed by the landlord; and if an application had been made under S. 106, Ben. Ten. Act, to correct that entry, in my opinion, it would not now be open to the parties to that application to reargue the rate at which the rent was payable in the present suit. But the application under S. 105, was for enhancement of rent, and upon such an application the revenue officer would not have had jurisdiction to correct the entry in the record-of-rights. It follows, therefore, that, as this is an application to enhance the rent under S. 105, and not an application to correct the entry in the record-of-rights under S. 106, it is not within the ambit of S. 105, and the rate of rent is not concluded against the landlord by reason of his having made an application under S. 105. In the circumstances obtaining in this case, therefore, the issue as to the amount of rent payable is one which the parties were entitled to canvass in this suit, and the finding being one of fact and adverse to the appellant, the appeals fail and must be dismissed with costs: one set in each appeal.

 Workmen's Compensation Act, S. 12—Work undertaken by A as part of his business—Part of work entrusted to B—B sub-contracting for the work with C—One of C's workmen killed by accident—The principal for the purposes of S. 12 is A, and he can be indemnified by B—Compensation cannot be obtained under the Act for any further sub-contracting of the contract.*

Where A undertakes work which is ordinarily part of his trade or business, but, for his business, he contracts with B for the execution of part of this work, and B similarly contracts with C for the whole or part of the work he himself has contracted for, and one of C's workmen is killed by accident, the principal for the purpose of S. 12 is A, and he is entitled to be indemnified by B, and as regards the question, whether B is entitled in turn to be indemnified by C, the Act does not provide for such a contingency. The "contractor" referred to in sub-S. (2), S. 12 is the contractor who contracts directly with the principal as defined in S. 12 (1). If there is any further sub-letting of the contract, indemnification cannot be obtained under the Act and must be sought by recourse to the civil Courts. [P 400 C 2]

Harendra K. Sarbadhikary, Subodh Chandra Dutt and Hari Prasanna Mukherjee—for Applicant.

Judgment.—This is a reference by the Commissioner for Workmen's Compensation, Bengal, under S. 27, Workmen's Compensation Act (8 of 1923), and arises out of certain proceedings which are now pending before the Commissioner under the Act.

The facts appear to be shortly as follows: Messrs. Jardine Menzies & Co. Architects and Building Contractors, undertook to do the ironwork in connexion with the erection of a garage in Central Avenue, and for that purpose entered into a contract with one Amulya Charan Aich. On 12th December last, while a khalasi named Golab Khan, now deceased, the husband of the petitioner in this case, was at work on the premises and was engaged in hoisting a beam an iron column post fell upon him, resulting in fatal injuries. The widow of the deceased thereupon applied before the Commissioner for an order on Messrs. Jardine Menzies & Co. to deposit the sum of Rs. 900, as compensation for the death of her husband.

Messrs. Jardine Menzies & Co. filed a written statement denying their liability and submitting that, if they were found to be liable to pay compensation to the applicant they were entitled under S. 12 to be indemnified by Babu Amulya Charan Aich with whom they alleged they contracted for the performance of the work on which the deceased was said to have been engaged. Babu Amulya Charan Aich was accordingly served with notice as provided by the rules under the Act, and duly appeared by pleader and filed a written statement in which he stated that Messrs. Jardine Menzies & Co. engaged one N. Bhattachariya as contractor for the iron work, who again engaged him (Amulya Charan Aich), who in turn engaged Ishak Mia and Maniruddi jointly as contractors to do the ironwork. The proceedings, as already stated, are pending before the Commissioner, and, in the meanwhile, he has submitted this reference, inviting our decision upon a question of law which he has formulated as follows bearing upon the application of S. 12 of the Act:

A undertakes work which is ordinarily part of his trade or business. For the purpose of his trade or business he contracts with B for the execution of part of this work. B similarly contracts with C for the whole or part of the work he himself has contracted for. One of C's workmen is killed by accident.

1. Who, for the purpose of S. 12 is the principal?

2. If A is the principal, and is found liable to pay compensation, by whom is he entitled to be indemnified? If by B then is B in his turn entitled to be indemnified by C.

We have considered the relevant sections of the Act and our decision on the two points referred is as follows:

1. The principal for the purpose of S. 12 is A; in other words, in this case, Messrs. Jardine Menzies & Co.

2. Messrs. Jardine Menzies & Co. being the principal, are entitled to be indemnified by the contractor to whom they entrusted the work. That this is so is clear from the terms of S. 12 (1) of the Act. Whether, however, Messrs. Jardine Menzies & Co. entered into the contract with Amulya Charan Aich, as alleged by them, or with N. Bhattachariya, as claimed by Amulya Charan Aich, is, of course, a question of fact for the determination of the Commissioner.

As regards the further question, whether B is entitled in turn to be indemnified by C, the Act does not appear to provide for such a contingency. The contractor referred to in sub-S. (2) of S. 12, is the contractor who contracts directly with the principal as defined in S. 12 (1). If there is any further subletting of the contract, indemnification cannot be obtained under the Act and must be sought by recourse to the civil Court. It may be, as observed by the learned Commissioner, that to hold C liable to indemnify A would be the construction most workable in practice, and that it would avoid litigation. We cannot, however, read into the Act something that is not to be found there. Let the papers be returned to the Commissioner with our opinion.

Criminal Appeal No. 633 of 1927, Decided on 21st February 1928, from order of Addl. Sess. Judge, 24-Perganahs, D/-5th August 1927.

Criminal P. C., S. 268—Trial by jury—One of the jurymen not knowing English—Charge translated to him in vernacular by Public Prosecutor and the defence mukhtear allowed to object if he was not satisfied—Verdict of jury unanimous—Accused is not prejudiced.

Where one of the jurymen in a case had not an adequate knowledge of English and when the peshkar commenced to translate the Judge's charge in the vernacular, it was found to be unsatisfactory because of his lack of sufficient knowledge of English, whereupon it was arranged that the Public Prosecutor being the best man available as regards translating capacity would translate the charge to the jury, the mukhtear for the defence being told that if he wanted to object to any translation he was at liberty to object then and there and the verdict of the jury was unanimous:

Held: that there was no reason to think that this particular jurymen was not given the benefit of the correct translation of the Judge's charge and it was a fair trial and the accused was in no way prejudiced. [P 402 C 1]

Khundkar—for the Crown.

Suresh Chunder Taluqdar and Mohendra Kumar Ghose—for Complainant.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the two accused persons were put on their trial on a charge of having raped a girl called Tustumoni on 28th May last in the afternoon. The girl appeared to be of the age of 16 or 17. It is said that neither her father-in-law nor her mother-in-law was in the house.

The defence was that the girl was the kept woman of one of the witnesses, Hari Narayan and that the whole story was false, and it was alleged that it arose out of enmity with Hari Narayan.

There were many questions of fact for the jury upon which, it seems to me, that the jury might have come to conclusions one way or the other and would have had some reason in either case. We are now concerned with the question whether the case was put properly to the jury and it is of no avail at this stage for us to consider the questions of fact about which there was evidence both ways.

We have been taken through the charge of the learned Judge and I must say that it seems to me an admirable charge. It deals with the relevant facts. It omits hardly anything of the smallest importance, and in my opinion, it puts everything clearly and fairly. It is true that in one part of the charge, with reference to the question whether the girl was the kept woman of Hari Narayan, the learned Judge says:

It appears that that was put to Tustumoni and that, no doubt, is a mistake on the part of the learned Judge. I can see no other expression in this charge that is open to serious criticism. The learned Judge was endeavouring to describe the character of the country in which this hut or house was, pointing out to the jury that the incident did not take place in a village but in an abadi. It is true that there is some evidence that there were certain houses not very far away. I do not think that that in any way shows that what the learned Judge said was in any way misleading to the jury.

It was pointed out that the mother-in-law was not called. An explanation was given that she was deranged in her mind and the learned Judge told the jury that if they thought fit they could draw the inference that the mother-in-law was being kept back by the prosecution. The learned Judge might have gone on to say that if the jury thought that she was being kept back by the prosecution they might draw the further inference that if she had been called she would have given evidence contrary to the prosecution case. It does seem to me that we may attribute sufficient intelligence to the jury in understanding what is meant by "being kept back by the prosecution."

Again, as regards the medical evidence I can see no serious criticism to be made upon what the learned Judge has told the jury. He does not tell them that they are not to think about it all. What he does tell is that, although the doctor has said that there were injuries on the girl that might have been caused in the way she says, still the doctor very fairly says that if anybody was minded to set up a false case of rape it would be quite possible to produce similar injuries for that purpose; and, therefore, the learned Judge says that one cannot decide this case by the doctor's evidence, that the doctor's evidence is inconclusive and that before one convicts a prisoner one must do so on the strength of other evidence in the case. That I think is a very fair way of putting it to the jury and that particular passage again seems to me to be quite correct.

The result, in my judgment, is that with the exception of this slip where he says:

You will also remember that that was a matter which was never put to Tustumoni, there is nothing that can be found fault with in this charge and I am of opinion that that is not a matter of any great importance. It only concerns with whether or not it was put to the girl. It was put to the girl and the girl denied it.

The only other matter is that it has been brought to our attention that one of the jurymen in this case had not an adequate knowledge of English and that apparently when the peshkar commenced to translate the Judge's charge in the vernacular it was found to be unsatisfactory because of his lack of sufficient knowledge of English. Thereupon it seems that it was arranged that the Public Prosecutor being the best man available as regards translating capacity would translate the charge to the jury, the mukhtear for the defence being told that if he wanted to object to any translation he was to be at liberty to object then and there. It strikes me that that is perhaps unfortunate but not an unfair way of getting the translation made as long as it was understood that the mukhtear was free to object whenever he thought fit to object. It is said that the mukhtear on one or two occasions, at all events, did object. That being so, the juror was given the benefit of the fact that one man put it one way and the other man put it the other way and I do not think that there was any possible prejudice to the prisoner in a matter of this sort. After all it appears that all the other members of the jury knew English sufficiently and that this particular member of the jury appears to have agreed with all the others. There was a finding of the jury that was unanimous. Of course there is a great temptation in criminal cases to use any loophole which suggests possibility of a prejudice that can be exaggerated afterwards. Speaking for myself I rather object to putting it upon mukhtears or other people that they should consent to do something which is not in itself proper without their consent. It is very much to be wished that peshkars or the Judges themselves should explain the charge to the jurymen who do not know English, but in this case I am quite satisfied that there are no reasons to think that this particular jurymen was not given the benefit of the correct translation of the Judge's charge. In all these circumstances I think this appeal must fail. It is accordingly dismissed.

SUHWARDY AND GRAHAM, JJ.

K. C. Bannerjee, Official Receiver—Petitioner, In re.

Civil Rule No. 1481 of 1927, Decided on 20th December 1927, against order of Court of President of Calcutta Improvement Tribunal, D/- 23rd August 1927.

(a) Land Acquisition Act, S. 32—Compensation money acquired by an incompetent person is part of his real property.

The compensation money representing the estate of an incompetent person such as idol partakes of the nature of real property and does not lose its character as such because it has been transformed in shape. [P 404 C 2]

(b) Land Acquisition Act, S. 32—Acquisition Court holds the compensation money subject to the orders of civil Court

Under S. 32 the acquisition Court is not absolutely vested with the compensation money. It is apparent that possession of the receiver is the possession of the Court and the money if made over to the receiver will remain in custodia legis. The law does not vest the acquisition Court with such power as to retain the money in its possession in spite of the direction of a competent civil Court. [P 402 C 2]

(c) Civil P. C., O. 41, R. 1—Receiver is the officer and representative of the Court—Limitation on his powers explained—Receiver.

Graham, J.—A receiver by his appointment does not become the representative of the party, but is an officer and representative of the Court which appoints him. Indeed he is frequently spoken of as "the hand of Court" and is merely in possession of the property on behalf of the party who may be ultimately declared to be entitled thereto. One or other of the parties must eventually be declared to be entitled to the securities in question or at all events to retain possession of them. A receiver appointed by the Court is merely a temporary custodian of the properties on behalf of the Court, and holds them for the benefit of the party successful in the litigation. He cannot deal with the properties in any way without the consent and approval of the Court, so that no apprehension need arise that the interest of either of the contesting parties is likely to suffer in any way by reason of his temporarily retaining possession of the properties.

Bipin Chandra Mallik and Kusi Prasun Chatterjee—for Petitioner.

Suhrawardy, J.—This application in revision is by the Official Receiver of this Court against an order of the President of the Calcutta Improvement Tribunal by which the learned President refused to make over certain Government promissory notes held in his Court to the petitioner. In the circumstances of the case there is no opposite party and we had to hear this matter ex parte. We have given our earnest consideration to the facts of this case and to the observation made by the learned President in his judgment. The facts are that a portion of the premises No. 28, Giri Babu's Lane, in Calcutta belonging to the debutter estate of certain idols was acquired under the Land Acquisition Act and the compensation thereof was deposited with the Calcutta Improvement Tribunal under S. 31 of the Act. Thereafter some of the shebais of the said idols instituted a suit in the original side of this Court against certain persons for a certain declaration which will be more particularly mentioned later. In that suit an application was made by the plaintiffs for the appointment of a receiver and the Court appointed the Official Receiver as Receiver in the suit with all the powers with which a receiver can be vested under O. 40, R. 1, Civil P. C. The receiver thereafter applied to the President of the Tribunal that the Government securities representing the compensation money awarded in respect of a portion of the debutter property acquired might be made over to him. The learned President on certain considerations has refused to make over the securities to the petitioner. Before proceeding further it is necessary to observe that the order appointing the petitioner as receiver ran in the following words:

And it is further ordered that the said receiver be also at liberty to withdraw the securities representing the compensation money in respect of premises No. 28, Giri Babu's Lane, and deposited with the Tribunal of the Improvement Trust, Calcutta, and the interest accrued due and to accrue due thereon.

Since the learned President has declined to part with the securities in spite of the order of this Court, the matter has assumed an importance which demands very careful consideration by us. The main grounds on which the learned President has refused to make over the securities to the petitioner may be summed up thus: (1) The receiver is only a trustee for the parties to the suit, and no party to the suit is a person competent to alienate the land within the meaning of S. 31, Land Acquisition Act 1 of 1894 or a person entitled to act under S. 3, prov. (iv) of the Act; (2) That the suit in the High Court is a suit between parties claiming to be shebais to which the idols are not parties either in name or in substance; and, therefore, the properties which belong to idols should not be made over to the receiver appointed in such a suit; (3) The order of the High Court appointing the petitioner to be the receiver cannot deprive the Improvement Tribunal of the statutory right which it has under the Act of retaining the money, under O. 40, R. 1 (2) and the order of appointment of the receiver cannot operate so as to remove from its possession or custody the property as no party to the suit has a present right so to remove.

As regards the first ground it is clear on the authorities that the view expressed by the learned President is not tenable in the circumstances of the present case. As has been held in the case of Harihar Mukherjee v. Harendra Nath Mukherjee (1), a receiver appointed by the Court is not ordinarily the representative or agent of either party in the administration of the trust. But his appointment is for the benefit of all parties and he holds the properties for the benefit of those ultimately found to be the rightful owners; and reliance has been placed on the decision in Jagat Tarini Dassi v. Naba Gopal Chaka (2), where it is laid down that the receiver is the representative of the Court and may be deemed to be right arm of the Court in exercising jurisdiction invoked in such cases for administering the property because the Court can only administer through a receiver. The learned Judges further observed that no doubt, in some cases the expression is used that the receiver may be considered as a representative of the parties to the suit but this only in the sense that as against an adverse claimant his title does not stand higher than that of the parties to the litigation; and upon this notion of the character of the receiver is founded the provision in O. 40, R. 1 (2), Civil P.C. In Harihar Mukherjee's case (1) the question was whether the receiver appointed by the Court could take possession of the property without a succession certificate. It was held that a receiver, when he seeks to take possession of the subject-matter of the litigation under an order the Court is not a person who claims to be entitled to the effects of a deceased person under the Succession Certificate Act, 1889, and he is in no sense a representative of the deceased person but, is merely entrusted by the Court with certain power over the estate for temporary purposes. The decision in Radha Binode Mandal v. Gopal Jiu Thakur (3) rests on the fact that there the suit was for declaration of plaintiffs' title as shebait in which the idol was not interested.

This brings us to a consideration of the nature of the suit in the High Court which is connected with the second ground on which the learned President's judgment is founded. The suit in the High Court as appears from a perusal of the plaint is no doubt for a declaration that the plaintiffs and some of the defendants are shebait of the idol. But there are also two prayers in the plaint which are relevant for our present purposes. The prayer (o) is to this effect :

If necessary the said debutter estate be administered by and under the direction of this honourable Court,

if necessary a scheme be framed for the proper performance of the worship of the Thakur.

It is conceivable that in view of these prayers this Court appointed the receiver and authorized him to take possession of all the debutter properties including the promissory notes in the hands of the improvement tribunal. In the suit the plaintiffs further prayed that certain unauthorized alienations of the idols' properties might be set aside. Considering the entire scope of the suit it is difficult to hold that the idols were not interested in the suit. As has been observed by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Jagadindra Nath Roy v. Hemanta Kumari Devi (4), that although an idol may be regarded as a juridical person capable of holding properties, it is only true in an ideal sense; but the fact remains that the possession and management of the dedicated properties belong to shebait; in other words though the idol is the owner of a property but being incompetent to manage it, the right of management and possession is vested in the shebait. The suit is for the benefit of the idols though a portion of it relates to matters personal to the plaintiffs. We are told that all the other properties belonging to the idols have been taken possession of by the receiver. There appears to be no reason why the promissory notes which are in the possession of the Tribunal should not be taken possession of by the receiver as a part of the debutter estate. As has been held in Mrinalini Dasi v. Abinash Chander Dutt (5) the compensation money representing the estate of an incompetent person partakes of the nature of real property and does not lose its character as such because it has been transformed in shape. The money in the hands of the Tribunal therefore, is a portion of the debutter property which would have come into the possession of the receiver under the direction of the Court if it were not acquired under the Land Acquisition Act : see also Kamini Devi v. Promotho Nath Mukerjee (6).

As to the third ground under S. 32, Land Acquisition Act, the acquisition Court is not absolutely vested with the compensation money. It is apparent that possession of the receiver is the possession of the Court and the money if made over to the receiver will remain in custodia legis. The law does not vest the acquisition Court with such power as to retain the money in its possession in spite of the direction of a competent civil Court. Taking all these facts into consideration I am of opinion that the order of the learned President of the Improvement Trust should be set aside and that he be requested to comply with the order of this Court by making over the money to the petitioner. This rule is made absolute.

Graham, J.—I agree and desire to add only a few words. The rule was issued at the instance of the Official Receiver to show cause why an order of the President of the Calcutta Improvement Trust Tribunal rejecting the application of the Official Receiver to withdraw certain securities deposited with the Tribunal under S. 31 of the Act should not be set aside and an order made directing the delivery of the said securities to the petitioner.

The learned President of the Improvement Trust Tribunal, in refusing the application, proceeded mainly upon the ground that he was precluded by the terms of the statute (Land Acquisition Act 1 of 1894) from acceding to the application, and he has referred in support of the view taken by him to certain provisions of the Act. He has held that the receiver stands in the shoes of the parties and represents them, and that that being so he cannot have any greater power than is possessed by the party whom he represents. The learned President has perhaps not considered sufficiently the fact that a receiver by his appointment does not become the representative of the party, but is an officer and representative of the Court which appoints him. Indeed he is frequently spoken of as "the hand of Court" and is merely in possession of the property on behalf of the party who may be ultimately declared to be entitled thereto. One or other of the parties must eventually be declared to be entitled to the securities in question, or at all events to retain possession of them. A receiver appointed by the Court is merely a temporary custodian of the property on behalf of the Court and holds them for the benefit of the party successful in the litigation. He cannot deal with the properties in any way without the consent and approval of the Court, so that no apprehension need arise that the interest of either of the contesting parties is likely to suffer in any way by reason of his temporarily retaining possession of the properties. For these reasons and also in view of the order made on the original side of this Court by Mr. Justice Pearson I agree with my learned brother that the order which has been made by the President of the Improvement Trust Tribunal cannot be sustained and that this rule should be made absolute.

Civil Rule No. 952 of 1927, Decided on 29th November 1927, against decree of Sub Judge, Khulna, in S. C. C. Suit No. 28 of 1927, D/- 22nd April 1927.

Provincial Small Causes Act (9 of 1887), Sch. 2, Art. 35 (ii)—Suit for damages for taking away paddy—No offence under Ch. 17, Penal Code, disclosed—Suit is cognizable by Small Cause Court.

A suit for mesne profits against a trespasser is cognizable by Small Cause Court and Cl. (2) of S. 35 has not effected any change in the law.

Plaintiff had obtained as against the defendants delivery of possession of a certain land through the Court. Thereafter litigation went on between the plaintiff and the defendants, and taking advantage of the said litigation the defendants did not give up possession, and continuing in such possession took away the paddy that was standing on the land and appropriated the same to their own use. The plaintiff sued for damages for use and occupation.

Held: that the suit was cognizable by Small Cause Court as damages that had been claimed were not for any act which amounted to any criminal offence within the meaning of Chap. 17, I. P. C. : 28 C. L. J. 120, Dist.

*S. C. Bose and Saroj Kumar Chatterjee—*for Petitioners.

*Sarat Chandra Roy Choudhuri and Santi Kumar Roy Choudhuri—*for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—I am of opinion that to accede to the contention urged on behalf of the petitioners in this Rule would be to hold that all suits for recovery of mesne profits against trespassers are outside the cognizance of the Court of Small Causes. Sch. 2, Art. 31, Provincial Small Causes Courts Act, was construed by this Court prior to the introduction of Cl. (ii) of Art. 35 in the case of Kunjo Behary Singh v. Madhub Chandra Ghose (1), and a Full Bench of this Court held that suits were cognizable by Courts of Small Causes. To find out whether the introduction of Cl. (ii) to Art. 35 in the said schedule has effected any change in the law it may not be out of place to refer to what was said in that case by Trevelyan, J. He observed that suits for damages in the nature of mesne profits were cognizable by a Court of Small Causes even under Act 11 of 1865. It would require very strong reasons to suppose that the introduction of Cl. (ii) was made in Art. 35 with the object of unsettling the practice that has obtained in this country ever since the foundation of Courts of Small Causes, and indeed to those who are familiar with the history of this clause it is well known why and to meet what class of cases this clause was introduced.

Turning now to the allegations contained in the plaint upon which the plaintiff's cause of action is founded what is stated in paras. 6 and 7 thereof is this that the plaintiff had obtained as against the defendants delivery of possession through the Court on the 17th November 1924, that thereafter litigation went on between the plaintiff and the defendants, and that taking advantage of the said litigation the defendants did not give up possession and continuing in such possession took away the paddy that was standing on the land on the said 17th November 1924, and that thereafter they illegally grew paddy on the land in the year 1332 and appropriated the same to their own use and for that the plaintiff sued "for damages for use and occupation." These allegations standing by themselves would hardly make out a case either under S. 379, I. P. C., or under S. 447 thereof. Other elements have got to be proved in order to establish a case of criminal trespass or of theft as against the defendants. It might well be that the defendants acted under a bona fide claim of right, that although the Court had delivered possession of the land to the plaintiff they were not willing to part with their possession in view of such rights as they thought they had in the lands, and that after acting in that belief they did not give up possession but continued to be in occupation of the lands and to grow crops thereon and to take such crops as had actually been grown by them and belonged to them. I do not see how it can be said that the acts committed by the defendants necessarily amounted to theft or criminal trespass.

My attention has been drawn to a decision of this Court in the case of Abinash Chandra Sarkar v. Atul Krishna Bose (2), in support of the position which the petitioners have taken up, namely, that the allegations in the plaint, if established, do constitute a criminal offence. It will be seen however, that there is a broad distinction between that case and the present one. The difference lies in this that in that case the complainant having obtained a decree for possession against a certain person had obtained actual possession of the land in respect of which the decree had been passed—actual possession in the sense in which the expression is understood in criminal law. I am of opinion that the damages that have been claimed in the present suit are not for any act which would amount to any criminal offence within the meaning of Chap. 17, I. P. C. We need not in the present case look at the exceptions contained in Chap. 4, I. P. C., for the determination of this question at all. I accordingly hold that the Small Cause Court had jurisdiction to deal with this suit.

The Rule is, in my opinion, fit to be discharged and I order accordingly. The opposite party will be entitled to costs. Hearing fee two gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 2186 of 1925, Decided on 23rd January 1928, from appellate decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, Noakhali, D/- 20th June 1925.

(a) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 52—Reduction in the area of holding—No stipulation in the patta that tenant would not be entitled to any reduction of rent—Tenant is entitled to the proportionate reduction of jama.

Section 52 gives a statutory right to the tenant to have his jama reduced when there is a reduction in the area of the holding in creating a permanent tenure. An agreement with a tenant to deprive him of the provisions of S. 52 is valid; but that agreement must be stated in clearness. When there is no stipulation in the patta that the tenant would not be entitled to any reduction of rent even if there would be a reduction in the area of the holding then the tenant would be entitled to the proportionate reduction of the jama: A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 880, Ref. [P 407 C 1]

(b) Bengal Cess Act, S. 41—Valuation roll is a factor in determining the amount of cess.

The rate as laid down in the Cess Act is not the only factor in determining the amount of cess. There is another factor in determining it and that factor is the valuation roll.

Jyotis Chandra Guha—for Appellant.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of arrears of rent. The defence inter alia was that the defendant was entitled to a reduction of the jama as admittedly a portion of the holding had been acquired by Government and that the cess which the plaintiff had claimed was excessive the plaintiffs having claimed cess at the rate of 2½ annas in the rupee whereas according to the defence it should have been only six pies in the rupee. This defence found favour with the first Court and the trial Judge gave a part-decree to the plaintiffs in accordance with the case for the defence. In appeal, the lower appellate Court set aside the judgment and decree of the Court of first instance and gave a full decree to the plaintiffs. The defendant has come up to this Court in second appeal.

The first point that arises for consideration is whether the defendant was entitled to a proportionate reduction of the jama. The learned Subordinate Judge could not allow any reduction of the jama principally on two grounds. One of these grounds was that there had been nothing in the patta under which the land was held to show that the defendant would be entitled to a reduction of the jama in case there would be a reduction in the area of the holding. I do not see how that ground can be sustained. S. 52, Ben. Ten. Act, gave a statutory right to the defendant to have his jama reduced when there was a reduction in the area of the holding. Then as regards the absence of any stipulation in the patta on the question of reduction of rent: it is true that in creating a permanent tenure (as the tenure in the present case is) an agreement with a tenant to deprive him of the provisions of S. 52 is valid; but that agreement must be stated in clearness: Umesh Chandra v. Mati Lal (1). In the present case, as I have stated before, there was no stipulation in the patta that the defendant would not be entitled to any reduction of rent even if there would be a reduction in the area of the holding.

The second ground on which the learned Subordinate Judge refused to allow a proportionate reduction of rent to the defendant was that as the land had originally been let out on two pattas in which there were two different rates of rent given no reduction of rent was possible under the ordinary rule of three. But it appears that the defendant in an additional written statement gave full details of the two holdings as created by the two pattas and also of the subsequent amalgamation of them with an average rate of Rs. 3-1-6 per kani. The plaintiffs in no part of their case challenged these allegations as they are to be found in the schedule attached to this additional written statement. In these circumstances and remembering also that the point of the present average rate was never raised in the Court of first instance I am of opinion that the learned Subordinate Judge was not justified in raising that point and in making it one of his grounds for refusing the defendant a proportionate reduction. The two grounds on which the lower appellate Court refused to allow any proportionate reduction in the rent are both, in my opinion, unsustainable and I am of opinion that the defendant was in the circumstances of the case entitled to a reduction of the jama as claimed by him.

There was another point urged before me and that was about the amount of cess allowed to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were allowed by the lower appellate Court an amount of cess as it is to be found in the settlement khatian. The learned vakil for the appellant contended that this was not proper inasmuch as the Cess Act does not allow any rate higher than six pies in the rupee. But the rate as laid down in the Cess Act is not the only factor in determining the amount of cess. There is another factor in determining it and that factor is the valuation roll. The rate of cess at Rs. 3-6-4 per year, as it is to be found in the settlement khatian, must be presumed to be correct and as observed by the learned Subordinate Judge there was nothing in the present case which rebutted that presumption. The rate at which the lower appellate Court has allowed cess to the plaintiffs must, therefore, stand.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal is allowed in part. The plaintiffs will get a decree for rent at the rate admitted by the defendant. But they will get cess at the rate as it is to be found in the settlement khatian after making a proportionate reduction in the sum as in the case of the rent. I make no order as to costs in this appeal as no one put in any appearance on behalf of the respondent at the time of the hearing. The costs in the lower Courts will be in proportion to the success and failure of the parties.

Judgment.—In this case, the plaintiffs brought a suit in respect of one and a half bighas of homestead land, their case being that the tenancy was created by acceptance of a kabuliyat from the predecessors of the defendants. Of the three defendants, defendant 1 denied that he had any interest, defendant 2 did not appear and defendant 3 contested saying that the land was not held under the plaintiff at all but held under one Hari Mondal at a different rental, from whom he had a potta which he produced. The first Court decreed the suit. He went into the evidence and found that the relationship of landlord and tenant in respect of this land existed between the parties and the rent was due. He considered the fact that there had been a previous decree for rent in which a kabuliyat was mentioned, though the kabuliyat on which the plaintiff based the inception of the tenancy was not produced in the present suit. He also considered other points and then gave his decision. The learned Subordinate Judge however, in delivering a judgment of affirmance, has dealt with nothing at all except that he says that there was a previous rent-decree. On the other hand, he says the potta of the defendants does not show that it relates to this land but he also says

We do not know whether the kabuliyat lands, whatever they may be, are the same as plaintiff lands but that is no matter and the identity of the same may be left open.

I cannot hold that this is a sufficient judgment by a final Court of fact for the disposal of this matter. The defendant has a right to have a judgment deciding the points of fact and not merely a judgment in affirmance come to by just saying that there was a previous decree and so there can be a decree now. In the result, I must set aside the judgment of the Subordinate judge and send back the case for re-hearing of the appeal according to law. Costs in this Court will abide the result.

Appeals Nos. 1581 to 1588 of 1925, Decided on 5th August 1927, from appellate decrees of Spl. Judge, Jessore, D/- 25th March 1925.

Evidence Act, S. 32 (2)—Rent suit by landlord—Account books from the landlord's sherista tendered in evidence and admitted under S. 32 (2)—The fact that they were made in the absence of and without the assent of the tenants and were uncorroborated is not sufficient ground to consider them as of no value.

In a suit by a landlord under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, for settlement of fair and equitable rent, the tenants produced dakhilas to prove that certain holdings had been held at a uniform rate of rent for more than 20 years. In order to rebut a presumption in favour of the tenants the landlords tendered in evidence certain account books from their sherista. The lower Court admitted them under S. 32 (2), but refused to attach any value to the entries in these account book because these books were prepared in the landlord's sherista, in the absence of tenants, and they were uncorroborated.

Page, J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the learned Special Judge of Jessore reversing a decision of the Assistant Settlement Officer of Jessore. The appeal arises out of an application by a landlord under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, for settlement of fair and equitable rent. A large number of holdings were under consideration, but this appeal relates only to eight of them. The record-of-rights is in favour of the landlord, and in the record-of-rights is an entry to the effect that the holdings under dispute are those of settled raiyats, and, therefore, prima facie the rent was liable to enhancement under certain circumstances. The tenants who are now respondents pray in aid S. 50, sub-S. (2), Ben. Ten. Act, and produced dakhilas which proved to the satisfaction of both Courts that these eight holdings had been held at a uniform rate of rent for more than 20 years. In order to rebut the presumption which under such circumstances will arise in favour of the tenants the landlords, who are now appellants, tendered in evidence certain account books from their sherista, namely jama wasil baki jamabandi, sheha and karcha papers. These papers relate to the year 1872 and onwards, and both the lower Courts have considered these account-books upon the footing that they were admissible in evidence under S. 32, sub-S. (2), Evidence Act, 1872. The entries in these books, therefore, were admissible, in evidence without corroboration: see Rampyarabai v. Balaji Shridhar (1); Dukha Mandal v. W. N. Grant (2); Aktowli v. Tarak Nath Ghose (3); Umed Ali v. Khaje Habibulla (4). The entries in these account-books were also admissible in evidence notwithstanding that they were made in the absence of and without the assent of the tenants. But the weight to be attached to the entries in these account-books was a matter to be determined by the tribunal whose duty it was to take them into consideration, and in second appeal, if it is clear that the lower appellate Court, under a proper appreciation of the law material to the matter in hand, had come to a finding of fact upon the issue as to whether the entries in these account books outweighed the evidence of the dakhilas produced by the tenants or not, this Court would not interfere with the finding at which the lower appellate Court arrived.

In the present case, however, it is apparent from the judgment of the learned Special Judge that he has not considered the relative weight to be attached to the entries in these account-books and the rent receipts produced by the tenants upon the merits of the documents at all. In my opinion, the learned Special Judge approached the consideration of this matter from the wrong standpoint, for, as I understand his judgment, the ground upon which he refused to attach any value to the entries in these account books, whatever they might have been and however genuine they were, was that these books were prepared in the landlord's sherista and it is not fair to charge the tenants with liability on the strength of papers prepared in the zamindar's office in the absence of the tenant, and that no value is to be attached to such paper in the absence of legal corroboration by other sufficient evidence. Now, as we have said, merely because papers such as those in question are not corroborated or merely because they were prepared in the landlord's office in the absence of the tenants, is not a sufficient ground for refusing to attach any value to the entries in those books as evidence.

In this case, in my opinion, in considering the facts the learned Special Judge misdirected himself as to the law, and the case must be remanded to the lower appellate Court in order that the appeal should be determined according to law. It is not to be understood that because this case is remanded for re-hearing this Court has expressed or formed any opinion whatever as to whether the entries in these documents taken together with the other evidence in this case are sufficient to establish that the tenants of this holding are liable to have the rate of rent, that they are now paying, readjusted. It may be that after considering these documents and the other evidence the learned Special Judge will come to the conclusion that the entry in the record-of-rights is correct. On the other hand, he may take an opposite view. But inasmuch as the entries in these account books have been held by both the lower Courts to be admissible under S. 32, sub-S. (2), Evidence Act, the learned Special Judge is not entitled to summarily dismiss them from consideration together with the other evidence in deciding the issues which fall to be determined upon the appeal. The result is that the decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside, and the case is sent back to that Court to be dealt with in accordance with law. Costs of and incidental to this appeal abide the result. We assess the hearing-fee in this appeal at two gold mohurs.

This judgment will also govern the other seven analogous appeals.

Mahendra Kumar Ghose and Suresh Chandra Taluqdar—for Petitioner.

Judgment.—The petitioner is the owner of a motor-bus which was on a certain day driven by a person who had no license to drive. The petitioner has thereupon been convicted under S. 16, Motor Vehicles Act (8 of 1914) and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 15 and an order has been made under S. 18 of the Act cancelling his license for a period of six months. This rule is directed against the said conviction, sentence and order.

The petitioner's defence was that seven or eight days before the date of the occurrence he had left for home leaving the bus in charge of his licensed driver and that he was not liable if any unlicensed person drove the bus during his absence and without his knowledge. There was a further defence that the licensed driver was on the bus but it has been disbelieved. The licensed driver Krishna was examined as a Court witness. He said that on the day in question, he went away to take his meals asking one Shyam Lal Das to act as driver but as a matter of fact one Nalini who had no license has driven it. He said further that the petitioner had gone home some days before the date of the occurrence. He also said that Nalini was the manager of the bus and used to accompany him on the bus. There is a further statement in the cross-examination of this witness by the defence which runs in these words:

The bus was in charge of Nalini and not of myself.

It is not clear whether by this the witness meant to deny the allegation of the petitioner that he had left for home leaving the bus in charge of the witness; but as the Magistrate has not stated anything about this matter in his judgment I think it is fair to proceed on the supposition that this allegation of the petitioner has not been disproved. In that view the question that arises is whether the petitioner is punishable for the fact that the bus was driven, though without his knowledge and without his consent express or implied, by a person who is not a licensed driver.

The conviction of the petitioner is founded on the liability of the owner arising under S 6 of the Act. The relevant portion of the section runs thus:

No owner shall allow any person who is not (so) licensed to drive it.

The Magistrate has purported to follow the decisions in the cases of Thornton v. Emperor (1) and Baidya Nath Bose v. Emperor (2) to which he has referred in his judgment, and on the authority of those decisions has held that the petitioner should have seen that the bus was not driven by any man other than a licensed driver. He has further remarked that even upon the decision in the case of Viraj Lall v. Emperor (3) the petitioner is liable as the driving of the car by any man other than a licensed driver is expressly prohibited by the Act, because on the principle of that decision the petitioner as master of Krishna is liable for the criminal act of Krishna in allowing Nalini to drive the bus,

Now the penal clause upon which the conviction in Thornton v. Emperor (1) was founded was R 4 of the rules framed under the Bengal Motor and Cycle Act 3 of 1903 which was worded thus:

No person shall drive or have charge of or cause or permit to be used any motor-car, motor cycle or trailer which does not in all respects conform to these rules or which is so driven or used as to contravene any of these rules.

The rule contravened in that case was R. 20 which purported to forbid the reckless or negligent driving of a motor car. It was held that once the permission express or implied to use a car was given the owner remains responsible for any misuse of the car while that permission lasts and that a general injunction to the chauffeur never to drive the car beyond the regulation speed is not sufficient to get rid of the owner's responsibility. These Rr. 4 and 20 were for all practical purposes same as Rr. 3 and 19 framed under the Act of 1914 under which arose the case of Baidya Nath Bose v. Emperor (3). In that case it was said that the language of R. 3 could not be said to be very happy and that the construction of the rule was not free from doubt but the decision in Thornton's case (1) was binding. The view taken in Thornton's case (1) has been dissented from in the case of Viraj Lall v. Emperor (3) which was a case under R. 3 and R. 16 framed under the Act of 1914. It has been said in that case that where a particular intent or state of mind is not of the essence of an offence, a master can be made criminally liable for his servant's acts if an act is expressly prohibited but not otherwise; and he cannot be so made liable if the act provides for liability for permitting and causing a certain thing unless it can be shown that the act was done with the master's knowledge and assent, express or implied.

These decisions may be helpful in interpreting R. 4 or R. 3 referred to above and to which they relate, in which the words are:

No person shall cause or permit to be used any motor vehicle etc., words which make it necessary to determine whether the word "person" is meant to include an absentee owner. The decisions properly viewed merely purport to lay down rules of interpretation to be followed in such and similar cases. In my judgment they are of little assistance in construing the words of S. 6 of the Act to which I have already referred and which define the liability of the owner who is made liable for allowing a person not to drive the vehicle.

The real question is whether in the circumstances that have happened in the present case the petitioner can be said to have allowed Nalini to drive the bus. It is a question of fact whether he did so or not, and to answer this question it will have to be considered: firstly whether he did so himself; and secondly whether if Krishna did so, Krishna's act may be imputed to him under any general principle of law relating to master and servant.

As regards the first of these two questions: it cannot be said that there is any evidence either direct or circumstantial from which any consent express or implied can be held to have been established or to be capable of being deduced. As far as can be made out it has not been established even that the petitioner had any knowledge that such a contingency was likely to happen.

(1) [1911] 38 Cal. 415=13 C. L. J. 335=9 I.C. 480=15 C. W. N. 390.

As regards the second question: there is abundant authority for the proposition that a servant has no implied authority to engage a stranger to do work on behalf of his master, so as to render the master liable for the stranger's acts or defaults except perhaps in a case of necessity, which term comprises only some well-known exceptional cases: Gwilliam v. Twist (4) and Haris v. Fiat Motors Ltd. (5), (both of which were cases in which the driver left the control of the car allowing it to be driven by a stranger). Similarly where a driver contrary to instructions allowed a third person to drive who knocked down a passer-by it was held that the owner was not liable as the driver had acted outside the scope of his authority: Coogan v. Dublin Motor Co. (6). But the owner's liability may arise if the driver retains control of the car and allows a stranger to drive negligently: Ricketts v. Thos. Tilling Ltd. (7) and Richard v. Shard (8). If these general principles are applied to the present case, the petitioner can hardly be said to be responsible for the act of Krishna for Krishna, even if he had allowed Nalini to drive the bus, had clearly acted outside the scope of his authority in doing so.

On no conceivable principle then, in my judgment, can the petitioner be said to have allowed Nalini to drive the bus and consequently his conviction and sentence and the order of cancellation of his license against which the rule is directed must be set aside and the fine if paid should be refunded. The rule is made absolute.

application to the category of plaintiffs. These two plaintiffs claimed the property in suit as the reversionary heirs of one Bhabani Das Bhattacharja who died in October or November 1874 leaving a widow Bama Sundari surviving him. Bhabani had previously executed a will dated 28th July 1874, by which he had appointed several executors. The executors renounced their executorship and the widow applied for letters of administration with the copy of the will annexed which was granted to her on 8th February 1875. It appears that on 6th May 1879 the widow Bama Sundari executed two permanent leases in favour of one Gour Hari Das (Choudhury), the predecessor-in-interest of defendants 7 to 15, and the properties covered by these two leases are the only subject-matter of dispute in this appeal. The Subordinate Judge has made a decree for possession in favour of the plaintiffs making the defendants liable for mesne profits. From that decree these defendants have appealed to this Court.

The history after the grant of the letters of administration is that the agnates of Bhabani Das oppressed his widow in various ways so that she was obliged to leave the family dwelling-house of her husband and had to go to live in her father's residence. In September 1899 she applied to the District Judge for permission to sell certain properties. This permission was refused and in that order the District Judge made certain observations about the revocation of the letters granted to her. In November 1899 two of the executors applied for letters of administration with the will annexed of Bhabani Das and plaintiff 1 also made a similar application. In the meantime, on 28th September 1899, Bama Sundari sold her right to all the properties to the predecessor-in-interest of defendants 1 to 6. The learned District Judge granted letters of administration to one of the executors named Kibal Krishna Bhattacharji. On appeal the High Court set aside that order and the result was that the original grant to Bama Sundari was not interfered with. In September 1906 Bama Sundari brought the properties covered by the two pattas of 1879 to sale after having obtained a decree for rent. It will be noticed that this was after she had parted with all her interest in the properties left by her husband. The disputed properties were purchased by the predecessor-in-interest of defendants 16 to 19, who has been found to be a benamidar of the original lessee Gour Hari. Bama Sundari died on 10th January 1921, and this suit was brought by the plaintiffs to recover possession of the properties left by their maternal uncle Bhabani Das, of which the properties subject to the aforesaid leases are now the subject-matter of this appeal. The ground urged by them is that there was no legal necessity for permanent leases. The Subordinate Judge in his judgment discusses various points and has come to the conclusion that the leases were not granted for legal necessity. He has further held that the widow had only limited powers of alienation as administratrix and had not the power before the passing of the Probate and Administration Act, 1881 to grant permanent leases without the sanction of the District Judge. He has also held that the transaction entered into by the widow in granting permanent leases was not a bona fide one. He appears to have been of opinion that the salami which was said to have been paid to the lady before the Sub-Registrar was not actually received by her, but that there was only a show of payment. In that view he has decreed the suit.

The first contention on behalf of the appellants is that the Subordinate Judge has misread the law as regards the powers of an administrator governed by the Hindu Wills Act before the passing of the Probate and Administration Act as stated in Phillips and Trevelyan's book on Hindu Wills 2nd edn, p. 225, by omitting a "not" in the quotation made by him. This is true. Their argument is that before the passing of the Probate and Administration Act an administrator acting under the Hindu Wills Act had the same authority as an executor under S. 269, Succession Act, which was made applicable to Hindus by S. 2, Hindu Wills Act. S. 269, Succession Act, 1865, runs thus :

An executor or administrator has power to dispose of the property of the deceased, either wholly or in part in such manner as he may think fit.

I am of opinion that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in his view of the law as regards the powers of an administrator under the Hindu Wills Act before the passing of the Probate and Administration Act, 1881. Whether the leases are binding on the plaintiffs or not will depend on other considerations and the matter will be dealt with later on.

The next point urged is that in any view of the case under the terms of the will, it should be held that the widow forfeited her right to succeed to the property by the sale of all her properties inherited from her husband on 28th September 1899 and that the plaintiffs were entitled to come in as heirs under the Hindu law on that date; and the suit, having been brought in January 1924, was barred by limitation. With regard to this point we are of opinion that the appellants' argument cannot be sustained. Even assuming that the sale would work a forfeiture of the right of the widow, which we are not prepared to hold, there is no subsequent disposition of the property under the will and the result would be an intestacy. The widow was the heir under the Hindu law and she would be entitled to hold the property as the heir of the testator Bhabani Das under any circumstance when there was no gift over under the will; and so long as Bama Sundari was alive, the plaintiffs would have no title to the property left by Bhabani.

The first point is a more substantial one and requires careful consideration. It is contested on behalf of the respondents that Bama Sundari did not give the permanent leases of the property in question in the course of the administration of her husband's estate, and, therefore, the power conferred upon an administrator under S. 269, Succession Act, 1865, does not come into play. Letters of administration were granted to her in 1875. The finding of the Subordinate Judge is that there were no debts to be paid by the administrator. It was not necessary for the administrator to alienate the property for the purpose of administration, nor does it appear that the administration had not already come to an end at the time when the permanent leases were given. The leases, therefore, granted by the lady were not granted by her as administratrix, but should be taken as granted by her as a Hindu widow, and not being supported by legal necessity are not binding on the plaintiffs. It is further argued that on the finding of the Subordinate Judge, that the leases were not bona fide, they are not binding on the plaintiffs under any circumstance.

The lease Ex. B (16) shows the reason why it was given. The other lease, we are told, was in the same terms. There the lady describes herself as the widow of Bhabani. It is stated that the istem-rari mokarrari kaemi daemi patta was given for the purpose of her husband's Gaya sadh, for the expenses of her residence at Benares and other necessary expenses. These are matters which cannot be held to be for the purpose of the proper administration of the estate of her deceased husband, and she does not describe herself in granting the leases as administratrix nor does it anywhere appear that the lessee was aware that she was given letters of administration of her husband's estate.

I apprehend that the powers given to an executor under S. 269, Succession Act 1865 were for the purpose of conversion of the testator's estate into money for the payment of debts to the creditors and for the facility of division of the legacies. The powers granted under that Act were the same for all cases of administration, whether the testator died after leaving a will or died intestate. Where it is clear that no debt has to be paid and no legacies have to be divided, it would be difficult to say that an administrator has an unlimited power of sale for his own purposes. No authority in point has been cited at the Bar with regard to any restriction on the exercise of the power of an executor or administrator under S. 269, Succession Act, but as that section was taken from the English law, I think it is permissible to refer to English authorities in order to explain the nature of the power, which I shall presently do.

It was contended by Mr. Chandra Sekhar Sen in reply that the fact that the lady did not describe herself as administrator did not affect the right of the lessee and he relied on the case of Preonath Karar v. Suraja Coomar Goswami (1), where the Court held that the fact that the vendors did not describe themselves as administrators but described themselves as heirs did not affect the case because either as administrators or as heirs they were entitled to sell, though as heirs

they could not sell anything more than their own shares. This would be applicable only to the case of bona fide purchasers who had no knowledge that the money was to be applied otherwise than for the payment of the Testator's debts. see Corser v. Cartwright (2), referred to in the above case. In Solomon v. Attenborough (3) one of two executors without the knowledge of his co-executors, pawned articles of plate belonging to the testator's estate with certain pawnbrokers, who had no notice that he was not the absolute owner thereof, and he misapplied the money advanced upon them for his own purposes. At the date of the pledge all the testator's legacies and debts so far as they were known had been paid, but the residuary estate had not been completely realized and distributed. On the death of the pledgor the transaction was discovered and an action was brought by his co-executor and a new trustee against the pawnbrokers to recover the plate. The Court of appeal held, reversing the trial Court, that inasmuch as the pledgor had not purported to act as executor, and the defendants had no notice that he was executor, the latter had no title to the plate and must deliver it up to the plaintiffs. The House of Lords affirmed the decision on appeal on the ground that the proper inference from the facts was that the executors at the time held the plate not as executors but as trustees and, therefore, the deceased executor had no power to pledge the plate: Attenborough v. Solomon (4). In Ricketts v. Lewis (5) it was held that an administrator has no power to mortgage leaseholds of an intestate under leases not containing repairing covenants in order to raise money for repairing the property. And such a mortgage will be set aside as against a mortgagee who has notice of the purpose for which the money is raised. Fry J., (as he then was) observed :

What authority had the administratrix to raise money for the purpose of repairing the property? It may be that she was liable to repair by virtue of covenants in the lease, but having regard to the length of the terms and the time when they were granted that does not appear probable, and the onus of proving that there was such a liability is on the mortgagee, and he has not discharged it. It comes then, shortly, to this: that at the date of the mortgage Mrs. Lewis did not require the money for any purpose which it was her duty to perform as administratrix, and that she did require it for the purposes of her own beneficial enjoyment.

Applying the principles laid down in these cases there cannot be any doubt, in my judgment, that the leases in dispute cannot be sustained. There was no debt to pay off the testator; the lessor did not purport to grant the leases as administratrix; she did so rather as the widow of Bhabani Das; the lessee does not appear to have any knowledge that letters of administration had been granted to the lessor; there was clear notice in the lease to the lessee that the money was required for purposes quite different from what it was the duty of the lessor to perform as an administratrix; all these circumstances establish that the leases are not binding on the estate left by Bhabani Das, even assuming that the lessee did actually pay the premium to the lady as stated in the leases. An executor or administrator does not appear to have according to the law an absolute power to dispose of the property of the deceased if it is not necessary for the purpose of administration of the estate, but a bona fide purchaser may be protected in certain cases where a transfer is not for that purpose.

There can be no doubt that she could make alienations for necessity as a Hindu widow. But the Subordinate Judge has found that there was no necessity for such alienation and no attempt has been made to show that that finding is correct. It is further argued on behalf of the respondents that the will itself does not give a free power of alienation by way of leases even to the executors. Para. (8) of the will says :

In case it becomes necessary to grant any permanent leases to tenants, the executors shall be competent to grant them under the signature of my wife, and at the end of each year, they shall submit and explain an account of the income and expenditure to her.

It is urged that it cannot be reasonably said that when the executors had renounced, the widow, would according to the will itself, get an unfettered power of making alienation by way of permanent leases by taking letters of administration with the will annexed.

I am not quite sure that if it was necessary for the purpose of administration the widow could not grant a permanent lease by reason of these provisions. But on the grounds already stated we are of opinion that the leases which were granted by the lady were granted by her in the exercise of her right as the owner of a widow's estate as heir of Bhabani, and, as such, not being supported by legal necessity, the reversioners are entitled to recover possession after the death of the widow.

On these grounds the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Duval, J.—In this appeal, the main point which was argued on behalf of the appellant was that certain documents which were not tendered in evidence at the first trial, after a review of that trial had been obtained, were admitted in evidence in the second trial. It appears that the reviewing Court by its order did not exclude the trial Court from considering these documents at the re-hearing and by its order granting the review ordered that the case should be re-heard. Admittedly, these documents were relevant and admissible. Whether they ought to have been admitted or not at the discretion of the Court at the re-hearing was a matter for the Court to decide and I am not prepared to hold that these proceedings would be vitiated, because these documents at the discretion of the trial Court were used as evidence at the re-hearing. Moreover, the learned Judge in the lower appellate Court, apart altogether from those documents, relied upon certain dakhilas which were at any rate some evidence in support of the very issue upon which the disputed documents were used as evidence. It cannot be said that the finding of the lower appellate Court was arrived at without evidence being before it upon which it reasonably could arrive at the decision to which it came. That point, therefore, fails. The second point taken on behalf of the appellant is that as the review was granted upon one ground although the application for review was based upon another ground the subsequent proceedings were all vitiated. It is enough to say that in the circumstances of this case we should not be disposed to consider such a point, unless it was taken in the lower appellate Court. No objection, however, to the validity of the review proceedings was taken in the lower appellate Court and, in the circumstances, we do not propose to consider it on second appeal. The result is that this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—The appellant Bhadreswar Sardar, along with certain other persons who have not appealed to this Court, was tried in the Court of the learned Sessions Judge of Nadia with the aid of a jury for an offence under S. 395 I. P. C., and the learned Judge, agreeing with the unanimous verdict of guilty of the jury, has convicted and sentenced him to undergo five years rigorous imprisonment. The learned vakil who has appeared in support of the appeal has relied upon certain misdirections which he says the learned Judge has committed in that he admitted in evidence a certain statement made by one of the accused, Purna, before a Magistrate and wrongly described it as a confession. This statement was subsequently retracted. Now, the learned Judge, first of all, put S. 30, Evi. Act before the jury and then he went on to say:

The principle underlying the section is that, when a person makes a confession implicating himself and others to the same extent, the fact of self-implication affords some guarantee for the truth of the incrimination of the others. But the truth of this guarantee is weakened, as in the present case, when the confessing accused makes the others take a much more prominent part in the dacoity than he took himself and says that he was forced by the others to take them to Hazari's house and it is still further weakened, as here, when the accused has retracted his confession. Although capable of being taken into consideration, retracted confessions of this nature are to be scrutinized with the greatest care. It has not been made on oath, it has not been tested by cross examination and its truth has been denied by its maker. If the retracted confession were the only evidence on the record, its evidentiary value as against the other two accused Bhadreswar and Mohendra would be extremely meagre. You will take this confession into consideration, gentlemen, only after you have carefully weighed and scrutinized the whole of the prosecution evidence.

The learned vakil has contended that the statement made by Purna is not a confession, in as much as it is not incriminatory but self-exculpatory. We have no doubt, on reading the statement, that that is precisely what it is. It has been pointed out in many cases that a statement made by an accused person before it can be taken into consideration against a fellow prisoner, as is provided for in S. 30, Evidence Act, must amount to a confession on the part of the maker with respect to the offence with which all are charged. It must be a confession or, as it was put by Mr. Justice Straigh in Empress of India v. Ganraj (1) :

the test, S. 30, Evidence Act intended should be applied to a statement of one prisoner proposed to be used in evidence as against another is to see whether it is sufficient by itself to justify the conviction of the person making it of the offence for which he is being jointly tried with the other person or persons against whom it is tendered. In fact, to use a popular and well-understood phrase, the confessing prisoner must tar himself and the person or persons he implicates with one and the same brush.

If that test is applied to the present case, what do we find? Purna says that he went to the spot—the scene of the dacoity—under pressure; that, in fact, he was actually under fear of imminent death, that he took no part in the dacoity; that he stood outside the house and at the end went away. Mr. Khundkar who has appeared for the Crown has contended that, though it may not, strictly speaking, be a confession, it is nevertheless an admission. But, if it be regarded as an admission, there can be no doubt that the learned Judge did not put that aspect of the case to the jury; and even then, though it might be considered against the person who made it, it could by no possibility be considered as against the other accused persons. When we find that the learned Judge in this case all through dealt with this statement as a confession, we cannot but hold that this was a serious misdirection. In point of fact, a statement only becomes admissible in evidence at all if it is an incriminating statement which involves the maker as it does those persons whom he incriminates. It is no doubt true that the learned Judge took particular pains to explain what little value a statement of this kind, especially when retracted, has. But, on the other hand, it is possible that the mere fact that this statement had been placed before the jury when it was not admissible at all might have led them to a conclusion at which, in the absence of that statement, they would not have arrived. We think, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed and that the proper order to make in the case is to set aside the conviction and sentence and to direct that all the accused persons except Bhaku Sardar who has been acquitted by the jury be retried on the substantive charge.

Judgment.—The suit which has given rise to this appeal was instituted by the plaintiff for declaration of title and recovery of khas possession of certain lands.

The lands comprised of two plots, the southern portion of Cadastral Survey Plot No. 3315 and the whole of Cadastral Survey Plot No. 3316. The plaintiff's case was that the lands originally belonged to his father in ryoti right and comprised a holding held under one Nobo Chandra Saha, that the said Nobo Chandra Saha sold up the holding at a rent sale, and that one Ramesh Chandra Rakshit purchased it at the said sale and let it out to the plaintiff in dar-ryoti interest on 23rd April 1920, that the defendants dispossessed him in August 1920, upon which he instituted a suit under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, but was unsuccessful therein and hence the suit. The case of defendant 1 was that Cadastral Survey Plot No. 3315 was held by his father in dar-ryoti right under one Sarada Charan Sikdar who in 1917 also mortgaged his ryoti interest to the said defendants' father. The case of defendant 3 was that Cadastral Survey Plot No. 3316 belonged to certain persons, that under a partition and a transfer subsequently made it came to be owned in ryoti right by defendant 3, and that he settled it in dar-ryoti to defendant 1.

The Munsif decreed the suit, but the Subordinate Judge on appeal has dismissed it.

The Subordinate Judge has found that the documents showed that one Nobo Chandra Saha having obtained a decree for arrears of rent against the plaintiff's father Ratanmani put the holding up to sale and Ramesh Chandra Rakshit purchased it at such sale in 1900 that in 1906, Sarada Charan Sikdar sold his interest in the lands to Ramesh Chandra Rakshit, and in April 1920, plaintiffs obtained a settlement thereof from the said Ramesh Chandra Rakshit. He was of opinion that there was nothing to show who this Nabo Chandra Saha was or whether he was the sole landlord and whether Ratanmani was the sole tenant, and that there was no explanation why Sarada was not made a party in the rent suit which Nobo Chandra Saha instituted though Sarada along with Ratanmani were recorded in Cadastral Survey records as the tenants in respect of the two plots Nos 3317 and 3316, which were also described therein as one holding with defendant 1's father as a korfa tenant under them. On the whole he was of opinion that the rent decree and the sale was a shady and suspicious transaction. He, however, decided the appeal on the ground of limitation holding that the suit failed as neither the plaintiff nor his lessor Ramesh was in possession within 12 years before the suit. It is this finding on the question of limitation that is challenged on behalf of the plaintiff who has preferred this second appeal.

To the maintainability of the appeal a preliminary objection has been taken on behalf of the respondents. It is pointed out on their behalf that this appeal was filed on 24th June 1925, that prior to filing the appeal the plaintiff had filed an application for review on 30th April 1925, before the Subordinate Judge and the application for review was allowed on 14th September 1925, the result being that the appeal was again heard ; and on 20th January 1926, a fresh judgment was delivered by which the original judgment was held to stand good and a fresh decree was prepared and signed on 27th January 1926. It is urged that the present appeal is in the circumstances not maintainable. The appellant, on the other hand, urges that by the order granting the application for review the Subordinate Judge merely kept his original judgment "in abeyance," as he expressly said in his order passed on 14th September 1925, and that when by the judgment ultimately passed on 28th January 1926, and the decree prepared and signed on 27th January 1926, the original judgment was held to stand good, the appellant is competent to attack the original judgment and the original decree in this appeal. In my opinion the effect of allowing an application for review is to vacate the decree originally passed, and the decree that is subsequently made on the review, even if it does not modify the decree originally passed, is a new decree superseding the original one. For this view that I take, I do not find any authority directly or clearly in point. The case of Kanhaiya Lal v. Baldeo Prasad (1) was one in which the former decree was modified in important particulars on the review; so also in the case of Brijbasi Lal v. Salig Ram (2) there was a modification. In the case of Pyari Mohan Kundu v. Kalu Khan (3) it is said at p. 1016 (of 44 Cal.) that if the application for review is successful the appeal cannot proceed, and Kanhaiya Lal v. Baldeo Prasad (1) is quoted in support. The decision of the Lahore High Court in Basheshar Nath v. Ram Kishen Das (4) is perhaps the only authority which may be cited as fully supporting my view.

In the circumstances I think it proper to record my views on the merits of the appeal on which also I think the appeal must fail. The argument on the merits is that as the defendants cannot claim any higher rights than those of under-ryots, and inasmuch as Ratanmani's and Sarada's names were recorded as ryots in the Cadastral Survey records, and because the defendants cannot dispute the purchase by Ramesh of Ratanmani's interest at the rent sale and of Sarada's interest by private purchase, or challenge the lease granted by Ramesh to the plaintiff, it should be held that the under-ryoti tenancy which was at one time held under Ratanmani and Sarada still continues and, therefore, the possession of Ramesh and also of the plaintiff is established. In other words, it is contended that the relationship as between ryot and his under-ryots not having been determined, even though no rent may have been paid or received, Ramesh must be held to have been in possession and so the plaintiff. This argument assumes that a mere assignment or transfer is sufficient to put the assignee or transferee in possession as against persons claiming to hold under the assignor or transferrer, a proposition which cannot be seriously put forward. In my opinion, the finding of the Subordinate Judge on the question of possession is a question of fact and should be viewed as such.

Court of Narail, in a suit for rent brought by the plaintiff who is the respondent in this appeal. The facts are these : In the year 1884, the plaintiff's predecessor granted a dar-mourasi lease in favour of the predecessor of the defendants. The lease was with regard to a certain area of land which the District Judge has found to have been 1,183 highas at the time when the lease was granted. It was for a consolidated rent of Rs. 176-8-0-15 gds. per year. It was obtained on payment of a selami of Rupees 1,181-4-0. All the rights which a permanent tenure-holder is entitled to get under mourasi lease was granted to the lessee, that is, he was entitled to enjoy and possess the leasehold from generation to generation with all the powers of an owner on payment of the fixed rent. It has been found by the Courts below that during the period for which the suit for rent was brought, that is, from the last half of 1325 B. S. to 1328 B. S. nearly two-thirds of the demised land had been diluviated by the river Madhumati. The question involved in this case is whether by reason of diluvion the tenants-defendants are entitled to a proportionate abatement of rent for the period in the suit. The Munsif allowed the abatement. The District Judge on appeal has held that having regard to the terms of the patta the tenant had contracted himself out of his right to claim abatement of rent on any ground whatsoever. Upon that finding the District Judge passed a decree for the sum claimed at the rate stipulated in the patta.

It is contended on behalf of the appellants that they are entitled to a proportionate abatement of the rent on the ground of diluvion. It is argued that the right to obtain abatement in case of diluvion is based upon the general principle of law which should be enforced as a rule of justice, equity and good conscience, and, unless there is any special contract by which the tenant precluded himself from obtaining the abatement he is entitled to claim it. Reliance has been placed upon certain cases, notably the cases of Sheikh Enayatoollah v. Sheikh Elaheebaksh (1) and Salimullah Bahadur v. Kali Prosonno Parbat (2), in support of the contention on behalf the tenant. The general proposition of law as enunciated is not contested by the respondent. But the contention on behalf of the respondent is that upon a true and proper construction of the agreement entered into in this case the tenant is not entitled to abatement on the ground of diluvion. We have, therefore, to see whether the contract is such that the tenant cannot rely upon the rule which has been considered as a rule of the nature of justice and equity under which he is entitled to abatement of rent on account of diluvion. The first thing to be noted in the kabuliyat is that it is a mourasi mokarari lease. The rent is fixed ; but that does not prevent the tenant from claiming an abatement on the ground that a part of the leasehold property is lost by diluvion. The express contract runs thus :

You shall not be entitled to take a plea for remission of the jama fixed on the ground of failure of crops on account of inundation or drought, on account of dearth, abandonment, land lying fallow or being in a waterlogged condition, dispossession and on any other such ground. If you do that it shall not be entertained. I shall not be competent to demand anything in excess of the rent fixed on any ground.

There is also this further passage :

If Government acquires any land under the dar-mourasi for its own use or for works for the public good you will get the compensation but shall not get any abatement of rent on that account.

There is another passage which it is necessary to mention :

If you find it necessary to surrender the jama on account of inability to pay rent at the rate stipulated you shall surrender after paying in full all arrears of rent, and on delivery of possession of the land and jama to me to my satisfaction. Otherwise you shall remain liable for the rent as stated above.

The contention on behalf of the appellant is that there is no special stipulation that even on account of diluvion the tenant will not be entitled to any abatement of rents : and, therefore, his right to claim abatement has not been taken away by the contract. While the contention on the other side is that taking all the provisions that I have already cited, it is quite clear that the stipulation was that there should be no abatement of rent nor increase of rent on any ground whatsoever. If the tenant considers that he is being made to pay more rent than what he is capable of paying it was open to him to surrender the land and he cannot say that he is entitled to keep the land which has not been diluviated and is not bound to pay rent at the rate stipulated in the kabuliya. In our judgment it seems to be beyond reasonable doubt that the stipulation of the parties was that there should be neither increase nor decrease of the rent on any ground whatsoever. If there is any accession to the land by alluvion the landlord would not be entitled to any increase of rent. If there is a decrease of land by diluvion the tenant will not be entitled to any abatement of rent. There is no question of justice and equity in this case because it is within the power of the tenant to surrender the land at any time he chooses.

In one of the cases cited on behalf of the appellant, Sallimullah v. Kali Prosonno (1), the learned Judges decided the question with reference to the stipulation then made by which the landlord reserved the right to increase the rent if it was found on measurement that the land was in excess of the area let out. The learned Judges held that in the absence of an express stipulation the tenant would not be deprived of the right to abatement of rent on the ground of diluvion. It would be unreasonable to hold that the tenants placed themselves in a position of manifest disadvantage without any corresponding benefit. In this case, upon a proper construction of the kabuliya, it seems to me that the tenant was placed in a better position than the landlord. The landlord would not be entitled to get any increase of rent whatever. The stipulation is in general terms, and notwithstanding the fact that under the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act and under the Regulation (1825) he would be entitled to claim rent for the land accreted to the leasehold he has precluded himself from claiming anything in excess of the rent fixed. He cannot ask the tenant to give up the land on any ground whatsoever, while the tenant has the right to surrender it at any time he chooses. Under these conditions it seems to me that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. The appellants' learned vakils have stated before us that they are willing to surrender the land. The Advocate general, on behalf of the respondent, is willing to accept the surrender. But we cannot give effect to the statements by the learned counsel on both sides. It would be quite desirable if the tenant surrender the land by giving a proper notice to the landlord in which case the landlord will be bound to accept the surrender.

Rankin, C. J.—This is a rule in revision obtained by the plaintiff calling upon the defendant to show cause why an order should not be set aside whereby the defendant was ordered to be examined on commission at his own request.

It appears that the suit was launched in 1925 for the recovery of some Rs. 49,000 as remuneration due for work done as a managing contractor of a colliery and that the defendant had paid Court-fee on a counter-claim for some two and half lacs, on account of damages alleged to have been caused to the defendant's colliery by the negligence of the plaintiff. The issues which were settled in 1925 contained a great many matters arising out of the counter-claim.

In April 1927 the defendant put in a petition that he might be examined on commission on the ground that he was suffering from lumbago which made it impossible for him to remain in the same position for more than ten minutes. He filed a medical certificate to that effect. The plaintiff objected. He says that he took the point that the defendant in respect of the counter-claim was really in the position of a plaintiff. He disputed that the defendant was ill as alleged and that there was any necessity for his examination on commission, and he attacked the independence of the doctor who gave the medical certificate. The application was repeated and by the order of 6th May 1927 the Subordinate Judge granted the application. It appears from the order recorded that the main ground of opposition was that the case may not be taken up at an early date and that the witness, even if he is unwell, may recover in the meanwhile. The plaintiff does not admit that the witness is really ill. It is not known when the case can be taken up.

Having set out these matters the learned Subordinate Judge goes on to say this:

After hearing the pleaders I do not think that it is a fit case in which the prayer for the examination of the witness on commission shall be refused. I should however, recoup the other party by giving the cost of pleader for the examination of the said witness.

He went on to order that the applicant should deposit Rs. 96 as plaintiff's pleader's fee for three days and if the examination should last for more than three days the witness would be required to pay at the rate of Rs. 32 per day as the plaintiff's pleader's fee.

This Rule was obtained by way of challenging that order and reliance has been placed by the learned advocate who appears for the applicant upon several decisions of this Court. To begin with: it has to be observed that the present case is within O 26, R. 1, Civil P. C., and that it is not a case under R. 4 to which different considerations may apply. That rule says :

Any Court may in any suit issue a commission for the examination on interrogatories or otherwise of any person resident within the local limits of its jurisdiction who is exempted under this Code from attending the Court or who is from sickness or infirmity unable to attend it.

In this class of cases we have not to deal with the case of a plaintiff who has a choice to bring his own suit in a particular forum and then asks to be examined on commission on the ground that he cannot attend at the place where he has chosen to sue. We are dealing with an application on the ground of sickness or infirmity and, broadly speaking, even although a man's defence consists of an equitable counter-claim it would prima facie be more just that the defendant even if he has a counter-claim, if he really cannot attend to give his evidence in Court should be examined on commission. No doubt it was the duty of the learned Subordinate Judge to satisfy himself very carefully as to the seriousness and reality of the sickness that was alleged and, if I may be allowed to say so, the judgment of the Subordinate Judge is very unhappily phrased. It is phrased in flabby language and it is indefinite to a degree.

The question is not whether this is a fit case in which the prayer for the examination of the witness on commission should be refused. The question is whether it is a case in which it has been established by reason of the illness of the defendant that the prayer for examination on commission must in justice be granted. It is however, in my opinion, an unjust hypercritical attitude to take to say that the learned Subordinate Judge has not intended to find that the defendant is ill and suffering from lumbago as alleged, and we have therefore to consider whether there is any real reason why this order should be interfered with under S. 115, Civil P. C. It is, quite clear that in a case of this character the whole jurisdiction to make such an order arises out of the fact, which has to be found, of the sickness of the person in question. When it is found that he is unable to attend Court by reason of sickness or infirmity the rest is a question of discretion. Indeed, it may be said that in such a case it would be a very strong measure to refuse an examination on commission.

Learned advocate for the applicant relied upon certain cases of this Court and of the High Court of Patna. These cases proceeded usually under R. 4, O. 26 and they have reference to the question whether a plaintiff choosing his forum should be examined on commission. So far as those cases are concerned there appears to be authority for the proposition that if a Court does not think that the discretion given to the Court by R. 4, O. 26, is properly exercised it can treat the matter as a material irregularity. Other cases seem to go upon the footing that the Court can treat the matter as a material irregularity unless it appears from the order recorded by the lower Court that the principles of law which may be thought applicable to the subject-matter being disentangled they were all considered and separately applied. Whether these cases are in the least consistent with the interpretation of the Privy Council, from time to time, of S 115 of the Code may be seriously doubted. In the present case it is not necessary for me to discuss that particular question. Given the fact that the Court is satisfied under R. 1, O. 26, that the person is sick and unable to attend Court and that the Court has exercised its discretion as to whether in those circumstances a commission should issue and has issued a commission, I am clearly of opinion that that discretion cannot be revised under S. 115, Civil P. C., whether the judgment of the Court below on this interlocutory application consists of a complete treatise on the subject or an incomplete treatise on the subject.

In the present case however, it is advisable to call attention to R. 8, O. 26. In a recent case in this Court Mahim Chandra v. Naba Chandra (1), before Sir Nalini Ranjan Chatterjee and Mr. Justice Panton, it has been pointed out that that rule is to be treated as a reality. That is a case of a man who got himself examined at a time when he was outside the jurisdiction. At the time of the hearing he was within the jurisdiction and the other party wanted him to give his evidence in Court in the ordinary way. The Court as the man's evidence had been taken on commission allowed the commission evidence to go in and it was pointed out that in those circumstances the evidence taken on commission could not be read as evidence in the case against the defendant in view of the provisions of O 26, R. 8, there being no material which would ground the exercise of a discretion on the part of the Court to dispense with the proof of the various matters mentioned in that rule. Again, in the case of Bon Behary Chatterji v. Satish Kantha Roy (2), Lord Atkinson, delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, commented upon a case where it appears that in December 1916 a commissioner was appointed, evidence was given on commission in January 1917 and the trial commenced in February 1917; and the Judicial Committee there pointed out:

Evidence taken on commission should only be permitted to be used where the witness is proved to be too ill to give his evidence in Court or is absent or for other sufficient reason. If Satis went to the Court he could and presumably would have been accommodated with a seat and so on. The whole procedure in this matter strongly suggests that it was his aversion to undergo the ordeal of an examination in open Court, in the presence of those who knew him, rather than ill health, which kept him from the witness box.

I take this occasion to point out that when this case comes on for trial the mere fact that this commission has been ordered now will be no reason whatever by any one to look at it unless it is found that at the time of the hearing sickness or infirmity or other reason prevents the witness from giving his evidence in the ordinary way. I say that the more emphatically as there is some authority in the books particularly in the case of Dhanu Ram Mahto v. Murli Mahto (3), which gives colour to the view that once a commission has been ordered and executed the commission evidence goes in ipso facto and without further consideration. I do not say that that proposition was intended to be laid down in the case in which I have referred, but the decision and the reasoning lend colour to that view and I am particularly anxious, therefore, that it should be made clear to the lower Court that R. 8, O. 26, is as much a rule of procedure in the mofussil as anywhere else and that what the Privy Council has laid down and this Court has recently laid down in the case to which I have referred is the proper method for conducting the case. It does not seem to me that in this case the question whether the man is shown to be so ill that it was advisable to take his evidence on commission is a question of such a character that the learned Subordinate Judge is bound to answer it cor-

Civil Rule No. 823 of 1927, Decided on 2nd December 1927, from decree of 1st Munsif, Small Cause Court Judge, Dacca D/- 21st March 1927, in Small Cause Suit No. 169½ of 1926.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (9 of 1887), Sch. 2, Art. 31—Suit for recovery of money wrongfully realized is not excluded unless accounts are asked for.

Unless a decree for accounts is asked for, a suit for money against a person who is alleged to have wrongfully realized moneys due to the plaintiff does not come within the article.

Judgment.—The only ground on which this rule has been issued is that the Small Cause Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit in view of Art. 31, Sch 2, to the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act.

There were two defendants in the suit, defendant 1 being the principal defendant and defendant 2 the pro forma defendant.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover Rs.170 as house rent, together with Rs.10 for compensation, against defendant 1 who was the tenant in the house. The claim against defendant 2 was worded thus in the plaint :

If it appears and is legally proved that defendant 1 has in good faith paid to defendant 2 the rent claimed or the rent for any month, then a decree may be passed against defendant 2 for such amount as may be so found to have been paid.

In the course of the trial the plaintiffs appear to have reduced their claim to two-thirds share of the rent, defendant 2 being entitled to the remaining one-third.

Defendant 2 having admitted to have realized the rents and the learned Munsif having found that defendant 1 had made the payments in good faith, he passed a decree against defendant 2 for two thirds of the amount which he had realized.

It is urged in support of the rule that the suit, in so far as it is against defendant 2, is to recover the profits of immovable property belonging to the plaintiff which have been wrongfully received by the defendant. That no doubt is so. But, as pointed out by the Full Bench decision of this Court in the case of Kunjo Behari Singh v. Madhub Chandra Ghose (1), the only class of suits excluded by Art. 31 are those in which the plaintiff claims an account of the moneys which the defendant has received and to an account of which the plaintiff is entitled because the moneys belonged to him (per Petheram, C. J., at p. 889). A suit in which accounting is involved is not necessarily a suit for account. Trevelyan, J., also at p. 890 says :

But the jurisdiction of the Small Cause Court is in my opinion only excluded by the Act where such suit is a suit for an account, that is, a suit which seeks for a decree, not for a definite sum of money but ordering the defendant to account to the plaintiff for moneys received by him. The machinery necessary for the putting in force of that decree is of a kind with which the Small Cause Courts have never been supplied, and it has always been the object of the legislature to confine Small Cause Courts to simple suits which are concluded by the first decree. A suit for an account is a suit which seeks for discovery in pursuance of that decree.

It is clear from these observations that unless a decree for accounts is asked for, a suit for money against a person who is alleged to have wrongfully realized moneys due to the plaintiff does not come within the article. The plaintiff in a suit of the present nature can have a decree for money so long as he is able to prove what moneys were so realized by the defendant.

The ground of the rule in my opinion fails. In view of the limited character of the rule it is not necessary for me to consider whether on any other ground the rule may be supported, nor indeed have I been asked to do so. The rule is discharged with costs : 1 gold mohur.

Appeal No. 700 of 1925, Decided on 4th August 1927, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Faridpur, D/- 12th February 1925.

Specific Relief Act, S. 42—Person interested to deny or denying plaintiff's title is not pro forma defendant—Civil P. C., O. 1, R. 1.

Rankin, C. J.—This is a somewhat unusual case and a very good illustration of the difficulties which are created for the lower Courts and which they themselves assist to create. The plaintiffs are eight persons called Roy who claim to be interested in a certain revenue-paying estate under the Collectorate of Jessore and to have in addition a kaiemi mukurari mourashi jote thereunder; in other words they claim to be entitled to the superior interest in the suit lands and the share they claimed is 13 annas four pies share. Among the many defendants there is a group of defendants described as co-sharer pro forma defendants who are entitled to the remaining share. The cause of action might be very simply stated. It is that six persons, one Erfanaddi and five others, whom I may call the Bairagis, having agreed on certain terms to become tenants of certain lands and to execute a kabuliyat refused to do so and by executing and causing to be registered a false kabuliyat which the plaintiffs never accepted and by seizing by force the lands of schedule (gha) became trespassers whom the plaintiffs are entitled to eject.

The plaintiff's case is that these six persons have put themselves into exclusive possession of the properties of Schedule (gha) and that they have no right or claim to be in occupation as their tenants. On any ordinary principles such a suit would be brought against those six persons and those only, it being elementary that the proper defendants in an action of ejectment are the persons in possession. That however did not content these plaintiffs. They impleaded apart from their co-sharers 107 persons in addition to the six persons who have been described in the cause-title as principal defendants. These 107 persons are described in the cause-title as pro forma defendants. When the plaint is examined it contains no claim whatever for relief against any of the 107 pro forma defendants. It contains two statements with reference to them that have any importance. One is that these 107 persons are or that some of them are tenants under the plaintiffs of other lands. There is no suggestion that they are not perfectly law-abiding and well-behaved tenants. The second is a statement that there was an arrangement by which these persons, represented by one of their number made, a bargain with the plaintiffs, and apparently with the principal defendants also, that the plaintiffs would give them tenancy of certain other lands—the lands in Schedule (ga). The lands which the principal defendants are said to have trespassed upon and the lands which these pro forma defendants are said to have some promise of tenancy in are different lands with the exception of two plots—plots 72 and 485. Of these two plots I shall say something hereafter. These two statements referring to the pro forma defendants are the only statements affecting them so far as I can discover in the plaint and there is no explicit prayer for any relief whatever at the end of the plaint so far as these 107 persons are concerned. In these circumstances before issuing summonses upon 107 persons one would have thought that the trial Court would have examined this plaint under O. 7, Civil P. C., and would have rejected or returned it for amendment so as to disclose some cause of action. It may, however, be said that the plaint which is somewhat complicated was difficult to understand and that such a summary proceeding was not thought desirable.

It appears that summonses were issued, but no written statements were filed on behalf of these pro forma defendants. Some time afterwards the plaintiffs compromised with the principal defendants and the case came before the Court for a decree. As against the principal defendants the suit was decreed in terms of the compromise. As against the absent pro forma defendants something, which was supposed to be a decree, was passed ex parte. It was a statement that as against these pro forma defendants the suit was decreed ex parte, but it did not state what was decreed. It did not give any declaration even by reference as no amount of reference to the plaint will enable anybody to see that anything in particular was asked for as against these pro forma defendants. What as against them was decreed and was supposed to be meant it is not easy to discover. I am glad to say that I do not find that this decree was passed against the pro forma defendants for any costs. Thereafter several of these defendants applied to the Court for restoration of the case so far as they were concerned and the decree as against them was set aside and they were allowed to file written statements. A written statement was put in on their behalf in which they objected, first, that the plaint disclosed no cause of action against them and secondly, that certain of them had claims to particular plots of the lands in suit as being persons who were in possession as tenants of those plots. On this basis they objected to the plaintiff's suit as against the principal defendants being decreed in terms of the solenama.

The matter went to trial on that basis. No amendment was made in the plaint, but certain issues were framed which include issue (1):

Have the plaintiffs any cause of action against the answering defendants? (2) Is the suit barred by limitation? and (6). Have the answering defendants any tenancy in respect to the lands mentioned in their written statements? Is the plaintiff entitled to obtain khas possession to those lands?

The learned Subordinate Judge who tried the case found that no one of these answering defendants had any claim to, or had any possession in, or any right to, any of the plots with the exception that defendant 92 had a tenancy right in dag No 33. Accordingly he framed what was considered to be a suitable decree. The answering defendants 11, 12, and 14 who made no claim to any of the plots were struck out and they, therefore, escaped from the suit altogether. As regards the other defendants those who had failed to establish any right to any plot he declared that they had no title or possession to the plots to which they laid claim and no locus standi to question the plaintiffs' title to those dags or claim to khas possession to the suit lands. It will be observed that these defendants' claim to be in possession of, and to have right to, certain plots was fought out and tried in a suit in the cause-title of which they were called pro forma defendants; and when the learned Subordinate Judge came to defendant 92 who had established his claim to plot 33 he dealt with the matter in this way: he removed defendant 92, because he had succeeded, from the category of pro forma defendant to the category of principal defendant. The learned District Judge in the end affirmed (with a slight correction for the fact that the plaintiffs were only entitled to 13 annas 4 pies share), the decree of the Subordinate Judge. He too declared that the various defendants except No. 92 had no locus standi to question plaintiffs' title or right of khas possession in respect to the various dags. He too made the pro forma defendant 92 a principal defendant because as to one dag he has succeeded.

On appeal before us it has been argued on behalf of these defendants that the whole proceedings were misconceived, that there were no proper pleadings, no claim for relief, no statement of facts which would ground any right to relief against them. It was also contended before us that the Courts below have not properly dealt with the question of limitation inasmuch as the case being one under Art. 142 the plaintiffs had to prove that they were in possession within twelve years. In my judgment there is no reason to think that the Courts below have made any mistake upon the matter of limitation. Their findings are that these defendants are not in possession at all and as it is clear that none of them claimed any right except a tenancy right it is difficult to see how the plaintiffs' claim, if they have any claim against the pro forma defendants, is defeated by any principle of limitation. But I entirely agree with the contention on behalf of the defendants that the proceedings in this case have been an abuse of the process of the Court.

Yesterday, being desirous to ascertain whether any of these 106 pro forma defendants (I omit defendant 8) were persons who, prior to the issue of the plaint, had by word or act done something to deny the plaintiffs' title to or right to possession of any portion of the suit lands, we adjourned this case in order that the learned vakil for the plaintiffs might have an opportunity to see whether there was any evidence of any such conduct which would justify the inclusion of the pro forma defendants in this plaint. We have been this morning informed by him that at the time when the plaintiffs issued their plaint they had no knowledge of any claim on the part of any one of those 106 defendants to the suit lands or any part thereof.

In these circumstances, we have to consider what effect we ought to give to the contention on the part of the appellants that these proceedings as against the pro forma defendants have been a scandal from first to last. It is quite clear that the real reason why summonses were issued on these 106 persons was simply this: that the lands of the plaintiffs having been at various times occupied during a time of dispute between the plaintiffs and the Choudhuris by various squatters and other people, the plaintiffs were apprehensive that some of those 106 persons might hereafter lay claim to some right or interest in the suit lands. They had no reason to suppose that any such claim had been made. They did not know in the least which defendant was likely to make a claim to which plot and the plaint was really a public circular issued as widely as possible calling upon any person out of the 106 who had any mind to invent or discover or assert any claim to any part of the suit lands to come in and make a claim now, or ever after hold his peace. No other interpretation can be put upon this plaint. I need hardly say that that is not a proceeding which can be tolerated by a Court. When this plaint was issued and summonses were served the first thing which the pro forma defendants should have done was to apply at once to have it amended or struck out. If it was to be amended it was necessary for it to contain statements showing that the pro forma defendants had done something which entitled the plaintiffs to sue them at all, and until the plaint alleged something of that sort it is clear enough that there was nothing to which any written statement need be directed. It is a matter of considerable wonder that any learned Judge should have decreed this suit in the first instance ex parte against any of those defendants. The defendants in question however failed to do that and in failing to do that they committed their first mistake. They filed in the end a written statement in which they not only took the line that they were accused of nothing that was actionable but they took the line that they were in possession of and had a tenancy right in certain of these dags. That is a question upon which they invoked the Court's decision and that question was litigated with the plaintiffs and these defendants have lost. It is true that they did not abandon their contention upon issue 1. They then went to the learned District Judge. Again they urged that there was no cause of action against them. Again they urged that they were in possession and had a tenancy right to certain of these dags. Again they lost and they have come before this Court with the same two pleas: first that their case has not been dealt with properly on the merits and, secondly, that as against them there was no case to decide. If there were any reason to think that the absence of proper pleadings in this case had prejudiced these defendants with regard to their claim to particular plots our course would be very clear, but there is no question of that sort.

The next question is whether there is any real cause of action disclosed now at the end of the day by the evidence in the case against these defendants. It is conceded that the evidence in the case does not show that before the plaint was issued any claim was being made by them, but it is said that as they made a claim in their written statement and as the merits of that claim have been adjudicated upon there is no reason now to set aside the proceedings merely because their claim was made after the plaint instead of before. No doubt from a common sense point of view there is a great deal in this contention and we have to consider whether that contention ought really to prevail. The idea that any one of these 106 people is a pro forma defendant in any proper or intelligible sense is one which has to be discarded. If a person has denied the plaintiffs' title and asserted possession in himself so that the plaintiff is entitled to sue him for a declaration removing a cloud upon his title such a defendant is in no sense of the word as pro forma defendant. "Pro forma defendant" is not a term that ever ought to appear in the cause-title of any suit or proceeding. It does happen sometimes that a person is impleaded merely for the sake of conformity as, for example, the plaintiffs' co-sharers in the present case. A person may be impleaded to represent the legal interest although he is a bare trustee having no real interest in the matter, or he may be impleaded because he has a right or title which is affected by the order sought though not prejudicially affected. There are circumstances under which it is not improper in ordinary language to describe a defendant as being joined pro forma. But the present case is a very different one. The defendants are persons against whom the plaintiffs—if they are asking for anything—are asking for a declaration. The plaintiffs would seem to have come under S. 42, Sp. Rel. Act which entitles a person entitled to any legal right as to any property to institute a suit against any person denying or interested to deny his title to such character, but I need hardly say that it is prima facie a very curious discretion to grant a declaration against persons who have made no specific claim hostile to the plaintiffs' interest and who have in no way asserted or formulated any claim of a hostile character.

If at the time the plaint had been issued the plaintiffs had said that the defendants so and so (mentioning those defendants who ultimately appeared) claim to be entitled to dags Nos. so and so and the plaintiffs ask for a declaration against them that they are not so entitled their plaint would have been in substance good. They did not say that, but the defendants made a claim in their written statement and the question is whether these appellants can at the same time contend that they were in possession of the suit lands with tenancy-interest and also that prior to the plaint they had done nothing to justify the plaintiffs in bringing their suit against them. In my judgment those two positions are inconsistent and, although the plaintiffs' course has been as irregular as it well could be, I think that these appellants by claiming not merely to have a right in but to be in possession of parts of the suit lands have debarred themselves from succeeding on the ground that the plaintiffs cannot prove any claim on their part before the issue of the plaint. That is the point on which this appeal turns.

As regards defendant 8 : it seems to me that he was possibly a proper defendant though not a pro forma defendant in respect of dags Nos. 72 and 485 because it would seem that he had been the plaintiffs' tenant in respect of these; but the plaintiffs had purchased the holding in execution of a decree and had only got symbolical delivery of possession from this defendant. When the plaintiffs came to evict a trespasser from those plots, defendant 8 as a tenant from whom the plaintiffs never obtained possession was not unreasonably impleaded.

With the exception of defendant 8 I think the plaintiffs' proceedings against all the other "pro forma defendants" have been extremely irregular. I hope that if ever again a Court finds a hundred defendants called pro forma defendants against whom there is no real case made in the plaint it will take the necessary steps to deal with that situation and put an end finally to the litigation. It is no part of the duty of a law Court to issue notices round the world to persons to come in to make claims, if any, or take objections if any, to the plaintiffs' evicting the persons who are in actual possession of the plaintiffs' property.

I think, therefore, that this appeal ought not to succeed and should be dismissed but without costs.

Appeal No 1417 of 1925, Decided on 19th January 1928, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Nadia, D/- 3rd Mar. 1925.

Landlord and Tenant—Rent—Tenant dispossessed from a portion of the property—Whether suspension of the entire rent should be ordered or only abatement of rent should be allowed depends on facts of each case.

It is not possible to lay down any hard and fast rule as to when suspension of entire rent should be ordered or when only abatement of rent should be allowed where the tenant has been dispossessed from only a portion of the demised properties. Each case has to be decided on its particular facts. R. C. Mitter—for Appellant.

H. P. Mukherji—for Respondents.

Cuming, J.—In the suit out of which this appeal arises the plaintiff sued the defendants to recover arrears of rent from the last two kists of 1326 to pous kist of 1329 at an annual rental of Rs. 34-5-3½ pies with cesses and damages. His allegation was that the defendants' father purchased the holding in question on 15th September 1919, at an auction-sale and that the defendants had been holding this jama since their father's death. The defendants contested the suit. They raised a number of objections. The only one with which we are concerned in the present appeal is that they claim to be entitled to the suspension of the entire rent on the ground that they have been dispossessed from a large portion of the holding by the landlord.

The Munsif overruled the objection of the defendants and decreed the suit. In appeal the learned Subordinate Judge found that the defendants had been dispossessed from some portion of the holding and that they were entitled to the suspension of the entire rent.

The plaintiff appealed to this Court and the appeal was heard by my learned brother Mr. Justice Roy and myself and we remitted the case to the lower appellate Court for a definite finding as to how much land the defendants' father actually came into possession when he purchased the holding at the auction-sale and how much land they had been dispossessed from, if any, by the plaintiff and, if so, when. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that the defendants came into possession of at least 30 bighas of land when they purchased the holding at the auction-sale and that they were subsequently dispossessed by the plaintiff from no less than ten bighas of land in Baisakh or Joistha 1327.

Mr. Mitter who appears on behalf of the appellant contends and his contention has not been opposed by the learned vakil who appears on behalf of the respondents that at any rate he is entitled to the rent and cesses for the two kists of 1326. The Court having found that the dispossession did not take place till Baisakh 1327 clearly he is entitled to the rent for the last two kists of 1326.

With regard to the rent for the period subsequent to the dispossession Mr. Mitter contends first of all that the tenants are not entitled to the suspension of the entire rent. He argues that as the tenants have been dispossessed from a portion of the demised property they are entitled only to an abatement of rent for the portion from which they have been dispossessed. He argues that the doctrine of entire suspension of rent in a case where the tenant has been dispossessed from only a portion of the demised properties does not apply with full force. He has referred us to the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Katyayani Devi v. Udey Kumar Das (1) and to a decision of Mr. Justice B. B. Ghosh and Mr. Justice Roy in the case of Susil Kumar Biswas v. Rajani Kanta Chakrabutty (2). Neither of these decisions dealt with a case where the tenant, though once in actual possession, had been actually dispossessed by his landlord. In both those cases the tenant never got possession of the demised property. Further in the case of Katyayani Devi v. Udey Kumar Das (1), their Lordships of the Judicial Committee remark that the doctrine of suspension of payment of rent, where the tenant has not been put in possession of part of the subject leased, has been applied where the rent was a lump rent for the whole land leased treated as an indivisible subject. It has no application to a case where the stipulated rent is so much per acre or bigha. This remark, as far as I can see, does not assist the appellant in any way. No doubt every one of these cases is to be decided on the particular facts of the particular case and it is not possible to lay down any hard-and-fast rule when suspension of entire rent should be ordered or when only abatement of rent should be allowed. The learned vakil for the appellant has been unable to point out to me any single case where a tenant in possession has been dispossessed of a considerable portion of the demised property and only an abatement of rent has been allowed, more specially in a case where the settlement was for a lump sum and not for so much per bigha. I think this contention of the appellant cannot succeed.

Mr. Mitter has further contended that it is not a case of dispossession by a landlord qua landlord. The landlord purchased the adjacent property in execution of a rent-decree which he himself had obtained against the tenant of that land and in execution of this decree he dispossessed the present defendant of some ten bighas of land. It would only be a refinement of the word "dispossession" to say that this dispossession of the tenant is not dispossession by the landlord qua landlord but in his capacity as a tenant.

These are the only points urged in the appeal. The appeal, therefore, fails except for the modification regarding rent for the last two kists of 1326 with cesses and damages thereon.

There will be no order as to costs in the appeal.

Mukerji, J.—I agree.

Criminal Appeal No. 618 of 1927 and Death Reference No. 8 of 1927, Decided on 15th November 1927, from judgment of Addl. Sess. Judge, 24 Parganas.

* (a) Penal Code, S. 302—(Per Cuming, J.) Non-proof of motive is immaterial—(Per Mukerji, J.) Motive, though not necessary to bring home the charge, it is relevant to prove intention.

Per Cuming, J.—When in a case of murder facts are clear, it is immaterial that no motive has been proved. The motive which induces a man to do any particular act is known to him and to him alone. At the highest the prosecution can only suggest what is or may be the motive for any particular act. It may be known only to the accused or possibly to the deceased and it is quite impossible to prove.

Per Mukerji, J. Motive though not a sine qua non for bringing the offence of murder home to the accused is relevant and important on the question of intention.

(b) Criminal P. C. S. 374—High Court has to form independent opinion—Question of misdirection is therefore immaterial.

The questions of misdirection are of less importance in a case of reference, for in a case of reference the High Court has to come to its own independent conclusion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused person independently of the verdict of the jury or of the opinion of the Judge.

* (c) Penal Code, S. 302—A plunging knife into B's stomach—(Per Cuming, J.) A is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act and therefore A must be held to have intended to cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death—(Mukerji J. contra)

Per Cuming, J. The natural result of plunging a knife into a man's stomach is death or such bodily injury as is likely to result in death. The man who plunges a knife into another man's stomach must know that it would cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death and that hence death would be the probable result of his act. The man who does such an act therefore must be held to intend to cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to result in death, for a man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his action. If he had not that knowledge or intention in the circumstances and he did the act with some other knowledge or intention then it is for him to prove it, for that is a fact peculiarly within his own knowledge.

Per Mukerji, J. The presumption that one must be taken to intend the natural or probable consequences of his act—a rule of English criminal law which, originally but a rule of evidence, has now acquired the dignity of a legal axiom—is not always quite easy to apply to the Indian criminal law in view of the distinction that the Indian Penal Code makes between intention and knowledge. On the question of knowledge much depends on the intellectual capacity of the actor.

Camell, Sures Chandra Taluqdar, Surajit Chandra Lahiri and Basanta Kumar Sen—for Appellant.

Lalit Mahan Sanyal—for the Crown.

Cuming, J.—This is the case of one Hazrat Gul Khan who has been tried by the learned Additional Sessions Judge of 24 Parganas sitting with jury. The jury found him guilty of murder under S. 302, I. P. C. The learned Judge agreeing with the verdict of the jury has sentenced the accused to death; and his case has been referred to this Court under S. 374, Criminal P. C. for confirmation of the sentence. The accused has also preferred an appeal against his conviction and sentence.

I may here note that the accused Hazrat Gul Khan was tried on the same charge once before. In that trial the jury unanimously acquitted him. The learned Sessions Judge who tried the case referred the case to the High Court and a retrial of the case was ordered.

The facts of the case are shortly these: The accused Hazrat Gul Khan and the deceased Mahammad Alim whom he was accused of murdering are Peshwaris. The deceased was the brother-in-law of the accused. On the day of occurrence, the 6th of November 1926, at about 8 or 9 p m, Hazrat Gul Khan and a number of other persons were sitting in a certain baitlak khana attached to the house in which the deceased Mahammad Alim lived. Mahammad Alim was lying on a khatia. The accused Hazrat Gul Khan came there and after some time got up and went to a certain waterpot for taking a drink of water. As he did so on passing the khatia on which Mahammad Alim was lying he pulled out a knife and struck the deceased Mahammad Alim in his stomach. The accused then ran away pursued by some of the witnesses. On their way they met one Gul Hamid who is a watchman in the service of the railway company at Naihati railway station. They told him to try to arrest Hazrat Gul Khan. These witnesses then went to the thana. The thana officer behaved with what can only be described as great slackness. They did not take the trouble of recording statements these persons made to them or of taking cognizance of the case. They told them to fetch the wounded man. The witness returned to fetch him and found him dead. They then took the dead body of the deceased to the thana and a first information was then recorded. Meanwhile the accused Hazrat Gul Khan was arrested at or near Naihati railway station by Gul Hamid and some other railway servants and brought to the thana. On these allegations the accused has been charged with murder. The defence is a plea of innocence. He states that he was arrested as he got down from the train having come from a place called Matiabruz. He did not himself suggest why he had been falsely accused of the charge. It is suggested that some one else, perhaps Habib Sha, one of the witnesses, committed the deed and for some reason or other, which is not given, Hazrat was accused of doing it.

Now, the two principal witnesses against the accused are Habib Sha and Abdul Kayem. Habib Sha is a man of some 60 years of age and Abdul Kayem is a boy of about 15 or 16. According to their statements they were actually present at the time when the murder was committed and saw the occurrence. They pursued the accused. After a very careful consideration of their evidence I am convinced that they have spoken the truth. Their evidence certainly agrees with each other. A few minor discrepancies have been pointed out between these two men's evidence. For instance one says that the assailant jumped over the bed after striking the blow, while the other says that the accused ran away round the end of it. Further Habib Sha states in one part of his evidence that there was a quarrel between the deceased and the accused some 11 days before and that that was the last quarrel between them, while further on he states that there was a quarrel on the day of occurrence. These are obviously petty discrepancies of minor importance. One fact goes strongly to prove the truth of what they state, namely, that the name of Hazrat Gul Khan as the assailant was given out almost immediately after the occurrence. That is quite clear from their evidence and also from that of Gul Hamid, the railway watchman. Unless Habib Sha had given out the name of Hazrat Gul Khan to the watchman Gul Hamid, Gul Hamid would have had no reason whatever for arresting Hazrat Gul Khan when he found him at Naihati railway station and taking him to the thana. Further it is clear I think from the evidence of the police officers that when Habib Sha and Abdul Kayem went to the thana the first time they gave out the name of the assailant. The police officers say that they did, but they, the police officers, did not trouble themselves to take down or remember it. But it is very difficult to imagine that Habib Sha would dare to give a different name when he came back to the thana a second time with Mahammad Alim's dead body. He could not possibly know whether the police officers did or did not remember the name he had given out when he first came there. In such circumstances he would not venture to change the name.

Mr Camell who appears for the accused has argued that the story which this witness told is improbable, first, because Habib Sha and those accompanying him gave up the chase after meeting Gul Hamid and went to thana. There is nothing improbable at all in this conduct. Habib Sha is a man of about 60 years of age and Abdul Kayem is a boy of about 15 or 16. The assailant was armed with a knife and these witnesses, if their story is true, had just seen him use his knife upon Muhammad Alim. It was most unlikely that they were at all anxious to catch him up. He might have used the knife on them if they had caught him. Obviously their safest course was to go to the thana and to report the matter to the police and to leave it to them to arrest the accused person.

Then it is contended that it is very unlikely that the assailant would have gone to the railway station. I cannot see why. Probably or possibly his intention was to get away by train. But for the fact that Habib Sha had met Gul Hamid he would have probably succeeded. The evidence would go to show, I think, that Hazrat Gul Khan was lurking about the outskirts of the railway station when he was arrested. It is impossible to argue that a man must follow some particular course of action in particular circumstances,

Next it is argued that there was no motive to commit the crime. It would be more correct to say that the prosecution has not proved any motive. When facts are clear it is immaterial that no motive has been proved. The motive which induces a man to do any particular act is known to him and to him alone. At the highest the prosecution can only suggest what is or may be the motive for any particular act. It may be known only to the assailant or possibly to the deceased and it is quite impossible to prove. Had the story been a concocted one it is more than probable that some story of quarrel at the time of assault would have been invented to explain the assault. The fact that there is none, to my mind, goes some way to show that the witnesses were relating exactly what they had seen.

Then it is contended that there must have been blood on the ground where the murder was committed and on the charpai on which he was alleged to have been lying and as there was not it was probable that the murder was committed somewhere else by some one else and the body was brought to the thana from some other place. There is really no substance in this contention. For there is no evidence on the point one way or the other. It may be that the bowels protruded and stopped the external bleeding. The medical evidence would go to show that there was a large amount of internal bleeding. No question was put to the doctor specifically on this point, possibly because this view of the case is attempted to be made out for the first time in the appellate Court. Habib does say in his evidence and in the cross-examination that part of the bowels protruded. This would certainly to some extent support the view that the prosecution has set up why there was not a large amount of external bleeding.

Then it has been argued that the learned Judge misdirected the jury as to the way in which they were to deal with the evidence of the witness Mir. Ali whom the prosecution had declared to be hostile. Mr. Camell contends that the learned Judge told the jury that so far as the prosecution is concerned his evidence should be totally disregarded and might be used by the accused adversely. Possibly this is the correct view of law. But the questions of misdirection are of less importance in a case of reference, for in a case of reference we are obliged to come to our own independent conclusion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused person independently of the verdict of the jury or of the opinion of the Judge. Neither as far as I can see the misdirection, if any, really affected the verdict of the jury.

There is the usual suggestion that there were many witnesses who must have seen or known what had occurred and that these witnesses had not been examined. After the first trial this Court did give direction that certain persons named should be examined as witnesses. They were the persons who lived in the vicinity. But they were unable to throw much light upon the occurrence.

I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that it was the accused Hazrat Gul Khan who stabbed the deceased

Mahomed. Alim. The accused Hazrat Gul Khan made no attempt to prove the case he put forward that he was arrested on getting down from the train on his way from Matiabruz.

As to what the act of Hazrat Gul Khan amounts to, the view I take is that it would amount to murder. The natural result of plunging a knife into a man's stomach is death or such bodily injury as is likely to result in death. The man who plunges a knife into another man's stomach must know that it would cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death and that hence death would be the probable result of his act. The man who does such an act therefore must be held to intend to cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to result in death, for a man is presumed to intend the natural consequence of his action. If he had not that knowledge or intention in the circumstances and he did the act with some other knowledge or intention then it is for him, in my opinion, to prove it, for that is a fact peculiarly within his own knowledge. I would therefore hold that the offence was murder and that seeing that the attack was made on an unsuspecting and apparently unarmed man the proper punishment is the extreme penalty of the law.

My learned brother, however, for certain reasons is of the opinion that the act of the accused amounted to causing grievous hurt with a cutting weapon. Although I do not agree in that view I am not prepared to differ from him.

We set aside the finding and sentence under S. 302 and find the accused Hazrat Gul Khan guilty under S. 326, I. P. C., and sentenced to ten years rigorous imprisonment.

Before parting with this case I think we ought to draw the attention of the Inspector-General of Police to the perfunctory way in which the police has dealt with the case. When complaint was first made at the thana, according to the statement of the police officer, the complaint was of a cognizable offence yet no attempt was made to record the statement of the person making the complaint or to make any enquiry.

Mukerji, J.—Having given the case the anxious consideration that it deserves I have come to the same conclusion as my learned brother on most of the points that arise in it. It will serve no useful purpose to set forth the reasons on which my findings are based as most of them are the same which my learned brother has given in the judgment he has just delivered. I agree with him in his conclusion that the injury on the deceased was inflicted by the prisoner and none else, that the whole of the occurrence took place in what is referred to as the baithakkhana ghar in the evidence, and that the blow was struck when the deceased was lying on the khatia, as is the case for the prosecution. The two eye witnesses, P. W. 3 Habib Shah Mir and P. W. 4 Abdul Kayem, notwithstanding the variance that has on behalf of the prisoner been pointed out in their evidence, are in my judgment worthy of credit, and nothing, in my opinion, has been established which would entitle the Court to reject their evidence as untrustworthy, in so far as they purport to attribute the injury on the deceased to a blow dealt by the prisoner with a knife. The argument that P. W. 3 Habib Shah Mir himself might have dealt the blow is too fantastic to deserve any serious consideration. The enmity that has been sought to be established as between this witness and the deceased as affording a motive on his part to commit the crime is based upon an inference which even if sound is too far-fetched; and on the other hand his conduct immediately or soon after the occurrence chasing the supposed culprit, taking steps to get him arrested, and seeking the help of the police is utterly inconsistent with the supposition that we have been asked to make. I think the witness named the prisoner as the assailant immediately or very soon after the occurrence and there can be no vestige of a suspicion that there was any opportunity, far less any endeavour, to concoct a case as against the prisoner, or to implicate him falsely.

I think it may be reasonably held upon the evidence, such as it is, that the name of the assailant was given at the thana by the witness when he went there for the first time at about 8 p. m. and I am not prepared to put up on the passage in the evidence of P.W. 21, Sub-Inspector Kamala Pati Sen Gupta, the meaning which the prisoner's learned counsel desires us to do, the passage which runs in the words:

Beyond saying that one man had struck another with a knife they said nothing further then about the accused.

I do not think the witness meant to suggest that the name of the accused was not given, having said a few moments earlier that he could not remember the names that were given. In my opinion the passage only means that no further details as to what the accused did were given beyond the infliction of the injury with a knife. If the assailant was then named at the thana, it is inconceivable that it could be any other than the one who was charged in the first information lodged at the same thana only two hours after by the same informant. Again, it is fairly clear that the arrest of the prisoner took place in consequence of the information which P. W. 3 Habib Shah gave to P. W. 6, the railway watchman, Gul Hamid Khan, very soon after the occurrence and before Habib Shah and others started out for the thana. Added to this is the evidence of the other eye-witness P. W. 4 Abdul Kayem against whom I can find nothing which can lend the slightest colour of a suspicion that he would be party to a conspiracy to save the real culprit and implicate an innocent man against whom he had no cause of grievance whatsoever.

I may say in passing that P. W. 5 Mir Ali was allowed to be declared hostile and cross-examined by the prosecution for no appreciable reason whatever. For this, however, the trial Court was not to blame; the mistake was made in the Court of enquiry. The reason given in the petition filed by the prosecution for this purpose in the Court of the committing Magistrate was utterly inadequate and the course thus adopted is to be deprecated as having contributed to the difficulties in the case.

I am not prepared to say that the witnesses P. W. 8 Jumayet Khan, P. W. 9 Debi Miah and P. W. 10 Miajan Shah are not truthful witnesses; but I am unable to set much store by their evidence in view of the fact that they were not examined before the committing Magistrate in the enquiry that was held prior to commitment and were not examined at all at any stage until after the case was remanded by this Court, and more especially as two of them were not even examined by the police in the investigation that was held before the prisoner was sent up.

As regards the witnesses who speak to the arrest of the prisoner nothing much turns upon the details, so long as we can find, as I do find, that it was in consequence of the information given by P. W. 3 Habib Shah to P. W. 6 Gul Hamid Khan that the arrest was made.

The main difficulties in the case have been due to a combination of circumstances, notable amongst which is the want of promptitude on the part of the thana staff in dealing with the information that was conveyed to them at 8 p. m., when Habib first went to the thana and to the perfunctory character of the investigation that followed the first information which was recorded at 10 p. m. The whole thana, not excluding the thana clock itself, seems to have been out of order on the day in question. The police diary does not show that in this case, in which a charge of murder was being investigated, the statements of all the eyewitnesses were fully recorded under S. 161, Criminal P. C. Learned counsel for the prisoner has not been slow to make such use as he was legitimately entitled to make of the evidence of the police witnesses, their want of recollection, their defect of observation, the inquest report and the first information. But for the force of circumstances that exist, and the satisfactory nature of the direct evidence that there is in the case, a miscarriage of justice would probably have resulted.

A more difficult question in my opinion that calls for decision in this case is the offence of which the prisoner should be convicted. The medical evidence shows, and that is entirely consistent with the evidence of the eyewitnesses, that only one blow was inflicted on the lower part of the abdomen. It was a penetrating wound, margins being clean cut, transverse in direction $1\frac{1}{2}$ " long communicating with the abdominal cavity. The wound was directed backwards, the peritonium being injured by a clean cut corresponding to the injury described above. The coils of the intestine were cut in five places, three in small and two in the large intestine. All the injuries communicated with the cavity of the intestine. The left side artery was half-divided. The knife with which the injury was caused was, according to the medical evidence, probably very sharp. It has not been found and of its dimensions nothing is known. If the evidence of the eyewitnesses be accepted in its entirety, the prisoner armed with the knife appeared in the baitakkhana, waited for some time, talked with those present there quite leisurely, drank a glass of water, asked Habib Shah if he would like to have a glass of water and on his answering in the affirmative gave it to him, dealt the blow on the deceased and quietly walked out of the room taking up his lathi that was near the door. One of two hypotheses is possible under the circumstances: either that he had come prepared to kill the deceased, or that he was suddenly seized with a homicidal mania. Either hypothesis it is difficult to accept. That a man who has formed the intention to kill another and has armed himself with a knife for the purpose would think of coming up accompanied by somebody from whom he did not expect any help that he would sit down and quietly talk with two other men for some time, drink a glass of water, give a glass of water to another in the room and then in the presence of all deal the blow to inflict which he came, is a story which, in itself, is somewhat improbable or at least out of the ordinary.

But apart from it, the nature of the injury, in my opinion, is not positively indicative of an intention to kill: one blow with a knife the dimensions of which are not known, the force with which the blow was dealt being more or less a matter of speculation, and the length of wound being consistent with the supposition that it was plunged and taken out and not indicating a desire to rip the abdomen open. There is no evidence either way as to whether the prisoner was or was not in the habit of carrying a knife. Motive though not a sine qua non for bringing the offence to the accused is relevant and important on the question of intention, and of motive what there is or has been established is hardly adequate to lead to a conclusion that there must have been an intention to cause death. On the question whether the prisoner intended to cause such bodily injury as he knew to be likely to cause death or such as is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, the medical witness should have been asked to give his opinion on the nature of the injury and its likely and natural effects, but in this respect his evidence is silent. I am unable to hold, therefore, that the intention requisite to constitute murder has been made out. As regards the theory of a sudden fit of homicidal mania, the intention to kill is not manifest upon the character of the injury, and there is no history at its back. To deduce knowledge on the part of the prisoner as to the likely result of his act so as to hold the prisoner liable for culpable homicide similar difficulties present themselves. Moreover the evidence seems somewhat inconclusive as to whether the prisoner had a talk with the deceased just before the act was committed, the passage in the evidence of P. W. 3 Habib Shah being not incapable of that interpretation. If there was any conversation or altercation between the two we are entitled to know what it was about and the exact nature of it, and that would have enabled us to judge more accurately of the prisoner's mentality either on the question of his intention or of his knowledge, either directly or with the aid of the presumption that one must be taken to intend the nature or probable consequences of his act—a rule of English criminal law which originally but a rule of evidence has now acquired the dignity of a legal axiom, but which it is not always quite easy to apply to the Indian criminal law in view of the distinction that the Indian Penal Code makes between intention and knowledge. It should not also be forgotten on the question of knowledge, that much depends on the intellectual capacity of the actor, a savage often thinks differently from a civilized man.

I am not sure that in the evidence we have before us all that immediately preceded the assault. The safer course in my opinion, instead of resorting to the process of inferential reasoning, in view of the circumstances to which I have referred, is to take the facts as they are and to convict the prisoner of voluntarily causing grievous hurt with a knife which falls well within S. 326, I. P. C. I am inclined therefore to convict the prisoner under S. 326, I. P. C., and sentence him to rigorous imprisonment for ten years.

SUHRAWARDY AND GRAHAM, JJ.

Suresh Chandra Chatterjee — Appellant—

Kanti Chandra Bhattacharjee — Respondent.

Appeal No. 2229 of 1927, Decided on 29th February 1928, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, 24-Parganas, D/- 28th July 1927.

Civil P. C., O. 41, R. 33—Suit by landlord to eject tenant after giving notice—Calcutta Rent Act in force when suit dismissed—Rent Act expiring at the hearing of the appeal—Rent Act was held to be not applicable—Interpretation of statutes—Calcutta Rent Act (3 of 1920).

It is true that an appellate Court has to decide a case as it was presented before the trial Court and on a consideration of which the original judgment is based. But if the right claimed is one which has either ceased to exist or been modified by certain events which have transpired since the decree of the trial Court, the Court is bound to take notice of it in order to give just and proper relief to the parties to the appeal before it. [P 437 C 2]

The plaintiff let his premises to the defendant and standard rent was fixed under the Rent Act of 1920. On 14th March 1925, the plaintiff gave a notice to the defendant asking him to vacate the premises by the end of March 1925. The defendant not having vacated within the time allowed to him, a suit was instituted on 13th May 1925, for ejectment against the defendant. The trial Court dismissed the plaintiff's suit on the ground that the defendant was protected from ejectment under the provisions of S. 11, Rent Act. This order was pronounced on 30th July 1926. There was an appeal by the plaintiff against the decree of the trial Court. The appeal came on for hearing on 29th July 1927. In the meantime the Rent Act expired on 31st March 1927 and ceased to exist. The appeal was heard and allowed. Defendant came on second appeal.

Held : that the case was rightly decided as on the day the lower appellate Court delivered its judgment, the law applicable was the general law i. e., T. P. Act, and the tenancy having been validly determined under it, a decree ordering ejectment was correct. [P 437 C 1]

Suhrawardy, J.—This is an appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge of 24-Parganas in a suit in ejectment. The appellant became the tenant under the plaintiff in respect of premises, 17/2-A, Kundu Lane, Bhowanipur, in the suburbs of Calcutta, at a monthly rent of

Rs. 50, in 1920. Subsequently the parties went to the Rent Controller to the standard rent of the premises under the Rent Act of 1920 which was then in force. The rent was fixed by the Rent Controller at Rs. 39 a month. On 14 March 1925 the plaintiff gave a notice to the defendant asking him to vacate the premises by the end of March 1925. The defendant not having vacated within the time allowed to him, the present suit was instituted on 13th May 1925 for ejectment against the defendant. The trial Court dismissed the plaintiff's suit on the ground that the defendant was protected from ejectment under the provisions of S. 11, Rent Act. This order was pronounced on 30th July 1926. There was an appeal by the plaintiff against the decree of the trial Court. The appeal came on for hearing on 29th July 1927. In the meantime the Rent Act expired and ceased to exist. The Rent Act was originally passed in 1920 in respect of premises in and about Calcutta and came into operation from 5th May 1920. The Act was originally enacted for three years but by subsequent enactment was extended up to 31st March 1924. Before it expired another Act was introduced and the Rent Act got a fresh lease of life till 31st March 1927, but only in respect of premises of which the rent was below Rs. 250 a month so that so far as the premises in question are concerned the Rent Act must be taken to have affected them till it expired on 31st March 1927.

The appeal was heard by the learned Third Additional District Judge of 24-Parganas and allowed. The learned Judge decreed that the defendant should vacate the premises in suit within one month from the date of judgment which was 29th July 1927 and he was further directed to pay damages at the rate of Rs. 39 a month from 1st April 1925 till possession was delivered. The learned Judge took a different view of the facts relied upon by the trial Court and he found that the defendant did not pay the rent regularly to the plaintiff or deposit it in the Rent Controller's Court and was therefore not protected from ejectment by virtue of the provision of sub S. 5 of S. 11 of the Act. He was also of opinion that the evidence in the case went to show that there was no preliminary tender of rent to the landlord before it was deposited in the Rent Controller's office and hence it was not a proper payment of rent within sub-Cl. 4, S. 11, Rent Act. We have examined these clauses in the light of the evidence in the case and the findings of the first Court and we do not think that they can be supported. But the learned vakil for the respondent has supported the decree passed by the appellate Court upon a different ground, namely, that on 29th July 1927 there was no Rent Act in operation and the defendant's tenancy having been terminated by a valid notice he was liable to be ejected and hence the decree of the lower appellate Court is correct. This seems to be the correct position to take. Under the general law a landlord is entitled to determine the tenancy of a tenant under him by a valid notice and he is further entitled to recover possession of the property let out to the tenant on the termination of the tenancy. This right of the landlord for a certain period became interrupted by the Rent Act which laid down certain circumstances in which recovery of possession of land could not be obtained by the landlord. That bar ceased to exist on 31st March 1927. On the day on which the learned Judge delivered his judgment the law which is the general law under the Transfer of Property Act was in operation and he having found that the tenancy was validly determined he had authority to pass a decree ordering ejectment of the defendant. The effect of a temporary Act running out and ceasing to have any further operation has been considered in many cases. The principle is thus laid down in Craies on Statute Law, 3rd edn., at p. 342 :

As a general rule and unless it contains some special provision to the contrary, after a temporary Act has expired no proceedings can be taken upon it and it ceases to have any further effect. . . . As soon as the Act expires any proceedings which are being taken against a person will ipso facto terminate.

In Quilter v. Mapleson (1), it was held that the Court of appeal could grant to a party relief to which he was entitled according to the law as it stood at the hearing of the appeal. In his judgment Bowen, L. J. observed :

The rules were intended to enable the Court of appeal to do complete justice. If the law has been altered pending the appeal, it seems to me to be pressing rules of procedure too far to say that the Court of appeal cannot decide according to the existing state of the law.

The same view has been taken in several cases in this country of which reference may be made to Kanakayya v. Janardhan Padhi (2), Muthuswami Ayyar v. Kalyani Ammal (3). This principle is based upon another principle that a Court of appeal must in certain exceptional circumstances take notice of events which have happened since the institution of the suit and afford relief to a party on the basis of the altered circumstances : Ram Ratan v. Bishun Churn (4), Ramyad Sahu v. Bindeswari Kumar (5) ; Udit Chobey v. Rashika Prasad (6) ; Rustomji v. Purshotamdas (7) ; and Dinanath Mahish v. Nabakumar Hazra (8). All the relevant cases on this point have been considered by Mookerjee, J., in Rai Charan Mandal v. Biswa Nath Mandal (9). It is true that an appellate Court has to decide a case as it was presented before the trial Court and on a consideration of which the original judgment is based. But if the right claimed is one which has either ceased to exist or been modified by certain events which have transpired since the decree of the trial Court the Court is bound to take notice of it in order to give just and proper relief to the parties to the appeal before it. Upon these and similar considerations R. 33, O. 41, Civil P. C., was introduced for the first time by the Act of 1908. A Court of appeal is empowered thereby to make such a decree or order as the case may require. I am accordingly of opinion that the decree passed by the learned Judge was correct on the findings arrived at by him namely that the defendant was tenant-at-will whose tenancy was determined by a valid notice and he was liable to be ejected, though not on the grounds on which the lower appellate Court has relied in support of its decree.

The learned advocate for the appellant has argued that before a decree could be passed against his client for ejectment the validity of the notice should have been determined. In the 'trial Court an issue was raised with regard to the sufficiency and validity of the notice of ejectment. But that Court having found in favour of the defendant on the law did not enter into a discussion of it. In the appellate Court this question was raised and the learned Judge observed that notice was served on 14th March requiring the defendant to vacate at the termination of the month of March. The defendant signed an acknowledgment of the receipt of the notice but did not vacate the premises. The learned Judge further observes that the defendant admits the receipt of the notice to quit and no evidence has been given to show that the notice is not valid :

There can be no doubt, therefore, that were it not for the Rent Act the defendant could not resist ejectment.

It is also contended that the learned Judge has misplaced the onus of proving the validity of the notice upon the defendant whereas it being the basis of cause of action in the suit the plaintiff ought to prove that he had validly determined the tenancy. None of these contentions ought to prevail. The learned Judge has dealt with the question of the proof of notice and he has come to the conclusion that it was valid inasmuch as it was not shown that the notice was invalid. This is really not a question of misplacing the onus. It was a tenancy-at-will. The notice was served on 14th March 1925 ending with the last day of the month. Apparently it was a good and sufficient notice under S. 106, T. P. Act. The plaintiff if there was any onus on him, had discharged it by proving the receipt of the notice ; and if the defendant contended that it was not a sufficient and valid notice it was for him to show that it was so. I am, therefore, of opinion that it is not necessary to remand the case to the lower appellate Court for a further finding with regard to the sufficiency of the notice. The appeal accordingly fails and is dismissed with costs.

There is a cross-objection on behalf of the respondent, that the amount of damages fixed by the lower appellate Court is insufficient. The learned Judge has decreed damages from 1st April 1925 till possession is given at the rate of Rs. 39 a month that being the standard rent fixed under the Rent Act. The contract between the parties was Rs. 50 a month and this the plaintiff-respondent claims should have been allowed to him by way of damages. It is the plaintiff's case that he terminated the defendant's tenancy by a notice from 1st April 1925 and from that date the defendant was a trespasser in occupation of the premises. He cannot, therefore, claim as a matter of right that damages must be in the shape of rent which was stipulated between the parties. But it is open to the Court to assess damages which the plaintiff is entitled to get from a trespasser in wrongful possession of the premises. The Rent Controller has found that Rs. 39 was the fair rent of the premises and we cannot say that the principle upon which the learned Judge has assessed damages is so obviously wrong as to entitle us to interfere in second appeal. The cross-objection must accordingly fail. But the decree of this Court will be that the defendant will vacate the premises on 31st March 1928 and in the event of his doing so he will pay damages to the plaintiff (less the money deposited by him in the Rent Controller's office and any amount paid by him for or on behalf of the plaintiff) at the rate of Rs. 39 a month from 1st April 1925 till March 1928. If the defendant fails to vacate the premises on or before 31st March 1928 he will be liable to pay damages to the plaintiff at the rate of Rs. 50 a month from 1st April 1927 till the date of delivery of possession to the plaintiff. We make no order as to costs of the cross-objection. The plaintiff is entitled to the amount that has been deposited to his credit by the defendant in the proceedings under the Rent Act.

Any amount in excess of what is decreed by this order and deposited by the defendant may be refunded to him.

The appeal and cross-objection are dismissed with the modification stated above.

Criminal Revn. Petn. No. 1083 of 1927, Decided on 10th February 1928, from order of Sub-Divl. Magistrate, Barisal.

If a person himself is likely to commit a breach of the peace he may be dealt with under S. 107. A. K. Basu and Sachindra Nath Banerji—for the Crown Judgment.—This is a rule granted to the petitioner Satindra Nath Sen Gupta on certain grounds mentioned in the petition. Proceedings were taken under S. 107, Criminal P C, against the petitioner on 18th March last by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Barisal and after hearing the evidence the Sub-Divisional Magistrate directed him to execute a bond of Rs. 5,000 with two sureties of Rs. 2,500 each to keep the peace for one year. On appeal to the learned Sessions Judge the order requiring security was upheld but the amount of the bond was reduced to Rs. 500, together with two sureties of Rs. 250 each.

The facts found by the learned Sessions Judge in concurrence with the Sub-Divisional Magistrate are that the petitioner is the leader of the Satyagraha movement in the district of Bakerganj, the object of which is to enforce the right of the Hindus to lead processions with music before mosques on public highways at all times. The assertion of such a right, to use the words of the learned Judge, has excited the Mahomedans and they decline to let any procession with music pass in front of their mosques. On 16th March 1927 the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, in view of the state of feelings then existing between the Hindus and the Mahomedans, issued an order under S. 144, Criminal P. C., prohibiting any such procession upon the ensuing Doljatra day which would be held either on 18th or 19th March. On the morning of 17th March a Hindu procession tried to pass Lakhutia which we are told is a place within the Barisal sub-division, but owing to the objection of certain Mahomedans the procession withdrew. On the same evening the Superintendent of Police sent for the petitioner and asked him what his attitude was with regard to the prohibitory order made by the Magistrate under S. 144. The petitioner stated in his presence and that of the District Magistrate who came in during the meeting, to use the words of the learned Judge, that he would lead processions with music before mosques highways and would not desist either for the opposition of the Mahomedans nor for any orders of the police or the Magistrate. The learned Judge observes :

As he is a leader of a large number of young men he was in the circumstances arrested on 18th March and the present proceedings were instituted against him.

The question for our decision is whether in the circumstances such an order requiring the petitioner to execute a bond should be sustained. A great volume of evidence was laid before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate and it was accepted by him as well as by the learned Sessions Judge. He found this, to quote the words from the judgment of the learned Magistrate :

Put in a nutshell, the case for the Crown is that Satindra Nath Sen had during a period of extremely strained feeling between the two communities on religious matters enunciated the principle that it was the Hindus' inherent right to pass with music before all mosque, at all times of the day and night. In pursuance of this principle he had collected men and money and had organized a movement commonly known as the Satyagraha movement. His followers were numerous and loyal to him. He had been responsible for processions at Meghia and Barisal which had flouted orders lawfully promulgated and he had asserted that he would resort to violence if necessary. During the Doljatra festival in spite of orders under S. 144, Criminal P. C., he told the District Magistrate that if he organized a procession it would be on the lines of the others for which he had been responsible. Further he was prepared to organize these processions before any mosque in the district where Mahomedans opposed it. The prosecution has succeeded in proving these facts and alleges that Satindra Nath Sen is in a position to carry out his threats. In the present condition of the district, action as described above is likely to lead to clashes between the two communities and disturbances of the public tranquility are probable.

These findings which have been accepted by the learned Judge are so clear that prima facie we should find the greatest difficulty in interfering with the order for security. It has, however, been strenuously contended by Mr. Taluqdar who has appeared in support of the rule that the evidence on which these findings have been arrived at is for the most part inadmissible in law. His first contention has been that whatever academic ideas any person may entertain he is not liable to be dealt with under S. 107, Criminal P. C., unless overt acts are committed as the result of the expression of these ideas. This seems to us to be misconstruing the provisions of S. 107, Criminal P. C. This section says :

Whenever a Magistrate is informed that any person is likely to commit a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquility or to do any wrongful act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquility the Magistrate may proceed.

Now it is plainly true to say that if a person himself is likely to commit a breach of the peace he may be dealt with under the section. But it is also true to say that if for any wrongful act on his part other persons may do things which would probably occasion a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquility he would equally become amenable to the provisions of the section.

The second argument which has been addressed to us is that the conversation between the petitioner and Mr. Blandy, the District Magistrate, and the Superintendent of Police, Mr. Taylor, is inadmissible in evidence because it was made under an implied seal of secrecy. We fail to appreciate this argument. The position was, as we understood it, that the Superintendent of Police sent for this gentleman to enquire what attitude he proposed to take in regard to the suggested procession on the Doljatra day. Mr. Blandy happened to come in there and took part in the conversation. To say that that constitutes a conversation held under an implied seal of secrecy seems to us to import a meaning which it cannot possibly bear. The petitioner frankly admitted that he did not propose to hold his hand; on the contrary he would take the procession with music past a mosque as he pleased irrespective of any order already made or any order that might be made. Plainly that evidence is admissible to show what his intention was. Mr. Taluqdar has then referred to certain findings of the learned Sessions Judge in regard to the Satyagraha movement at Patuakhali, the Saraswati Puja incident in 1926 and the B. M. College incident of the 13th

February. In the last case the petitioner was put on his trial but was acquitted. It is argued that a reference to these particular incidents is irrelevant to the present enquiry. No doubt the fact of the petitioner having been acquitted on 13th February made that matter one upon which little reliance can be placed. But the rest of the evidence is clearly admissible under S. 11, Evidence Act, to show the particular line of action the petitioner would probably take.

It is then contended that the petitioner cannot be held responsible for the Lukutia incident of 19th March as he had by that time been arrested. Mr. Taluqdar has dealt at some length with the evidence which shows that the Hindu processionists acted with self-restraint in waiting till after prayer time to pass by the mosque. He has referred in particular to the evidence of Mr. Higgins P. W. 12, who says that the procession approached at about 5-10 p. m., that he met and stopped them 75 yards from the mosque and spoke to certain gentlemen. He told them that the Mussalmans were saying their prayers and told them not to pass by the mosque. They consulted amongst themselves and at 10 minutes to 6 p. m. they insisted on passing by the mosque with music. The Mussalmans were annoyed and excited. He arrested the processionists under S. 296, I P C., and put his force between the Hindus and Mussalmans as both sides were excited and there was possibility of a breach of the peace. He says further that the Hindu processionists behaved well and that they were not violent, insolent or insulting. Plainly, therefore, a breach of the peace was averted chiefly by the presence of the police force because, although the Hindu processionists were neither violent nor insulting, their action in taking the procession by the mosque where prayers were still in progress was provocative and likely to annoy the Mussalmans. The procession seems to have been directly inspired by the petitioner, as it was led by men whom the Magistrate has found to have been his close associates. We think, therefore, on a full consideration of the facts that when the petitioner took the line of action which he did the Magistrate had no option but to make the order he passed and in view of the position the petitioner occupies we can not say that the security required from him is excessive. The rule is, accordingly, discharged.

Appeal No. 704 of 1925, Decided on 17th August 1927, from appellate decree of 1st Sub-Judge, Zillah Mymensingh, D/- 11th December 1924.

Transfer of Property Act, S. 52—Rent suit by landlord compromised—Transfer of durputni pending the suit but before compromise—Doctrine of lis pendens was held not applicable.

To make lis pendens a notice to a purchaser of an estate, the question in the action must relate specifically to the estate and not, merely to the money secured on it. [P 443 C 1]

A landlord executed a durputni patta in favour of C in respect of some moujas, fixing some rent. Later, the terms of the lease were modified by another registered deed of agreement increasing the rent. Subsequent to this deed of agreement, the Court of Wards took charge of the landlord's estate and brought a rent suit against C, the original holder of durputni. The suit was ultimately compromised and a decree was passed embodying the terms of the compromise. During the pendency of the suit but before the compromise took place, A and B purchased the durputni from C.

Held: that alienations of the property in favour of A and B were not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens: 29 All. 339 (P. C.), Ref.

Nuruddin Ahmed and Nausher Ali—for Appellants.

Surendra Nath Guha—for Respondent.

Mitter, J.—This is an appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Mymensingh, dated 11th December 1924, which affirmed a decision of the Munsif of Tangail dated 28th February 1923.

The suit in which this appeal arises was commenced by the plaintiff for recovery of arrears of rents and cesses together with damages for the years 1327 and 1328 B. S. from the defendants who are three in number at the rate of Rs. 135-8-0 per year. The plaintiff alleges that defendant 1 was the original holder of the durputni to which the suit relates and that defendants 2 and 3 are transferees from defendant 1 of the durputni interest and they have consequently been impleaded in the suit.

The defence of the defendants, who filed separate written statements, is substantially this:

That plaintiff is not entitled to recover any rent as the defendants have been kept out of possession of two mouzas, Haria and Gajaria, comprised in the durputni and that the rate at which the rent has been claimed cannot be recovered as the solenamah, on the basis of which this rent was adjusted, was invalid and inoperative.

In order to understand the points raised before the lower Courts which have been repeated before this Court it is necessary to set forth briefly the following material facts. The plaintiff executed a durputni putta (Ex. B) in respect of six mouzas mentioned in the plaint and mouza Haria by which the rent stipulated to be paid was Rs. 165 per year. On 14th of Aughrayan 1310 B. S. (1903) the terms of the lease were modified by another registered deed of agreement (Ex. 4), by which the annual jama was raised from Rs. 165 to Rs. 188-2-2 per year. Subsequent to this deed of agreement the Court of Wards took charge of the plaintiff's estate and brought a rent suit against defendant 1 in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Mymensingh for rents for the years 1321-1326 B. S. The suit was ultimately compromised and a decree was passed embodying the terms of the compromise. Neither the petition of compromise nor the decree embodying the compromise has been placed before us and we are left to gather the terms of the compromise from the following statements regarding its contents in the Munsif's judgment.

... and on the strength of this solenamah the defendant relinquished all claims in mouza Haria, the plaintiff admitted defendants' right and possession in Gajaria mouza and rent payable by the defendant was accordingly reduced to Rs. 135-8-0 and in consideration of the defendants' relinquishing his claim in Haria mouza the plaintiff relinquished his rents for the period he claimed in that rent suit. Besides these stipulations the defendant affirmed the genuineness of the deed of agreement Ex. B.

This solenamah was embodied in the decree and the suit was dismissed accordingly: vide Exs. 5 and 9.

It is to be noted here that defendants 2 and 3 were no parties to the solenama although the plaintiff was informed of the purchase by defendants 2 and 3 from defendant 1 of the durputni in question as the landlord's fee was deposited. The purchase of defendants 2 and 3 was alleged to have been made for a valuable consideration of Rs. 1,500 and was in the nature of a hibabilewaz and was made four or five months before the compromise decree and during the pendency of the rent suit in which the compromise was made. The plaintiff has instituted the present rent suit on the basis of the compromise decree. The case made in the Courts below by the defendants is: (1) that the solenama cannot be admitted in the evidence as it was not registered and this notwithstanding its being embodied in the decree, as the compromise (solenamah) had the effect of creating a new durputni with new terms, and that consequently it required registration, having regard to the provisions of S. 17, Cl. 1 (d), Registration Act; and (ii) that defendants 2 and 3 are not bound by the compromise as they were no parties to the said compromise decree. The Munsif held that the effect of the compromise (solenama) was not to create a new lease but only to make a certain variation in the old rental and in certain other incidents of the tenancy and as such it did not require registration having regard to the provisions of S. 17 (2), Cls. 1 and 6, Registration Act. The Munsif further held that the transfer in favour of defendants 2 and 3 which are evidenced by two deeds (Exs. A and A-1) are affected by the doctrine of lis pendens as embodied in S. 52, T. P. Act and defendants 2 and 3 took the property subject to the result of the previous rent suit which ended in the compromise decree. The Munsif accordingly decreed the suit of the plaintiff and directed that defendant 1 will be liable for rents, cesses, damage and proportionate rents up to the end of Pous 1327 and that he should be absolved from liability from the date of Hiba which is 20th of Pous 1327 B. S. and that defendants 2 and 3 be liable for rents from beginning of March 1327 B. S.

An appeal was taken by the defendants to the Court of the Subordinate Judge who affirmed the decision of the Munsif.

In second appeal the same two objections which were taken in the Courts below have been repeated before us by the learned vakil for the defendants now appellants. With regard to the first objection it is sufficient to state that the effect of the solenama in the previous rent suit has been not to create a fresh lease so as to attract the operation of S. 17, Cl. 1 (d), Registration Act, and make registration of the solepama compulsory. All that was done was that mouza Haria was excluded from the durputni and a separate jama of Rs. 52 odd fixed for the mouza was deducted from the entire rent of the durputni and the present rental was fixed as being the sum total of the rents of the different mouzas. There might have been a variation of rent of the original lease by the solenama which, in order to be effective, would have required registration but for the provisions of S. 17 (2), Cl. (1) and (6), Registration Act. There is, therefore, no substance in this objection of the defendants which must be overruled.

The second objection raised is one of substance and must prevail. It has been contended that the Courts below are in error in holding that the transfers in favour of defendant 2 and 3 are effected by the doctrine of lis pendens. The argument is that S. 52, T. P. Act. can not apply as the suit was a rent suit and was not a suit in which "any right of immovable property was directly and specifically in question" within the meaning of the said section. A suit for rent is primarily a suit for money and although rent is a first charge on the property no charge is created until, in any event before decree. For it has been pointed out in the case of Basant Kumar v. Khulna Loan Co (1) that the rent payable by a putnidar to his zamindar, which has been transformed into a judgment-debt, is a first charge on the tenure.

The same rule applies with regard to the rent payable by the durpatnidar to the putnidar. It is open to the holder of the rent decree to proceed if he likes against properties of the lessee other than the lease-hold property. It is of the essence of the rule of lis pendens that in order to obtain the protection of the rule the property must be directly and specifically in question in the suit. In the previous rent suit there was no question of any title to the properties transferred. All that was said was that defendant 1 had not been given possession of some mouzas of the tenure and therefore was entitled to entire suspension of rent.

In the case of Faiyaz Hossain v. Prag Narain (2) at p. 345, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council made the following observations with regard to the doctrine of lis pendens as enunciated in S. 52, T. P. Act.

The doctrine of lis pendens with which S. 52 of the Act of 1882 is concerned is not, as Turner, L. J. observed in Bellamy v. Sabine (3), founded upon any of the peculiar tenets of a Court of equity as to implied or constructive notice.

It is a doctrine common to the Courts both of law and of equity and rests upon this foundation, that it would plainly be impossible that any action or suit could be brought to a successful termination if alienations pendente lite were permitted to prevail. The correct mode of stating the doctrine as Cranworth, L. C., observed in the same case, is that "pendente lite neither party to the litigation can alienate the property in dispute so as to affect his opponent."

It will appear clear from the above observations that alienations of the property in dispute were not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens. In the rent suit there was no dispute with regard to the title to the durputni as between plaintiff and defendant. There was allegation by the defendants of dispossession by the plaintiff from some durputni mouzas. The rent suit was not a suit to establish the title but was a suit to recover a debt. Neither did the defence raise any question of the title of the plaintiff to the superior interest in the disputed durputni so that by the pleadings in the rent suit title of the plaintiff in such superior interest was not drawn into controversy, nor was there any dispute with regard to the title to the durputni interest which was alleged to have been transferred by the hibas in favour of defendants 2 and 3, but the allegation only was that defendant 1 had not been put in possession of all the mouzas covered by the durputni.

To make a lis pendens notice to a purchaser of an estate, the question in the action must relate specifically to the estate and not merely to the money secured on it: see White and Tudor's Leading Cases on Equity, 5th edn Vol. II, pp. 75 and 76.

In the case of Ex parte Thornton (4) Lord Justice Cairns said:

Then the lis pendens being a technical expression well known, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that it always implied a claim of right, or a claim to charge specific property.

A suit for rent can hardly be regarded as a claim to charge specific property. In my opinion the transfers in favour of defendants 2 and 3 are not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens as embodied in S. 52, T. P. Act. In citing the English cases I am not unmindful of the observations of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Narendra Nath v. Kamalabasin (5) at p. 26 where their Lordships quoted with approbation the remarks of Lord Herschell in Bank of England v. Vagliano (6) that the proper course is in the first instance to examine the language of the statute and to ask what is its natural meaning uninfluenced by any consideration derived from the previous state of the law The purpose of such a statute surely was that on any point specifically dealt with by it the law should be ascertained by interpreting the language used instead of, as before, roaming over a vast number of authorities in order to discover what the law was, extracting it by a minute critical examination of the prior decisions.

But I feel myself justified in referring to the English cases for the purpose of showing that not only S. 52, T. P. Act, does not apply to the facts of the present case, but that also the general doctrine of lis pendens does not apply to the facts thereof. It also seems to me that it was assumed in the Privy Council case of Faiyaz Hossain v. Prag Narain (2), to which I have already referred, that the rule of lis pendens obtaining in England is the same as the rule embodied in S. 52, T. P. Act. The appeal must succeed on this ground.

The result is that the decrees of the lower appellate Court as against defendants 2 and 3 are set aside and the case is remitted to the Court of appeal in order that the Court may try the question on the evidence already taken as to whether there has been such dispossession of the defendants from the lands of the durputni by the plaintiff as to entitle Criminal Appeal No. 729 of 1927, Decided on 13th March 1928, from judgment of Addl. Sess. Judge, 24-Parganas.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 307—Majority of jury finding accused guilty twice—Trial Judge doubting as to accused's guilt but accepting the verdict and convicting them—Power of reference was held to have been rightly refused.

In a case tried by jury, the jury by a majority of four to three found the accused guilty and the Judge accepted the majority verdict of the jury and convicted and sentenced the accused. He stated in his order: "While this is a case in which there are certain doubtful factors, I hesitate not to accept the majority verdict of the jury, as this is the second time the accused have been tried by a special jury and a second time a verdict of guilty has been returned by the majority. It was essentially a case in which the jury must decide and I therefore accept their decision while not agreeing with it. I shall be glad if the accused get relief in the appellate Court.

Held: that the power of reference was rightly not exercised as this power should always be exercised with due regard to the fact that the constitutional tribunal to decide questions of fact is the jury and not the Judge. [P 445 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 307—High Court in appeal thinking that the case ought to have been submitted—High Court cannot direct the case to be submitted—Sessions Judge's view is final.

It is not correct law to say that, if the High Court thinks that the Judge, in a case tried by jury, ought to have been of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case, the High Court can direct him so to do or can act as though he has, in fact, submitted the case. The conditions laid down are not merely that the Judge disagrees with the verdict of the jury, but also that the Judge is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case. It is quite impossible to direct the Judge to be clearly of a certain opinion and the language used by the statute shows that the Judge's view on that point is to be final for that purpose. [P 446 C 1]

Khundkar and Sachindra Nath Banerjee—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case six appellants were tried on a charge under S. 201, I. P. C., before the Additional Sessions Judge of the 24-Pargannas sitting with a jury. The jury by a majority of 4 to 3 found them guilty and the learned Judge accepted the majority verdict of the jury and convicted the appellants and sentenced them to four years' rigorous imprisonment each. He stated in his order:

While this is a case in which there are certain doubtful factors I hesitate not to accept the majority verdict of the jury as this is the second time the accused have been tried by a special jury and a second time a verdict of guilty has been returned by the majority. It was essentially a case in which the jury must decide and I therefore accept their decision while not agreeing with it. I shall be glad if the accused get relief in the appellate Court.

Now, the general character of the case was this that one Chintamoni left his home to go to Maibibirhat and never returned. His dead body was found in a tank which may be called Nibaran's tank. There is evidence of a witness who says that he saw the accused with the body near a tank called Suren's tank. This witness is called Parameswar. He says that he confronted the six accused with the body of Chintamoni on the bank of the tank. They first of all told him to get away and then called him back and threatened him. There is evidence of two other witnesses, one called Adyait and another called Kansari, who were coming from a place called Dharmacharak at Panapukur, and as they crossed a bheri west of Nibaran's tank they say they saw these six accused with the dead body. They appear to have been dragging the dead body, but the witnesses' evidence as to seeing the actual dragging is not very definite.

The learned Judge put the case to the jury quite fairly, without laying undue stress either way. He left them to consider whether upon this evidence they were entitled to find that the accused were taking the dead body there. He left to them very fairly and properly the evidence on either side as to whether it was proved that Chintamoni had been murdered and whether it was possible that Chintamani had been drowned by accident. He told them that unless they were satisfied as to the commission of the offence of murder they could not on a charge under S. 201 go any further.

If one looks to the charge as a whole one finds, and indeed Mr. Taluqdar for the appellants very fairly says and admits, that the charge is a fair one. It contains no error of law and cannot be said to be inadequate. It is noticeable that the learned Judge has called the attention of the jury to the fact that the important witnesses did not state what they had seen until after a substantial delay, that they have an explanation that they were threatened and that they were afraid, and that the case, therefore, was essentially a case which the jury had to determine on the facts. The learned Judge appears to have been of opinion that sitting as a jurymen he would not have been prepared to act upon the evidence taken as a whole but would have given the prisoners the benefit of the doubt. Three of the jury took this view and four of the jury took the view that they were prepared to act upon the evidence, in particular, the definite evidence of these three men. Our right to interfere in such a matter is limited to a case where there has been misdirection on a point of law or where we are satisfied that the jury must have misunderstood the Judge's direction upon a point of law; and this case cannot be brought under either of these characters.

The question then arises as to the propriety of the order made by the learned Judge. His view is that it is a fair question for the jury. If he had been a jurymen, he would have been in favour of a verdict of not guilty, but he said that he accepted the majority verdict of the jury, and while his reasons about this being a second trial may not have very much in them the position is that he accepted the majority verdict of the jury and did not refer the case. This is not a case in which it can be said that there was no evidence or only a scintilla of evidence against the accused to go before a jury. There is far more than that.

The question, therefore, arises whether it is right or possible for us to interfere with the action of the learned Judge under our revisional or appellate jurisdiction and to say that he ought to have referred the case, and to deal with the case upon the footing that the facts and the law are open to us. There seems to be some authority, though it is only an obiter dictum, in the case of Saroda Charan Mistri v. Emperor (1). That was a case where the Judge's order was particularly difficult to understand and in the end, the Court decided the case on the footing that there was a misunderstanding on the part of the jury as to the law laid down by the learned Judge. On that footing the High Court was entitled to interfere, but it was said by my learned brother, Mr. Justice Mukherjee:

The learned Judge felt that the verdict of the jury was wrong, and if he accepted the verdict in its entirety he was unable to do justice to the accused. It follows therefore that the ends of justice demanded a reference to this Court. The conditions necessary for the application of S. 307, Criminal P. C., being clearly present the duty of the learned Judge was to make such a reference, and once the conditions are present that course is obligatory and is no longer a matter of discretion at all; it should be remembered that the word used is "shall." If under circumstances such as those that are in this case the learned Judge fails to do what the law requires him to do and thus deprives this Court of an opportunity to deal with the case on its merits, he does something more than merely acting in the erroneous exercise of his discretion. He fails to exercise his jurisdiction and this failure operates to the prejudice either of the Crown or of the accused, and, speaking for myself, I am of opinion that it is well within our power under S. 439, Criminal P. C., to direct him to submit the case to us for our consideration under S. 307, Criminal P. C.

Now as to that I desire to say two things: First of all, that the rights of the Court of appeal ordinarily include all the rights of revision and a reference to S. 439, Criminal P. C., would show that a case which comes within S. 439 is merely a case in which the High Court is given the power to exercise any of the powers conferred on a Court of appeal.

The second thing I desire to say is this: that if one looks at S. 307, Criminal P. C., one finds, as the learned Judge has pointed out that the word used is "shall"—"he shall submit the case accordingly;"—but the conditions laid down in the first subsection are: if the Judge disagrees with the verdict of the jurors or of a majority of the jurors and is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court, it is only then that, it is said, he shall submit the case accordingly. Now, I am not of opinion that it is correct law to say that if the High Court thinks that the Judge ought to have been of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case this Court can direct him so to do or can act as though he has, in fact, submitted the case. The conditions laid down are not merely that the Judge disagrees with the verdict of the jury, but also that the Judge is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case. The Judge is either clearly of opinion or not clearly of opinion and according as he acts in that matter the consequences must be. It is quite impossible, in my judgment, to direct the learned Judge to be clearly of a certain opinion and the language used by the statute shows that the Judge's view on that point is to be final for that purpose; and I am not prepared, in a case such as this, to enquire into the question whether or not the learned Judge ought to have been of opinion that it was necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case.

This matter is a little complicated and some learned Sessions Judges seem to be a little unhappy as to the way in which they express themselves when acting under Ss. 306 and 307. S. 306 says that when the Judge does not think it necessary to express disagreement with the verdict of the jurors he shall give judgment accordingly. That shows, as indeed is obvious, that it is no necessary part of the function of the Judge to have an opinion of his own about mere questions of fact and to assert it. His power only arises when having an opinion contrary to that of the jury he thinks that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court; and, in my judgment, this power should always be exercised with due regard to the fact that the constitutional tribunal to decide questions of fact is the jury and not the Judge.

It remains, however, that three jurymen and the Judge were not impressed with the reliability of the witnesses and four jurymen did accept their evidence. If, in these circumstances the executive authorities think fit to take action in the matter, I desire to say nothing that it would in any way fetter their hands. In my judgment it would be wrong on our part to interfere with the conviction or the sentences, and this appeal must be dismissed.

The appellants will surrender to their bail and serve out the remainder of their sentences.

Judgment.—Criminal Revision No. 952 of 1927.—This Rule has been granted in regard to an order made by the Deputy Magistrate of Howrah under S. 144. Criminal P. C. The material portion of the order was in these terms :

Whereas it appears from the petition filed on 21st July 1927 by Narain Das Chandra of 12 Shib Kristo Daw Lane, Calcutta, and the report dated the 26th July 1927 submitted thereupon by the Sub-Inspector of Golabari police station that Ram Gopal Goenka, of 20 Central Avenue, Calcutta, is holding a new market at Nos. 97 and 99 Haragunj Road, Sulkea, adjacent to the old Haragunj Bazar belonging to the Daw Babus of Jorasanko, Calcutta, for which a breach of the peace is apprehended, I do hereby prohibit the said Ram Gopal Goenka from holding new market at Nos. 97 and 99, Haragunj Road, as the holding of such market will lead to an imminent breach of the peace.

Now the order was only in force for two months and it expired on the 27th September 1927. Prima facie, therefore, the necessity for vacating it is not clear except on the ground that proceedings have been taken against the petitioner under S. 188, I. P. C., for violating it.

There is no dispute that the market which has been prohibited is situated on the petitioner's own land. The findings in the present case are that he applied to the Howrah Municipality to construct certain buildings upon this land and, according to the petition, sanction was first accorded by the Municipality but was afterwards revoked on the 30th June 1927. The facts found by both the Courts below are that the petitioner continued the work of construction in spite of the fact that sanction had been withdrawn. It is said also that he had no license as required under the Municipal Act, though this matter does not appear to be entirely clear. The further finding is that certain Nepali durwans in the employ of the petitioner forcibly dragged vendors to the new market and otherwise molested the public by conducting passers-by into the market presumably with the view of making them buy their commodities there rather than in the adjacent bazar belonging to the Daw Babus. Both the lower Courts have found that it was likely to result in an imminent breach of the peace. The question, therefore, we have to consider is whether the Magistrate was in these circumstances, justified in passing an order which admittedly is intended to operate only in cases of extreme urgency. Mr Langford James who has appeared for the petitioner has contended that S. 144, Criminal P. C., is never intended to be used in any case of dispute between the owners of two rival bazars and that if some servants of one of these owners are shown to have acted illegally or oppressively, S. 107, Criminal P. C. is the proper section to be proceeded under to bind them down and to restrain them from committing further offences. He has referred to two cases, namely the cases of Satish Chunder Roy v. Emperor (1), and Bidhu Ranyan Mojumdar v. Romesh Chunder Rai (2). The learned Judges who decided the first of these two cases were of opinion that the Magistrate could not, by passing successive orders under S. 144, Criminal P. C., extend the operation of the order beyond the time limited by sub-S. (5) of S. 144, Criminal P. C. and that the most appropriate section of the Code to deal with cases of rival hats which might cause a breach of the peace was S. 107 of the Code. No doubt, that view must be treated with respect. But we are of opinion that the powers of a Magistrate to deal with the situation where a breach of the peace is, in his opinion, imminent have been so clearly defined in the Full Bench case of Bykuntram Shaha v. Meajan (3), to which our attention has been drawn by Mr. Chatterjee who appears for the opposite party that we cannot do better than set down some of the findings therein contained. What the learned Chief Justice Sir Richard Couch, in interpreting the words of the section, said is this:

The word "certain" placed before the word act and afterwards repeated twice in the expression "to take certain order with certain property in his possession" leaves no reasonable doubt in our minds that the legislature intended to give full and ample powers to the Magistrate, the chief officer entrusted with the duty of preserving the peace of the district, to restrain any person from doing any act or to command him to hold any property in his possession subject to any condition, whenever such Magistrate shall consider that such a course of procedure is likely to prevent or even tends to prevent a riot or an affray; and again the learned Chief Justice said :

A particular act or a particular mode of enjoyment of property might be perfectly innocent or lawful in itself. But the act may be done or the property enjoyed in that particular mode under circumstances calculated to lead to a serious breach of the peace attended even with loss of human life ; and it would be by no means proper or desirable to hold that even in such cases the chief peace officer of the district has no power to issue an order such as that contemplated by S. 62 of Act 25 of 1861.

While, therefore, in the present case, it may be conceded that the petitioner has an absolute right to use his property as he pleases, yet, if the mode of enjoyment of this property, innocent and lawful as it might be, resulted or tended to result, in a series of acts committed by the petitioner's servants which in the Magistrate's judgment, were likely to lead to a breach of the peace, we cannot but think that the order under S. 144, Criminal P. C., restraining the petitioner temporarily from holding his market there was amply justified. We accordingly discharge this Rule.

Appeal No. 569 of 1925, Decided on 17th January 1928, from decree of Addl. Sub-Judge., Howrah, D/- 31st January 1925.

(a) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 167—“Purchaser” includes assignees or transferees from a certificated purchaser—A real owner is not precluded from giving notice under S. 167.

The person for whose benefit notice under S. 167 is to be given is the real purchaser and there is no reason to limit the meaning of the words “purchaser” to the certificated purchaser at an execution sale. The word “purchaser” includes assignees or transferees from a certificated purchaser, and therefore a real owner for whom the benamidar merely holds the property in trust cannot be precluded from giving such notice when, as a matter of fact, he is perfectly entitled to enforce his right in a Court of law as against a third party: 21 C. The principle of S. 66 (1) cannot be invoked in a case where the real owner seeks for a declaration of his real title against some one who does not claim under a certificated purchaser and asks for a remedy which the law entitles him to. [P 449 C 2]

*Nasim Ali—*for Appellants.

*Pyari Mohan Chatterjee—*for Respondent.

Mukerji, J.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiff for recovery of khas possession of and for declaration of his title to a certain plot of land. The suit was decreed by the trial Court and that decision was affirmed on appeal by the learned Subordinate Judge. The defendants have thereupon preferred this second appeal. The plaintiff's case was that the land in suit formed part of an occupancy holding which consisted of 30 bighas odd of land and bore a rental of Rs. 59 odd and it was held by one Yasin Mallick, that in execution of a decree for rent which was obtained by the landlord against the said Yasin Mallick the said holding was put up to sale and was purchased by the plaintiff, that the plaintiff thereupon served a notice under S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act, upon the defendants alleging that the defendants were under raiyats and thereafter the plaintiff instituted the suit for declaration of his title to and for recovery of khas possession of the land of which the said defendants were in such possession. The plaintiff's case was that this particular plot of land originally stood in the name of one Daimali Mullick and appertained to the jote of one Porabaddi Mallick who held as a raiyat under the said landlord. The defendants' case, on the other hand, was that the land in suit did not appertain to the raiyati holding of the said Porabaddi Mallick, but that, as a matter of fact, it was land which had been purchased by the wife of the said Porabaddi Mallick and from her the land descended to her son Deratulla, from whom it was transferred by a gift to one Ohidannessa Bibi under whom the defendants held not as an under-raiyat but as an occupancy raiyat. The defendants' case further was that their landlords were tenure-holders having a lakheraj right to the land.

The grounds that have been urged in support of this appeal are four in number. The first ground relates to the question of admissibility of a chitta and a khatian of the year 1261 which was proved in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff and upon which reliance has been placed by both the Courts below for the purpose of holding that the land in suit appertained to the jote of Porabaddi Mallick and that Porabaddi Mallick, as well as the tenant, in execution of a decree for rent as against whom the property was sold and purchased by the plaintiff, was a raiyat and not a tenure-holder. So far as this question is concerned it would appear that the chitta and the khatian are dated 1261 and it is not disputed that the person who made the entries in these documents relating to the land in question is now dead. If that be the position the documents, in my opinion, come clearly within the provisions of S. 32, sub-S. (2), Evidence Act. The amin who made the measurement and prepared the khatian and chitta must be taken to have made the entries in these documents in the ordinary course of his business or in the discharge of his professional duties within the meaning of that sub-section. It is unnecessary in this view of the matter to consider whether these documents are or are not also relevant under the provisions of S. 13, Evidence Act.

The next ground that has been urged is to the effect that the onus of proof was wrongly placed upon the defendants. Reading the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge as a whole upon the question of the status of the defendants it does not seem to me that this contention is wellfounded. As a matter of fact the learned Subordinate Judge appears to have taken the whole of the evidence that there is on the record and upon that evidence has come to the conclusion that the disputed land was held by Daimali Mallick, the predecessor of the defendants, as a raiyat. In the circumstances I do not think any question of onus really arose in the case. The learned Subordinate Judge has observed that the khatian and the chitta to which reference has already been made prove that the disputed land was held by Daimali as a raiyat. He has then referred to the fact that the area of the land being only 30 bighas, no presumption arose to the effect that Daimali was a tenure-holder; and, being of opinion that upon the whole of the evidence the fact that Daimali was only a raiyat has been proved, he has recorded a finding to that effect. It may be stated in this connexion that the case which the defendants put forward, namely that they had been paying bhag paddy to Mohammad Sheik on the footing of their case to the effect that it was Bijari Bibi and not her husband Porabaddi Mallick who was the holder of these lands, has not been believed by the learned Subordinate Judge.

The third contention is to the effect that the notice that was served under the provisions of S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act, was not a valid notice. It has been urged in this connexion that the word "purchaser," as used in that section, means only a certificated purchaser and in support of this position reliance has been placed upon an observation which is to be found in the judgment of the Maclean, C. J., in the case of Jogesh Chunder v. Rohini Kumar (1). The passage runs in these words:

We are not in a position to decide that point (that is the question of sufficiency of notice under S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act)-upon the materials before us. If the sale certificate were made out in the name of the benamidar, then, in my view, he would be the proper person, as the certificated purchaser to give the notice under the Act.

The passage in question, no doubt, supports the appellant's contention. But it does not appear what the actual facts of the case were in connexion with which these observations were made. As far as can be made out, the judgment being of a date prior to those cases in which it has been held that a benamidar is competent to sue and is not precluded from obtaining those reliefs which really belonged to the real owner, the contention that must have been urged in the case in which that judgment was passed was that a benamidar had no right to give notice under S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act. It was apparently that contention that was dealt with by the aforesaid observation. It cannot be disputed that the person for whose benefit such notice is to be given is the real purchaser and I see no reason to limit the meaning of the words "purchaser to the certificated purchaser" at an execution sale. It may be observed further that it has been held in a series of decisions that the word "purchaser" includes assignees or transferees from a certificated purchaser. If that be so I do not see how a real owner for whom the benamidar merely holds the property in trust can be precluded from giving such notice when, as a matter of fact, he is perfectly entitled to enforce his right in a Court of law as against a third party.

Lastly it has been urged that the suit is not maintainable in view of the provisions of S. 66, sub-S. (1), Civil P. C. This objection, in my opinion, is not wellfounded, because the whole object of that sub-section is to prevent a real owner from relying on his secret title as against a person claiming title under a certificated purchaser. The principle of this section cannot be invoked in a case where the real owner seeks for a declaration, his real title against some one who does not claim under a certificated purchaser and asks for a remedy which the law entitles him to. I do not see how the provisions of this section can be a bar to the maintainability of this suit. In this view of the matter, I am of opinion that all the grounds urged in this appeal on behalf of the appellants fail and the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

(e) Calcutta Municipal Act (1923), S. 141—Assessee not adducing evidence against assessment—Assessment should be confirmed.

The appeal which is given to the Court of Small Causes by the Calcutta Municipal Act is really a proceeding by which an administrative act is challenged before a judicial tribunal. It is intended that it should not be treated as an ordinary appeal from a civil Court, but is an occasion on which the party complaining must have an opportunity of adducing evidence if he wants, to show that the decision of which he complains is wrong. If, therefore, no evidence at all is adduced to show that the Chief Executive Officers' determination is wrong, it is the Judge's duty to dismiss the appeal and confirm the assessment. [P 455 C 1]

Cuming, J.—The facts of the case out of which this appeal has arisen are these: The respondent Srimati Jalaja Bashini Devi is the owner of premises No. 125, Harish Mukerjee Road. The Corporation of Calcutta in March 1924 assessed the land with the premises thereon to consolidated taxes. In arriving at the assessment the Chief Executive Officer valued the land at Rs. 2,750 a cotta and the house on it at Rs. 20,365. Under S. 141, Calcutta Municipal Act, the assessee appealed to the Court of Small Causes at Sealdah. She objected both to the value of the house and value of the land. The learned Judge of the Small Cause Court held the value of the building was Rs. 18,123 and the value of the land was Rs. 2,200. Against this decision the Calcutta Corporation have appealed to this Court under S. 142 (3), Calcutta Municipal Act.

There is also a cross-objection by the respondent. Her contention is that the burden of proof has wrongly been placed on her and that it was for the Corporation to prove that the present value of the land was more than it was in 1917 when she purchased the property. She also contended that Rs 350, the price of the electric fittings, should not be included. The appellant contends first of all that the learned Small Cause Court Judge has wrongly placed on him the burden of proving what was the value of the land at the time of the assessment in March 1924, Secondly that the Judge has come to a wrong finding of fact on the evidence as to what the value should be of the land.

A preliminary point has been discussed at some length as to what are the powers of the Court in dealing with this appeal. The appellant would seem to contend that it is open to us to go into facts. His contention would seem to be that this is not a second appeal as contemplated by the Civil Procedure Code and that S. 100 and S. 101, Civil P. C., have no application. It will appear that when the Corporation desire to make an assessment or re-assessment they proceed under S. 131 (1). The valuation and assessment are apparently made by the Executive Officer.

• A notice is given to the assessee to object if he so desires. The Executive Officer must hear and decide the objection and pass orders under S. 140, Calcutta Municipal Act. Against this order an appeal lies to the Judge of the Small Cause Court and against his decision a further appeal to the High Court.

In these circumstances what is the nature of the proceedings before the Executive Officer. If the order is an executive order pure and simple how can there be an appeal to the Small Cause Court Judge, a Court of law, with a further appeal to the High Court.

It has been suggested that as it has been held that the Land Acquisition Deputy Collector is not a Court, so it must be held that the Executive Officer making an assessment is not a Court.

There is no analogy between the two. Anyone dissatisfied with the award of the Land Acquisition Deputy Collector may ask the Collector to refer the matter to the Judge and on such a reference the Judge hears and decides the matter.

But this is not an appeal against the order of the Deputy Collector and hence there is no analogy between the two cases. In the case of Ezra v. Secy. of State (1), it was held that the Land Acquisition Deputy Collector was not a Court because the decision was merely a decision as to what sum shall be tendered to the owner of the land and was binding only on the Collector, and if a judicial determination was required the owner could obtain it by requiring the matter to be referred by the Collector to the Court.

In the present case, unless the valuation is objected to, it is final. S. 141 also provides that part 2 and part 3, Lim. Act, shall apply to every appeal presented under the section, and sub-S. (4) provides that no appeal shall be admitted unless an objection has been determined under S. 140. It seems difficult to escape from the conclusion that the appeal to this Court must be regarded as a second appeal and that the appeal does not lie on fact but on law only. It has been suggested that the order of the Executive Officer assessing the premises was an execution order. It might be that the first order of the Executive Officer by which he made the valuation and assessed the tax to be paid was an executive order but it is not against this order that an appeal lies. It is clear no appeal lies against that order. See S. 141 (4)]

The appeal lies against his order made under S. 140 which he makes after hearing objection. It may seem perhaps somewhat remarkable that the same person who made the assessment should determine the objection to the assessment. It might well be argued that he is the defendant and also the Judge in the matter. Possibly, so far as the objection is concerned, the objector must be considered as one party and the Corporation the other. But it seems to me that if there is an appeal against the order to the Judge of the Small Cause Court and second appeal to the High Court the order must be considered as a judicial order. I cannot conceive a purely executive order being the subject of an appeal first to the Small Cause Court Judge and then to the High Court.

Both parties have argued that the burden of proof has wrongly been thrown on them by the Judge. The Corporation urges that it is for the assessee to show that the assessment made is incorrect, in other words to prove what the present value of the land is. The assessee on the other hand contends that it is for the Corporation who desire to raise the assessment to show what the present value of the land is. The Judge has found that there is no evidence whatever to prove what the present market value of the land is.

There is only evidence as to the value of land in the locality in 1921-22 at a time when the land boom was on. Admittedly since then the value of land has fallen. He goes on to state that these prices cannot be accepted for the purpose of assessment now. He concluded by saying:

Considering the position of the disputed land and also the fact that the price of land has considerably fallen I assess the value of the land at Rs. 2,200 a kata.

The figure is a obviously purely arbitrary one arrived at on no data whatever the Judge having himself stated that there is no evidence on the point. There being no evidence admittedly as to what the present value is, the question of onus is all important.

If the onus is on the Corporation they have absolutely failed and if on the assessee she has equally failed. The onus I think is obviously on the Corporation. The Corporation seek to increase the assessee's assessment. It is for them to show that the value of the land has increased and not for the assessee to show it has not increased.

It cannot for one moment be open to the corporation to fix any arbitrary valuation that they please as has clearly been done in this case, for there is admittedly no evidence whatever to show what the present value of the land is, and then say to the assessee that he has to prove it as something different. Even if there were a presumption that the assessment was correct and the burden lay on the assessee to prove it was incorrect she has clearly done so, for she has proved that the corporation had no material whatever on which they could have based the present assessment. An assessment based on no material whatever cannot be considered as a valid assessment. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal of the corporation and allow the cross-objection of the assessee as to the value of the land, the land to be valued for the purpose of assessment at Rs. 1,200 per cotta. On both the appeal and cross-objection my learned brother has taken an entirely different view. He would allow the appeal and dismiss the cross-objection.

There is a further objection by the assessee which relates to the value of the premises for the purpose of assessment. The Judge for some reason or other has included in the valuation of the buildings Rs. 350 for the electric light installation. The corporation never claimed to include it and it is perhaps difficult to understand why the Judge should give the corporation a relief they never asked for. The assessee is entitled to have Rs. 350 deducted.

The result is that both the appeal and the cross-objection as to the value of the land must fail and are dismissed with costs. The cross-objection of the assessee regarding the valuation of the building is allowed with costs. We assess the hearing-fee in the appeal and also in the cross-objection in so far as it is dismissed and in so far as it is allowed at one gold mohur in each.

Graham, J.—(After stating facts the judgment proceeded) The learned vakil for the appellant before us stated at the outset that the appeal was confined to the value of the land, and he contended that the burden of proof being upon the respondent, who had failed to adduce any evidence as to the market value of the land at the time of assessment, the Court below ought not to have reduced the assessment of the value of the land.

There are two preliminary matters which it is I think necessary to determine before dealing with the appeal on its merits: firstly, the question of the burden of proof just referred to above; and secondly, the question of the form of the appeal, and whether it is a first appeal or second appeal. I will deal first with the second point. A decision on this point would ordinarily be necessary in order to ascertain what our powers are in disposing of the appeal, since if it is a first appeal, we can go into the evidence, whereas if it is a second appeal, we cannot disturb the findings of fact. It happens, however, that in the particular circumstances of this case the question involved is one of merely academic interest because neither party adduced the necessary evidence either affirmative or in rebuttal, and, that being so, there is no evidence for us to consider, even if the appeal be treated as a first appeal. It follows that the decision of the appeal will turn entirely upon the question of onus. Incidentally I may say that in my judgment the appeal is in proper form and is a first appeal against an original order. It can not, I think, come within the purview S. 100, Civil P. C., since the appeal before the Small Cause Court is not an appeal against a decree, but is rather in the nature of an appeal against an executive order. Speaking for myself I do not see how the Executive Officer or Deputy Executive officer can be regarded as a judicial officer merely because at the second stage of the assessment proceedings he is required to decide the objection after hearing the assessee.

With regard to the first point, question of burden of proof: my learned brother, while recognizing that it is all important, has come to the conclusion that the onus was upon the corporation, and in that view of the matter holds that the appeal should be dismissed. I have the misfortune to differ from him. That the question of onus is important I entirely agree. Indeed, having regard to the nature of the evidence adduced in the Court below, or rather the absence of any such evidence as remarked above, the determination of the appeal really hinges, as I have said, upon this question. If the onus was on the corporation, the appeal must succeed. If it was upon the assessee, the appeal must fail. Now what is the right answer to this question? Was it incumbent upon the corporation to prove in the Small Cause Court that the assessment was right, or was it the duty of the assessee, the appellant, to establish that it was wrong? The rule of onus stated in general terms is that the burden of proof is upon the party who would fail if no evidence is adduced by either side. If this test be applied the burden was on the assessee, since, if she failed to adduce any evidence, the assessment must stand. In this connexion reference may be made to certain sections of the Calcutta Municipal Act in order to ascertain the scheme and purpose of the Act. These sections, it seems to me, throw some light upon the question of onus. S. 131 provides for assessment of annual value and duration of the assessment. S. 138 requires notice to be issued when valuation is first made, or increased and objection to such valuation is provided for in the following section. Under S. 140 all such objections are to be investigated and determined by the Executive Officer or a Deputy Executive officer, and in S. 141 an appeal is given against the order of that officer to the Small Cause Court. Under S. 142, there is a further appeal to the High Court. It is important to note that under sub-S. (1), S. 142 every valuation made by the Executive Officer under S. 131 is final, subject to the provisions of Ss. 139, 140 and 141. And under sub-S. (2) of this section similarly every order passed by the Executive Officer, or Deputy executive Officer, under S. 140 is subject to the provisions of S. 141 final.

Thus it seems to be clear that the orders made by the executive officers of the corporation at the two first stages of the proceedings are according to the scheme of the Act to be treated as final subject to the right of appeal provided in the Act whereby those orders may, if so desired, be subject to the test of the judicial determination.

My learned brother has observed that it cannot for one moment be open to the corporation to fix any arbitrary valuation that they please, but I do not think it ought to be assumed that officers holding responsible positions will act in an arbitrary manner or abuse their powers. And, even if they do so, a remedy is provided in the judicial proceedings in the Small Cause Court where the assessee has the right and opportunity to prove that the assessment is wrong, and there is in addition the further appeal to this Court.

My learned brother has observed that, even if the burden lay on the assessee, she has discharged that onus, since she has shown that the corporation had no materials whatever on which they could have based the present assessment. Speaking for myself I do not understand how the assessee has proved that there were no materials. There could not be any such materials before the Small Cause Court which had previously been before the Executive Officer because there was not at the former stage any judicial proceeding and, therefore, no record. The proceedings became for the first time judicial proceedings in the Small Cause Court, and it was at that stage that it was incumbent upon the assessee qua plaintiff to place before the Court the necessary evidence to establish that the assessment was wrong.

For the reasons I have given, I regret, that I am unable to agree with the conclusion arrived at by my learned brother. In my judgment the appeal succeeds, and should be allowed with costs in both Courts.

In the cross-objection two points are involved: firstly as to the value of the land, and whether it should be Rs. 1,200 as claimed by the assessee or Rs. 2,760 as fixed by the Executive Officer; and secondly, with regard to the sum of Rs. 350 for electrical installation included by the Judge in the Court below in the valuation. As to the first point I have already expressed my opinion that the onus was on the assessee and that she has failed. As to the second point: it does not appear to be clear whether the electric installation had been made at the date of assessment or not and the Corporation did not at that time make any claim on that account. That being so I am of opinion that this item should not have been included by the learned Judge and to this extent only I would allow the cross-objection with costs in proportion.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal under the Letters Patent from a judgment pronounced by my learned brother Mr. Justice Cuming in a case in which he differed from Mr. Justice Graham. The appeal to the High Court was an appeal brought by the Corporation of Calcutta and was directed against a decree or order of the Judge of the Court of Small Causes of Sealdah dated 6th August 1925. That order was made in what it is apparently a custom of that Court to call a municipal appeal.

It seems that there was a certain piece of land which in 1917 was bought by the present appellant from the Corporation for the price of Rs. 1,200 per cotta. It seems that up till 1921 the annual value for the land was taken for the purpose of assessment at Rs. 223, but this was increased in February 1921 to Rs. 510. In March 1924 the property was being re-assessed by reason of the fact that a new building had been put upon the land and it was necessary to value the land and the building together. The Chief Executive Officer of the Calcutta Corporation who had in the first instance the duty of putting a figure on the value of the land put a value of Rs. 730 and to that the assessee objected in the manner prescribed by the Calcutta Municipal Act. Thereupon it became the duty of the Chief Executive Officer to deal with her objection and, so far as the present question is concerned, he overruled her objection. If the matter had stood there then the annual value of Rs. 730 would have been a final determination, but the lady took an appeal as is provided by S. 141, Calcutta Municipal Act of 1923 to the Court of Small Causes. That appeal was brought on 2nd July 1924 and it was heard and decided in August 1925.

The evidence (so far as it matters) adduced before the learned Small Cause

Court Judge was the evidence of Babu Jodu Nath Majumdar, the lady's husband. So far as it matters, the evidence adduced by the Corporation was that of their Sub-Assessor, Babu Rajendra Lal Dutt. It is quite true that no expert evidence giving an expert opinion in favour of a particular figure was adduced on the part of the lady. It is equally true that the person who was responsible for fixing the value of the land, namely, the Corporation Assessor, was not called on their behalf though the Sub-Assessor was called who had taken a part in valuing the new building.

Now, when one looks at the evidence given by the lady's husband one finds that it is perfectly sensible and relevant evidence going to the value of the property. He states the date of the purchase and the price Rs. 1,200 per cottah. He states the annual valuation in past years. He states what the building is that has been put upon the property. He points out that from 1917 onwards till 1920 there was a land boom, but he says from his own knowledge that since 1921 the price has gone down. He then describes the particular road and he explains that the premises are at present rented and what rents are obtained therefrom. He points out that this particular part of Harish Mukherji Road is not the most valuable part and is not so valuable as the northern portion near to the Calcutta maidan. He says that it has huts on its eastern boundary and has got a municipal night soil depot and mehtars' quarters not very far away. He says that in these circumstances the most that by way of annual value should be put upon the land is Rs. 1,500 per cottah, the land having been bought in 1917 at Rs. 1,200 per cottah. On that he is cross-examined and a particular transaction is put to him of a vacant plot of land enclosed by pucca walls at 64, Harish Mukherji Road. That is very much further to the north and presumably therefore is a much more valuable site. That apparently, although it was 17 cottas, fetched a price of Rs. 2,573 per cotta in April 1924, which was the time with which we are concerned.

Further evidence is given, and when the Corporation witness is put into the box he gives evidence of the sale of premises No. 192, Harish Mukherji Road, in September 1922 at Rs. 3,000 per cotta.

and of other sales in 1921 and 1922 of more valuable parts of that road at prices at and above Rs. 3,000 per cottah.

In these circumstances the learned Judge dealt with this matter and considered the materials. He had to arrive at a finding of fact like a jury and he did not have the assistance of any expert surveyor. He came to the conclusion that he would assess the value of the land at Rs. 2,200 per cotta.

The only observation that has to be made upon his judgment is that, when he was dealing with the question of the value of the building, apparently by mistake, a sum of Rs. 350 was added which he had no right to add. This refers to the cost of electric installation; and, by consent at the hearing, before us, it has been agreed to treat that Rs. 350 as wrongly included by the Small Cause Court Judge. Except as to that small point of Rs. 350 with the map of this locality before me and the evidence before me which was before the learned Small Cause Court Judge, I ask myself what is there wrong in his finding of Rs. 2,200 per cottah as a fair value of this land? I am of opinion that there is nothing wrong in that finding and that it is a fair and reasonable finding arrived at on proper materials by the learned Judge who was no doubt competent to give an opinion on that point.

That being the position, the rest of this case appears to me to be a comedy of errors, because the Corporation brought their appeal and the contention apparently before this Court, when that appeal came on for hearing, was that the learned Judge had proceeded upon no evidence at all and that there was no evidence on either side. Accordingly much interesting discussion arose as to the party upon whom the burden of proof lay in an appeal of this character from the determination of an objection to an assessment by the Chief Executive Officer to the Judge of the Court of Small Causes. That was not the only point of argument, but another question was argued as to whether an appeal to this Court from the Court of Small Causes was a special appeal, that is to say, a second appeal of the limited character defined in S. 100, Civil P. C.

Mr. Justice Cuming held that the burden of proof was on the Corporation. He further held that the appeal to the High Court was not one in which it was open to the High Court to discuss questions other than mere questions of law. In my judgment, the learned Judge's decision on both of these points was wrong and, so far as both of these points are covered by the judgment of a Division Bench in the case of the Corporation of Calcutta v. Keamuddin (2), I agree with that decision of Mr. Justice Page and Mr. Justice Graham.

The view taken by Mr. Justice Graham, who also proceeded upon the footing that there was no evidence before the learned Judge, was that in the absence of evidence it was the learned Judge's duty to dismiss the appeal and confirm the assessment.

I agree with Mr. Justice Graham that if it be really true that there was no evidence before the Judge of the Court of Small Causes it would follow that this particular kind of appeal would fail. The appeal which is given to the Court of Small Causes by the Calcutta Municipal Act is really a proceeding by which an administrative act is challenged before a judicial tribunal. It is quite clear that it is intended that it should not be treated as an ordinary appeal from a civil Court, but is an occasion on which the party complaining must have an opportunity of adducing evidence if he wants to show that the decision of which he complains is wrong. If, therefore, it had really been the case that no evidence at all, to show that the Chief Executive Officer's determination was wrong, had been laid before the Court of Small Causes I should have agreed with the view of Mr. Justice Graham. In my judgment that is not the position in the present case. The moment it was shown what price for this property had been paid in 1917, the moment it was shown what had been considered to be a fair assessment of the annual value in past years, the moment evidence was given as to the character of the site and the price paid for other properties and so on, materials were laid before the learned Judge of the Court of Small Causes on which he was entitled, if he thought fit, to put a figure on the value of this property.

In my judgment, the result of this appeal is that the appeal of the Corporation cannot succeed and it must be dismissed with costs; but, in my judgment, the reasons given by Mr. Justice Cuming in favour of this conclusion were not sound. It seems to me that this matter was properly disposed of in August 1925 when the Small Cause Court came to its finding. The result is that this Letters Patent appeal is dismissed with costs and the Corporation are also to pay the costs of the assessee of the hearing before Mr Justice Cuming and Mr. Justice Graham. We assess the hearing-fee in this Court at five gold mohurs. We do not say anything on the cross-objection.

RANKIN, C. J. AND C. C. GHOSE AND MUKERJI, JJ.

In the matter of Commercial Properties, Ltd.

Reference under S 66 (2), Income-tax Act 11, 1922, Decided on 9th January 1928.

It is the function of the Commissioner of Income-tax to find the facts and it is for the High Court to accept his findings on all matters of mere fact. [P 456 C 1]

(b) Income-tax Act, S. 9—Assessee a company doing business to acquire land, build houses and let premises to tenants—Assessee are liable to income-tax under S. 9.

Even where the assessee is a registered company of which the sole object is to acquire land, build houses and let premises to tenants and its sole assets consist of certain properties and its sole business is the management and collection of rents from the said properties, the income derived by the assessee from the "property" cannot be regarded as income derived from business, and, therefore, the assessee are to be assessed under S. 9 of the Act. [P 457 C 2]

Rankin, C. J.—This is a case stated by the Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, and the question for decision is whether or not the assessee are liable to income-tax under S. 9, Income-tax Act, 1922 or only under S. 10 of that Act.

It is the function of the Commissioner to find the facts and it is for this Court to accept his findings on all matters of mere fact.

The facts stated are that the assessee, The Commercial Properties, Limited, is a registered company of which the sole object is to acquire land, build houses and let premises to tenants in Calcutta or elsewhere in India. The sole assets of the assessee consist of three properties and the sole business of the assessee is the management, and collection of rents from the said properties.

The opinion of the Commissioner, of income-tax is that even if the assessee are held to be a business, they must be assessed in respect of the property owned by them according to the special provisions relating to property.

It will be observed that S. 6, Income-tax Act states that the following heads of income, profits and gains shall be chargeable to income-tax in the manner hereinafter appearing, namely.

Then comes six heads of which the third is "property" and the fourth is "business." By S. 9 the tax shall be payable by an assessee under the head "property" in respect of the bona fide annual value of property consisting of any building or lands appurtenant thereto of which he is the owner, other than such portions of such property as he may occupy for the purposes of his business; and it goes on to lay down the method in which the quantum of the tax to be computed. It points out, for example, that where the property is in the occupation of the owner, or where it is let to a tenant and the owner has undertaken to bear the cost of repairs, then one-sixth is to be the deduction for repairs. In like manner, a deduction is to be allowed for insurance. Questions of mortgage interest and ground-rent are covered and there are specific provisions as regards allowance to be made for parts of the property being unoccupied from time to time. Again, it is to be noted that the "annual value" is to be deemed to be the sum for which the property might reasonably be expected to let from year to year so that this class of property is not to be taxed on the basis of de facto rent alone, and it is further provided that where the property is in the occupation of the owner for the purposes of his own residence, the annual value is not to be deemed to be more than 10 per cent of the total income of the owner. I mention these matters to show that special computations which arise in the case of house property are dealt with under S. 9 which is a particular, detailed and special scheme for ensuring that any property

Section 10 which dealt with business—"profits or gains of any business carried on by him"—is also provided with certain rules as to allowances to be made before computing profits. These rules, in so far as they refer to house property, refer to "the premises in which such business is carried on," but with regard to insurance premiums, land revenue rates and taxes refer to buildings and premises "used for the purposes of the business."

In the present case we have a company which owns three estates. It does not appear that any part of that property is outside the definition given in S. 9. It is found to let the houses from time to time, to see to the payment of rents and (doubtless) the doing of repairs. If that is carrying on a business, then this company carried on a business in the sense in which every landlord or owner of this type of property must necessarily carry on business. We know from S. 9 itself that it is applicable to property which is let out to tenants and it has been argued before us that when one looks at the case-law one finds that, at all events, where the owner is a company and the objects of the company include the object of owning and managing house property then the income that is derived from the tenants is an income that is derived from business. It is in that way that it is contended that these assesseees should be charged under S. 10. It is said that if the question were to arise under S. 10 these assesseees would not be liable to pay income-tax at all so that no income-tax would be recovered in respect of any of these estates, the reason being that, in point of fact, they have traded so unsuccessfully during the year in question that they have actually made a loss. This is certainly a very important question, from the point of view of the treasury because if this argument be right then it will depend to some extent upon the success of the management whether or not the public treasury should derive any income-tax in respect of house property of this character. It is obvious, too, that if we are to depart in such a case as this from the careful provisions contained in S. 9 for purposes of computing the correct figure in the case of house property on which tax is to be levied we will get under S. 10 all sorts of complicated questions special to house property upon which the law will be absolutely at large. In my judgment the words of S. 6 and S. 9 and S. 10 must be read so as to give some effect to the contrast that is there made between income, profits and gains from "property" and from "business" and I entirely refuse my assent to the proposition that because it happens that the owner of a property is a company which has been incorporated for the purpose of owning such property, therefore, the income derived from "property" must be regarded as income derived from "business." In my judgment, income derived from "property" is a more specific category applicable to the present case.

The cases to which we have been referred are cases in England with, I think, one exception which is a case from Burma. The case in Burma In re Kaladan Suratee Bazar Co Ltd. (1) arose out of the Excess Profits Duty Act, 1919. The Excess Profits Duty Act laid a special tax upon the profits of business, and although it contained a special protection for the earnings of a man in his profession there was no special provision applicable to the case of an owner of property. There was a company called the Kaladan Suratee Bazar Co. Ltd., which owned certain plots of land and stalls at Moulmein at a bazar there. Its income was derived from the rents of houses and bazar stalls belonging to it, and the financial Commissioner not disputing that it was subject to income-tax under S. 9 maintained that it was liable to excess profits duty because it was a "business" within the meaning of the Excess Profits Duty Act. The decision of the Court was that these two Acts were to be interpreted in the same way. It was pointed out that a person or a company drawing income from house property was clearly not contemplated in the Indian Income-tax Act, as carrying on a business but was treated as a person who derived income from the property; and in the same way, when the question of excess profits duty had to be decided the Court determined that the company was not carrying on a business within the meaning of that Act. It was pointed out that if the mere letting of stalls was carrying on a business within the meaning of that Act, then every person who had invested his capital in house property was liable to excess profits duty when his income rose above the minimum limit. It was further said that a man who had invested his capital in house property and who kept a rent office and staff of rent collectors, clerks, etc., for the purpose of letting out his houses and collecting the rents was not carrying on a business. He was merely taking the ordinary steps necessary for enjoying the income from his property. That, therefore, is the Indian case which bears upon this question and it is not in favour of the assessee.

Of the English cases to which we have been referred, the first is the case of Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Sangster (2). That was a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt. It was the case of a man who was an inventor and who derived considerable sums of money from royalties paid to him by companies of which he was a manager. He had sold one invention it is true, but that was a good long time ago, and in these circumstances it was contended that he carried on the business of an inventor and was, therefore, liable under the provisions of the Finance Act of 1915 to excess profits duty. That argument was rejected Mr. Justice Rowlatt saying that he was not carrying on a business because he was an owner of royalties and that he was not carrying on a business because he was a shareholder in a certain company.

Much reliance has been placed, however, upon certain cases of which the case of Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Korean Syndicate Ltd. (3) is the chief. There, again, was a question not whether the company was liable to pay under Sch. A, Income-tax Act, or under Sch. D, but whether it was liable to excess profits duty as carrying on a trade or business at all. It was a very complicated case and I do not propose to set out the facts, but it is clear that the company was originally incorporated to get and work a concession in Korea, but ultimately it obtained a share and had an agreement with a co-sharer to do the actual working of the concession; a certain sum was to be paid to it under this agreement. The document purported to be a lease and the sum

by the document was called a royalty; but, on a close examination of the particulars by the Master of the Rolls, Lord Sterndale, it was held that the company was carrying on in this particular way the business of obtaining a working concession for which it has been incorporated, that the document was not really a "lease," that the payments were not truly and strictly "royalties" and that, therefore, it was not entitled to say that it was outside the scope of the excess profits duty. Very similar are the decisions under the corporation profits tax imposed by S. 52, Finance Act of 1920. There tax was put prima facie upon every British company which carried on trade or business or anything of that kind. Cases arose on the border line, such as a case where a company having put up money to build an Indian railway and an Indian railway having been built by the Secretary of State and managed more or less successfully the company was now in the position of receiving under its agreement, certain payments and it was contended on the one hand that it was not carrying on a business at all. It has ultimately been decided by the House of Lords that if you look at the matter from the beginning as a whole the company was carrying on the business of financing this Indian railway and that although it had finished finding the finance and only had to receive what was due to it under the agreement it could not be said that it was no longer carrying on business.

In my judgment, these cases are not authorities to the effect that as between the "property" and the word "business" in S. 6, Income-tax Act, 1922, a case of this character is to be put under the word "business." It comes more directly and specifically under the word "property." In my judgment, the mere fact that the house owner is a company does not change the incidence of the tax in the way contended for. The income of the assessee is income derived from its ownership of buildings and their outclosures. To obtain such income a certain amount of management is always necessary but the Act does not regard such income as profits of management. To own houses one must buy or build them, but the Act does not regard such income as profits of investment. In my opinion the Income-tax Commissioner was right and we should answer the question which he has put to us that the assesseees are to be assessed under S. 9 of the Act. The assesseees must pay the costs of the reference.

Sasi Mohan Saha and others—Defendants—Appellants.

Hari Nath Saha—Plaintiff—Respondent.

Appeal No. 1017 of 1927, Decided on 16th February 1928.

* Hindu Law—Partition — Principles of maintainability of a subsequent suit for partition of property left out in the previous suit for partition and still held in joint possession in divided.

If, in the previous suit for partition, a property is left out either intentionally or by mistake and no objection is taken by any party to a partial partition and the properties in that suit are partitioned, a subsequent suit for partition of the property so left out and still held in joint possession is maintainable. Where properties included in the previous suit are left out of partition with the consent of parties who agree that they should remain in joint possession of the parties they may also be partitioned in a subsequent suit; but where the decree in the previous suit dealt with the properties included in that suit and directed that some of them should remain joint between the coparceners a subsequent suit for partition thereof cannot be maintained in view of the provisions of S. 11, Civil P. C.

Sarat Chandra Basak and Chandra Sekhar Sen—for Appellants.

Dwarkanath Chakrabarty, 'Gopal Chandra Das and Bhuvan Mohan Saha—for Respondent.

Suhrawardy, J.—This appeal by the defendants arises out of a partition suit. The facts are that the plaintiff Hari Nath, Madhu Sudan and Radha Charan (father of the appellants Sasi Mohan and others) were three brothers living jointly in the common ancestral house. In 1916 the present plaintiff Harinath instituted a suit for partition of their family properties against his two brothers. In that suit a Commissioner was appointed who proposed a partition of the homestead of the parties in a certain way. The matter came up before the Court which accepted the Commissioner's report with a slight modification with which we are not concerned at present. The decree passed in the suit was in effect that the suit be decreed the Commissioner's report and map form parts of the decree, and the allotments made by the Commissioner subject to the modification noted above be the basis of the partition.

By that decree the residential portion of the homestead was partitioned but some portions were left ejmali or joint among the parties. They consisted of pathways, tanks, cremation ground, ditches &c. . . &c. . . Subsequent to this suit the plaintiff purchased the share of Madhu Sudan and is now entitled to two-thirds of the homestead. The present suit is brought by him for partition of those portions of the homestead which were kept ejmali and joint in the former suit. Both the Courts have decreed the plaintiffs' suit. They have held that the properties in suit were excluded from partition in the previous suit and hence are liable to re-partition. The learned District Judge in the appellate Court remarked:

It should be noted that at the request of the parties the properties which form the subject-matter of the present appeal were excluded from partition and were subsequently held jointly.

It is proper that at this stage we should understand correctly the position in which the parties stand at the present moment. The expression used by the learned Judge that the properties in suit were excluded from partition in the previous suit should be understood as meaning that the properties in suit were by agreement of parties left out of partition and allowed to remain joint as before. Objection is taken by the learned advocate for the appellant to this remark on the ground that it is not correct to say that the properties which were left joint under the former decree were so left at the request of the parties. He has placed before us the report of the Commissioner in the previous suit and we find on a perusal of it that the objection taken to the remark that at the previous partition the parties agreed that some of the properties should remain joint is not without substance.

It has been broadly argued before us on behalf of the respondent that under the law if a property is left undivided in a suit and continues to be joint it can be subsequently partitioned. As a bare proposition of law no exception can be taken to it. Co-owners have the absolute right to divide all joint properties amongst themselves either privately or through the assistance of the Court. They can by agreement, if they are so minded, divide some of the properties either out of Court or through the assistance of the Court leaving some in joint possession. Such properties which are left out with the consent of the parties at the time of partition may undoubtedly be partitioned later. But the present case stands on a different footing. The question to be decided in this case is whether the decree in the previous suit operates as res judicata in the present case in so far as it bars the plaintiff's right to claim partition of the properties which were dealt with in that suit.

In support of the proposition that has been argued before us by the learned advocate for the respondent, reference has been made to several cases. They are not exactly in point but there are observations in them which certainly support the respondent's contention. In Bhuban Mohini Dasi v. Kumudbala Dasi (1) the lower Court passed a preliminary decree for partition and ordered that an enquiry be made as to the extent of the joint properties to which the preliminary decree for partition should apply. Objection was taken in that case that such a decree was not a proper decree. The learned Judges, after holding that a decree like the one passed in that suit ordering a partition of the joint properties in suit and directing a subsequent discovery of such joint properties could be passed in a partition suit, observed that properties left out of partition might also be subsequently partitioned and hence the decree which ordered partition and directed ascertainment of all the joint properties of the parties some of which were not included in the suit could not be bad in law. In Jogendra Nath Rai v. Baladeo Das (2), a mehal was partitioned among co-owners but a portion of it which was jungly was left out of partition by mistake. It was held that the portion of the mehal which was left out of partition by mistake could be re-partitioned. In Bhawani Prasad Shaha v. Juggernath Shaha (3) the assets of the joint properties were determined but certain properties which were ignored were not included in the amicable partition between the parties. The learned Judges held that if they were joint properties and were not included in the previous partition and if they still continued to be joint properties the plaintiff was entitled to a share therein. In the case of Monsharam Chakravarty v. Ganesh Chakravarty (4) there was a suit for partition of properties held jointly by the plaintiffs and the defendants. Subsequent to the decree in that suit there was another suit brought by a party to that suit for partition of some of the properties which were owned and possessed jointly and were not partitioned by the previous suit. These properties fell under two heads; some of them were properties which were included in the previous suit but were left undivided by the consent decree made therein and some others were not included in the previous suit for partition. In respect of the latter class of properties the defendants contended that the claim was barred by S. 43, Civil P. C. (O. 2 R. 2) of 1882. The trial Court overruled the objection but the lower appellate Court held that the suit was barred. The question that arose in that suit was whether one of two tenants-in-common who had sued for partition of a part of the properties jointly held by them was at liberty to bring a suit for partition of the remainder of the properties. This question was answered in the affirmative. In discussing the proper construction to be put on S. 43 and as to whether the cause of action alleged in the plaint in the subsequent suit was identical with the cause of action alleged in the former suit it was observed:

Where there has been an infringement of one right and one cause of action has arisen the plaintiff must make his whole claim, once for all, in one suit. Now, the right on the part of a tenant-in-common to have each field separately divided between himself and his co-tenant is one thing, his right to claim a partition of all the fields held by them as tenants-in-common is another thing, and the circumstances that there has been an adjudication as to certain parcels of land on the footing of an alleged right of the former sort does not preclude a subsequent suit for partition of what is still jointly owned and held by the co-parceners.

Their Lordships held that the causes of action of the two suits were not so identical as to attract the operation of S. 43, Civil P. C. No observation was made by the Judges with reference to the first class of properties which were left undivided by the consent decree made in the previous suit. These are all the cases in support of the respondents' contention.

There is a case of the Bombay High Court in which the observation made by one of the Judges lends support to the appellants' contention. In Shantaram Balkrishna v. Waman Gopal (5), the Acting Chief Justice held that where a strip of land was reserved as common passage for the use of the co-parceners who were Hindus, the land so reserved could not be partitioned subsequently according to the Hindu law. Crump, J., agreed with the view of the Hindu law taken by the learned Acting Chief Justice, but also based his decision on the general principle that when there is no bona fide error or that the partition was of a partial nature the effect of the decree in the previous suit was to decide that the properties of which partition was subsequently sought should be reserved as a common passage; it would follow from the decree itself that that passage was not property such as could be the subject of a further partition.

On an examination of these authorities and on considerations of justice and equity and of the law applicable the following results seem to be evident:

perties included in that suit and directed that some of them should remain joint between the coparceners a subsequent suit for partition thereof cannot be maintained in view of the provisions of S. 11, Civil P. C. If a party institutes a suit invoking the assistance of the Court to partition the properties which he has held jointly with the defendant and the Court in effecting the partition holds that a certain portion of the properties cannot conveniently be partitioned or are in their very nature indivisible and impartible a subsequent suit for partition of such properties will not lie as that might mean a reopening of the partition made in the previous suit.

Applying these deductions which I have made to the facts of the present case it appears that proper enquiry has not been made in the Courts below with regard to the nature of the properties left joint under the decree in the previous suit. It is possible that some of the properties were left joint with the consent of parties. These will be according to the view I have ventured to take on the question of law capable of partition. But such portions of the properties in suit which the Court in that suit held as incapable of partition or should not be partitioned having regard to the equitable enjoyment of the other portions of the properties cannot be partitioned in a subsequent suit. It is necessary therefore that an enquiry should be made by the Court as to the nature of the properties left joint in the previous suit. It should be ascertained what portions of the properties in suit were left joint in the former suit by the decision of the Court. The suit with reference to such portions must fail. If any portions were kept joint with the consent of the parties or under such circumstances as not to make them subject of the decision of the Court and were not rendered subject of the decision of the Court they may be partitioned subject to the decision of the Court as to what portion of them should in justice and equity be not partitioned.

In the result the decrees of the Courts below are set aside and the case remanded to the Court of first instance for decision according to law in view of the observations made above. Costs of this Court as well as of the Courts below will abide the result and will be apportioned according to the extent of the success of the parties.

RANKIN, C. J., AND MITTER, J.

Salam Chand Kannayaram—Appellant.
v.

Joogul Kissore Ramdeo—Respondent.

Appeal No. 82 of 1927, Decided on 25th August 1927, from original order in Suit No. 3280 of 1922.

Civil P. C., S. 136—It is doubtful whether a Judge on the original side has a right to direct a District Judge of another district within appellate jurisdiction to execute a warrant of arrest for contempt—Application to that effect refused—Proper course is to ask the original side Judge to ask for express injunction.

An order was made appointing a Receiver and directing that A do make over to the Receiver the books of account of their firm. A failed to comply with the order. So an order by the High Court on its original side was made committing A to the custody of the Superintendent of the Presidency Jail for contempt of Court for having failed to make over to the said Receiver the books of account, but the warrant directed to the Sheriff failed to take effect as A was not within the limits of the ordinary civil jurisdiction of the Court, but was residing and staying within a district within its appellate jurisdiction. An application was made to the Judge on the original side for an order either under S. 136 or in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction directing the District Judge of that district to execute the said warrant, seize the person of the defendant wherever found within the said district and convey it to the Sheriff of Calcutta to be by him conveyed over to the Superintendent of the Presidency Jail, but the application was dismissed as the Judge had no jurisdiction to make such an order:

Held: that the High Court on its appellate side in a case arising in the mofussil would have the power to make such an order but whether on its original side the Judge would have any right to direct the District Judge of a district to execute a warrant of arrest for contempt is doubtful. The appointment of a Receiver, so far as regards parties bound by the order, operates against them as an injunction and under O. 39 interlocutory injunctions are enforced under a special power which is given to Courts in the mofussil as well as to the High Court notwithstanding that such Courts have no inherent right of arrest for contempt. Instead of appealing to the appellate side of the Court the applicants here would have been better advised to make a fresh application to the learned Judge on the original side asking for an injunction in express terms. In case of breach of that injunction an order could be made under O. 39, R. 2, directing the arrest and detention of the offender. In that case there would be no difficulty in holding that S. 136, Civil P. C., would apply: 26 Mad. 120; Ref.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case an order was made on 26th August 1925 appointing a Receiver and directing that the defendant firm do make over to the Receiver the books of account of their firm for a certain year and the hatchittas standing in the benami name of one Ramdeo's brother Baij Nath Motilal and those executed by various debtors of the defendant firm in acknowledgment of their debts. It was further ordered that the defendant firm do make over to the Receiver or to this Court to be placed to the credit of the suit all moneys realized by them in contravention of a certain order. By another order made on 5th July 1926, it was ordered that the Official Receiver be appointed Receiver in the suit under the order already mentioned and that the said Ramdeo do stand committed to the custody of the Superintendent of the Presidency Jail for contempt of Court for having failed to make over to the said Receiver the hatchittas mentioned in para. 22 of the said petition and that a warrant do issue directed to the Sheriff of Calcutta and to the Superintendent of the Presidency Jail commanding the Sheriff to arrest the said Ramdeo wherever he may be found within the local limits of the jurisdiction of this Court and to convey him to the said jail.

It appears that Ramdeo was not within the limits of the ordinary civil jurisdiction of the Court but was residing and staying within the District of Nadia in this Province. Accordingly the warrant directed to the Sheriff failed to take effect. In consequence of this the application which is now before us was launched on 31st March 1927, and it asks the learned Judge on the original side for an order directing the District Judge of Nadia to execute the said warrant, seize the person of the defendant wherever found within the said district and convey it to the Sheriff of Calcutta to be by him conveyed over to the Superintendent of the Presidency Jail.

The learned Judge, Mr. Justice Gregory dismissed this application not being satisfied that he had any jurisdiction to make such an order. It would appear from the minutes of the proceedings before him that S. 136, Civil P. C., was relied upon by the applicants and that the applicants also claimed to be entitled to the exercise of the inherent powers of the Court and also to powers under S. 151 of the Code. S. 36, Civil P. C., was also referred to.

Mr. S. N. Banerji has argued upon this appeal that Ss. 36 and 136 must between them cover this case.* It is necessary therefore to observe that any order for arrest for contempt of Court committed by breach of an injunction or by defiance of the Court's Receiver may be regarded in the High Court in different ways. In so far as the order is made not under the Code but as an order for contempt of a Court of record that is one thing. In so far as the order is made under provision of the Code that is another thing. Viewed merely as an order in the exercise of the Court's inherent jurisdiction to punish for contempt I am not of opinion that it is made out that any such order as is here asked for can be made by this Court. There can be no doubt, as it seems to me, that for the purposes of execution of decrees and orders the ordinary original jurisdiction is confined within the local limits of Calcutta. The question of the Court's power derived from the old Supreme Court to arrest for contempt of Court a person in the mofussil have not been argued before us and I make no pronouncement with regard to them. There can be no doubt that this Court on its appellate side in a case arising in the mofussil would have the power to make such an order as is here asked for. That on its original side the Judge would have any right to direct the District Judge of Nadia to execute a warrant of arrest for contempt is a proposition which I doubt extremely. That matter, however, need not be further discussed. It has to be observed that this question is one which might arise just as easily in a mofussil Court as in the High Court. Any mofussil Court may appoint a Receiver and if a person residing outside its jurisdiction interferes with the Receiver then the same problem arises as arises here. In my judgment it is eminently desirable to proceed regularly under the Code so far as possible. It is trite law that the appointment of a Receiver so far as regards parties bound by the order operates against them as an injunction. It is an injunction necessarily against interference with the Court's Receiver whether by withholding possession or property or otherwise. Under the Code permanent injunctions are enforced in execution, but under O. 39 interlocutory injunctions are enforced under a special power which is given to Courts in the mofussil as well as to the High Court notwithstanding that such Courts have no inherent right of arrest for contempt. The provision is contained in R. 2 of O. 39 where it says :

In case of disobedience, or of breach of any such terms, the Court granting an injunction may order the property of the person guilty of such disobedience or breach to be attached and may also order such person to be detained in the civil prison for a term not exceeding six months.

It seems to me that instead of appealing to this Court the applicants here would have been better advised to make a fresh application to the learned Judge on the original side asking for an injunction in express terms. In case of breach of that injunction an order could be made under O. 39, R. 2 directing the arrest and detention of the offender. In that case there would be no difficulty in holding that S. 136, Civil P. C., would apply. This Court would have a statutory right to make the kind of order which is now asked for. If there be any objection to this course and after all it is no part of the duty of this Court to give advice to these appellants, then these appellants must discover some other method of procedure for themselves. In the case of Rajah of Ramnad v. Seetharam Chetty (1), it was held that the High Court on its original side could not execute decrees by arrest outside its territorial limits; but there are observations which would appear to distinguish the case of arrest for contempt on the ground that is in its nature a criminal matter. Accordingly the same reasoning may not apply in such a case. But apart altogether from any question of jurisdiction it has to be remembered that there is a question of machinery to be considered and as the Sheriff of Calcutta no longer functions outside the limits of the ordinary civil jurisdiction of this Court grave difficulties arise if it be attempted in any way to exercise criminal jurisdiction by this summary proceeding over a person in the mofussil. That, however, was not touched upon in the arguments before us and it is a question upon which it is not necessary now to pronounce any opinion.

In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed. We make no order as to costs.

Judgment.—This case raises an important question of principle, namely, whether the Commissioners for the Port of Calcutta cannot be restrained by injunction by a civil Court from proceeding with a certain criminal prosecution instituted by them against the respondents under S. 84, Calcutta Port Act (Act 3 of 1890 B. C.) for contravention by the respondents of the provisions of S. 83 of the said Act.

The facts, shortly stated, are as follows:

The plaintiffs who are the respondents before us are the lessees of certain lands on the west side of the river Hooghly near Ghuseri. They started construction of a jute mill on a portion of the said lands and it appears that during the construction of the mill they put up an earthen bund on the bank of the river nearest to their land to facilitate the landing of building materials intended for constructing the said mill. On or about 11th May 1927, the Port Commissioners wrote a letter to the plaintiffs enclosing a coloured plan depicting the bund which they stated to be an encroachment on the high-water mark of the river and directing its removal within a month, failing which action was to be taken under Ss. 83 and 84, Calcutta Port Act. The plaintiffs took no notice of this letter till 20th June and then started a correspondence into the details of which it is unnecessary to enter. On 16th August 1927, the Port Commissioners instituted a complaint against the plaintiffs before the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta, he being the authority before whom complaints relating to offences committed within the limits of the port of Calcutta could be brought. On 18th August 1927 the present suit, out of which this appeal has arisen, was instituted by the plaintiffs in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Howrah praying inter alia that it might be declared that the bund in question was erected on the plaintiffs' lands and it was not an encroachment on the high-water mark of the river Hooghly and that the Port Commissioners might be permanently restrained from interfering in any manner with the plaintiffs' possession of the said bund and from taking any steps whatsoever in any criminal Court in respect of the said alleged encroachment. In their written statement which was filed on or about 20th September 1927, the Port Commissioners stated that the bund in question had been erected on the foreshore of the river below the high-water mark, the bund going in time of flow under the high-water mark, that the land on which the said bund had been erected formed part of the foreshore of the river and that it was really an attempt on the part of the plaintiffs to carve out for their own purposes a portion of the foreshore. The Port Commissioners contended that in the circumstances they were entitled to have the bund removed and to institute proper proceedings in a proper Court, to wit, the Court of the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta, against the plaintiffs and that no injunction could be issued under the law for restraining them in manner referred to in the plaint. On 2nd November 1927 the plaintiffs applied before the Subordinate Judge of Howrah for a temporary injunction against the Port Commissioners in terms of the prayer in the plaint. They alleged that there was a bona fide dispute between the parties as to the location of the high-water mark of the river Hughly and that in the event of the Port Commissioners being allowed to remove the said bund before the determination of the suit, they would suffer irreparable loss and damage. The Port Commissioners, in opposing the said application, pointed out that the plaintiffs had applied, after the institution of the said criminal proceedings, to this Court in its criminal revisional jurisdiction for stay thereof and that such application had been refused by this Court. They further pointed out that if the proceedings in the criminal Court were not proceeded with and the bund removed, there would be danger to navigation with the further result that the confined area would be lost to the river by gradual siltation of the encroached part to the great detriment of river navigation and that such loss would cause considerable inconvenience and irreparable injury to them as also to the public. It was also pointed out that the Calcutta Port Act with a view to preventing such encroachments leading to siltation and interference with navigation had provided a summary procedure under S. 84, Calcutta Port Act, and that the civil Court could not and should not interfere with the said criminal proceedings. Lastly they contended that the balance of convenience was in their favour and against the plaintiffs.

The learned Subordinate Judge held that there was a substantial question to be investigated and that until the matter was finally disposed of everything should remain in status quo. Accordingly he granted a temporary injunction against the Port Commissioners as prayed for by the plaintiffs restraining the former from proceeding with the said criminal proceedings.

In our opinion the order of the learned Subordinate Judge is an extraordinary one and ought never to have been made in the circumstances of this case. The plaintiffs' action in instituting the present suit two days after the institution of the complaint in the Chief Presidency Magistrate's Court was a manifest device on their part to evade the provisions of the Calcutta Port Act. Now, under S. 56, sub-S. (e), Specific Relief Act, a civil Court has no jurisdiction to stay by means of a permanent injunction proceedings in any criminal matter and it is settled law that where the legislature has indicated a mode of procedure before a Magistrate, a civil Court will not interfere unless in very special circumstances by way of injunction or declaration of right: see in this connexion Corporation of Calcutta v. Bijoy Kumar Addy (1). If these be the principles relating to the issue of permanent injunctions, it follows as a necessary corollary that there is no warrant for the issue of a temporary injunction against the Port Commissioners in this case. The learned Subordinate Judge states that the expression "high-water mark" has not been defined in the Calcutta Port Act and that the balance of convenience was on the side of the plaintiffs. Now, on an application for an interlocutory injunction the Court has got to be satisfied that the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case that he is entitled to relief. It appears to us on the materials placed before us that there ought not to be any difficulty in the determination of the high-water mark of the river Hughly. The learned Subordinate Judge refers to the notification issued under the Indian Ports Act, 1875, defining the high-water mark of the river Hughly and seems to throw doubt on the question whether that definition is operative at the present day. Now, under S. 83, Calcutta Port Act it is not lawful for any person save the Port Commissioners to make, erect or fix below high-water mark within the port any wharf, quay, stage, jetty, pier, erection or mooring, unless the assent of the Local Government is first obtained. The limits of the Port of Calcutta, as is well known, were defined by notification under the Indian Ports Act (Act 12 of 1875) under date the 18th August 1879. Thereafter, on the 13th August 1880, a further notification was issued under the same Act defining the high-water mark of the river Hughli. The said notification was as follows:

The 13th August 1880 In continuation of the notification of the 18th August 1879, defining the limits of the Port of Calcutta which was published as p. 841 of the Calcutta Gazette of the 20th August 1879, the Lieutenant-Governor is pleased, with the sanction of the Government of India, to declare in accordance with the provisions of Ss. 5 and 6, Indian Ports Act 12 of 1875, that high-water mark shall extend to 15'09 feet above the sill of the Kidderpore Dock, that being the highest point reached by ordinary spring tides in any season of the year.

On the Howrah side of the river this boundary has been defined and marked off by stone blocks fixed level with the river bank to mark the exact position of the 15'09 feet water line between the Port Commissioners' land at Sibpur on the south and the southern boundary of the East Indian Railway Company's premises on the north as shown on a plan submitted by the Commissioners.

It is true that Act 12 of 1875 was repealed by the Indian Ports Act of 1889, (Act 10 of 1889), but by virtue of S. 2 of the last-mentioned Act the notifications referred to above were deemed to have been made and issued under the last mentioned Act and were therefore, continued. Act 10 of 1889, was repealed by Act 15 of 1908. Though there is nothing said in Act 15 of 1908 about the continuance of the notifications issued under the earlier Acts, it is to be remembered that meanwhile the General Clauses Act (Act 10 of 1897) had come into operation. Now, what was the effect thereof? Under S. 24, General Clauses Act it is provided that where any Act, of the Governor-General in Council or regulation is after the commencement of this Act repealed and re-enacted with or without modification, then unless it is otherwise expressly provided any appointment, notification, order, scheme, rule, form or by-law made or issued under the repealed Act or regulation shall so far as it is not inconsistent with provisions re-enacted continue in force and be deemed to have been issued under the provisions so re-enacted unless and until it is superseded by any appointment, notification, order, scheme, rule, form or by-law made or issued under the provisions so re-enacted.

In view of the above, there would seem to be no justification for the learned Subordinate Judge's doubts as to the existence of a recognized definition of the high-water mark of the river Hughli at the present moment. No doubt it will have to be determined in the suit itself whether the contention of the Port Commissioners, viz., that the bund in question is below the high-water mark is correct or not, but it is reasonably clear that if the Commissioners are right and if by reason of the erection of the said bund there is obstruction to public navigation, resulting in the loss of lives of passengers in vessels and also property, no amount of pecuniary compensation would be sufficient or adequate to meet such loss and that the balance of convenience is, on an interlocutory application such as was brought on before the Subordinate Judge, against the plaintiffs and in favour of the Commissioners. To restrain the Port Commissioners in manner indicated above in a matter like this is a very serious thing and in our opinion the learned Subordinate Judge would have been well advised if he had refused the plaintiffs' application and directed an early hearing of the suit.

The result, therefore, is that this appeal is allowed and the connected Rule is also made absolute with costs, the hearing fee being assessed at five gold mohurs in each case. The appellants will be entitled to the costs in the lower Court and to the costs of the preparation of the paper-book in this appeal.

Criminal Appeal No. 2 and Death Reference No. 2 of 1928. Decided on 13th March 1928 from judgment of Sess. Judge, Chittagong.

* Criminal P. C., S. 236—Charge of a substantive offence but no charge of abetment of that substantive offence—Accused may be convicted of abetment of that offence if he is not prejudiced.

It cannot be laid down as a universal rule that in no circumstances whatsoever, where there is a charge of a substantive offence and there is no charge of abetment of that substantive offence, can the person so charged with the substantive offence be convicted of abetment of that offence. The answer to the question really depends on the facts of each case and it must be seen in each case whether or not prejudice has been caused to the accused by reason of the conviction for abetment of the substantive offence in the absence of a charge therefor.

C. C. Ghose, J.—This is a reference under S. 374, Criminal P. C. by the learned Sessions Judge of Chittagong in a case in which the appellant before us named Kadira alias Abdul Kadir was tried along with five others before him and a jury under various sections of the Indian Penal Code. The appellant Kadira was charged with having committed offences punishable under Ss 302 and 120-B/302 I. P. C. The five other persons who were tried along with the present appellant and who were acquitted by the jury were charged under Ss. 302/102-B and 302/109 I. P. C. As regards the appellant, the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty under Ss 302 and 302/102-B and a verdict of guilty by 4 to 3 under Ss. 302/109, I. P. C. The learned Judge accepted the verdict of the majority of the jury under Ss. 302/109, I. P. C. and sentenced the appellant to death. In his letter of reference to this Court the learned Judge states that in his opinion the evidence on the record is sufficient to justify the conviction of the appellant under S. 302 read with S. 109, I. P. C., and that in the circumstances of this case he had no alternative but to sentence the appellant to death.

Now, the case for the prosecution, shortly stated, was as follows: It appears that at the instance of one Iasinali, one Anu Boli and some others were charged under S. 304, I. P. C., on the allegation that they had caused the death of Iasinali's brother Azimuddin. After the preliminary investigation a charge-sheet was submitted against the accused in that case and they were committed to the Sessions. One Kumud Ghosal was taking an active interest in the prosecution of that case and was assisting Iasinali. It is alleged that he was approached by Anu Boli, among others, with a view to arrange some sort of compromise of that case. Kumud Ghosal was not inclined to favour the compromise, but Iasinali, it is said, was not unwilling to effect a compromise. Be that as it may, the attempted compromise fell through.

Some days thereafter Kumud Ghosal and one Asmat Ali, along with two others named Amir Hamza, who is a brother of Iasin Ali, and Isaf Ali, set out for Cox's Bazar in the district of Chittagong. The four persons named above met at the Ferry Ghat at Balukhali and from there onwards they travelled together. They got out of the boat at a place called Tambru Ghat and from there they set out by road to Cox's Bazar. The road to Cox's Bazar passes after the dak bungalow at Ukhia through some dense jungle and thereafter the road rises for some distance and then continues on the level again. After passing this rise, the four persons named above began to pass along the higher level of the dhala; Kumud Ghosal was leading and the other three were following him. There was a gun with Kumud Ghosal; it was being carried by Asmat Ali. After they had passed some distance over the level road, a gunshot was heard from the direction of the west and it was found that Kumud had been shot on the left side. He fell down exclaiming that Kadira had shot him. The men who were with Kumud Ghosal, namely, Asmat Ali, Amir Hamza and Isaf Ali, turned their eyes towards the west and it is said that they saw a gun being withdrawn into the jungle, smoke rising and Kadira's head was peering-out over the jungle growth. It is also said that these three persons also saw Anu Boli. Anu Boli, it is said, gave an order to seize the three men and thereupon a number of men came out of the jungle and advanced upon the men who were accompanying Kumud Ghosal. These latter fled in terror towards the north. They ran for some distance but when they found that the people who had been chasing them had gone away, they returned to the place where Kumud Ghosal lay and found that other passengers from the boat which stopped at the Ferry Ghat had gathered round Kumud Ghosal. When they returned they spoke to Kumud and it is said that each of the three men told Kumud that they had recognized the men who had attacked. Kumud told them to go and inform the police. One of the three men, namely Amir Hamza, went to the police station where he lodged the first information. This was about 3-30 p. m.

The Sub-Inspector of Police thereupon proceeded to the place of occurrence. He held an inquest and sent the dead body to Cox's Bazar for post-mortem examination. The doctor who held the post-mortem examination was examined in the Sessions Court and he was of opinion that the killing of Kumud Ghosal was clearly a homicidal one.

Now the main evidence against the appellant Kadira consists of the deposition of the three witnesses, being P. Ws. 3, 6 and 7, and it is really on the evidence of these three witnesses that the charge under Ss. 302 and 302/120-B, I.P.C., was sought to be sustained. We have carefully examined that evidence for ourselves to see whether in the circumstances, apart from any question of law, it is sufficient to sustain a conviction under S. 302/109 I. P. C. In my opinion that evidence is wholly insufficient to sustain a conviction under S. 302/109 I. P. C. Further there was no charge before the jury against the present appellant of being guilty of an offence, punishable under S. 302 read with S. 109 I. P. C. As indicated above the two charges against the present appellant were under S. 302 and S. 302 read with S. 120-B, I. P. C. In these circumstances the learned vakil for the appellant has contended that the jury having found the appellant not guilty under the charges against him and which included a charge of conspiracy, and there being no charge against him under S. 302 read with S. 109 I. P. C., the verdict of the jury, that is, of the majority of the jury, against the present appellant under S. 302 read with S. 109, is one that cannot be sustained and that it is open to us on a reference under S. 374, Criminal P. C., in a case of this description, to set aside that verdict.

It is true that there was no charge of abetment of murder against the present appellant before the jury, but in my opinion it cannot be laid down as a universal rule that in no circumstances whatsoever, where there is a charge of a substantive offence and there is no charge of abetment of that substantive offence, can the person so charged with the substantive offence be convicted of abetment of that offence. The cases on the point under Ss. 236, 237 and 238, Criminal P.C., indicate a conflict of judicial opinion but the true rule seems to me, as indicated by J. Woodroffe in his Annotations to the Criminal Procedure Code, that the answer to the question really depends on the facts of each case and that we have to find out in each case whether or not prejudice has been caused to the accused by reason of the conviction for abetment of the substantive offence in the absence of a charge therefor. I do not propose to go through the cases which were discussed at the bar as no useful purpose would be served thereby. In this case the question resolves itself whether on the record before us the appellant can be properly convicted of abetment of murder of Kumud Ghosal. The jury have found that the persons before them, i. e., Kadira and the said other persons, were not guilty of murder of Kumud Ghosal. Therefore the murder of Kumud Ghosal must have been committed by some person unknown. Now, the record before us is insufficient for conviction of the present appellant of abetment of murder of Kumud Ghosal by an unknown person. The evidence on record points to the conclusion that there was either a murder of Kumud Ghosal by the persons arraigned before the jury or nothing. There being therefore no charge of abetment of murder and no evidence to sustain such a charge, even if made, the verdict of the jury cannot be allowed to stand, and it is our manifest duty to set the same aside. In my opinion, in a case like this it would be extremely risky to allow the verdict of the jury to remain and the safer course would be to set aside the same and to allow the present appeal.

The result therefore is that the verdict of the jury is set aside and the appellant must be discharged from custody.

Rankin, C. J.—I agree.

Civil Rule No. 903 (M) of 1927, Decided on 15th November 1927, from original order of 4th Sub-Judge, Dacca.

(a) Limitation Act, S. 5—Pleader's act or default is not binding upon the client.

In a matter falling under S. 5, the pleader does not act as an agent of his client and his act or default is not binding upon the latter within the meaning of S. 5. [P 470 C 1]

(b) Limitation Act, S. 5—A mistake of a pleader cannot always and under all circumstances afford ground for extension of time under S. 5—Appeal filed in a wrong Court on the advice of a pleader—Appeal filed in proper Court after limitation—Time was extended.

A general rule of law cannot be laid down that a mistake of a pleader, however obvious it may be, can always and under every circumstance afford ground for extension of time under S. 5. [P 471 C 2]

The appellant instructed his pleader, of over 15 years' standing and having considerable practice, to file an appeal. The pleader, under a wrong impression that the appeal relates to the suit which was valued below Rs. 5,000, filed the memorandum of appeal in the Court of the District Judge. It was found that the appeal did not lie to the Court of the District Judge and it ought to have been presented in the High Court. The District Judge on that day returned his memorandum of appeal to the petitioner and the appeal was presented by him in the High Court. On these facts the client prayed for extension of time under S. 5.

Held: that the appellant was entitled to the extension of time as the appeal was wrongly filed before the District Judge on the advice of a pleader of some standing on whose words he had good reason to rely: A.I.R. 1922 Cal. 247; A.I.R. 1924 Bom. 393; A.I.R. 1922 All. 490 (F.B.); A.I.R. 1918 P.C. 135; and 12 I.C. 677; Discussed and Rel. on: 34 Cal. 216 and A.I.R. 1923 Pat. 140, Dist. [P 472 C 1]

Suhrawardy, J.—This is an application by the appellant for permission to file an appeal out of time on the ground mentioned in the petition. The ground is that there were two suits brought against the appellant by two creditors: one was valued at over Rs. 5,000 and the other much below it. Both the suits were decreed and the decrees put into execution. The appellant's properties were sold in the suit which was valued at over Rs. 5,000 and the decree-holder in the other execution case applied for rateable distribution of the money realized from the sale of the properties. The appellant applied to have the auction sale set aside under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C. That application was after trial dismissed on 28th February 1927. The appellant's case is that as he was lying seriously ill at that time he sent the necessary costs and papers to his pleader at Dacca who was a pleader of over 15 years' standing and having considerable practice. The pleader, under a wrong impression that the appeal related to the suit which was valued below Rs. 5,000, filed the memorandum of appeal in the Court of the District Judge at Dacca on 29th March 1927. On 27th June 1927 it was found that the appeal did not lie to the Court of the District Judge and that it ought to have been presented in the High Court. The District Judge on that day returned his memorandum of appeal to the petitioner and the appeal was presented by him in this Court on 18th July 1927. On these facts the petitioner prays for extension of time under S. 5, Lim. Act. The question that arises in this case has been very thoroughly argued before us and all the relevant authorities have been placed in support of one view or the other. The questions which present themselves before us for determination, accepting the facts as stated by the petitioner to be true and we do not see any reason to doubt the truth of those facts, are whether when a party acts implicitly relying on the advice of his legal adviser is he entitled to claim the benefit of S. 5, Lim. Act; and, secondly if the advice turns out to be wrong or when the legal adviser acts negligently, namely without due care and attention, is the party not entitled to claim such benefit?

The answer to these alternative questions in any way will lead to undesirable results. If the first question is answered in the affirmative it will be putting a premium on the carelessness or incompetency of persons practising law on whom lies a heavy duty and responsibility of giving proper advice to their clients. On the other hand, if the second question is answered in the affirmative an innocent party who has acted on the advice of his lawyer qualified for the purpose of giving advice will suffer injury without any fault of his. (The question therefore, that has come up before us in these proceedings is one of considerable difficulty and delicacy. As has been held in several cases [Rakhal Chandra Ghose v. Ashutosh Ghose (1), and Krishna v. Chathappan (2)], the discretion given by S. 5, Lim. Act, to the Court should not be defined and crystallized so as to convert a discretionary matter into a rigid rule of law. But the discretion in each particular case should be exercised on its own facts with a view to secure furtherance of justice. It has also been held in numerous cases that when the period fixed by the law of limitation for an action or appeal expires the defendant or respondent secures very valuable rights which should not be easily tampered with: see Krishnaasami Panikondar v. Ramasami Chettiar (3). Keeping these principles in view we have to examine the facts of the present case and the decisions that bear upon them. The explanation given for the delay in filing the appeal in this Court is that the appellants' pleader to whom the papers were sent was under the impression that the matter arose out of a suit which was valued below Rs. 5,000. It is not clear what was the basis of that impression and we cannot but observe that we are not satisfied that the pleader was so diligent as it was necessary for a lawyer to be in dealing with the interests of his client. But the fact remains that the petitioner was induced by the advice of his pleader to file the appeal in the wrong Court. On similar facts decisions have been pronounced which it is not easy to reconcile. The learned advocate for the opposite party has drawn our attention to several cases in support of his contention that if the pleader acts negligently the client is not entitled to the benefit of S. 5, Lim. Act. Before considering those cases it would be profitable to refer to the section itself which says that an appeal may be admitted after the period of limitation prescribed therefor when the appellant satisfies the Court that he has sufficient cause for not preferring the appeal. The words of the section are that the appellant must satisfy the Court that he, namely the appellant, has sufficient cause for not preferring the appeal in time. It has not been argued before us, nor can it be reasonably said, that in a matter of this kind the pleader acts as an agent of his client and his act or default is binding upon the latter within the meaning of S. 5, Lim. Act. The learned advocate for the opposite party has referred us to several cases which may be examined separately. The first case to which reference has been made is the case of Sarat Chandra Bose v. Saraswati Debi (4). The point on the facts of the case there did not really arise and it was decided upon a very different consideration. The appellant there was a well-known lawyer and his explanation was that he was under the impression that the appeal lay to the Court of the District Judge instead of the High Court. Their Lordships commented upon the fact of the appellant being himself a lawyer and distinguished the cases which supported the appellant's contention in that case. They conceded that where there was a bona fide mistake on behalf of a client acting on the advice of his lawyer a good case may be made out under S. 5, Lim. Act. Thereafter their Lordships made the following observation:

But the circumstances we have already described show that there was negligence on the part of the appellant.

In that case, therefore, it was found that there was negligence on the part of the party and that he was not entitled to any indulgence. The next case is S. C. Dey v. Mt. Rajwanti Kuer (5). In that case Dawson-Miller, C. J., has expressed an opinion that if a party pleads that he has been misled by the mistake of his legal adviser the principle on which the Court acts is that the mistake must be of such a description that it might arise even amongst practitioners of experience. But the judgment of the Court did not depend upon this view of the law, for on the facts the learned Judges found that the allegations made by the petitioner in that case were not sufficient. In the concluding portion of his judgment the learned Chief Justice says that the affidavit of the petitioner before him did not say who made the mistake, whether it was some practitioner of experience or whether it was made by some clerk in the pleader's office. The learned Chief Justice in expressing the above view relied upon a decision of this Court in Sunder Kuer v. Raghunath Sahai (6). There, the mistake made by the petitioner 'was in calculating the time within which he should have filed the appeal in this Court taking into account the period occupied in taking copies of necessary papers. He based his case upon the advice he got from a pleader in the mofussil in that matter which turned out to be wrong. The learned Judges after considering the various cases relating to the point made the following observation :

(3) A.I.R. 1917 P.C. 179=41 Mad. 412=45 I.A. 25 (P.C.).

(6) [1911] 12 I.C. 677.

The test therefore, to be applied to the case before us is whether there has been any negligence or inaction or want of bona fides on the part of the appellant. We are satisfied upon the materials which have been placed before us that the question must be answered in the negative. The appellant who is a pardanashin lady, appeared to have acted bona fide and her agent consulted her pleader who assured him that he was entitled to a deduction of all the periods mentioned.

After making this observation the learned Judges proceeded to observe further that the basis on which the wrong calculation was made was strenuously maintained by the learned vakil who appeared before their Lordships on behalf of the petitioner which fact to their Lordships indicated that a mistake of that description might arise even amongst practitioners of experience. The decision in Sundar Kuer v. Raghunath Sahai (6), therefore, does not support the observation of the learned Chief Justice of the Patna High Court in the case of S. C. Dey v. Rajwanti Kuer (5) in support of the view expressed therein. We have a large number of cases bearing on this point and some of them are decisions of great authority. It is not necessary to refer to all these cases and I confine myself to some that may be taken as typical. Reference may be made to the decision in the case of Kumudini Roy v. Kamala Kanta Sen (7). The importance of this decision lies in the fact that it is of Mookerjee, J., who was a party to the decision in the case of Sarat Chandra Bose v. Saraswati Debi (4) as well as to that in the case of Sunder Kuer v. Raghunath Sahai (6). In that case, in execution of a decree in a suit valued at more than Rs 5,000, an appeal from an order of the Subordinate Judge was preferred to the District Judge after the period for appealing to this Court had expired. The District Judge dismissed the appeal on merits. A second appeal was filed in this Court against the decree of the District Judge. At the hearing of the second appeal it was discovered that no appeal lay to the District Judge and their Lordships allowed the memorandum of second appeal to be converted into that of first appeal and directed that the appeal might be taken to have been presented to this Court on the day on which they passed the order and accepted it as filed within time. It may be sufficient for the present purpose to refer to two decisions of two other High Courts on this point. In Nagindas Motilal v. Nilaji Moraba Naik (8), Marten, J., has very exhaustively dealt with the English and Indian law on this point and held that if a party acts on the advice of his pleader he comes within the protection of S. 5, Lim. Act. There an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council was made within six months according to the period prescribed in the Limitation Act before its amendment by Act 26 of 1920, but after three months, as is provided by the latter Act. This was done on the advice of a mofussil pleader and the learned Judge held that it was a sufficient excuse entitling the appellant to extension of time. This point came up for consideration before a Full Bench of Allahabad High Court recently. In Sib Dayal v. Jagannath Prasad (9), a second appeal was filed on the last day prescribed by the law of limitation without a copy of the judgment of the first Court. When that judgment was filed and the case was properly constituted, the appeal was time barred. The appellant pleaded that the failure to comply with the rules of the Court was due to the error of the vakil of the district who had informed him that the judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court were alone necessary.

The question as to whether a mistake of the lawyer was a sufficient excuse within the meaning of S. 5, Lim. Act, was canvassed at great length and the learned Judges unanimously held that an honest mistake on the part of a litigant caused by erroneous advice given to him by his vakil in the district by reason of which an appeal was not filed until the period of limitation therefor had expired was a good ground for the application in favour of the would-be appellant of the provisions of S. 5, Lim. Act. I am not prepared to differ from the views expressed by so many learned Judges, but at the same time I want to guard myself for the present against laying down a general rule of law that a mistake of a pleader, however obvious it may be, can always and under every circumstance afford ground for extension of time under S. 5, Lim. Act. I may also refer in this connexion to the case of Sunderabai v. Collector of Belgaum (10), which supports the view I have taken. In the present case we accept the statement that the appeal was filed before the District Judge on the advice of a pleader of some standing and on whose word the petitioner had good reason to rely.

In this view the rule must be made absolute. Let the appeal be registered. The petitioner, however, will pay to the opposite party the costs of this hearing which we assess at three gold mohurs.

Graham, J.—The question of law involved in this rule is by no means free from difficulty, and that difficulty is not solved, nor indeed it can be said to be diminished by a reference to the numerous decisions on the subject, which are far from being uniform. On the whole, however, having regard to the particular facts of this case I, think the appeal should be admitted under S. 5, Lim. Act. It would certainly be a case of great hardship to the appellant if, in the circumstances that have happened, he should lose his right of appeal. There can be no doubt that the appellant's pleader was guilty of great carelessness in filing the appeal in the wrong Court; but it seems to me to be impossible to hold that the appellant has acted otherwise than bona fide in the matter; and that he has succeeded in showing sufficient cause for not presenting the appeal within time.

I agree, therefore, that this rule should be made absolute.

MUKERJI, J.

Kiran Chandra Roy and others — Plaintiffs—Appellants.

Jagannath Banik and others—Defendants—Respondents.

Appeal No 2700 of 1926, Decided on 19th April 1928, from appellate decree of Dist Judge, Zillah Faridpur, D/- 25th May 1926.

(a) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 105 — Suit to recover rent as settled in a proceeding under S. 105 for jama consisting of ten plots—Tenant contending that jama consisted of three plots and not of ten plots as alleged—No decision as regards the plots of which the jama consisted by the Revenue Officer—Decision under S. 105 was held to be not operative as res judicata and the civil Court was held to have power to go into the question as to the rent of the holding.

In a suit by a landlord A to recover rent as settled in a proceeding under S. 105 it was contended on behalf of the tenants that the jama consisted not of ten plots of land as alleged on behalf of A, but of three plots only, and that the remaining seven plots did not appertain to Mudafat G which, according to A, was the Mudafat to which the jama appertained but to Mudafat K; and it was further pleaded that the holder of Mudafat K had instituted a title suit against the parties to this suit and that, in that suit, which was decreed in 1920, it was declared that the said seven plots appertained to Mudafat K and the possession of the holders of that Mudafat was confirmed in respect of the said seven plots. A contended that the decision under S. 105 had the force and effect of a decree of a civil Court and it should have been given effect to in that way.

Held: that the principle of constructive res judicata could not be applied to a decision under S. 105 and that although it was open to the Revenue Officer to have arrived at a decision as regards the plots of which the jama consisted, inasmuch as no decision with regard to that matter had in point of fact been arrived at, the decision fixing the fair rental for the ten plots of land of which the jama was alleged to consist would not in any way operate as res judicata: 44 Cal. 783; Rel. on.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for rent. The plaintiffs claimed rent for their 13 annas 4 pies share of a certain jama which they alleged consisted of ten plots of land and bore a rental of Rs. 11-6-0 per year as settled in a proceeding under S. 105, Ben. Ten Act. Their case was that the rent due for their share was Rs. 9-7-8 per year. They claimed rent for the years 1326 to 1329 B. S. at the said rate together with cesses and damages. The defence that was taken was of a two fold character. In the first place it was alleged that the rent of the jama in the 16 annas share was Rs. 4-10-6 and that the rent due for the plaintiff's share was Rs. 3-14-1 per year. Next, it was contended that the jama consisted not of ten plots of land as alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs but of three plots only and that the remaining seven plots did not appertain to Mudafat Govindadas Bairagi which, according to the plaintiffs, was the mudafat to which the jama appertained, but to Mudafat Kamala Kanta; and it was further pleaded that the holder of Mudafat Kamala Kanta had instituted a title suit against the parties to this suit and that, in that suit, which was decreed in 1920, it was declared that the said seven plots appertained to Mudafat Kamala Kanta and the possession of the holders of that mudafat was confirmed in respect of the said seven plots. The Courts below concurrently accepted the contention that was urged on behalf of the defendants and, holding that the decision under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, did not purport to decide the question as regards the plots of which the jama consisted, expressed the view that it was open to the defendants, notwithstanding the said decision, to establish that the jama really consisted of three plots of land and that the rental thereof was not what was recorded in the decision under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, but something else. Those Courts also found concurrently, that the decree passed in 1920 was not vitiated by fraud and, relying on the said decree, they held further that the jama in respect of which the suit for rent was brought consisted of only three plots of land as was alleged on behalf of the defendants. In that view of the matter, they were of opinion that the plaintiffs' suit as laid could not succeed, but relying on the admission of the defendants that the rent in the plaintiffs' share for the said three plots of land was Rs. 3-14-1, decreed the suit at the said rate. The plaintiffs have thereupon preferred this second appeal.

The first contention that has been urged in support of this appeal is to the effect that, in view of the decision in the proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, it was not open to the Courts below to go into the question as to the rent of the holding; in other words, it is urged that the decision under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, has the force and effect of a decree of a civil Court and that it should have been given effect to in that way. The answer to this contention, however, is that the principle of constructive res judicata cannot be applied to a decision under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, and that, although it was open to the revenue officer to have arrived at a decision as regards the plots of which the jama consisted, inasmuch as no decision with regard to that matter had, in point of fact, been arrived at, it cannot be said that the decision that was actually passed, namely, that Rs. 11-6-0 was the fair rental for the ten plots of land of which the jama was alleged to consist would in any way operate as res judicata with regard to the point that has now been raised. If any authority is needed in support of this proposition, reference may be made to the case of Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad v Ahmed Hossein (1). This contention of the appellants, therefore, must be overruled.

The next contention that has been urged in support of the appeal, analyzed critically, reduces itself to the question of the legal effect that should attach to the decree of 1920. The finding of the learned District Judge is to the effect that there is no evidence of service of summons in the title suit which resulted in that decree. The finding falls somewhat short of a finding to the effect that there was in fact no service of summons at all. But assuming that the finding may be regarded as one of non-service of summons at all upon the defendants in the suit, in the absence of a finding that the decree was vitiated by fraud, it cannot be urged that the said decree may not be used as a piece of evidence in the case. It is a decree, though passed ex parte, passed by a Court having jurisdiction and, although it may be that the summonses were not properly served or not served at all, it cannot be urged that the Court had no jurisdiction to pass the decree. In any event, it is a decree that has not been set aside by a competent Court and indeed there is nothing to show that any attempt was ever made to have it set aside. So long, therefore, as it stands, it can certainly be used as a piece of evidence with regard to the matters dealt with by it. It would be evidence undoubtedly under S. 13.

(1) [1917] 44 Cal. 783 = 25 C. L. J. 556 = 35 I. C. 695 = 21 C. W. N. 1004.

Evidence Act. But the use that has been made of the decree, as far as one can gather from the judgment of the learned District Judge, is to treat it not merely as a piece of evidence in the case but rather as operating as res judicata with regard to the question whether the seven plots of land appertain to Mudafat Kamala Kanta or to Mudafat Govinda Das Bairagi. It should be remembered that the plaintiffs and the defendants in the present suit were in the position of defendants in the suit which culminated in the decree of 1920. The difficulty of using this decree as operating as res judicata is that the exceptional facts and circumstances which have got to be established in order that a decision may operate as res judicata as between co-defendants in a suit will have to be established. But it does not appear that any of those facts and circumstances are present in the present case. The proper way, therefore, to deal with the matter is to treat this decree only as a piece of evidence and to go no further. The learned Judge has, as I have already stated, regarded this decree as binding between the parties and operating as res judicata on this particular question. The result, therefore, is that the decision arrived at dealing with the decree in this way cannot be supported. In this view of the matter I am of opinion that the decree passed by the learned District Judge should be set aside and that the case should be sent back to his Court so that the appeal may now be re-heard and, after treating the decree of 1920 as a piece of evidence in the case and taking into consideration the other materials on the record, the question as to whether the seven plots of land appertain to the jama which forms the subject-matter of the suit may be decided. Upon the decision that is arrived at with regard to this question will depend the final decision of the Judge as regards the rent which the plaintiffs may nor may not be entitled to in the present suit. The appeal is allowed and the case is sent back to the lower appellate Court to be dealt with in the manner indicated above. Costs, will abide the result.

Civil P. C., S. 2 (12)—Defendants in wrongful possession but not proving that the land was being cultivated by others—Mesne profits should be awarded on the basis that they were in khas possession.

In a suit for mesne profits defendants, who were in wrongful possession, gave no evidence to show that they could not cultivate the lands themselves or that the lands were in possession of tenants before they entered upon them as trespassers.

Held: that under these circumstances the defendants were bound to pay mesne profits on the basis as if they were in direct possession of the lands in suit. [P 475 C 1]

Judgment.—Two objections have been taken to the decree made for mesne profits by the Court below. The first is that the lands with regard to Chak No. 8 and Chak No. 20 were in the possession of tenants and mesne profits should be calculated on the rent basis instead of on the basis taken by the Subordinate Judge that the defendants were in khas possession. The Subordinate Judge says in his judgment that no evidence was given before him and the commission was silent as to the fact whether the defendants had been in khas possession or in possession of the lands decreed to the plaintiffs through tenants. As a matter of fact it has been pointed out on behalf of the appellants that in the schedule attached to the commissioner's report he says that some lands are in the possession of tenants. No evidence, however, was given before the Court, but evidence apparently was adduced before the commissioner that certain lands were in the possession of tenants. That, however, does not exonerate the defendants from liability for mesne profits as defined in S. 2 (12),

Civil P. C. The defendants have given no evidence to show that they could not cultivate the lands themselves or that the lands were in possession of tenants before they entered upon them as trespassers. Under these circumstances the defendants are bound to pay mesne profits on the basis as if they were in direct possession of the lands in suit. The first ground, therefore, fails.

The second ground is that mesne profits had been allowed for a period which goes beyond the period prescribed in O. 20, R. 12, Civil P. C., inasmuch as mesne profits had been allowed for a period more than three years after the date of the decree. As a matter of fact the respondents decree holders claim only mesne profits for a period within three years of the date of the decree whether mesne profits were calculated for a period beyond that date was not taken as a ground of objection before the Subordinate Judge, nor does it appear that this point was specifically taken in the grounds of appeal. Under these circumstances we are unable to allow this question to be raised before us for the first time during the argument.

The appeal must, therefore, stand dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing-fee at ten gold mohurs.

Judgment.—Appeal No. 144 is on behalf of the claimant 2. His learned advocate after the arguments were heard in the other two connected appeals, did not think it proper to press this appeal. It is, therefore, dismissed but without costs.

Appeals Nos. 77 and 78 are by claimant 1. Two questions were pressed with reference to appeal No 77. The first is as to on what basis the apportionment of the compensation should be made as between claimant 1 who is the landlord, and claimant 2, the tenant. The learned President capitalized the rent payable to the landlord for the unexpired portion of the lease which had to run for about 85 years from the date of the acquisition on a 6 per cent. basis and the reversion was valued on the basis of 6½ per cent. The contention on behalf of the appellant is that the basis taken by the learned President is against the evidence given by the experts on both sides. Mr. Johnston was examined on behalf of claimant 2, the tenant, and his evidence was that if the whole of the leasehold property had to be valued with reference to the interest of claimant 1, the rent which the landlord was entitled to get for the leasehold as well as the reversion would have been valued on the 4 per cent. basis as regards the land. The real fact on the evidence may be shortly stated thus, basing it on the evidence of Mr. Johnston: He said that the rent of the landlord on the 4 per cent. basis on the market value awarded for the land itself would be about Rs. 2,240. The rent allocated with regard to this price of land as payable to claimant 1 is Rs. 720. The margin of profit to the lessee would, therefore, be something like Rs. 1,500 a month. The security for the rent which claimant 1 was entitled to get under the circumstances is more than satisfactory. Therefore, the value of the lessor's interests cannot be held to be as low as the President has put it. Any purchaser, however cautious he may be, would gladly pay 25 years' purchase-money for the interest of the landlord. In addition to this our attention has been drawn by the learned advocate for the appellant to the provisions of the lease under which the lessee not only deposited with the lessor sufficient security to the extent of one lakh of rupees, for payment of the rent but kept in deposit three months rent in advance over and above the security deposit of one lakh of rupees. Under these circumstances the rent reserved is protected by unquestionably valuable security and the lessee is certainly entitled to claim that he should be paid a higher price than what has been given to him by the learned President.

The learned President has in valuing the reversion valued it at a rate less than he valued the bare land with regard to the contiguous property which was No 123/1 which was also acquired. The contention on behalf of the appellant is that the reversion in the case of the land in question No. 123 should not be taken to be of less value than the bare land because there are buildings on it. It seems to us that the proposition is quite reasonable. The value of land does not deteriorate if there is any building upon it. The buildings may no doubt deteriorate, but when the reversion of bare land is valued on the 4 per cent. basis there does not seem to be any good reason why the land with building on it should be valued at less than the value of the land. The evidence given by Mr. Johnston may again be referred to in this connexion. He says:

The ground rent of No. 123 would have been 4 per cent. The value of the structures on it was Rs. 9,000 odd as standing structures.

The value of the land itself was

Rs. 56,400 and there is no reason why the 4 per cent. basis should not be taken with regard to the land as well as with regard to the reversion on this evidence. It is, however, contended on behalf of the respondent that it would be very hard on them to take the 4 per cent. basis thereon, because there has been some misapprehension with regard to the agreement as to the rent fixed at Rs. 60 per month as well as the increase at the rate of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. at the end of every ten years as provided in the lease. The argument is that claimant 2 understood that he had agreed to Rs. 60 as being the rent payable for the whole period. We are, however, unable to accept this statement having regard to the clear statement of the facts in the judgment of the learned President. We think, however, that in these matters it is very difficult to come to a definite conclusion as regards the valuation to be put on the interest of the landlord so as to apportion the compensation quite equitably. The standards given in English text-books are hardly of much use with regard to the valuation of the land in Calcutta. It would have been much better if there had been any direct evidence as to what a willing purchaser would pay for the interest of the landlord in such a case as this. In the absence of such evidence the apportionment can be made only in a rough and ready way, as has been done in various reported cases. The one thing which we can say is that we are unable to agree with the manner in which the learned President has calculated the value of the reversion of the land.

We, therefore, modify the order of the learned President in this way: that the capitalization value should be calculated at Rs 60 as the basis at the rate of 5 per cent. for 85 years and for subsequent increment in the same way as the learned President has done, but 5 per cent. should be taken as the basis for calculation. The reversion should also be valued at 5 per cent. basis. We modify the order of the President accordingly.

The appellant is entitled to his costs with regard to these appeals against claimant 2. We assess the hearing-fee at ten gold mohurs consolidated for the two appeals.

With regard to claimant 4 who is the mortgagee of one of the beneficiaries of the trust estate of which claimant 1 is the trustee, claimant 1 as appellant contends that the President was wrong in awarding to him any portion of the compensation on the basis of his mortgage. He contends that this is not a matter which can be taken into account in apportioning compensation awarded for acquisition of land which is the subject of a trust. Claimant 4 is the mortgagee from only one of the beneficiaries whose interest has been found by the President to be only 1/36th part of the premises. In dealing with the point whether a beneficiary is entitled to have any share of the compensation the learned President in deciding issues 6 and 7 held that the entire compensation which represents the value of the interest of claimant 2, the Pals, as the purchasers of the interest of some of the beneficiaries should be awarded to the trustee. Questions which may arise between the trustee and the beneficiaries and their assignees must be left to be debated before the Court having jurisdiction to administer the trust estate. This proposition appears to us to be incontestable.

But the learned President has taken a quite different view from what he has taken with regard to this question with reference to the beneficiaries and their assignees when he came to consider the matter as between the beneficiaries and their mortgagees. He ought to have according to the contention of the appellant made the same order as he has done with reference to the Pals interest as assignees of the beneficiaries. It is very difficult to understand why the learned President has made this difference in the case of the mortgagee claimant 4. He says first that the issue was not raised by claimant 1, but the learned advocate of claimant 1 points out that he made an application to raise the question before the case was taken up by addition of an issue which was rejected by the President. Next it appears that the President thought that he was bound to award a share of the compensation to the mortgagee by reason of the decision of the High Court dated 30th January 1926, in which this very mortgagee was a party, the case being with reference to another property included in the trust estate. The judgment of this Court is reported as Surendra Nath Tagore v.

K. S. Bonnerjee (1). What happened there was that although Surendra Nath Tagore was described as a claimant in the proceeding before the Collector he was not allowed to be heard on reference being made under S. 18, Land Acquisition Act, by the Collector. What the High Court directed was that his name being entered as one of the claimants the mortgagee was entitled to appear before the tribunal and make such representation as he might desire to make with regard to the apportionment of compensation to the beneficiaries. The High Court did not rule that either he or the beneficiary through whom he claimed was entitled to any share of the compensation. What this Court directed was that he was entitled to be heard. The President in the previous case was not justified in refusing to hear him. That case, therefore, does not in any way support the present order made by the President and the learned advocate for claimant 4 is unable to support it. The order, therefore, of allowing a share of the compensation to claimant 4 must be struck out and the whole of the money should be apportioned as between the trustee, claimant 1 and claimant 2, the lessee, leaving it to claimant 1 to make such application to the proper Court as he might be advised. We are not concerned with the other claimants in this case who are not interested in these appeals. They have got their moneys without any objection by any of the parties. In Appeal No. 78 the only question that arises is the question with regard to the compensation given to claimant 4, the mortgagee of the beneficiaries. That question has been dealt with in the previous appeal and the order will be the same, i. e., the learned President's order will be set aside. In this appeal the appellant, claimant 1, will get his costs from claimant 1/D. We assess the hearing-fee at ten gold mohurs. There will be no separate costs against claimant 4 in Appeal No. 77.

Jogesh Chandra Roy and Bepin Chandra Basu—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the principal defendant 1 and arises out of a suit for ejectment of the defendant. The plaintiff, now respondent, alleged that she acquired raiyati right in the suit land under a deed of gift from her mother, pro forma defendant 2, and that defendant 1 is an osat raiyat under her and that notice under S. 49, Ben. Ten. Act had been served on 18th March 1923. The plaintiff also alleged that defendants had violated some of the conditions of the previous decree which was passed by consent between the plaintiff's mother and defendant and failed to pay the yearly jama within the stipulated period. The defence of the defendant in substance is that the plaintiff is a tenure holder and that the suit is barred by the law of estoppel by reason of the stipulation contained in the previous consent decree which is to the following effect,

I (plaintiff) shall not be able to evict the defendant so long as the defendant pays the yearly rental of Rs. 20 within the year in which it falls due.

The Court of first instance found that the status of the plaintiff was that of a raiyat and that of the defendant an under-raiyat. Consequently, as the solenama decree contained terms which contravened the provisions of S. 85, Ben. Ten. Act, it could not be given effect to. Reliance was placed on the Full Bench decision of this Court in the case of Chandra Kanta Nath v. Amjad Ali Hazi (1). The Munsiff also found that the defendant had violated one of the stipulations in the consent decree in not depositing the yearly rent. The plaintiff's suit for khas possession was accordingly decreed. An appeal was taken against this decision by the defendant to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tippera and the learned Subordinate Judge has affirmed the decision of the Munsiff. He states that the only point urged before him was that the plaintiff was estopped from ejecting the defendant by reason of the solenama which contained the stipulation to which I have already referred. He states that no other points were placed before him. On this finding he affirmed the decree of the Court of first instance.

A second appeal has been taken to this Court and it has been argued that the findings of the lower appellate Court are insufficient to dispose of the appeal before him. It is said that as the question of plaintiff's status was drawn into controversy, the lower appellate Court and the Court of first instance should have come to the conclusion that the defendant was not a raiyat at fixed rent. The contention is that all that the lower Courts have found is that the plaintiff was a raiyat. I do not think that there is any substance in this contention. The question as to whether the plaintiff is a raiyat at a fixed rent was never raised in either of the Courts below. The question is not raised in the memorandum of appeal to this Court. All that the defendant said was that the status of the plaintiff was that of a tenure holder. He asserts that in ground 3 taken in this second appeal. Lower Courts have to proceed on the state of the pleadings and not by making a new case for any of the parties. The solenama decree shows that, on the face of it, the plaintiff's interest was described as that of a raiyat. Consequently, it was not open to the plaintiff to grant a lease of the character which in its effect was of a permanent nature as the effect of the lease is to protect the defendant from eviction except in certain contingencies. Therefore, there cannot be any estoppel on the basis of the solenama as the status of the plaintiff was found to be that of a raiyat and the defendant was liable to be ejected. I think, in this view, the decision of the Courts below are right. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 306 of 1925, Decided on 13th July 1927, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Zillah Murshidabad, D/- 12th September 1924.

(a) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 107—Decree in proceedings under S. 105 fixing the area and the rent of the holding—Landlord suing the tenants on that basis—The decree was held to be conclusive between the parties and the tenants were held to be bound to pay the rent fixed by the Settlement Officer.

After the final publication of the Record-of-Rights proceedings under S. 105 were started at the instance of the landlords and the Revenue Officer settled the fair rent of the land in arrears at Rs. 18-5-9. The decree in those proceedings showed that the tenants were in possession of 21 bighas 5 cottas odd land and that the fair rent assessed on the same was Rs. 18-6-9. Upon the basis of this assessment the landlord brought a suit to recover arrears of rent against the tenants. The tenants contended that there should be entire suspension of rent as the landlord dispossessed the tenants from 5 bighas 8 cottas of land and that the holding in respect of which the rent suit was brought consisted of 25 bighas odd, and was held at a rental of Rs. 15-6-11 gandas. The defence also alleged that there should, in any event, be proportionate reduction of rent. They further contended that the decree passed in proceeding under S. 105 was an ex-parte decree and the tenants did not raise the contention that they were entitled to suspension of rent by reason of dispossession by the landlord from a part of the disputed holding.

Held: that the decree under S. 105 was conclusive between the parties in suit on two questions: (1) the area of the holding, and (2) the rent of the holding. So long as the decree stood, tenants were bound to pay the rent fixed by the Settlement Officer in respect of the holding of 21 bighas found in their possession by the Settlement Officer. The fact that the decree was an ex parte one did not take away from the effect of the decree: A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 907, Foll [P 480 C 2]

(b) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 52—The doctrine of suspension of rent depends solely upon the fact that the rent due is an entire sum in respect of the land dismissed—Landlord and tenant.

The doctrine of suspension of rent depends solely upon this: that the rent due is an entire sum in respect of the land demised. If, therefore, the tenant is not given occupation of the whole of the land demised, the landlord has no right to the entire rent and, unless he has a right or some equity to an apportionment he can recover nothing on the contract. But the whole basis of the doctrine is that the rent due is one entire sum: A. I. R. 1925 P. C. 97, Foll.

B. C. Mukherji and Purna Chandra Chatterjee for Charu Chunder Ganguli—for Appellants

Peari Mohon Chatterjee—for Respondents.

Mitter, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of Murshidabad dated 12th September 1924 which reversed a judgment and decree of the Munsif of Jangipur dated 29th March 1923.

The appellants brought a suit against the respondents for recovery of arrears of rent, cess and damages for the years 1325 to 1328 B. S. at the rate of Rs. 18-5-9 per year. The main defence of the respondents was that there should be entire suspension of rent as the appellants dispossessed the respondents from 5 bighas 8 cottas of land and that the holding in respect of which the rent suit was brought consisted of 25 bighas odd and was held at a rental of Rs. 15-6-11 gandas. The defence also alleged that there should, in any event, be proportionate reduction of rent.

The Munsif decreed the suit in part. He allowed the claim for 1325 B. S. at the rate of Rs. 15-6-11 gandas and that of the other years at the rate of Rs. 18-5-9 in addition to cess and damages at the rate of 12½ per cent.

Appeal was taken by the defendants-respondents to the Court of the Subordinate Judge who reversed the decision of the Munsif and dismissed the plaintiff's (now appellant's) suit with costs. The lower appellate Court came to the conclusion that the defendants were dispossessed from 4 bighas odd of land before the commencement of the settlement operations and that as the rent was a charge on every bit of the land demised the entire rent should be suspended till the defendants are restored to possession of the lands from which they have been dispossessed.

It is common ground that after the final publication of the Record-of-Rights proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, were started at the instance of the plaintiffs landlords and the Revenue Officer settled the fair rent of the land in arrears at Rs. 18-5-9, which was to be recovered from the begining of the year 1329 B. S. On the record of this suit the only part of the proceedings under S 105 which has been produced is the decree. The decree shows that the tenants-respondents were in possession of 21 bighas 5 cottas odd land and that the fair rent assessed on the same was Rs. 18 6-9.

In second appeal it has been contended on behalf of the appellants that the decree in the S. 105 proceedings has the force and effect of a decree of the civil Court and it is not open to the respondents now to contend that the holding in question originally consisted of 25 bighas and not 21 bighas as mentioned in the decree under S. 105. Reference is made in this connexion to the provision of S 107, Ben. Ten. Act.

On behalf of the respondents it has been contended that the decree in the S. 105 proceeding cannot bar the tenant from raising the contention of suspension of rent as that was not a matter which was the subject-matter of consideration in the S. 105 proceeding. It is said by the learned vakil for the respondents that the decree was an ex parte decree and the tenants-respondents did not raise the contention that they were entitled to suspension of rent by reason of dispossession by the plaintiffs from a part of the disputed holding.

It is consequently argued that the decree of the Revenue Officer can not operate as a bar to the raising of the issue about suspension of rent. A number of cases have been cited on both sides, but none of them, except the one to which I shall presently refer, bear directly on the question at issue.

The true rule applicable in cases of this kind seems to have been laid down in the decision in the case of Dharani Mohon Roy v. Asutosh Mukerji (1). The facts of that case are briefly these; The plaintiff instituted a suit for recovery of arrears of rent and relied on the fair and equitable rent fixed by consent in a S. 105 proceeding. The defendant alleged the holding was rent free. The circumstances under which the decree in the S. 105 case was passed are stated in the judgment as follows:

It appears that the Record-of-Rights in this case was finally published on 16th December 1912. The record contained an entry to the effect that the defendants held the land without payment of rent, but that the land was liable to be assessed with rent. The landlord thereupon instituted a proceeding under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, for assessment of fair rent. The tenants contended that they held the land rent free. Consequently the question contemplated by S. 105, Cl (a), arose, namely, whether the land was or was not liable to payment of rent. It thereupon became incumbent upon the Revenue Officer to try and decide that issue and to settle rent under S. 105 if he should hold that the land was liable to payment of rent. It is not clear what took place before the Settlement Officer. But this much becomes obvious on an examination of the Record-of-Rights, that on 15th November 1913 rent was assessed at the rate of Rs. 3-9-0 per annum. It has been stated that this order was made by consent of parties but that is immaterial for our present purpose, because under Cl. (6), S. 105, where the parties agree amongst themselves by compromise or otherwise as to the amount of the fair rent, it is incumbent upon the Revenue Officer to satisfy himself that the amount agreed upon is fair and equitable and it is only if he is so satisfied that he can record the amount agreed upon as the fair and equitable rent; if he is not so satisfied, he has to settle a fair and equitable rent as provided in sub Ss. (4) and (5).

This much is incontrovertible: that under S. 107, so long as that decree remains in force, effect must be given to it, and, if effect is given to it, there is no escape from the conclusion that the claim for rent must be decreed on that basis.

It seems to me, therefore, that the decree under S. 105 was conclusive between the parties in suit on two questions: (1) the area of the holding; (2) the rent of the holding. So long as the decree stands defendants are bound to pay the rent fixed by the Settlement Officer in respect of the holding of 21 bighas found in their possession by the Settlement Officer. The fact that the decree was an ex parte one does not take away from the effect of the decree. The defendants-respondents have to thank themselves if they did not choose to appear in the S. 105 proceedings and they must now take the consequences of the ex parte decree. The decree of the Revenue Officer operates as a final decree and is binding between the parties. Whatever the position of the parties may have been at the time when the tenancy was created the effect of the Revenue Officer's decision is to define the present rights of the parties. In other words the effect of the decision is to determine that the defendants are tenants of the plaintiffs-appellants in respect of 21 and odd bighas of land for which they are liable to pay Rs. 18-5-9 pies as fair and equitable rent.

There is no question that the defence of suspension of payment of rent would have been available to the tenants respondents, for the rental as far as can be gathered was a lump rent. It has been so held in the case of Katyayani Devi v. Uday Kumar Das (2), at p. 166, where their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council observed as follows :

The doctrine of suspension of payment of rent, where the tenant has not been put in possession of part of the subject leased, has been applied where the rent was a lump rent for the whole land leased treated as an indivisible subject. It has no application to a case where the stipulated rent is so much per acre or bigha.

But as I have stated above this defence is barred by S. 107, Ben. Ten. Act, by reason of the previous decree in the 105 case. It is to be noticed also that the tenants respondents went on paying rents at the rate of Rs. 15-6-11 gandas or several years after the dispossession and as though this circumstance does not operate as an estoppel against the defendants it shows on which side the justice of the case lies. It shows at any rate that the tenants-respondents were prepared to pay amicably in full the entire rent notwithstanding the dispossession.

In this view the appeal must be allowed. The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and that of the first Court restored. In the circumstances of the case there will be no order as to costs.

Rankin, C. J.—I entirely agree. I would add just a few words. It was strenuously contended before us that the question of the right of suspension of rent was not a matter before the Settlement Officer who was concerned entirely with assessing a fair and equitable rent for the land and it was contended that under Ss. 105 and 107, Ben. Ten. Act, there was no estoppel or res judicata upon the question of the right of the tenant to a suspension of rent. That is quite true. But the doctrine of suspension of rent depends solely upon this that the rent due is an entire sum in respect of the land demised. If, therefore, the tenant is not given occupation of the whole of the land demised, the landlord has no right to the entire rent and, unless he has a right or some equity to an apportionment, he can recover nothing on the contract. But the whole basis of the doctrine is that the rent due is one entire sum. In this case, the original tenancy is said to have been for 25 bighas 19½ cottas. The land of which the tenant has had actual occupation is 21 bighas 5 cottas. The decision of the Settlement Officer was that the fair rent for 21 bighas 5 cottas was Rs. 18, this being an enhancement upon the rent of Rs. 15 for the original 25 bighas. If, therefore, this question depends upon any one proposition that proposition is this : whether the tenant is able to-day and after the Settlement Officer's decision to say that he holds 25 bighas at an entire rent. It appears to me that unless we are to set aside the Settlement Officer's decision and give no effect to it at all, it must be held that in respect of the 21 bighas it has been found that the fair and equitable rent is Rs. 18 in other words, the entirety of the original rent is inconsistent with and has been destroyed by the finding of the Settlement Officer. I think, therefore, that the order proposed is a correct one.

Civil Reference No. 8 of 1927, Decided on 7th February 1928, made by Commissioner, Workmen's Compensation, Bengal.

Workmen's Compensation Act (8 of 1923), S. 11 (6)—The phrase "that the workman has not been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner" should be construed as if it read "by another qualified medical practitioner."

The phrase "that the workman has not been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner" should be construed as if it read: "by another qualified medical practitioner." Although it is possible to suggest that the words in question were intended to apply only to a case of a refusal by the workman to be attended by the employer's doctor such a construction is not permissible as it would involve doing considerable violence to the language actually employed by the legislature. (2) 52 I. A. 160=A. I. R. 1925 P. C. 97=52 Cal. 417 (P. C.).

Rankin, C. J.—This is a reference under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Act 8 of 1923) made by the Commissioner, Workmen's Compensation, Bengal, under the power conferred on him by S. 27 of the Act, which is as follows :

The Commissioner may, if he thinks fit, submit any question of law for the decision of the High Court, and if he does so shall decide the question in conformity with such decision.

The question of law referred to us has reference to the true construction of sub-S. (6), S. 11 of the Act, and arises upon the following facts which have been found by the Commissioner. The applicant alleged that while joining threads in a beaming machine his right hand was caught between the drum and steam heated cylinder and was smashed. The employer contended that the hand was not smashed but only scalded and that owing to the applicant's disregard of the medical officer's instruction to keep his hand in bandages it became septic. The Commissioner has found that the employer's version is the correct one, that the applicant's disability is due to ankylosis of the joints which is the result of sepsis and that the present condition of his hand is due to his own conduct in disregarding the medical officer's instructions. In other words, that his injury has been aggravated by his disregard of those instructions. The Commissioner has accepted the evidence of the employer's doctor that the original injury was only a very slight burn.

The question is whether in these circumstances the sub-S. 6, S. 11 applies to the case. That sub-section is as follows:

Where an injured workman has refused to be attended by a qualified medical practitioner whose services have been offered to him by the employer free of charge or having accepted such offer has deliberately disregarded the instructions of such medical practitioner, then, if it is thereafter proved that the workman has not been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner and that such refusal, failure or disregard was unreasonable in the circumstances of the case and that the injury has been aggravated thereby, the injury and resulting disablement shall be deemed to be of the same nature and duration as they might reasonably have been expected to be if the workman had been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner, and compensation, if any, shall be payable accordingly.

The difficulty which presents itself to the Commissioner arises from the fact that in the present case the workman was attended, and regularly attended, by the qualified medical practitioner whose services were offered to him by the employer free of charge and the question of law referred to us is stated as follows :

In S. 11, Sub-S. (6) do the words "If it is thereafter proved that the workman has not been regularly attended by a qualified practitioner" include attendance by the medical practitioner provided by the employer whose instructions he has disregarded, or should they be construed as if they read "by another medical practitioner?" How should these words be applied to the case before me?

It is to be observed that sub-S. (6) has been enacted in the interest of the employer. It deals with the case where an injury has been received and where the injury has afterwards been aggravated by a refusal of medical attention offered to the applicant by the employer or by disregard of the instructions of the medical practitioner whose services had been so offered to the applicant by the employer. The sub-section is very carelessly drafted, but the words with which the present case is chiefly concerned :

If it is thereafter proved that the workman has not been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner, have a clear and reasonable purpose. To take first the case where the workman has refused to be attended by the employer's doctor. These words operate to prevent the workman suffering prejudice from this refusal if he has been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner, that is, ex hypothesi, by some qualified medical practitioner other than the employer's doctor. Coming then to the second case, where the workman having accepted the services of the employer's doctor "had deliberately disregarded the instructions of such medical practitioner. The words in question operate to prevent any prejudice resulting under this sub-section to the workman's claim for compensation if the workman has put himself in the hands of some other doctor. In that case disregard of the instructions given by the employer's doctor will not have the result of prejudicing the workman's claim for compensation.

It seems to me to be quite impossible that these words :

If it is thereafter proved that the workman has not been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner should apply to the case of regular attendance by the employer's doctor whose instructions have been disregarded. If therefore in the present case the Commissioner is of opinion that the workman acted unreasonably in the circumstances of the case in removing the bandages from his hand and that his injury has been aggravated thereby, then the concluding words of the sub-section must take effect and the workman's claim for compensation must be assessed upon the basis of an injury of the same nature and duration as might reasonably have been expected if the workman had been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner.

It is possible to suggest that the words in question were intended to apply only to the case of a refusal by the workman to be attended by the employer's doctor. The concluding words of the sub-section give some slight foundation to this contention; but I am not of opinion that such a construction is not permissible as it would involve doing considerable violence to the language actually employed by the legislature.

A case might arise in which the workman had refused to be attended by the employer's doctor acting as such, but had engaged the same doctor on his own account. This case may be unlikely, but in view of possibilities of this character I hesitate to go beyond the necessities of the present case to say that for all purposes the phrase "that the workman has not been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner" should be construed as if it read "by another qualified medical practitioner." For the purposes, however, of the present case, and cases of the same character, that is necessarily the meaning of the phrase. The question referred to us for our decision is thus answered. There will be no order as to costs.

Provisions of S. 533, Calcutta Municipal Act, must be taken to be subject to the provisions of S. 200 (b), Criminal P. C., and a Municipal Magistrate is bound to examine the complainant before recording conviction of a person under S. 291 (2), Calcutta Municipal Act.

C. C. Ghose, J.—The facts involved in this case are as follows: In this case a Water-works Sub-Inspector of the Corporation of Calcutta complained on 5th December 1927 before the Municipal Magistrate of Calcutta against the petitioner for having executed certain works in connexion with filtered water supply in his premises with extension and addition of fittings and pipes by a person other than a licensed plumber from premises No. 1/1A, Puddopukur Square in Kinderpore. The complainant stated in his petition of complaint that notice had been served on 22nd September 1927, but that the said notice had not been complied with by the accused. On that petition of complaint being filed, summons was issued under the provisions of S. 271 (2) read with S. 488, Calcutta Municipal Act of 1923. The summons was served on 2nd February 1928, on one Purna Chandra Das, who, we are informed, is a son of the accused. It appears that the case itself was fixed for hearing on 2nd February. One Jatindra Nath Das, agent of the accused, appeared in Court on that date, but the opposite party, namely, the prosecuting officer, was absent. The case was then adjourned on 9th February 1928. What happened on 9th February appears from the endorsement on the form used for making complaints which is as follows: "Jatindra Nath Das, agent, admits. Accused fined Rs. 20 under S. 291 (2)."

On behalf of the petitioner it has been argued before us that there could not have been any conviction upon the admission of the agent of the accused. Now, prosecutions under the Municipal Act are of a quasi criminal nature and it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case, as will appear later on, to decide whether the conviction of an accused under the Municipal Act can or cannot be legally based upon the admission of the agent of the accused. We are satisfied

however, that beyond the written complaint of the Water-works Sub-Inspector (leaving aside for the moment the question of the admission of the agent of the accused) there was nothing else before the learned Municipal Magistrate which would have justified him in convicting the accused under S. 291 (2). The Municipal Magistrate of Calcutta is a Presidency Magistrate and in cases of complaints to him, he is as Presidency Magistrate required to examine the complainant subject to the provisions of S. 200 (b), Criminal P. C. It does not appear from the record whether the complainant was ever examined by the Magistrate. It is true that under the Calcutta Municipal Act (See S. 533) if the accused had not appeared in person and had not sent an authorized agent, it would have been open to the Magistrate to decide the case ex parte, but that provision must be taken to be subject to the provisions of S. 200 (b), Criminal P. C. As indicated above, the last mentioned section has not been complied with and in the circumstances of this case we think it would be safer, having regard to what has happened, to set aside the conviction and sentence and direct that the complaint of the Water-works Sub-Inspector against the accused be enquired into afresh in accordance with law.

The record will be sent down immediately and the Magistrate is requested to see that the case against the accused is disposed of as quickly as possible. It must be clearly understood that it is not necessary for the Water-works Sub-Inspector to institute a fresh complaint. But what is necessary to be done is that the complaint of the Water-works Sub-Inspector, which is already on the record, should be enquired into afresh in accordance with law. The fine, if paid, will be refunded.

Criminal Revn. No. 1121 of 1927, Decided on 31st January 1928, from order of acquittal of Dy. Magistrate, Howrah, D/- 27th August 1927.

Bengal General Clauses Act (1 of 1899), S. 25—Prosecution of a person within the Howrah Municipal area under Ss. 466 and 574, Calcutta Municipal Act of 1899, which had been extended to Howrah under a Government notification—Acquittal on the ground that the Act was repealed and no notification had been issued extending any part of the new Act to Howrah—Acquittal opposed on the ground that prosecution was competent under S. 25, General Clauses Act—Acquittal was held to be proper as any prosecution founded upon the notification must be under the new Act.

A person, who was charged in respect of an offence under Ss. 466 (d) and 574, Calcutta Municipal Act (Act 3 of 1899), was acquitted on a preliminary objection that the prosecution did not lie, inasmuch as, though the provisions of Ss. 466 and 574 of the Act in question had been extended to Howrah by a notification under Act 3 of 1899, that Act had been repealed and re-enacted by the Calcutta Municipal Act (Act 3 of 1923), and no fresh notification had been issued extending any part of the new Act to Howrah. It was contended on behalf of the opposite party that though the Act of 1899 had been repealed, a prosecution under it was competent by virtue of provisions of S. 25, Bengal General Clauses Act (1 of 1899).

Held: that the provisions of S. 25, Bengal General Clauses Act indicated that the notification is attracted to the provisions so re-enacted, and that any prosecution founded upon it must be under the new Act. Therefore prosecution under the old Act was not competent.

Judgment.—This rule was granted against the order of acquittal under S. 245, Criminal P. C., passed by the Deputy Magistrate of Howrah. On 27th August 1927, a complaint was made under the orders of the Chairman of the Howrah Municipality against the Manager of Messrs. Tar Mahomed and Company for using, or permitting to be used, certain premises for the purpose of storing molasses without obtaining a license. The charge was in respect of an offence under Ss. 466 (d), 574, Municipal Act (Act 3 of 1899), and the prosecution was under that Act. The order of acquittal was made on a preliminary objection taken and upheld, that the prosecution did not lie, inasmuch as, though the provisions of Ss. 466, and 574 of the Act in question had been extended to Howrah by a notification under Act 3 of 1899, that Act had been repealed and re-enacted by the Calcutta Municipal Act (Act 3 of 1923), and no fresh notification had been issued ex-

It is contended on behalf of the petitioner that though the Act of 1899 has been repealed, a prosecution under it is competent by virtue of the provisions of S. 25, Bengal General Clauses Act (1 of 1899). S. 25 runs as follows:

When any enactment is, after the commencement of this Act, repealed and re-enacted by a Bengal Act with or without modification, then, unless it is otherwise expressly provided, any order, scheme, rule, bye-law, notification, or form issued under the repealed enactment, shall, so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted, continue in force, and be deemed to have been issued under the provisions so re-enacted, unless and until it is superseded by any order, scheme, rule, bye-law, notification, or form issued under the provisions so re-enacted.

The question, therefore, is whether this section in the notification can serve to support the prosecution under the repealed Act.

It is not contended for the opposite party that a prosecution does not lie, but a prosecution—it is said, must be under the new Act. In support of this view it is urged that the provisions of S. 466 of the repealed Act, and those of S. 386 of the new Act, are not consistent; also that the punishments provided by the two Acts are not the same.

Under the repealed Act a trading license had to be obtained from the Chairman who had vested in him the sole right to grant it, but a reference to the two Acts will show that the constitution of the Corporation has been entirely altered by the Act of 1923. The Chairman is not now vested with any power to grant the licenses. This right devolves now upon the Corporation, so that, as a matter of fact, at the present time, a literal compliance with old S. 466 would not be possible. But apart from this particular difference in the two Acts, the provisions of S. 25, Bengal General Clauses Act, that a notification which is consistent with the re-enacted provisions, and which has not been superseded, shall continue in force, and be deemed to have been issued under the re-enacted provisions, indicate that the notification is attracted to the provisions so re-enacted, and that any prosecution founded upon it must be under the new Act. This is the finding of the learned Magistrate and in our opinion it is correct.

In this view of the matter we think the prosecution in this case under the repealed Act was misconceived, and the rule must accordingly be discharged.

Chairman of the Dacca Dist. Board—Plaintiff—Respondent.

Appeals Nos. 767 to 770 of 1924, Decided on 13th July 1926, from appellate decrees of 5th Sub-Judge, Dacca, D/- 21st November 1923.

(a) Limitation Act, Art. 146-A—“Road” used in Art. 146-A includes the portion which is used as road as also the lands kept on two sides as parts of the road for the purpose of the road.

The expression “road” or “highway” has been considered in many cases in England and it seems that the interpretation put there is not confined to the portion actually used by the public but it extends also to side lands. A too narrow meaning cannot be put on the expression “public street” or “road” in Art. 146-A, as it is intended to safeguard the interest of public bodies which are not expected to be as vigilant over their rights as private individuals. “Road” in that article includes the portion which is used as road as also the lands kept on two sides as parts of the road for the purposes of the road: Rez v. Robert Wright, (1832) 3 B. & A. 681 and Turner v. Ringwood Highway Board, (1870) 9 Eq. Cas. 418, Ref. [P 487 C 1]

(b) Limitation Act, S. 22—S. 22 applies to cases where a new plaintiff has been introduced and not to cases where there is only an amendment with regard to the description of the plaintiff.

Section 22 has been held to apply to cases where new plaintiff has been introduced and is not applicable to cases where there is only an amendment with regard to the description of the plaintiff. [P 487 C 1]

* (c) Evidence Act, S. 114—Failure of a District Board to prove the actual acquisition and possession and the actual delivery of certain land to it by the Government—Intention of the Government to acquire the land and its taking some necessary steps in pursuance thereof proved—It was held to be not wrong to presume that necessary steps for the acquisition of the land and for the transfer of the same to the public body were taken.

On 10th February 1879 a declaration was made by the Government (Ex. 19) proposing the acquisition of lands including the lands in suit under the law. A chitta was prepared and a map was also prepared. The District Board's case was that the Government acquired the land about which the declaration was made and made it over to the District Board for the purpose of making the road. The Board failed to prove the actual acquisition and delivery of possession by the Government to it. The facts proved were that the Government expressed its intention to acquire the land, that some necessary steps were taken in pursuance of that resolution and years after, that land was found in the possession of a public body.

Held: that in these circumstances a Court of fact could not be said to be wrong in presuming that all the necessary steps for the acquisition of the land and for the transfer of the same to the public body were taken. [P 497 C 2]

Prakash Ch. Pakrashri and Satindra Nath Khasnobis for Nil Kanta Ghose—for Appellants.

Nares Ch. Sen Gupta and Asita Ranjan Ghose—for Respondent.

Suhrawardy, J.—The suits out of which these appeals have been brought were instituted by the District Board of Dacca to eject the defendant-appellants from the lands in suit on the ground that the lands belonged to the District Board as part of a public road from Danga to Kaliganj and that the defendants had trespassed into and encroached upon them. Both the Courts below decreed the plaintiff's suits. Out of the five suits instituted which were heard together, one was partially decreed and there is no appeal before us arising from it.

The first question that has been argued on behalf of the appellants is whether Art. 146-A, Lim Act, applies to these cases. The defendants claimed title to these lands, firstly, on the ground that they belonged to their taluks and tenancies. It has been found by both the Courts that the defendants have failed to prove this. In the alternative they claimed title to the lands on the ground of adverse possession against the plaintiff. With regard to three out of the four suits from which these appeals arise the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge in the lower appellate Court is that no question of adverse possession arises, the huts having been built or other acts of possession exercised over those lands within 12 years of the institution of the suits. In Suit No 1074, it was tried to prove that formerly there were houses of prostitutes by the side of the road including the disputed lands. One of the defence witnesses said that the tatties were put up about 30 years ago. He was examined two years after the institution of the suit. The learned Subordinate Judge accordingly observes that even if this evidence be true, the defendant's adverse possession would extend only to 28 years. He has accordingly applied Art. 146-A and held that as the defendants have failed to prove possession for 30 years the plaintiff's right in the land has not been extinguished. The learned Subordinate Judge does not accept the witness's statement to be true, but for the purpose of the application of the law he assumes it to be so. If the appellants succeed in showing that Art. 146-A does not apply, it should necessitate a remand for the determination of the question of limitation in Suit No. 1074. The plaintiff's case is that the lands in suit together with the lands forming the actual pathway were acquired for the purpose of building a road. That road was built; but the side lands which are the lands in suit were kept fallow for the purpose of mending the road by taking earth from them to make necessary repairs. It is accordingly argued on behalf of the appellants that the lands in suit cannot be said to be

"public street or road or any part thereof" within the meaning of Art. 146-A. On the other hand it is argued on behalf of the respondent that "road" is not limited to the portion actually used by passers by, but includes such land as might be necessary to make a public thoroughfare and so is a part of the street in actual use. The word "road" has not been defined in any of the Acts. The definition of "street" in the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1922, is extremely meagre and does not help us one way or the other. The term, however, has been defined in S. 4, Bengal Village Self-Government Act of 1919, where it is said to mean any road, street or passage, whether a thoroughfare or not, over which the public have a right of way.

The evidence in the case which has been accepted by both the Courts below is that the lands in suit together with the land over which the main thoroughfare runs were acquired by the Government sometime ago and made over to the District Board for making the road. The District Board made the road leaving portions of the land on both sides of the road for the purpose of repairing it. It can, therefore, be said that the lands in suit were lands used for the purposes of the road; and it may further be assumed that if necessity arises in future these lands may be utilized for the purpose of widening the road. The expression "road" or "highway" has been considered in many cases in England and it seems that the interpretation put there is not confined to the portion actually used by the public but it extends also to the side lands. See the cases of Re v. Robert Wright (1) and Turner v. Ringwood Highway Board (2). I am not prepared to put a too narrow meaning on the expression "public street" or "road" in Art. 146-A, as it is intended to safeguard the interest of public bodies which are not expected to be as vigilant over their rights as private individuals. I am of opinion that "road" in that article includes the portion which is used as road as also the lands kept on two sides as parts of the road for the purposes of the road. I accordingly hold that Art. 146-A applies and on the finding of the learned Judge Suit No. 1074 is not barred by limitation.

In connexion with this matter an objection is taken with regard to the amendment of the plaint. It appears that the plaint was filed on 15th September 1921. At the time of the hearing of the argument by the first Court objection was taken that the plaintiff was wrongly described, the plaintiff in the plaint having been described as Chairman of the District Board of Dacca, whereas under S. 20, Bengal Local Self-Government Act (3 of 1885), the District Board is a corporate body and is entitled to sue in its own name. The Munsif disallowed the objection at that late stage but the Subordinate Judge on the objection of the appellants allowed the amendment of the plaint in the appellate Court. It is argued that limitation should be counted from the date of the amendment and not from the date of the institution of the suit. I do not think that this objection ought to prevail. The amendment was made under O. 1, R. 10 subject to the law of limitation as contained in S. 22, Lim. Act. S. 22 has been held to apply to cases where a new plaintiff has been introduced and is not applicable in cases where there is only an amendment with regard to the description of the plaintiff. In the present case the real plaintiff has all along been the District Board. The amendment, therefore, does not introduce a new plaintiff. This objection is raised in Suit No. 1074 where, it may be said, that the time of the amendment according to the evidence of the defence witness referred to above, the defendants were in possession for 30 years. It is also argued that some schedules were also amended by changing the boundaries. What happened was that after the institution of the suit, a Commissioner was appointed by Court to hold a local inspection and prepare a map. In the plaint lands were not properly described and after the submission of the report by the Commissioner the plaintiff applied for certain alteration in the description of the lands. This, in my opinion, does not mean an inclusion of land which was not the subject-matter of the suits instituted. These and a few other objections were also taken which were not raised in the lower appellate Court and we are not, therefore, inclined to hear them; but as they have been pressed on our attention we have given our opinion with regard to some of them.

The last and the most important question is with regard to the title of the plaintiff. It is argued that there was no sufficient evidence of plaintiff's title as has been admitted by the Court below and therefore the plaintiff's suit must be dismissed. The facts proved and the findings come to are these: On 10th February 1879, a declaration was made by the Government (Ex. 19) proposing the acquisition of lands including the lands in suit under the law. A chitta was prepared dated 22nd January 1880, and a map was also prepared on 5th April 1880. It is the plaintiff's case that the Government acquired the land about which the declaration was made and made it over to the District Board for the purpose of making the road. The plaintiff has failed to prove the actual acquisition and possession by the Government. It has also failed to prove the actual delivery of the land by the Government to it. The facts proved are that the Government expressed its intention to acquire the land, that some necessary steps were taken in pursuance of that resolution and that years after that land was found in the possession of a public body (the plaintiff). In these circumstances a Court of fact cannot be said to be wrong in presuming that all the necessary steps for the acquisition of the land and for the transfer of the same to the public body were taken. The learned Subordinate Judge has relieupon these facts as well as upon the evidence of some witnesses for the defendants about the Government paying compensation for the lands acquired. He also relied upon the evidence of one Madhu Saha who admitted that the Government had acquired the lands; and we cannot say that he was wrong in relying upon the evidence of that witness though he was a witness in the case from which there is no appeal taken before us but was tried along with the present suits. It is also to be noted, as has been observed by the lower appellate Court, that the appellants in the present cases did not question the fact of the acquisition of the land by the Government; but their main objection was that the lands in suit were not the acquired lands. With reference to this question, the learned Subordinate Judge held that in the absence of anything to the contrary the lands in suit were the acquired lands. The position was that the defendants claimed the lands to be parts of their taluks and tenancies and failed to prove it. The plaintiff claimed the lands as acquired by the Government under the declaration of 1879. The Court Commissioner relaid the map prepared in 1880 and found that the lands in suit were included with the land to which the declaration related. On these facts the Court below has held that the plaintiff has succeeded in proving title to the lands in suit, and we cannot say that his conclusion is wrong.

The result is that all the grounds taken by the appellants fail and the appeals are dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—The suit out of which this appeal arises was one for a declaration that defendant 1 had no right of easement to draw water from the plaintiffs' tank Kalipuskarini by excavating any irrigation pit either on the bank or in the bed of that tank for the purpose of irrigating his land and also for a declaration that the solenama filed in a criminal Court between defendant 1 and the plaintiffs' cosharer, defendant 2 was not binding on the plaintiffs. The first Court decreed the suit in part. It declared that defendant 1 had no right to irrigate his land with the water of Kalipuskarini by digging any pit in the bed or on the banks of the tank. The first Court declared also that defendant 1 had a right to irrigate his land with the water that accumulates upon the southern bank of the tank and which water is drawn through the pahura lying partly in the defendant's land and partly in the southern bank of the tank. The trial Court also held that the solenama was not binding on the plaintiffs. On appeal by defendant 1 the lower appellate Court affirmed the decision of the trial Judge so far as it related to the solenama and the right of defendant 1 to irrigate his land by digging pits in the bed and on the banks of the tank. But the lower appellate Court expunged the order of the trial Judge so far as it related to the right of defendant 1 to irrigate his land with the water that accumulates on the southern bank of the tank and which is drawn through the pahura mentioned above. Defendant 1 has appealed to this Court.

The principal point taken before me on behalf of the appellant is that the lower appellate Court was not justified in expunging the order of the trial Court so far as it related to the right of defendant 1 to irrigate his land with the water drawn through the pahura, because the learned vakil contended that amounted to taking away from the appellant something which the appellant had got in the first Court although there was no cross-objection filed in the lower appellate Court. It was urged that this was not proper and in support of this argument the learned vakil placed reliance on the case of Gangadhar Muradi v. Barabashi Palihari (1). In answer to this contention the learned advocate for the respondent has drawn my attention to the provisions of O. 41, R. 33, Civil P. C. as also to the observation made by their Lordships in Gangadhar Muradi v. Barabashi (1) where it has been laid down that although the language of R. 33, O. 41, Civil P. C. is widely expressed, ordinarily the exercise of the power conferred thereby should be limited to cases where, as the result of the appellate Court's interference in favour of the appellants, further interference is required to adjust the rights of the parties in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience. The contention of the learned advocate for the respondent was that having regard to the circumstances of the case the lower appellate Court was justified in expunging the order of the first Court on principles of justice equity and good conscience. This contention seems to me to be reasonable. The first Court's order on the point was that defendant 1 would have a right to irrigate his land with the water that accumulates on the southern bank of the tank and which is drawn through the pahura lying partly in the defendant's land and partly on the southern bank of the tank. But this point had never been specifically raised in the plaint in the case. It was not one of the points that were given to the commissioner for a local investigation and it was not one of the points on which any distinct issue was joined. This point which involved investigation of facts appears to have been raised only at the time of the trial, and that being so, I am of opinion that on the principles of justice, equity and good conscience the lower appellate Court was justified in expunging the order of the trial Judge on a point that had never been specifically raised for determination.

Another point that was taken before me on behalf of the appellant was that the lower appellate Court was wrong in law in reversing the finding of the first Court without consideration of all the facts and circumstances of the case. The only point on which the lower appellate Court seems to have come to a different conclusion is as to whether the solenama in question had been extorted by undue influence. The finding of the trial Judge on this point was that no undue influence had been exercised which the lower appellate Court found that it was a result of undue influence. But whether there was undue influence or not was not very material in the determination of the question which the Courts below had before them in connexion with the solenama. The point that was before them for determination in connexion with the solenama was whether the document was binding on the plaintiffs and both the Courts below concurrently found that it was not binding inasmuch as the plaintiffs were not a party to it. Then even if it be held that the existence or otherwise of undue influence was material in the case it cannot be said that the lower appellate Court came to a different conclusion on the point without consideration of all the facts and circumstances of the case. As the perusal of the judgment of the lower appellate Court will show the learned Subordinate Judge before he came to his conclusion that the solenama had been extorted by undue influence had taken into his consideration not only the facts but also the evidence and the probabilities of the case.

I see no sufficient reason for interfering with the decree made 'by the lower appellate Court. The appeal is, accordingly, dismissed with costs. I do not consider the case a fit one for a Letters Patent Appeal. The application for a certificate for such an appeal is refused.

Civil P. C., O. 1, R. 6—Parallel contract for the carriage of the same goods and for the same journey with different carriers—All should be made parties to the suit for the recovery of compensation—Contract Act, S. 91.

Where there are two parallel contracts for the carriage of the same goods and for the same journey with different carriers, a suit for recovery of compensation for the shortage of delivery cannot be proceeded with unless all the carriers are made parties and the plaintiff cannot recover from one carrier when he has been able to produce a clear receipt of the goods from the other. 47 Cal. 6; A.I.R. 1927 Cal. 394; Ref. [P 491 C 1]

Hemendra Kumar Das—for Petitioners.Amulya Charan Chatterjee and Prokas Chandra Pakrasi—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—This rule relates to a suit for recovery of Rs. 78-1 on account of compensation. The plaintiffs' case was that a consignment of 10 bags of T. B. Nuts was dispatched to them from the Hajigungeghat Steamer Station to Dibrugarh Bazar Station on the Dibru Sadia Railway, that of this consignment only nine bags were delivered to them, and that one bag containing one maund 22½ seers was not delivered and 27 seers out of five amongst the nine bags that were delivered were short. The suit was tried by the Court of Small Causes at Dibrugarh and the Munsif dismissed it. The plaintiffs then moved this Court and obtained the present rule.

The defendants in the suit are the River Steam Navigation Co Ltd. and the Indian General Navigation and Railway Co., Ltd., carrying on the joint steamer service through which the goods were dispatched. In carrying the goods to their destination the last part of the journey had to be made by rail, the place of destination being a station on the Dibru Sadia Railway. The defendants produced a "clear receipt" from the Railway Company which was marked Ex. B. The Munsif dismissed the suit holding that the defendant companies are protected from liability by reason of this receipt, and as the Railway Company had not been impleaded in the suit the plaintiffs can have no remedy.

The Forwarding Note and the Bill of Lading show but one contract to carry the goods from Hajigungeghat to Dibrugarh Bazar. If this was the only contract between the parties it is clear that the learned Munsif's decision is wrong in view of the decisions in the cases of Dekhan Tea Co. v. Assam, Bengal Railway Co. (1), and India General Navigation Railway Co. v. Giridharilal Gobardhone Das (2).

The opposite party while conceding that this must be so have endeavoured to support the dismissal of the suit upon other grounds which are many and varied. The whole of the arguments addressed to me on both sides, which I may say in passing extended over several hours, proceeded upon an assumption that a risk-note in form A, which is on the record has not been proved in the case. On behalf of the opposite party it was argued that though the risk-note is not in evidence the reference to it in the Bill of Lading and the Forwarding Note which are in evidence, coupled with the conduct of the plaintiffs in demanding of the Railway Company compensation for the loss, is sufficient to lead to an inference that the plaintiffs were aware that a part of the journey was to be performed by rail; and so the defendants' liability was at an end when they have proved the "clear receipt" Ex. B. Reliance was also placed on their behalf on condition No. II on the back of the Forwarding Note. It is much to be regretted that the learned advocates for the parties laboured under such a gross misapprehension though it must be said in fairness to them that it is the arrangement of the papers on the record that is to a certain extent responsible for this misapprehension. On a perusal of the records after the arguments were over I find that in point of fact the risk-note in question has been duly proved in the case by certain witnesses examined on commission. It has been proved to refer to this particular consignment and to have been executed by the senders Bansidhar Bajranglal in favour of the Eastern Bengal Railway in respect of the carriage of the goods from Hajigungeghat Station to the Dibrugarh Bazar Station. This risk-note suggests that the Steamer Companies were acting as agents for the Eastern Bengal Railway; in any event there were two parallel contracts for the carriage of the same goods and for the same journey. Whether the risk-note is sufficient in the present case to absolve the Railway Company or not is a question that need not be enquired into. It is sufficient to say that the suit could not under such circumstances be proceeded with in the absence of the Railway Company and that the plaintiffs cannot possibly recover from the Steamer Companies when they have been able to produce a clear receipt of the goods from the other.

Amarendra Nath Bose and Ambikapada Choudhuri—for Appellants.

Herambar Chandra Guha and Kiran Mohan Sircar—for Respondent.

Mukerji, J—This appeal has arisen out of a suit in which the plaintiffs Shew Bux Roy Ghaneshyamdas claimed damages for non-delivery of 17 tins of ghee out of a consignment of 104 tins dispatched from Daltongunge by Luchmi Narain Mahadeo Lal on 4th February 1922 to be delivered to the plaintiffs at Barakar. The consignment was covered by a risk-note in Form B. The trial Court dismissed the suit. That decision was reversed and the suit was decreed in favour of the plaintiffs by the Subordinate Judge on appeal. The defendant the E. I. Ry. Co. and the Secretary of State for India in Council have preferred this appeal.

The facts as found by the trial Court and as far as they are necessary to be stated are these: A general strike of the railway servants, mostly menials, commenced on 15th February and work on the line was at a dead-stop. The van containing the consignment arrived at Dhanbad on 12th February and was left in charge of a choukidar at the goods yard to be taken along with other vans to the goods shed. The goods yard is about three miles off the goods shed. The van was next noticed at the goods shed on 16th February the door being ajar and the seal broken. The contents being examined 11 tins were found missing. The door was then sealed, but on 18th February the door was again found open and 6 more tins were found short. During all this time the work of the railway was in a paralyzed state on account of the general strike. These findings of fact have not been reversed by the Subordinate Judge. The Subordinate Judge, however, has recorded two findings on which he has rested his decision. They are that the 17 tins of ghee were looted by the strikers at Dhanbad partly on 16th and partly on 18th February, that the strike was an unforeseen event and, therefore, by reason of the proviso mentioned in the risk-note was not within the meaning of the words "wilful neglect," as mentioned in the exception provided by the risk-note. I confess I find it somewhat difficult to follow what the learned Subordinate Judge meant when from these two findings he concluded as follows: "So the defendants are liable, if there has been theft by railway servants." Reading his judgment as a whole, however, it seems to me fairly plain that he has proceeded on the view that the defendants are not protected by the risk-note as the case comes within the exception mentioned in it, and because the tins were stolen or looted by the servants of the railway, the defendants are liable.

The decision of the learned Subordinate Judge has been challenged before us upon several grounds, some of which may be disposed of quite soon. It has been argued that his finding that the tins were looted by railway servants is unsupportable as an inference deducible from the materials that are on the record or the facts that have been found. This argument I may say is not altogether without substance, and were I asked to come to my own conclusion on the point I would perhaps find it extremely difficult to arrive at the same conclusion as the learned Subordinate Judge. On a second appeal, however, we are in quite a different position, as it is not possible for us to say that the finding is based on no materials. It has also been argued that the strikers cannot be regarded as servants of the railway and in support of this position reliance has been placed upon the case of G. I. P. Ry. Co. v. Gurdayal Badaridas (1). With all respect to the learned Judges of the Patna High Court who decided that case I am unable to agree in all that has been said therein. I am of opinion that the mere proclamation of a strike does not terminate the relationship of master and servant and make the servant lose his character as a servant. There may of course be additional circumstances consequent on a strike which may determine that relationship. "Strike" as pointed out by Lord James of Hereford in Denaby and Cadeby Main Collieries Ltd. v. Yorkshire Miners Association (2), is a word of an artificial character, and does not represent any legal definition or description. It is an agreement between persons who are working for a particular employer not to continue working for him (per Kay, Lord Justice, in Lyons and Sons v. Wilkins (3)). Cessation of work does not necessarily mean termination of the relationship as master and servant, but other circumstances attendant or concomitant are necessary to put an end to that relationship. When we come to examine the circumstances we see that the findings of the Subordinate Judge are that the strikers were living in the railway quarters, they had not given up their appointments, but were pressing for higher wages and that they had not in fact been discharged, but notices had been served on them to resume work failing which they were to be discharged. Between strikers such as these and the Railway Administration the relationship had not terminated, though after one has struck work, it may be important to consider, whether one can be regarded as acting in the course or within the scope of his employment a question which might arise in cases of this description.

The more important argument of the appellants relate to the nature of the contract embodied in the risk-note and the view of the defendants' liability that has been taken by the Subordinate Judge. The appellants contend that the Subordinate Judge, while he is right in holding that the defendants are not protected by the risk-note, as the case comes within the exception mentioned therein, was in error in supposing that the railway servants looted the goods is sufficient to charge the defendants with liability. The respondents on the other hand contend that the risk-note embodies a special contract which must be taken as entirely regulating the transaction and solely determining the rights and liabilities of the parties and that once the case is found to come within the exception, by the terms of this special contract itself the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. These rival contentions will now have to be considered.

In view of the facts found the risk-note would read thus :

Whereas the consignment is charged at a special reduced rate we in consideration of such lower charge agree and undertake to hold the Railway Administration harmless and free from all responsibility for any loss, etc., from any cause whatsoever except for the loss of a complete consignment or of one or more complete packages forming part of a consignment due to theft by its servants.

Reading the risk-note as carefully as one would, one will find nothing in it beyond a contract absolving the Railway Administration in all cases excepting a few cases specified. There are no words indicating that with regard to the cases so excepted the risk-note itself, apart from the general law, creates a liability or that when a case comes within the exception the rights and liabilities of the parties such as they are under the general law are to be regarded as in any way limited, extended or qualified by the risk-note. In support of the position that the respondents contend for reliance is placed upon a series of cases, to wit : Sheotarat Ram v. B. N. W. Ry. Co. (4), E. I. Ry. Co. v. Nil Kanta Roy (5), E. I. Ry. Co. v. Kanak Behari Halder (6) ; E. I. Ry. Co. v. Nathmal Behari Lal (7) ; E. I. Ry. Co. v. Sriram (8). All these cases deal with the question of onus which arises in matters of this description ; but the use that the respondents desire to make of them is that the decisions suggest that once a case comes within the exception nothing else need be investigated and by the terms of the risk-note itself the Railway Administration becomes liable. I am unable to agree with this contention and I do not see that these decisions lay down any such proposition. In only one amongst these decisions namely the case of Sheobarat Ram v. B. N. W. Ry. Co. (4), there is a passage which may perhaps be read as suggesting what the respondents contend for, but I have no doubt that that suggestion was never intended. To agree with the respondents' contention would be to hold that while the risk-note in consideration of a lower charge limits the liability of the Railway Administration to only those cases which may come within the exception in the risk-note, it again extends or enhances the liability of the Railway Administration in respect of those cases by taking them out of the general law.

This view would militate against the provision of S. 72, sub-S. (2), Railways Act 9 of 1890 to which statutory provision risk-notes owe their origin and in which it is said " An agreement purporting to limit that responsibility " etc, etc.. Moreover it is exceedingly doubtful whether it is permissible for a Railway Administration to extend or enhance their liability under the general law as embodied in S. 72 of the Act by means of a special contract. That question, however, need not be discussed as no such enhancement or extension was, in my opinion, ever intended by the risk-note. The respondents' contention in this respect, as far as I am aware, is an unusual one, and while there are numerous authorities which have laid down that the special contract is a limitation of the liability of the Railway Administration there is scarcely any in which it has been held that such a contract in respect of the excepted cases enhances their liability. A contention somewhat though not quite similar appears to have been advanced before the Madras High Court in the case of M. & S. M. Ry. Co. v. Subba Rao (9) and dealing with it Oldfield, J., observed :

It is next material that in the present case the contract embodied in the risk-note (it was risk-note in Form B in that case) was made in consideration of the railway's acceptance of a reduced charge, and it therefore cannot be regarded as intended to increase its responsibility.

The intention to increase the responsibility of the Railway Administration is in my opinion one not only not consistent with but repugnant to the terms of the risk-note. The respondent then contends that the railway servants having committed theft in respect of the goods, nothing else need be considered but that the Railway Administration are liable. I am unable to agree with this contention also. Once the risk-note is out of the way as a contract by which they were absolved their liabilities will have to be determined by the provisions of the Act, S. 72 of which lays down the measure of the general responsibility of a Railway Administration as a carrier of animals or goods. Sub-S. (3), S. 72, bars the application of the common law of England or the Carriers Act of 1865, and under sub-S. (1) the measure of the responsibility is the criterion laid down in Ss. 151, 152 and 162, Contract Act, subject to the other provisions of the Railways Act itself. Under the common law of England if goods are lost by reason of the criminal act of a servant, it being impossible to regard the criminal act to have been done within the scope of the servants' employment, the bailee is not responsible. In Sanderson v. Collins (10), which was the case of an accident due to negligence on the part of a servant who was driving for his own purposes a carriage sent by its owner to a coach-repairer it was held that where it is found that servant was not acting in the course of his employment the master was not liable, and Collins, M. R., in expounding the law on the point, observed :

Burglary is perhaps an extreme instance of something not done under any mandate from the master, but any other act outside the scope of the authority given by him would equally relieve the master. If the servant in doing any act breaks the connexion of service between himself and his master the act done under those circumstances is not that of the master.

In the case of Cheshire v. Bailey (11), the Master of the Rolls said :

He, the bailee, may perform that duty by servants or personally, and if he employs servants, he is as much responsible for all acts done by them within the scope of their employment as he is for his own. But he is not an insurer, and is not answerable for acts done by his servants outside the scope of their employment. He is not responsible for the consequences of the crime committed by the driver in this case, which was clearly outside the scope of his employment, unless it can be shown that the happening of the crime was due to the defendants' negligence. It is a crime committed by a person who in committing it severed his connexion with his master and became a stranger ; and, as the circumstances under which it was committed are known, it raises no presumption of negligence in the defendant. He took reasonable care to perform his duty in that he sent out a servant whom he reasonably supposed to be trustworthy to drive the brougham and watch its contents in the traveller's absence and he was not bound to do more. That an ordinary contract of bailment of this class does not involve a warranty that the servant shall not turn thief and so cease to exhibit reasonable care, where the master has devolved the duty of custody on the servant is clear from the fact that no class of bailees except common carriers and innkeepers are now at common law deemed responsible for the theft of their servants, unless such theft was attributable to the negligence of the master.

This immunity rests on the combination of two well-established factors. (a) that such bailees are only bound to ordinary care ; (b) that qua-masters they are not responsible for acts done by their servants outside the scope of their employment. It is not necessary to refer to the authorities in detail in support of these propositions. They will be found collected in Coggs v. Bernard (12), and the notes thereto in Smith's Leading Cases. In the case of Joseph Rank, Ltd. v. Craig (13) Swinfen Eady, Master of the Rolls, clearly explained that where the true character of the act of a servant is that it is an act of his own, deliberately done of his own choice and done to effect a purpose of his own the master is not liable. This view as regards the liability of a master for criminal acts done by his servants is well settled. If, however, the criminal act is facilitated by the negligence of the master the master is liable. The liability in such cases rests on the master not really because his servant had committed the criminal act but because he himself has been negligent.

In respect of goods entrusted to a railway for carriage the question necessarily has to be determined upon the express terms of S. 72, Railways Act. The Subordinate Judge does not appear to have dealt with the matter from this point of view. The finding that the servants of the railway looted the tins is a finding of fact which should not be allowed to be re-opened; but it will have to be considered whether the Railway Administration was guilty of such negligence as facilitated the looting by its servants. There are findings in the judgment of the Munsif which might enable a Court to pronounce a judgment on this point, but the Subordinate Judge has not considered it necessary, erroneously as I hold, to go into this matter.

To be more precise and using the words of S. 151, Contract Act, he will have to find, whether the strike being regarded as an unforeseen event, the Railway Administration took as much care of the consignment or rather the lost part of the consignment as a man of ordinary prudence would, under similar circumstances, take of it. On the answer he finds himself able to give to this question will depend his ultimate decision of the case.

The appeal is allowed, the decree complained of set aside and the case remanded to the Court of the Subordinate Judge to rehear and dispose of it in the light of the observations made above.

Costs of this appeal will abide the result of the remand.

Judgment.—There is no dispute about the facts of these cases which are that the National Bank of India sells gold bars in the Calcutta markets bearing a stamp showing the name of the bank in English and Guzrati with the words “100 tough” in Guzrati and the names of the bullion brokers, whoever they may be, in English. On 10th and 19th March 1926, certain men employed by the bank bought on each occasion one gold bar from the shop of the petitioner Akshoy Kumar De and these bars bore the counterfeit mark of the National Bank upon them. Further, the police searched the petitioners’ shop on 22nd March and found several other gold bars bearing this mark and some dies for stamping the mark upon them. The defence taken was that the gold bars sold are composed of what is known in the market as bator gold and that the petitioners had sold bars of this make under this particular mark in the open market for years past. The learned Chief Presidency Magistrate found that, though it was true that the firm had been using the counterfeit mark for some time, they had not succeeded in establishing this defence or their further defence that other gold bars bore the same mark as the English gold bars of the National Bank, and he further found that, by their use of the counterfeit mark, the accused firm had the opportunity of deceiving others and that it was no answer to the charge to say that the counterfeit would not deceive an expert. He, therefore, held that the mark in question was the property of the National Bank used by them to distinguish their English gold and that the mark used by the accused firm was counterfeit. These findings have not been challenged before us.

It has, however, been argued before us, as it was argued in the Court below, that the prosecution is barred by S. 15, Merchandise Marks Act (4 of 1889).

This section is in the following terms :

No such prosecution as is mentioned in the last foregoing section shall be commenced after the expiration of three years next after the commission of the offence, or one year after the first discovery thereof by the prosecutor, whichever expiration first happens.

Sir Benod Mitter who has appeared for the petitioners contends that, as the Magistrate has found that the sale of gold bars under the counterfeit mark has continued for many years, the offence must have been known to the bank and, therefore, as the bank took no action within the statutory period a prosecution will not lie. He has relied upon the case of Ruppell v. Ponnusami Tevan (1), and the two cases decided by the lower Burma Chief Court, namely, the cases of Abdul Majid v. Emperor (2) and Mahomed Jawa v. H. S. Wilson (3). Mr. Basu for the Crown argues, on the other hand, that the offence specified in S. 15, Merchandise Marks Act, is the particular offence charged and that it makes no difference whether the original infringement took place two or five or ten years ago. He also says that the words "first discovery" mean when the complainant first discovered the offence and that he was to take action within one year from that time. The point is by no means free from difficulty; but we are on the whole satisfied that Mr. Basu's contention is correct. We think that the word "offence" means "the offence charged." If it had meant only the infringement of the trade-mark, we think that the section would have said so. The charge here is under S. 486, I. P. C., that is, for selling goods marked with a counterfeit trade-mark. The complainant first discovered that this offence took place on 10th March 1926 and he lodged his complaint within a month of that date. It has been contended that the bank must have known of the use of this counterfeit trade-mark long ago. But apart from the suggestion that their broker Jagannath must have known of it there is no evidence as neither he nor Krishna Lal of the other firm of brokers have been called as witnesses by the defence. On the other hand we have the definite denial by Mr. Collier the Accountant, that the bank knew anything about it. We think, therefore, that the first discovery, to use the words of the section, on the part of the bank did not take place before 10th March 1926 when Aratoon purchased a gold bar from the petitioners' shop.

Sir Binod Mitter has next contended that the petitioner Akhoy Kumar De personally has no connexion with the firm. We think it sufficient to say that when the firm bears his name and the books show payments of many sums to him and when moreover in his petition he describes himself as the proprietor of the firm, we consider that his connexion with the firm is well established.

Sir Benod next contends that the petitioner Nirode Baran Dutt cannot be held liable under this prosecution as all that he is said to have done was to have handed over one of the bars to the petitioner Gokul Chunder Sil and nothing more. But the evidence shows that he actively promoted the sale and was, in fact, as the learned Magistrate has found, the broker.

Sir Benod has finally urged that the order made by the learned Magistrate for the forfeiture of the gold bars found by the police in the shop which are stated to be worth about Rs. 4,000 is too severe. The learned Magistrate was no doubt competent under S. 9, Merchandise Marks Act, to make the order. But we do not think that, in the circumstances of this case, it was a necessary order. We think it will be sufficient, therefore, while setting aside the order of forfeiture, to direct that the bars be restored to the petitioners, subject to their satisfying the Magistrate that the offending marks have been obliterated. With this modification, R. 1160 is discharged.

With regard to the petition for enhancement of sentence on the above-mentioned petitioners (Revision Case No. 1208 of 1927) we are of opinion that no action is necessary. That application is accordingly rejected.

Judge thought that the measurement of the area given in the kabuliyat was not at all accurate and he held that since the landlord had allowed a lax measurement by his own officers, it was not fair that the tenant should be compelled to pay at the kabuliyat rate for the area found by the scientific measurement of the cadastral survey. He, therefore, held that it would be just and proper to enhance the rent of the holding by three annas in the rupee. It was contended that the decision fell within the provisions of S. 105 and, therefore, a second appeal lay from it.

Judgment—Second Appeal No. 1223 is by the landlord against the decision of the Special Judge modifying the decision of the Assistant Settlement Officer allowing an increase of rent to the appellant, but reducing the rate of increase allowed by the Assistant Settlement Officer. A preliminary objection has been taken by the defendants that no second appeal lies against the decision under S. 109-A, Cl. 3, Ben. Ten. Act. The learned advocate for the appellant contends that as it is a decision not falling within the provisions of S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, there is a second appeal or, in other words, his argument amounts to this that where various questions are raised in the Court below, namely, whether the tenancy is a permanent mokarari one or not, and whether the landlord is entitled to an increase of rent for an increase of area under S. 52, Ben. Ten. Act, there is a second appeal although the decision of the Special Judge professes to settle a fair and equitable rent. In support of this contention, reliance is placed on the Full Bench case of Jnanada Sundari Choudhurani v. Abdur Rahman (1), where it was held by the Court that when in a proceeding under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, the Settlement Officer is asked to increase the rent under sub-S. 4 in accordance with the rule laid down in S. 52, Ben. Ten. Act, and the claim is refused on appeal to the Special Judge on the ground that the land of the tenant is not proved to be in excess of the area for which the rent has been previously paid, a second appeal is not barred by S. 109-A of that Act.

The learned advocate for the appellant asks for an extension of the rule laid down in that case. But when the facts and circumstances of the present case are looked into, the Full Bench case has no bearing upon the question in the present case. Here the settlement of rent was asked for lands which the tenants had encroached upon beyond the original area let out to him. The Assistant Settlement Officer fixed the rent on the basis of a certain area which, according to his view, was the excess land. On appeal, the Special Judge thought that the measurement of the area given in the kabuliyat was not at all accurate and he held that since the landlord has allowed a lax measurement by his own officers, it is not fair that the tenant should be compelled to pay at the kabuliyat rate for the area found by the scientific measurement of the cadastral survey. He, therefore, held that it would be just and proper to enhance the rent of the holding by three annas in the rupee. Although S. 52 is mentioned, this is not really, as the learned advocate for the appellant has conceded, a case falling within S. 52, Ben. Ten. Act, but an increase of rent according to the terms of the kabuliyat. The area has been estimated by the learned Judge and he has settled a fair rent. There is no question which can be raised in second appeal.

The appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs two gold mohurs.

With regard to second appeal No. 1224, the learned advocate for the appellant has very fairly conceded that he cannot urge anything against the preliminary objection taken on behalf of the respondent.

This appeal also is, therefore, dismissed with costs two gold mohurs

(a) Evidence Act, Ss. 60 and 67—Under S. 67 direct evidence of handwriting is not always necessary—S. 60 does not exclude circumstantial evidence of a thing which could be seen, heard and felt.

Sections 60 and 67 are somewhat ambiguous, but it was never intended by S. 67 that direct evidence of handwriting was always necessary. The section merely stated with reference to deeds what was the universal rule in all cases, that the person who makes an allegation must prove it and lays down no new rule as to the kind of proof to be given. It was never intended by S. 60 to exclude circumstantial evidence of a thing which could be seen, heard and felt, though at first sight the section might appear to have that meaning: 12 B. L. R. (b) Railways Act, S. 72—Risk-note — Terms “theft” and “robbery” are not synonymous.

The terms “robbery” and “theft” are not synonymous. “Robbery” has been used in the sense in which that word has been used in the Penal Code: (Case law considered). [P 499 C 2]

(c) Railways Act, S. 72—Loss of goods due to not padlocking a van carrying the goods—Omission deliberate and intentional—Railway Company is liable for wilful neglect—Contract Act, S. 151.

Plaintiff who signed the risk-note Form B sued a Railway Company for the loss of a consignment. It was proved that the consignment was loaded in a van which was not padlocked and there was no seal, and it was also proved that it was the practice not to padlock the doors.

Held : that the company was liable as omission to padlock was intentional and deliberate and the loss was due to the wilful neglect of the Railway Company. The company was also liable under S. 151, Contract Act, as it is inconceivable that a man of ordinary prudence would let similar goods of his own to be carried in an unlocked van under similar circumstances : A. I. R. 1928 P. C. 24, Rel. on.

*Sarat Chandra Bose and Panchanan Chowdhury—*for Appellants.

*Amarendra Nath Bose and Ambikapada Chowdhury—*for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.—The plaintiffs sued to recover from the defendants, the East Indian Railway Co., the price with interest of a bale of cloth, which formed part of a consignment dispatched from Howrah to the plaintiffs at Durgapur. The consignment was covered by a risk-note in form B. The Subordinate Judge decreed the suit, but on appeal taken from that decision the District Judge reversed the same and dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs have preferred this second appeal.

The District Judge held that the risk-note was signed by one Basudev who delivered the goods to the Railway Company for carriage, and the Railway Company absolved by reason of the risk-note.

It is contended on behalf of the appellants, in the first place, that it has not been legally proved that Basudev signed the risk-note. This fact was sought to be proved in this way : Basudev who is said to be alive was not called, obviously for the reason that it was either not possible for the defendants to find him out or to rely on him. D. W. 1, a freight calculator of the East Indian Railway at Howrah, who calculated the freight for the consignment, was called and he said that he attested the signature of Basudev on the risk-note, on Basudev having told him in answer to his enquiry that he had signed the note. It has been argued that this does not amount to legal proof of the fact that Basudev signed the note and reliance has been placed in this connexion on Ss. 60 and 67 Evidence Act. It is said that as it was alleged that Basudev had signed the risk-note, under S. 67 it was necessary to prove that the signature on the risk-note was in Basudev's handwriting; and as the signing of the risk-note by Basudev was a fact which could be seen under S. 60, only such oral evidence of the fact could be given as was of a person who had seen Basudev signing the document. This precise contention was dealt with and overruled by Markby, J., in the case of Neelkanto Pandit v. Jagqobandhu Ghosh (1). He held that Ss. 60 and 67 were somewhat ambiguous, but that it was never intended by S. 67 that direct evidence of handwriting was always necessary, but the section merely stated with reference to deeds what was the universal rule in all cases, that the person who makes an allegation must prove it and lays down no new rule as to the kind of proof to be given; and that it was never intended by S. 60 to exclude circumstantial evidence of a thing which could be seen, heard and felt, though at first sight the section might appear to have that meaning. If circumstantial evidence is allowable, then to prove that Basudev signed the note it is relevant to establish that Basudev admitted that he has signed it. This admission has been proved, and if believed it is a legal mode of proof of the fact in issue, namely, the fact of Basudev having signed the note. Whether it should be considered sufficient or not is a matter which we can go into on second appeal. This contention of the appellants, therefore, must fail.

The appellants' next contention relates to the finding of the District Judge that risk-note protects the Railway Company. The reasoning of the learned District Judge is this: The loss was due to theft from the train when she was running, that the word "robbery" used in the risk-note being synonymous with "theft", there was no "wilful neglect" and so it was not a case of theft due to wilful neglect and consequently the case does not come within the exception mentioned in the risk-note. To appreciate the bearing of this reasoning the relevant portion of the risk-note is here given:

We agree and undertake to hold the Railway Administration harmless and free from all responsibility for any loss, etc., from any cause whatever except for a loss due either to the wilful neglect of the Railway Administration or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants provided the term "wilful neglect" be not held to include fire, robbery from a running train or any other unforeseen event or accident.

It is clear from the risk-note that if robbery is synonymous with theft, then loss caused by theft from a running train is not loss due to wilful neglect of the administration or of its servants, and the case not coming within the exception, the Railway Company are absolved, and the Judge's reasoning is perfectly sound. For the proposition that robbery as used in the risk-note is synonymous with theft there is a divergence of judicial opinion. The Allahabad High Court by a Full Bench has now held that it is not:

Bindraban v. G. I. P. Ry. Co., (2) and the Patna High Court has taken the same view: Kashi Ram Karoo Ram v. E. I. Ry. Co. (3). The Bombay and the Lahore High Courts appear to be of a contrary opinion: B. B. & C. I. Ry. v. Sankar Chand (4) and Gulab Rai Lahri Mal v. E. I. Ry. Co. (5). We have not been referred to any decision of our Court on the point, and being free to decide the question res integra I find it exceedingly difficult to regard the terms "robbery" and "theft" as synonymous. My reasons are mainly two: first because the two words have been used within a few lines of one another in the same document and, therefore, should be presumed to have been used in different senses; and second because the word "robbery" is preceded and followed by words implying situations over which the Railway Company themselves or their servants can have no control. For these reasons I am of opinion that the view taken by the learned District Judge that the words "theft" and "robbery" mean one and the same thing is not right. The word "robbery", in my opinion, has been intended to convey the sense in which the word is used in the Indian Penal Code, that is to say, a felonious taking from the person of another or in his presence against his will, by violence or putting him in fear. His finding that there was no wilful neglect merely because there was theft from a running train in my opinion is not right.

This finding being vitiated by the error that I have noticed, it is necessary to consider whether the case should not be sent back to the Court of appeal below to be dealt with again. Giving the matter the consideration that it deserves I am of opinion that it is not necessary to do so and that this is a proper case in which we may well exercise our powers under S. 103, Civil P. C., as recently amended. The District Judge has referred in his judgment to the evidence of one single witness, namely D. W. 3, in support of his finding that the consignment in question was put in a sealed wagon the doors of which were closed. He, however, failed to appreciate that the witness was a loading clerk at Howrah who could only speak to the state of things as they were before the wagon left Howrah. The evidence of this witness was disbelieved by the trial Judge; but however that may be it is clear upon his evidence that the door of the van was not padlocked as it was not the practice to padlock the doors of such vans in those days. The positive evidence on the point is afforded by the statement of the guard in charge of the train, Ex. C, a document on which the Railway Company themselves have relied which is to the effect that there was no seal as it was a road van. Whether mere sealing is at all effective it is unnecessary to enquire, it is sufficient that there was no seal, and what is more important is that the system of putting padlocks on was not insisted on in those days. Wilful neglect for the purposes of a risk-note has not been explained by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Ardeshir Bhicaji Tamboli v. Agent, G. I. P. Ry. Co., (6) in accordance with the meaning given to the expression by Lord Russell in R. v. Senior (7), as meaning that the act is done deliberately and intentionally and not by accident or inadvertence, but so that the mind of the person who does the act goes with it.

It was not an accidental omission that the door of the van was not padlocked; it was the practice not to do so, and so it was a deliberate and intentional omission. That the loss was due to this omission is pretty certain, for it was a factor that facilitated the theft which otherwise it would have been infinitely more difficult to perpetrate. The case therefore does come within the exception mentioned in the risk-note.

To such a case then the statutory responsibility of a Railway Company under S. 72, Railways Act, would attach. The question that next needs investigation, therefore, is whether the administration as bailee has fulfilled the standard of care laid down in S. 151, Contract Act. The finding of wilful neglect covers much the same ground as S. 151, Contract Act, in view of the circumstances of the case for it is inconceivable that a man of ordinary prudence would let similar goods of his own to be carried in an unlocked van in similar circumstances.

The result is that in my judgment, the plaintiffs have made out a case fully entitling them to recover. The appeal is accordingly allowed and the decree of the lower appellate Court being reversed, that of the trial Court is restored with costs in this Court and the lower appellate Court.

Any Magistrate is competent to hold a test identification and if he is not empowered to deal with the matter under enquiry he can prove the statement made before him under the provisions of S. 157, Evidence Act. It is no business of the Judge in charging the jury to assume the part of the defence counsel. It is his duty to place the evidence before the jury as he finds it and though the inference left to be drawn by the jury reasonably is that it would be unsafe to accept that evidence of a particular witness it is certainly open to the jury to believe what the witness said and to accept it if they chose to do so.

turn out to be an idle hope, that in consequence of his giving certain information, he would be rewarded by the Government. It must be shown that the hope was directly inspired by some one who had authority to make the promise.

Judgment.—These three appeals arise out of the same trial and are now disposed of together. Appeal No. 509 is by the three accused persons Samiuddin, Bakshu Mia and Eunoch Mia; Appeal No. 550 is by the accused Nezamat Ali and Appeal No. 621 by the accused Naju Mia. The trial was held by the learned Additional Sessions Judge of Chittagong with the aid of a jury. The jury unanimously found the accused Samiuddin, Bakshu Mia, Eunoch Mia and Naju Mia guilty of an offence under S. 395, I.P.C. and they by a majority of 4 to 1 found the accused Nizam Ali guilty of the same offence. As against Naju Mia, there was an additional charge under S. 75, I. P. C. The learned Additional Sessions Judge agreeing with and accepting the verdict of the jury as aforesaid convicted all these accused under S. 395, I. P. C., and sentenced Naju Mia to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six years and the remainder to undergo rigorous imprisonment for five years. At the hearing before us, Naju Mia and Nizam Ali were represented by learned vakils while Samiuddin, Bakshu Mia and Eunoch Mia were unrepresented, they having preferred their appeal from jail.

As regards the facts, there is no dispute, and they may briefly be stated thus: A dacoity was committed in the house of one Jiban Kristo Chowdhury, a zamindar who had also a large money-lending business and his practice was to lend money taking ornaments by way of security. These ornaments were all kept in his house together with a considerable amount of money in cash. On the night of 14th January 1926, a large number of dacoits broke into his house armed with revolvers and swords and, by the light of electric torches broke open the chests and almirahs and took away a sum of Rs. 8,000 in cash and a large quantity of gold and silver jewellery. The first information was recorded at 3-30 p. m. on 15th January by the witness Saroda Charan Chowdhury 14 men were arrested on suspicion on 16th and two test identifications were held on 7th and 9th February respectively in which no witness was able to identify any of the accused persons. The trial continued for over two months and the result was that on 6th April 1926 the accused were all discharged. Nothing more happened until 28th July when the appellant Naju Mia was arrested and, on the following day, his house was searched and a certain number of ornaments some of which are said to have been identified subsequently as part of the proceeds of the dacoity were found. On 80th he was remanded to police custody and, on 2nd August he made a confession before a Magistrate which he afterwards retracted. On 4th October, a charge sheet was sent in which the names of certain of the appellants appeared and it was stated there that the accused Nizam Ali had absconded, and it was not until 15th February 1927 that he was arrested. A test identification was held on 25th February and there the witness Sarada Charan Chowdhury for the first time identified Nezamat as one of the dacoits.

Thereafter the trial proceeded with the result which has already been stated. Mr. Bhattacharji who has appeared for the appellant Nizam Ali has raised certain objections to the learned Judge's charge to the jury. He says, in the first place, that the test identification which was conducted by a Magistrate of the 2nd Class who was not empowered under the law to hold an enquiry was bad and that, therefore, no evidence with regard to what happened in that test identification was admissible in evidence. He contends that though any Magistrate is competent to hold a test identification, yet if he is not empowered to deal with the matter under enquiry he cannot prove the statements which were made before him under the provisions of S. 157, Evidence Act. This contention does not seem to us to be well founded. It is plain that no test identification could be held before Nizam Ali was arrested and, as that did not occur until 15th February 1927 the test identification could not take place before that date, though, in point of fact, the enquiry with regard to the other appellants had already begun. S. 164, Criminal P. C. covers the case where a Magistrate acts under this section and records a statement made to him.

Mr. Bhattacharji next contends that the learned Judge has not charged the jury sufficiently in regard to the fact that the witness Saroda did not identify the appellant Nizam Ali at the two earlier test identifications and that, in the first information which he lodged, he did not say that he had identified the man. We have examined the charge with great care and we are of opinion that there is no substance in this contention. We find, first of all, that the learned Judge told the jury in dealing with the evidence of Saroda that he (Saroda) noted the features of one of the dacoits. That man is Nizam Ali. He had his face painted black with some white marks on it. He was taken inside the jail two or three times. He identified Nizam Ali on the last occasion.

Then, a note was made by the learned Judge in brackets as follows:

He "that is, Saroda," did not say in the lower Court the first time he was examined there that he had noted the features of one of the dacoits.

The reference to the statement made by this witness in the lower Court is clear that, in fact, the witness did not say that he recognized Nizam Ali. Then again the learned Judge says that, according to the witness Upendra Lal Chowdhury, Saroda was in his (Upendra Lal's) shop on the night of the dacoity and did not come out till the dacoits had left the house of Jiban Kristo. This evidence, it appears, is in direct conflict with what Saroda says that he was sleeping in his own house; and the learned Judge says:

You should bear in mind that Saroda is the first informant in this case. He says that he was in their cutchery ghur on the night of the dacoity and has identified one of the accused as being among the dacoits. If you believe this witness, Saroda could not see the occurrence nor was it probable for him to identify any of the dacoits; you should also bear in mind that the witness did not say in the lower Court that Saroda was in his shop that night. He says that he did not say so as nobody had asked him.

Later on, in summing up the evidence against each of the accused, the learned Judge says with regard to Nizam Ali: Saroda identified him as being among the dacoits:

Then, in brackets, he says:

You should in this connexion consider the evidence of Upendra Chowdhury that Saroda was in his shop on the night of the dacoity, and should also bear in mind that there were three test identifications in jail and Saroda could not identify anyone on the first two occasions; and, later on, when dealing with the case of the appellant Eunoch, the learned Judge says:

You should bear in mind that Exs. F and G show that Saroda could not identify anyone on a previous test identification.

It appears, therefore, that at least on four occasions in the course of his charge, the learned Judge put it to the jury that it was only on the third attempt that the witness Saroda succeeded in identifying this appellant Nizam Ali. The question evidently that he left to the jury to decide was whether in these circumstances it was safe to accept the evidence given by this witness in Court and he told the jury moreover that, in the first information, Saroda did not say that he had recognized anybody. So, there can be no room for doubt that the learned Judge put everything in favour of this accused before the jury and we do not consider that he could have done anything more. It was not his business to assume the part of the defence counsel. It was his duty to place the evidence before the jury as he found it and, though the inference left to be drawn reasonably was that it would be unsafe to accept this evidence, it was certainly open to the jury to believe what the witness said and to accept it, if they chose to do so. We think, therefore, that there is no substance in the argument that there has not been sufficient direction on behalf of the learned Judge.

We now proceed to deal with the case of the appellant Naju Mia. He has been represented at the hearing before us by Mr. Das Gupta who has raised two points in the course of his argument. The first is that the confession made by Naju was made under such circumstances as to leave little doubt that it was not a voluntary confession and the second is that the learned Judge omitted to charge the jury that the articles found in the house of this appellant were not mentioned in the first list given by Jiban

Kristo, on the day following the dacoity. Now with regard to the first point, the confession was recorded by the Sub-Deputy Magistrate Babu Upendra Narain Chowdhury who stated that he had recorded the confession after giving the accused the necessary warning before recording it and also after saying that there was no police officer present and giving him sufficient time—an hour or so—to reflect before committing himself. Now, the confession itself ran like this. The learned Magistrate said :

I am a Magistrate. There is no policeman here. If you want to make any statement of your own free will, you may do so. Don't say anything you are tutored to say. Don't say anything even under threat from anyone. You may say anything or not as you please. There is no obligation of any sort. If you admit anything, it will be recorded as evidence and will, if necessary, be used as evidence against you. Do you want to make any confession?

Naju Mia replied:

I want to make a clean breast of everything for the reason that, if I serve the Government in any way, the Government may take pity on me.

It is contended by Mr. Das Gupta that this statement of the appellant, Naju Mia is in itself sufficient to render this confession inadmissible. But having regard to the provisions of S. 24, Evidence Act, it seems to us that there must be something from which we are to infer that the inducement or promise was given to the accused by some person who had authority to give it. It is not enough for the accused to entertain a hope, which may turn out to be an idle hope, that in consequence of his giving certain information, he would be rewarded by the Government. It must be shown that the hope was directly inspired by some one who had authority to make the promise. There is nothing of the kind here. In fact, the opening words of his statements are:

No one has pinned me nor asked under menaces to say anything. I want to unburden myself of all that has happened.

Now, with regard to this, the learned Magistrate said that he believed that the confession was a voluntary confession and he gave a certificate to that effect. In dealing with it, the learned Judge says:

Although I have admitted the retracted confession of the accused Naju Mia, it is for you to appraise the value of that confession. The weight to be given to such confession depends upon the circumstances under which it was given and the circumstances under which it was retracted. It will, in short, be unsafe for you to rely upon the retracted confession of Naju Mia, unless, after consideration of the whole evidence in this case, you are in a position to come to the unhesitating conclusion that the confession is true. Even in that case it is evidence against Naju Mia but not against others.

We are of opinion that it is a perfectly correct statement of what the law governing a retracted confession is. The learned Judge then proceeds to put the dates of his arrest, of the search of his house and of his confession and he says that it is after all for the jury to consider whether the confession was a voluntary one and whether there is evidence strong enough to corroborate the finding of certain articles which were stolen in the house of this accused.

In regard to the second point raised by the learned vakil, the learned Judge has dealt with all the articles discovered in the house of Naju Mia after the search. Prima facie, the place where they were discovered and the cautious concealment of all these articles would lead to the inference that they were stolen property and evidence was led by the prosecution to show that the articles so discovered were, in fact, articles stolen from the house of Jiban Krishna. The learned Judge has told the jury that some of these articles were mentioned in the list filed by Ram Krista and that the others were not in that list and he has said:

You should bear in mind that except the Bajus and earring no other ornament is mentioned in the list submitted by Jiban Kristo on 16th January 1926. Even with regard to these two items, there is discrepancy regarding weight. In considering the evidence you should in the first place bear in mind the discrepancies and contradictions which I have pointed out to you and to which your attention has been drawn by the defence pleader and you should consider how far those discrepancies and contradictions are due to faulty memory.

There was, therefore, a clear direction to the jury that they would have to make up their minds, whether, in spite of these contradictions, omissions and discrepancies, there was evidence on which they felt that they could safely rely. The verdict shows that they considered the evidence satisfactory. We think, therefore, that there is no substance in this point.

We have still to deal with the case of the remaining three appellants—Samiuddin, Bakshu Mia and Eunoch Mia. The evidence against these three persons is very much of the same character, and it is of persons who saw them on the day of the occurrence in two sampans and landing at Chowdhury's Ghat and of witnesses who say that they saw them again boarding the sampans at the Chowdhury's Ghat on the day after the dacoity. The prosecution case evidently was that these men were associated together in these sampans both prior to and after the dacoity. Though it cannot be said that that evidence is conclusive, it was no doubt open to the jury, if they thought so, to hold that these facts showed that these appellants had actually taken part in the dacoity and we cannot say that their decision is wrong. This appeal, in our opinion, has no substance in it.

On these considerations, we are of opinion that the appellants have been justly convicted. We accordingly affirm the conviction and sentence and dismiss all the three appeals.

Civil Rule No. 1057 of 1927, Decided on 5th December 1927, against order of Munsif, Dauton (Midnapur), D/- 21st June 1927, in Small Cause Suit No. 58 of 1927.

* (a) Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, Art. 35 (ii)—Suit for damages for loss of animal on the ground that the animal was killed due to negligence of the Railway Company in not fencing the line, in driving too fast and not taking precautions in frightening away the animal—Allegations do not constitute mischief and the Article has no application.

In a suit for damages against the Railway Company for damages for loss of an animal the allegations were that due to the negligence of the defendant company in not fencing the railway line, and in driving the locomotive to the utter disregard of public safety, life and property, and the company's servants in charge of the engine not taking proper precautions in frightening away the animal, the plaintiff was put to the unnecessary loss of the animal which was thrown down the embankment, sustaining injuries which resulted in its death.

Held: that the said allegations in the plaint constituted a case of negligence which even, if wilful, fell far short of those requisites which would go to make out any such intent or knowledge as is necessary to satisfy the definition of

"mischief" as given in S. 425, and Art. 35 (ii) would not apply. [P 505 C 2]

* (b) Railways Act, S. 16—No restriction imposed upon the company as regards their right to use locomotives only at scheduled times or at a speed less than scheduled speed—Inconvenience to public is not a ground of action.

Where there is no restriction imposed on the Railway Company as regards their right to use locomotives only at scheduled times or at a particular speed, whatever nuisance or inconvenience may be caused to the public in general it cannot be regarded as a violation of any duty which the company owe to them or as amounting to any negligence which may form a ground of action so far as they are concerned: R. v. Pease, (1832) 4 B & Ad. 30, Ref. [P 506 C 1]

There is no principle or authority which demand that a driver running an engine on the open lines at places where there are no level-crossings or which are not known to be ordinarily used for purposes of crossing the rails is bound to be on the look out to see if any trespassers are on the lines. A Railway Company allowing persons to cross the line otherwise than by a level crossing is not in duty bound to use care to protect such persons. Omission to notice and the failure to blow a whistle in consequence of which any loss is sustained does not amount to negligence: Cases Referred. [P 507 C 1]

* (d) Tort—Negligence—No statutory provision to fence a railway line—Animal straying and killed on the railway line—No evidence that accident was caused by any negligence on the part of the driver—The Company is not liable.

The company is under no obligation, statutory or otherwise, to fence the line and if an animal strays and grazes on to the railway line and in consequence is killed and there is no evidence that the accident is caused by any negligence on the part of the driver of the train, the company is not liable: *Henry Conder v. Judgment.—This Rule relates to a decree for damages which the plaintiff has obtained against the defendant company for having knocked down and killed a bullock belonging to the plaintiff. The incident happened on the 3rd February 1911, at about 11 a. m., when a light engine belonging to the defendant company and run by one of the company's drivers was proceeding up the railway line from Danton to Lakhannath Road, bumped against the bullock which at that particular moment happened to be on the railway line, and as a result the bullock was thrown down the embankment, sustaining injuries which resulted in its death.

The negligence upon which the action was founded in the plaint was set out in para. 5 thereof which ran in these words :

That due to the negligence of the defendant company in not fencing the railway line, and in driving the locomotive to the utter disregard of public safety, life and property, and the company's servants in charge of the aforesaid engine not taking proper precautions in frightening away the unfortunate animal the plaintiff was put to the unnecessary loss of Rs. 49 which the defendant company is bound to pay. Rs. 49, thus claimed, it should be mentioned, was the price of the bullock.

By a petition subsequently filed by the plaintiff the following words were added to the said paragraph :

That the defendant company is bound in law and equity to erect and maintain sufficient fences on both sides of the railway line to prevent the cattle of the owners and occupiers of the adjoining lands from straying on the railway lines, and the plaintiff being the owners of such adjoining lands is entitled to protection against the straying of plaintiff's cattle from the plaintiff's lands where such cattle are lawfully kept by the plaintiff, etc.

In giving his reason for holding the defendant company liable the learned Munsif has said in his judgment :

To my mind these three factors, viz. (1) the running of the engine at the unscheduled time, (2) the terrific and unwarranted speed at which it was proceeding, and (3) the failure to blow the whistle to avert the accident, combine to fasten the liability for the loss of the bullocks on to the defendant company.

There was a plea of contributory negligence set up on behalf of the defendant company. It has been overruled. The learned Munsif has found that in the cultivated lands which lie on both sides of the railway line the villagers enjoy a customary right of grazing their cattle during this particular season and that as no fencing subway or level-crossing has been provided by the defendant company for going from one side of the railway line to the other, cattle cross the line at any point they choose. He appears to have been of opinion that the bullock had apparently gone over to the west of the embankment to graze and was coming back to its shed on the east of it, when it was knocked over.

In the aforesaid view of the matter the learned Munsif has decreed the suit.

The defendant company have obtained the present rule.

It will be convenient at the outset to dispose of the objection that has been raised as to the jurisdiction of the trial Court to deal with the suit as one cognizable by the Court of Small Causes, it being urged that the suit is excepted by Art. 35 (ii), Sch. 2 to the Act inasmuch as the allegations upon which the suit is found constitute the offence of mischief as defined in the Indian Penal Code. In my opinion the said allegations in the plaint constitute a case of negligence, which even, if wilful, falls far short of those requisites which would go to make out any such intent or knowledge as is necessary to satisfy the definition of mischief as given in S. 425, I P. C. The action, as I understand it, is founded upon negligence—negligence of the defendant company themselves as regards certain matters and negligence of their servants as regards others for which the defendant company as masters are sought to be made liable. To such an action the article in question, in my judgment, has no application.

The other objections that have been urged as to the validity of the decree need not be set out in detail as they cover the whole range of the reasoning of the learned Munsif and it would be more convenient to deal with the reasons themselves rather than the contentions that have been put forward against those reasons.

As regards the facts : it is fairly clear upon the evidence of plaintiff's witness 1 and plaintiff's witness 2 that the bullock had been taken to the west of the railway line to graze and was left there, that before the impact it had got on to the embankment, that, at the time of the impact, it was grazing on the line, and that it was caught in the cowcatcher and was thrown over to the west receiving the injuries which resulted in its death. The finding of the Munsif that it was apparently coming back to its shed on the east may or may not be correct.

Of the three factors to which the learned Munsif has referred in his judgment as constituting the ground of the defendants' liability, two viz., "the running of the engine at an unscheduled time" and "the terrific and unwarranted speed at which it was proceeding," are matters which hardly come into the question. The legislature having in Ch. 4, Railways Act (9 of 1890), made provisions for the opening, closing and use of railways and it not being suggested that there was any restriction imposed on the defendants as regards their right to use locomotives only at scheduled times or at a speed less than the speed at which the engine was travelling, whatever nuisance or inconvenience may be caused to the public in general cannot be regarded as a violation of any duty which the defendants owe to them or as amounting to any negligence which may form a ground of action, so far as they are concerned. King v. Pease (1) has made it perfectly plain that where the legislature has authorized the formation of a railway, the circumstance of the use made by the company of their railway involving more than ordinary risk cannot justify the imposition on the company of a larger degree of responsibility than the Act of Parliament prescribes.

In considering the third ground, namely, "the failure of the defendant company to blow the whistle," I think it must be held on the facts that the whistle was not blown. The driver says that he does not recollect having knocked over anything on the day in question. He says that when cattle obstruct the way drivers always sound whistles, but he does not remember whether he did so on the day in question. He says that when whistles are sounded cattle get scared and get away. Whether the evidence of the driver is true or false it is not possible to say, but it is difficult to believe that it is wholly true. Now to render the company liable for the omission on the part of the driver to whistle it is necessary to prove that the driver has been guilty of a breach of duty or an error of judgment or that he saw the danger and failed to give warning. Failure to whistle is not the omission of any statutory precaution not only here but also under the English law, Newman v. L. & S. W. Ry (2); but in certain circumstances it may be reasonable to whistle and failure to do so may be evidence of negligence, e. g., James v. N. E. Ry. Co. (3), Gray v. N. E. Ry. Co. (4), Coburn v. G. N. Ry.

Co. (5), Davey v. L. & S. W. Ry. (6), and Dublin Wiclow and Wexford Ry. v. Statterly (7). No abstract rule can be laid down as to the circumstances under which the driver would be bound to whistle notwithstanding that it is not a statutory duty to do so, but on the whole it seems that the duty arises only when the circumstances call for a warning to be given. If the duty did arise, it would not be an absolute defence to say that the whistle if blown might or might not have scared away the bullock and it would always be a matter for the jury the Court not being bound to presume as a matter of law that the whistle would have been useless: Barker v. L. & S. W. Ry. Co. (8). In the present case nothing has been proved to indicate that the driver had in point of fact noticed the bullock and still did not whistle. It is unnecessary, therefore, to discuss the liability of the defendant company on the footing of such a state of things. If the driver did not notice the bullock can it be said that he was guilty of negligence; "Negligence," as Alderson, B., said in Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Co. (9) is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs would do or doing something which a prudent man would not do.

The standard of care ordinarily required in each particular case has to be determined and the question to be considered is whether such a standard has been attained; the standard being founded upon a consideration of the ease which would be observed by a prudent and reasonable man: Metropolitan Ry. v. Jackson (10). A driver who is running an engine on the lines of a railway is expected not to disregard any signals or disobey any rules. He is expected also to be cautious as regards the safety of the locomotive and the rolling stock, and of passengers, invitees, licensees and the like. Even as regards trespassers it may be conceded, though there seems to be some divergences of opinion in this respect, that extra care should be taken not to injure the public if they are known to frequent or cross at a particular point though without any right. Omission to take such extra care under the last-mentioned circumstances has sometimes been held to afford a ground of action while at others not, e. g., such cases as Bilbee v. L. B. & S. C. Ry. (11), Lowery v. Walker (12) and Murley v. Grove (13). There is, however, no principle or authority which demand that a driver running an engine on the open lines at places where there are no level crossings or which are not known to be ordinarily used for purposes of crossing the rails is bound to be on the look out to see if any trespassers are on the lines. A railway company allowing persons to cross the line otherwise than by a level crossing is not in duty bound to use care to protect such persons : Harrison v. N. E. Ry. Co. (14), but if it is such a place where persons are in the habit of crossing, the Company has to take reasonable precautions in the use of the spot, even though there is no right of way there : Barrell v. Midland Ry. Co. (15). The evidence such as it is in the present case, shows that there is no bend at or near the spot and the lines run straight. There is ample authority for the view that if the driver was unaware of the danger and had no reason to anticipate it the liability would not arise : Simon v. London General Omnibus Co. (16). Hase v. London General Omnibus Co. (17). I am unable to hold on a consideration of all the surrounding circumstances that the omission to notice the bullock and failure to blow the whistle amounted to negligence on the part of the driver.

The question whether the Railway Company are bound to provide level-crossings or subways does not really arise in the present case, as it is not the plaintiff's case that any public road was being used by the bullock that was killed. The law relating to the obligation of the Railway Company to provide for the safety of the public crossing the line at level-crossings will have no bearing on the present case.

It is not alleged that the defendants have failed to comply with any statutory provision or carry out a requisition in this respect made by a competent authority or even by the public or any particular individual. The omission to provide them, if they are necessary, may have caused inconvenience to the public and may be taken to have formed a legitimate ground of complaint ; but for the purposes of the present suit the matter is irrelevant. On this head the more important question is whether the defendants knowing as they must have, that men and cattle are likely to cross the lines were not bound to make and maintain proper fences to prevent the cattle from straying on to the lines. Under the English law the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vic. c. 20), has imposed a statutory duty on a Railway Company to make and at all times to maintain proper fences between the railway and adjoining land, and, as pointed out by Lush, J., in Buxton v. N. E. Ry. Co. (18) :

If the fence is not sufficient and in consequence the cattle in the adjoining field stray on to the line and are killed, the company are answerable to the owners whether they are guilty of negligence or not.

There is no duty in a Railway Company to fence their line of railway as towards passengers or persons already on the line ; the duty in them is towards persons off the line to prevent the latter from getting or straying upon it per Bramwell, B., in Harrold v. G. W. Ry. Co. (19). The duty thus cast upon the Railway Company by the statute is the shifting but not varying of the obligation that is imposed on ordinary tenants by the common law and is co-extensive with that obligation and does not go further than the prescriptive liability of a servient tenement. Such fences separate the land taken for the use of the railway from the adjoining land not taken and protect such lands from trespass or the cattle of the owners or occupiers thereof from straying thereon by reason of the railway. It is a duty which they owe only to the owners and occupiers of the adjoining lands or persons claiming through them and not the world in general. So where the plaintiff's sheep escaped from his close through his own defect of fences and escaping thence on the defendants' railway were killed, it was held that the defendants were not liable : Ricketts v. East and West India Docks (20). In that case Jervis, C. J., speaking of the old prescriptive common law obligation said :

The rule upon the subject is well laid down in notes to Promfret v. Ricroft (21) : The general rule of law is, that I am bound to take care that my beasts do not trespass on the land of my neighbour, and he is only bound to take care that his cattle do not wander from his land, and trespass on mine, Tenant v. Goldwin (22), Churchill v. Evans (23) and Boyle v. Tamlyn (24); and, therefore, this kind of action will only lie against a person who can be shown to be bound by prescription or special obligation to repair the fences in question for the benefit of the owner or occupier of the adjoining land. And no man can be bound to repair for the benefit of those who have no right. Therefore, the plaintiff cannot recover for the damage occasioned to his cattle by their escape from the adjoining close through the defect of the defendant's fences, unless the plaintiff had an interest in that close, or a license from the owner to put them there, so also would no action lie even where the cattle had escaped from an adjoining highway unless they were lawfully using the highway that is passing and re-passing there : Dovaston v. Payne (25). A customary right of grazing on the lands adjoining the railway lines has been proved in this case, but there is no statutory liability here in this respect. In England, apart from statute, there is no common law liability to put up a fencing enclosing the lines where there is no highway adjoining, and on the facts disclosed in the present case an action for trespass would have been maintainable by the Railway Company against the owner of the cattle if the cattle strayed on the line and committed damages. Ridley, J., in Holgate v. Bleazard (26) in stating the law on the subject said :

In Bullen and Leake on Pleading, Edn. 3, p. 329 . . . it is laid down that the " general rule of law is that the owner of cattle is bound to take care that they do not trespass on the land of others." In other words that it is his duty as a general rule of law to keep his fences in such a condition as will prevent them from trespassing. The passage continues : " But the owner of the land " that is, the other owner upon whose land the trespass is committed " may be bound by prescription or otherwise to maintain and repair a fence for the benefit of the owner of the adjoining land who may have a corresponding right to have the fence so maintained and repaired.

The present case is similar in all cardinal respects to the case of Henry Conder v. Ballaprosad Bhagwandin (27) in which Sir Charles Sargent, C. J., and Fulton J., dealing with a claim for compensation for the loss of a buffalo which strayed, while grazing, on to the railway line and was killed said :

The obligation imposed on railway companies of fencing their railway by S. 21, Act 18, 1854 was repealed by Act 25 of 1871, and in lieu thereof there was substituted the power to the Governor-General or Local Government to make rules for fencing as provided by S. 21 of the Act . . . Nor have any rules been issued to the company under the Acts 4 of 1879 or 9 of 1890, and on the finding that the company was under no obligation statutory or otherwise, to fence the line and there being no evidence that the accident was caused by any negligence on the part of the driver of the train the company was held not liable.

The view of the defendant's liability taken by the learned Munsif, in my opinion, is not correct. The rule must be made absolute and the plaintiffs' suit dismissed with costs in the trial Court as well as in this Court. Hearing-fee in this rule is assessed at one gold mohur.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the appellants are interested in each of the 29 tenancies under the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought his suit for extra cesses due to him from the defendants in the following circumstances: It appears that the plaintiff made a return as required under S. 17, Cess Act, and in that return he described the defendants on the footing that they were cultivating raiyats within the meaning of the Cess Act. Thereupon that return having been scrutinized by the Collector, the Collector issued a notice under S. 24 upon the defendants requiring them to make a return. They said that they made a return and I am satisfied that thereupon action was taken by the Collector to put the defendants' names on the Cess Valuation Roll in part 3. It appears that they were described as tenure-holder 84 and to that number the names of the defendants were supplemented. On that basis the plaintiff brought his suit, because the plaintiff having hitherto got cesses from the defendants on the footing that they were cultivating raiyats properly entered in part 2, Cess Valuation Roll, now claims that as he has to pay Government cesses on the basis that these defendants were not cultivating raiyats he was entitled to the balance from the defendants. These facts are not disputed and the only question which is raised in this appeal is the important question whether or not the defendants come within the definition of a cultivating raiyat as used in S. 4, Cess Act—Act 9 of 1880.

Now if one looked at the scheme of that Act one would find in S. 41 that the amount of the cesses payable in respect of lands depends upon certain things. One particular rate is payable by every holder of an estate. Then every holder of a tenure has to pay to the holder of the estate or tenure within which the land held by him is included the entire amount of the road cess and public works cess calculated in a certain way. Every cultivating raiyat has to pay to the person to whom his rent is payable one-half of the road cess and public work cess calculated in a certain way. There can be no doubt that a person who is a cultivating raiyat can only be assessed in a less onerous manner as regards rate than if he were a holder of a tenure as defined by the section. The question is whether the defendants come under the definition of "cultivating raiyats" and are entitled to the privilege of coming under Cl. 3 of the section.

Now the point is this: that these defendants are interested in 29 different jamas the total rent of which amounts to more than Rs 100. They say that they themselves cultivate lands of each of those 29 holdings. They say that as in respect of none of the holdings which they cultivate they pay a rent exceeding Rs. 100, they are cultivating raiyats and therefore, although the total rent of the 29 such holdings exceeds Rs. 100, they are entitled to the privilege of paying road cess in the manner prescribed in Cl. 3, S. 41. Now to my mind that is not so. One has to remember first of all that while these defendants may be raiyats and may actually do cultivation, that does not make them cultivating raiyats for the purpose of the Cess Act. A cultivating raiyat, according to the definition in the Act, means a person cultivating lands and paying rent therefor not exceeding Rs. 100 per annum. There is therefore no argument to be based upon the fact that these peoples' holdings are raiyati holdings or upon the fact that they themselves are cultivators. One has to see whether they come within the definition of a "cultivating raiyat." If they do not themselves cultivate, it is clear from the definition of a tenure-holder that they are treated by the Act as tenure-holders. For that purpose one has to make up one's mind whether or not persons may cultivate lands to a large extent and remain cultivating raiyats provided they hold the lands in separate holdings. The intention of the Act is to look at all the lands the person in question cultivates and if he is a cultivator, a small cultivator, in the sense that his rent does not exceed Rs. 100 then he is given the privilege of a cultivating raiyat. Looking at the way in which the Act is framed it seems to me that it would be unworkable unless this Act intended to have regard to the total land which is cultivated by the individual claiming those privileges. It seems to me idle to make a maximum of Rs. 100 if that is to apply to an individual holding. It makes no difference to the policy of this Act whether a man has ten holdings or one holding. The object of the Act is not to compel people to sub-divide holdings unnecessarily. The Act intended to treat leniently a person who is an actual cultivator of the soil provided he is not paying a rent of more than Rs. 100, that being the limit within which that privilege can safely be granted. In my judgment the rent of Rs. 100 must be taken as applied to the whole of the land which is cultivated by the person in question. In this case we know that the defendants cultivate lands, but for the lands they cultivate they pay altogether a rent exceeding Rs. 100. I think, therefore, that the reasoning of the Subordinate Judge is in accordance with the intention of the statute. He says :

No doubt cesses are assessed on lands, but in the case of persons paying more than Rs. 100 as annual rent, the assessment is on the basis applicable to tenures.

When a person holds two jamas paying a total rent of more than Rs. 100 he is for the purposes of assessment, a holder of a tenure. That seems to me to be the correct determination of the point in dispute in this case. The point is not particularly clear and speaking for myself I am much obliged to the learned vakils for their arguments. In my opinion the intention of the statute is the intention which the learned Subordinate Judge imputes to the statute. In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 1914 of 1925, Decided on 16th May 1928, from appellate decree of Addl Sub-Judge, Howrah, D/-11th June 1925.

Specific Relief Act, S. 56 (j)—Plaintiff must show diligence and must not be guilty of laches.

Mandatory injunction is an equitable relief and one of the principles on which such relief is granted is that the plaintiff must show diligence and must not be guilty of laches. Judgment.—This appeal is directed against the decree of the lower appellate Court dismissing the plaintiffs' suit which was one for declaration of title and for a mandatory injunction against the defendants directing them to remove a portion of their privy which they have built upon the ejmali drain. The first Court decreed the plaintiffs' suit on the finding that there was an encroachment by the defendants on the ejmali drain. The lower appellate Court is of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that there was any encroachment by the defendants upon the ejmali drain, and this view it has been induced to hold by the fact that the present position of the drain was not demarcated in any of the maps prepared in the case. It appears that in 1904 a partition of the joint properties was made through Court between the ancestors of the parties. The disputed drain was left ejmali and it has been remarked by the lower appellate Court that it is difficult to determine for what purpose. This ejmali drain runs along the eastern side of the defendants' premises. The maps prepared in the case do not show that it in any way touches the plaintiffs' premises. In 1909 the mother of the present plaintiffs instituted a suit against defendants 1 and 2 and another for a declaration that the disputed drain was the joint property of the parties and for a permanent injunction restraining the defendants from including the drain in their homestead. That suit was decreed on 11th November 1909, but the mandatory injunction prayed therein was disallowed. It is not necessary to go further into the details of the litigation between the parties. It appears that in 1920 the defendants began to erect a privy encroaching upon the drain as alleged by the plaintiffs. In 1921 the decree in the plaintiffs' mother's suit was executed. No attempt was made to remove the encroachment by the defendants which, according to the evidence in the case as found by the learned Subordinate Judge began sometime in 1920. The present suit was instituted in 1922. On these facts the learned Subordinate Judge has held that the present suit was barred under O. 21, R. 32, Civil P. C. In my judgment the view taken by the learned Judge of the application of O. 21, R. 32, is not correct and that the suit does not necessarily fail because in the previous execution proceedings the decree-holder did not complain against the encroachment made by the defendants.

The next question in the case is whether under the circumstances of the case the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief claimed by them in the suit. The learned Subordinate Judge has held that the local investigation by the commissioners has not been satisfactory as they have not depicted on their maps the location of the drain as it stands at present. He, therefore, finds himself unable to say that there has been any actual encroachment by the defendants on the ejmali drain. If the matter had rested here we would have felt inclined to ask the Judge to reconsider his decision and, if necessary, after a fresh investigation. But the real relief which the plaintiffs claim in this case is mandatory injunction, namely, an order upon the defendants to demolish the portion of the privy which they have erected upon the ejmali drain. This relief, in the circumstances of the present case, they are not entitled to get. The encroachment according to the evidence of the plaintiffs themselves began in 1920. There was a verbal protest, but no further action was taken in the matter. Long after the completion of the structure the plaintiffs have brought this suit and claim that it should be removed. This is a relief which they are not entitled to as a matter of right. It is an equitable relief and one of the principles on which such relief is granted is that the plaintiffs must show diligence and should not be guilty of laches. Under S. 56 (j), Specific Relief Act an injunction cannot be granted when the conduct of the plaintiff or his agent is such as to disentitle him to any assistance from Court. It is a settled principle of law upon which mandatory injunctions are granted that the party who claims relief must be active and prompt. He must when the injury begins protest against it, and if his protests are not listened to he should follow it up by a suit in Court praying for an injunction against the defendant so that further injury may not be done. Benode Kumari Dassi v. Soudaminy Dassi (1); Woodroffe on Injunction, 4th edn 113.

In our opinion the conduct of the plaintiffs has been such as to disentitle them to any relief. They have further failed to prove that they have in any way been injured by the act of the defendants except that it is an encroachment upon the ejmali drain. They may have other remedies open to them which we need not suggest; but they are not, in the circumstances of this case entitled to claim that the privy put up by the defendants should be demolished. That is the principal relief which they claim and since in our opinion they are not entitled to any such relief it is not necessary that any investigation should be made as to the nature of the encroachment alleged to have been made by the defendants on the ejmali drain.

The learned Subordinate Judge had dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. But it appears that one of the claims in the suit was for declaration of the plaintiffs' ejmali title to the drain. This was not denied by the defendants and the plaintiffs at any rate are entitled to get a declaration to that effect

The result is that this appeal is allowed and the decree of the lower appellate Court confirmed with the modification as stated above. But in the circumstances of the case we do not allow any costs.

Atul Chandra Gupta and Radhikarajan Guho—for Appellants.

Mohini Mohan Bhattacharya and Nil Moni Goswami—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of arrears of rent. The plaintiffs claimed rent at the rate of Rs. 10 per year. Whereas the case of the defence was that the rent annually payable by the defendants was Rs. 2-8-0 only. The trial Judge accepted the figure as given by the plaintiffs and on that basis gave a decree to the plaintiffs for rent at the rate of Rs 10 per year. On appeal the lower appellate Court did not consider the plaintiffs' evidence on the question of the rate of rent sufficient, and holding that the kabuliyat which had been filed by the plaintiffs in support of their case did not relate to the land in suit allowed the appeal and gave the plaintiffs a decree only at the admitted rate, namely Rs. 2-8-0 per year. The plaintiffs have come up to this Court on second appeal.

A preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the respondent that no second appeal lay in the present case under S. 153, Ben. Ten. Act. I think this objection is sound and should prevail. The amount that was claimed in the case was less than Rs. 100 and the second appeal comes against a decree passed by a Subordinate Judge. The suit has been decreed by the learned Subordinate Judge at the rate of rent admitted by the defendants and it has been held in Nekejaie v. Nanda Dulal Bankeja (1) when a decree is given at the rate admitted by the defendants it is not a case of determination of the annual rent payable as mentioned in S. 153, Ben. Ten. Act.

On the merits also I do not think that this appeal can succeed. As I have said before the learned Subordinate Judge found the evidence, which the plaintiffs adduced to substantiate their case, unsatisfactory. One of the documents which the plaintiffs filed was a kabuliyat. This kabuliyat mentions the rate of rent to be Rs. 10, but the learned Subordinate Judge although he found that there was nothing suspicious about the genuineness of this document, came to the conclusion that the kabuliyat did not refer to the land in suit. It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the learned Subordinate Judge was not justified in raising this point in appeal as the point had been never raised before in the trial Court. But the lower appellate Court was a Court of fact as well as of law, and remembering that the kabuliyat was only a piece of evidence I do not think that it was beyond the scope of the learned Subordinate Judge, in considering the question of the relevancy of that document and in holding that that document which was nothing but an item of evidence, was irrelevant for the purposes of the case.

The only point that was taken before me on the merits of the case, therefore, fails. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

S. W. White—Opposite Party.

Application No. 6 of 1927, Decided on 14th July 1927, for ordering the opposite party to comply with an order of Gregory, J., D/- 7th April 1927.

Divorce Act, Ss. 55 and 7—Provisions for the enforcement of orders under this Act are to be followed as provided in the Civil Procedure Code.

All decrees and orders made by a Court in any suit or proceedings under the Divorce Act shall be enforced and may be appealed from in the like manner as the decrees and orders of the Court made in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction and not by contempt proceedings even though it were the intent of S. 7 to bring into India all the rules of procedure in the Divorce Act in England. [P 514 C 1]

Judgment.—This is an application on behalf of the petitioner in a suit for judicial separation who had obtained an order for alimony pendente lite. The application is made on behalf of the petitioner for an order that the respondent should carry out the terms of an order made by Gregory, J., dated 7th April 1927 whereby he was ordered to pay certain sums to the petitioner by way of alimony pendente lite, and the application further asks that in default of compliance with the order to pay the respondent be committed to jail as for a contempt of Court.

On the previous occasion when the matter came up before me, by consent of counsel for the respective parties it was agreed that the order made by Gregory, J., should be varied and that in future the respondent should pay to the petitioner's solicitors the sum of Rs. 400 or rather the equivalent of it in English money, that is to say, £30, by delivering to them a cheque upon an English bank on the 7th of each month. That agreement will be embodied in an order of this Court. The question then remains as to whether or not any order should be made with regard to the costs of the proceedings. It is said on behalf of the respondent that the procedure adopted for the enforcement of the order of Gregory, J., will not lie and in fact it is incompetent for the Court to enforce an order of this character as for contempt.

It was very ably argued by Mr. Barwell that proceedings by way of contempt will still lie in this country for the enforcement of an order of this kind, and he bases his argument upon this footing that in England until the passing of the Debtor's Act in the year 1869 it was the practice to enforce orders for the payment of alimony pendente lite by means of proceeding in contempt, and that it was only by reason of S. 4 Debtors Act, that such procedure was abolished.

That would indeed appear to be the case and indeed Hill, J., so held in the case of Leavis v. Leavis which was decided in the year 1921 and is reported in 21, Pro. Div. It also appears from that case and from other authorities that although noncompliance with an order for payment of alimony cannot be enforced by attachment by reason of S. 4, Debtor's Act, it nevertheless remains a contempt and has certain effects as a contempt, as for example in preventing a contumacious respondent himself from obtaining relief. It is clear from the English authorities, which I need not go into in any detail, that other orders made by the Divorce Court in England, as for example, an order requiring a respondent to furnish security for his wife's costs, may still be enforced by proceedings for contempt of Court. From all the authorities it indeed appears that noncompliance with any order made by the Divorce Court in England is a contempt of Court, but so far as an order which directs the payment of money is concerned, although it is a contempt, it cannot be enforced by attachment.

Mr. Barwell argued that as there is no counterpart in this country of S. 4, Debtors Act of 1869, the English procedure not only survives but is imported into the machinery of the Courts of India, and that partly, if not wholly, by the operation of S. 7, Indian Divorce Act of 1879.

It is perhaps a little difficult to follow the reasoning of that argument, because Mr. Barwell admitted quite frankly and indeed there are plenty of authorities to show that S. 7 is concerned not with adjective law but with substantive law, and it applies to matters which are not specifically otherwise dealt with in the Divorce Act.

However, be that as it may, even if it were the intent of S. 7 to bring into this country all the rules of procedure in the Divorce Court in England, it would not avail the petitioner in the present instance, not only because it is no longer the practice in England to enforce orders for payment of money made by the Divorce Court by means of contempt, but because there is in the Indian Divorce Act itself an express direction as to the method by which orders of this kind are to be dealt with. S. 55, Divorce Act, provides that all decrees and orders made by the Court in any suit or proceeding's under this Act shall be enforced and may be appealed from in the like manner as the decrees and orders of the Court made in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction. They may be appealed from under the laws, rules and orders for the time being in force.

Therefore, in order to ascertain how orders made by the Court in any suit or proceeding under the Divorce Act should be enforced, it is necessary to turn to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure and to see how orders of the Court made in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction are to be enforced, and upon turning to the Code we find that by S. 36 it is laid down that the provisions of this Code relating to the execution of decrees, shall so far as they are applicable, be deemed to apply to execution of orders; and by S. 2, Cl. 14, "order" is defined as meaning a formal expression of any decision of the civil Court which is not a decree. There can be no doubt, in my opinion, that the order made by Mr. Justice Gregory on the 7th July was an "order" within the definition of S. 2, Cl. 14, and reading that in conjunction with S. 36 that order has to be enforced in accordance with the provisions of the Code relating to the execution of decrees, and there is an appropriate part of the Code dealing with the matter into which I need not go at the moment. Suffice it to say that the provisions relating to the execution of decrees for the enforcement of orders do not contemplate the Court dealing with the matter purely as one of contempt. On the contrary, there are various specific provisions laying down how the matter should be dealt with and how the debtor in default should be brought before the Court.

In these circumstances it seems to me that it is not competent for a Court to send a defaulting respondent to jail straightaway. The machinery dealing with the execution of orders must be complied with and then ultimately, if there is a failure to pay, the respondent may be committed to jail.

From what I have said the consequence is that these proceedings are in a sense misconceived. In so far as they purport to be an application to commit the respondent to jail they are not in order. I will also observe that the petition itself prays that there shall be an order directing payment, which is inconsistent with a proper application for commitment into prison as for a contempt. Having regard to all the circumstances I think the proper method of dealing with this question of costs is to say that there shall be no order as to costs.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff against the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge dismissing the suit. The suit was brought by the plaintiff against several defendants. Her allegation against defendant 1 was that defendant 1 was the shebait of three idols, Krishna Jiu, Krishna Ray Jiu and Gopal Deb Thakur and the properties in suit were the debutter properties of these three idols. Allegations were made against defendant 1 for misconduct and plaintiff brings this suit, the first prayer of which was that defendant 1 be removed from his office of shebait. The second prayer is that she being in the line of shebait be appointed shebait of these three Thakurs. There are various sets of other defendants in the suit. They are purchasers of various properties in private sales, sales in execution of decrees and otherwise of different portions of the properties in suit. These defendants have no connexion with each other. The prayer is that the properties have been wrongfully alienated by defendant 1 and that the plaintiff who asks herself to be appointed shebait of these three idols may be allowed a decree on behalf of the idols to recover possession of those properties. A large number of issues were framed which would be found at p. 29 of the paper book. Defendants 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 contested the suit. At their request certain preliminary issues, that is, 1, 2, 3, 4 and 13 were taken up by the learned Subordinate Judge for decision first. Issue 1 whether the plaintiff had any cause of action, was decided in her favour. Issues 2 and 3 related particularly to the question whether the suit was bad for multifariousness. Issue 4 was whether the suit as against defendant 3 was barred by limitation. The last issue was with regard to the question of res judicata which also was decided in favour of the plaintiff. No question arises before us with regard to the plaintiff's right to sue and with regard to the question of res judicata.

tion of multifariousness and the point of limitation. The Subordinate Judge decided those two questions against the plaintiff. He held that the suit as framed was multifarious and he asked the plaintiff to elect within a certain date as to which of the defendants she wanted to proceed against and to amend her plaint accordingly. The plaintiff did not do that within the time allowed and therefore the Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff appeals to this Court and on her behalf the principal argument is that her suit ought not to have been dismissed but the issues which affect the different defendants differently might have been separately tried. The argument of the learned vakil for the appellant shortly stated amounts to this, that if she brought a separate suit against defendant 1 for his removal from the office of shebait and obtained a decree, that decree would be of no use as against the defendants who are alienees of the properties which she alleges to be debutter. Therefore in their presence the questions whether defendant 1 was the shebait, whether the properties are debutter properties, whether he is liable to be removed and whether the plaintiff should be appointed the succeeding shebait on removal of defendant 1 are questions in which each set of defendants is interested, and if she brought separate suits alleging the same fact making these defendants separately parties in those suits then obviously the Court in the exercise of its discretion would have consolidated all these suits for trial of these common issues of fact and law; therefore it is not expedient that she should be compelled to bring the present suit against one set of defendants alone and bring other suits against the other different sets of defendants, as in that case those suits would again be consolidated and practically become one suit for the trial of the common issues. Her prayer therefore is that let the issues of fact and law which are common to all the defendants be tried together, and these are, as I have already said, whether the properties are valid debutter, whether defendant 1 was really the shebait and whether the plaintiff is entitled to have defendant 1 removed and next to have herself appointed as shebait. These questions should be tried. If the defendants have got separate defences, and it does not appear from the issues that any defence was raised that assuming that the properties were debutter the sale to any of the defendants was for legal necessity of the Thakurs—if, as I say, there are any questions special to be tried with reference to any particular set of defendants that question may be separately tried by the learned Judge in such a way as not to cause inconvenience to the other defendants. It seems to me that, having regard to the circumstances of this case, that is the proper procedure to be adopted. No doubt the suit can very well be described as multifarious as these defendants claim different properties under different sales, but there are these common questions of fact and law. Therefore it seems to us that it would not lead to a proper administration of justice to compel the plaintiff to bring separate suits in such a case as this, seeing that these separate suits would have to be consolidated afterwards.

The next question is with regard to the point of limitation and that arises in this way. The properties which defendant 3 purchased were attached in Money Execution Case No. 113 of 1921 in execution of a decree obtained against defendant 1. Defendant 1 as shebait of the idols put forward a claim to those properties. The claim was disallowed on 14th January 1922. The thakur was bound to bring a suit within one year under Art. 2, First Schedule to the Limitation Act. That has not been done, and defendant 3 purchased the property in execution of the decree for which the attachment was made. Therefore the Subordinate Judge held that the suit with regard to the properties in the possession of defendant 3 is barred by limitation. The argument on behalf of the appellant is that following the principle of the case of Vidya Varathi Thirtha v. Balusami Ayyar: 48 Indian Appeals 302 the succeeding shebait may bring a suit for recovery of the property as the cause of action would accrue to that shebait after the death of the present shebait. Whether that may be so or not it is unnecessary to discuss now. The point which now arises is that there is the order made under O 21, R. 63, Civil P. C., against the idols dismissing the claim case. The idols have not sued within one year for establishing title to the property. Therefore under the Limitation Act the idols' suit would be barred and consequently the plaintiff cannot as the prospective representative of the idols maintain the suit. The decision therefore of the Subordinate Judge on that issue appears to be right.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal is dismissed as against defendant 3 with costs. But the judgment of the Subordinate Judge dismissing the entire suit is set aside and the case sent back to the Subordinate Judge for decision of all the other issues of fact and law common to all the defendants in their presence and if there be any particular question of fact or law which would affect only one set of defendants to fix a different time for deciding this separate point without requiring the attendance of the other defendants. That may be done without any difficulty. We are not expressing any opinion with regard to the merits of the case which the Subordinate Judge himself has refrained from doing. It will be open to the Subordinate Judge to take such steps to ensure the recovery of costs of the defendants in case they are successful in this suit.

Having regard to the nature of the claim made in this case defendant 3 who is respondent 3 here is entitled to his costs of this appeal as well as his costs in the lower Court from the appellant. We assess the hearing fee of defendant 3 in this Court at five gold mohurs. The costs of this appeal as regards the other parties will abide the final result.

Judgment.—These are eight rules issued by this Court calling on the District Magistrate and also on the opposite parties to show cause why the order complained of, namely, that of the Deputy Magistrate of Serajgunge, dated 11th November 1927, discharging the accused under S. 253, Criminal P. C., should not be set aside or such other order made as to this Court might seem fit and proper.

The facts involved in these eight rules are the same and they may be conveniently disposed of by one judgment.

The petitioners are eight different taxpayers within the Serajgunge Municipality. The opposite party No. 1 is the Chairman of the Municipality, the opposite party No. 2 is the Warrant Bailiff and the opposite party No. 3 is the Tax Collector. They are the accused in these cases. The case for the prosecution is that the Chairman of the Municipality in direct contravention of the provisions of the Bengal Municipal Act realized certain arrears of taxes and costs by the issue of distress warrants and thereby committed an offence punishable under S. 384, I. P. C. The learned trying Magistrate was of opinion that under the provisions of S. 197, Criminal P. C. the sanction of the Local Government was necessary before any proceedings against the Chairman of the Serajgunge Municipality could be maintained. He thereupon dismissed the case against the Chairman. As regards the other two accused, the Magistrate was of opinion that they were only acting under the orders of the Chairman and there was no case against them. Against the orders of the trying Magistrate applications were made to the Sessions Judge of Pabna-Bogra under S. 436, Criminal P. C. but those applications were dismissed, as the learned Sessions Judge was of opinion that the orders of the trying Magistrate in these cases were correct.

The ground upon which the present rules have been issued by this Court is as follows, viz., that the Courts below were in error in holding that the Chairman of the Municipality was not removable from his office without the sanction of the Local Government. This ground does not obviously apply to the opposite parties Nos. 2 and 3. The record before us does not show that these accused, namely, opposite parties Nos. 2 and 3, were acting mala fide in the matter of the realization of the arrears of rates and taxes and in our opinion these rules must be discharged so far as opposite parties Nos. 2 and 3 are concerned.

The argument against the opposite party No. 1, namely, the Chairman of the Serajgunge Municipality, depends upon the answer to the question whether the Chairman of the Serajgunge Municipality is a public servant who is not removable from his office save by or with the sanction of the Local Government within the meaning of S. 197, Criminal P. C. There is no question that the acts alleged to have been committed by the Chairman were so done while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duties. Now under S. 19, Bengal Municipal Act (Bengal Act 3 of 1884), the Local Government may remove a Commissioner appointed or elected under the Act if such Commissioner has been guilty of misconduct in the discharge of his duties or of any disgraceful conduct. Under S. 20 the Commissioner of the Division may remove any Commissioner in the circumstances referred to in the sub-clauses to the section. Under S. 23, sub-Cl. 2, the Commissioners of certain Municipalities not included in Sch. 2 of the Act are entitled to elect one of their number to be Chairman or may, whenever a vacancy occurs, at a meeting attended by not less than two-thirds of the Commissioners request the Local Government to appoint a Chairman and such Chairman shall be appointed by name. Under S. 23, sub-S. 3, the Local Government may at any time remove a Chairman appointed by it. Now it appears that the name of the Serajgunge Municipality is not included in Sch. 2 of the Act and therefore it is apparent that the Commissioners of the Serajgunge Municipality are entitled to elect one of their number to be their Chairman. The opposite party No. 1 is an elected Chairman of the Serajgunge Municipality. Under S. 24, an elected Chairman may be removed from his office by a resolution of the Commissioners in favour of which not less than two-thirds of the whole number of the Commissioners have given their vote at a meeting specially convened for the purpose; but the removal under this section of a Chairman from office is by S. 59 of the Act subject to the approval of the Local Government. It is argued that in certain circumstances the elected Chairman qua a Commissioner of the Municipality can be removed by the Commissioner of the Division under S. 20 of the Act, and if that is so the elected Chairman of the Serajunge Municipality can hardly be described as a public servant who is not removable from his office save by or with the sanction of the Local Government. In support of this contention reliance is placed on the case reported in Mahomed Yasin v. Emperor (1) where it was held that no sanction was necessary under S. 197, Criminal P. C., to prosecute the Chairman of a Union Committee who is removable from office in certain circumstances under S. 18, Bengal Act 3, 1885 by the Commissioner, though he is also removable in other circumstances under S. 18-A of the Act by the Lieutenant Governor. In our opinion the case last mentioned is easily distinguishable from the present case. The question in this case is whether the Chairman of the Serajunge Municipality as Chairman can be removed by the Commissioner of the Division. He is clearly not so removable. If he is to be removed the procedure indicated in S. 24 of the Act must be resorted to. The question really is not of the removal of the Chairman qua Commissioner of the Municipality concerned and it would appear from a consideration of the sections referred to above that the Commissioner of the Division is not the proper authority to take action for his removal. It follows from what has been stated above that in our opinion the opposite party No. 1 is a public servant within the meaning of S. 197, Criminal P. C., who is not removable from his office save by or with the sanction of the Local Government. No such sanction was obtained in these cases and the result is that the ground upon which these rules were issued fails and the same must accordingly be discharged.

Appeal No. 2052 of 1925, Decided on 22nd February 1928, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Jessore, D/- 29th April 1925.

(a) Life Insurance—A mere nominee in a life insurance policy cannot enforce his claim against the company, he being no party to the contract and no interest is created in his favour.

A person who is nominated by an assured in his policy of life assurance for receiving money due under it upon his death is not entitled to enforce his claim against the company as he, though a nominee, is no party to the contract and no interest passes to him merely by reason of his being named in the policy and the money forms part of the assets of the deceased and is liable for his debts: Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, (1892) 1 Q. B. 147, Foll., (Case-law discussed.) [P 521 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C., S. 60—Scope—Creditors of the sons of a deceased assured can attach money payable under the policy

There is nothing in S. 60, Civil P. C., preventing the creditors of the sons of the deceased assured from attaching money payable under it. [P 521 C 2; P 522 C 1]

(c) Married Women's Property Act, S. 6—Policy effected in 1910—Hindu widow claiming assured's money as a nominee—Widow was held not entitled to money as the Act did not apply (see Act 18 of 1923).

A Hindu assured directed an insurance Company to pay money due under his policy effected in 1910 to his wife as the nominee of the assured. The wife claimed the amount on the death of the assured contending that Women's Property Act applied and under S. 6 of the Act trust had been created in her favour.

Held: that the wife was not entitled to the money as the Women's Property Act did not apply and there was no trust in her favour by virtue of S. 6. [P 521 C 2]

Rupendra Kumar Mitter—for Appellants.

Karunamoy Ghose—for Respondent.

C. C. Ghose, J.—In this case the main contention that has been urged on behalf of the two defendants who are appellants before us is that the money payable under a policy of insurance, being policy No. 4667, issued by the Hindusthan Co-operative Insurance Society Limited, did form part of the assets of the estate of one Behary Lal Sircar deceased and that his widow Pramila

Bala Dassi had no rights therein. In order to understand the precise significance of this contention it is necessary to set out the facts giving rise to the litigation out of which the present appeal has arisen. It appears that one Behari Lal Sircar insured his life on 29th March 1910 for a sum of Rs. 500. The material words of the policy, with which we are concerned are as follows :

The Society hereby guarantees to insure that if the insured pays to the society at their office in Calcutta on the 5th day of March 1910 each succeeding year up to and including the year of his death the sum of Rs. 21 and 11 annas only or in lieu of any such annual premium the full number of instalments thereof as may be agreed upon (of which agreement the receipt granted by the Society shall be full and sufficient evidence) then upon proof to the satisfaction of the office committee of the Society of the death of the insured and the title to the policy, the Society will pay to Srimati Pramila Bala Dassi, wife of the insured (hereinafter called the nominee) at the head office of the Society, in Calcutta or at the permanent residence of the nominee whichever may be preferred the sum, of Rs. 500 only together with such additional sum or sums by way of profits as, according to the Society's regulations may accrue and become payable in respect of the policy, after deducting therefrom (1) the balance of the premium, if any, payable in respect of the year of the insured's death; and (2) also other sum or sums, if any, due from him to the Society.

The assured paid all the premiums due on the policy till his death which took place some time in 1924 B. S. He died leaving him surviving the plaintiff, Pramila Bala Dassi, his widow, and three sons. The sons were his heirs under the Hindu law. On the death of the assured the plaintiff claimed the amount of the said policy and it appears that the Insurance Society were about to make payment to the plaintiff. Defendants 1 and 2 who had obtained a decree against the sons of the deceased and defendant 3 who had also obtained another decree against them attached the amount payable under the policy in execution of their two decrees. The plaintiff thereupon preferred a claim under the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, but her claim was disallowed and the money due under the policy was rateably distributed among the three execution creditors. Thereafter the present suit was brought by the plaintiff for declaration of her title to the amount payable under the said policy and for recovery of the money from the creditors.

In the Court of first instance the plaintiff's suit was contested only on behalf of defendants 1 and 2 and it was held that the money due under the policy became the property of the plaintiff on the death of the deceased and did not form part of the assets of the estate left by him. The decree of the first Court ran as follows :

Plaintiff to get a decree for the sum of Rs. 173-0-9 with proportionate costs for plaintiff and pleader's fees, whole cost of the suit necessitated by the contest from defendants 1 and 2; and Rs. 326-15-3 with proportionate costs for the plaintiff and pleader's fee from defendant 3.

The lower appellate Court affirmed the decree of the first Court. Defendant 3 does not challenge the decree of the lower appellate Court and, as stated above, defendants 1 and 2 are the appellants before us. On their behalf it is contended that having regard to the authorities, viz., the cases reported in Jiban Krishna Mullick v. Nirupama Gupta (1), Shankar Visvanath v. Umabai Sadashiv (2), and Ishani Dasi v. Gopal Chandra (3), it ought to be held that, having regard to the words used in the policy, there was no trust created in favour of the plaintiff and that she was not entitled to realize the money in question from the Insurance Society and that the said money formed part of the assets of the estate of the deceased. On the other hand, it has been contended on behalf of the plaintiff respondent that she was beneficially interested on the said policy and that she alone was entitled to enforce the claim arising thereunder. It has further been argued that the Married Women's Property Act of 1874 applies to this case and that therefore it cannot be questioned that there was a trust in favour of the plaintiff and that the latter was entitled to realize the money in question from the Insurance Society. It has also been contended that under the Civil Procedure Code the execution creditors were not entitled to attach the amount of the policy in execution of their decrees.

The question depends on whether the plaintiff was entitled to enforce her claim against the Insurance Society. If she was, then there could be no question that the money due under the policy belonged to her and did not form part of the assets of the estate of the deceased. The plaintiff was no doubt the nominee of the deceased; but she was no party to the contract between the deceased and Insurance Society. Under the English law if A contracts with B for a benefit to be given to C, although that was the object and purpose of the contract, C may not sue on that contract unless in certain excepted cases. The excepted cases are these: where you can read on the whole of the deed or contract that the contracting party really was a trustee for a third person, then the third person may sue. An illustrative case of this description is the case of Fletcher v. Fletcher (4). In that case a man covenanted with the trustee or a person whose name was introduced as trustee that after his death £60,000 of his property should be handed to that trustee in trust for the natural children of the covenanting party. It was held by Wigram, V. C., that, looking at the whole scope and purpose of the deed, it amounted to a declaration of trust by the covenanting party for his natural children and that the latter had a perfect right to sue to enforce the trust, although it was a voluntary trust. The second exception in the case of children under a marriage settlement where persons in contemplation of marriage make a settlement by way of contract only for the benefit of, amongst others, the children of the marriage.

In English law the children of the marriage are said to be within the marriage consideration; everybody who is considered to be within the immediate purpose and intent of a marriage settlement is treated as a person from whom consideration moves to the contracting party and therefore the children of the marriage are treated as if they themselves although, of course, they are not then in existence, had given valuable consideration for the contract in the marriage settlement. This last second exception is referred to by Cotton, L. J., in the case of Andrews v. Andrews (5), where his Lordship observed as follows:

As a rule, the Court will not enforce a contract as distinguished from a trust at the instance of persons not parties to the contract.

Collier v. Countess of Mulgrave (6) is an example of this. The Court would probably enforce a contract in marriage settlement at the instance of the children of the marriage; but if so, this is an exception from the general rule in favour of those who are specially the objects of a marriage settlement.

In the case of Orr v. Union Bank of Scotland (7) it was held that the mere payment of money by A to B who is not C's agent with a direction to pay it to C is revocable and 'confers no right of action upon C': see Moore v. Bushell (8); and for the application of the same doctrine in equity see Hill v. Royds (9). It is unnecessary for me to multiply cases, but the law on the subject will be found in 7, Halsbury 342, and the illustrative cases collected in 12, English and Empire Digest, p. 44, et. seq.

It is said, however, that in India the law is somewhat different and in support of this contention the case of Deb Narain Dutt v. Chuni Lal Ghose (10), is referred to. That case was decided after the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Khawaja Mahommed Khan v. Husaini Begum (11). As I read this last case, it was a case of a contract between A and B whereby it was intended to secure a benefit to C as a cestui que trust and the question arose whether C was entitled to sue in his own right to enforce the trust. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held that under the agreement executed by A certain immovable property was specifically charged for the payment of allowance which A bound himself to pay to the plaintiff and that the plaintiff was the only person beneficially entitled under it. The plaintiff was C. Their Lordships observed as follows:

First, it is contended on the authority of Tweddle v. Atkinson (12) that as the plaintiff was no party to the agreement, she cannot take advantage of its provisions. With reference to this, it is enough to say that the case relied upon was an action of assumpsit, and that the rule of common law on the basis of which it was dismissed is not, in their Lordships' opinion, applicable to the facts and circumstances of the present case. Here the agreement executed by the defendant specifically charges immovable property for the allowance which he binds himself to pay to the plaintiff; she is the only person beneficially entitled under it. In their Lordships' judgment, although no party to the document, she is clearly entitled to proceed in equity to enforce her claim.

In the case of Deb Narain Dutt v. Chuni Lal (10) the transferee of a debtor's liability had acknowledged his obligation to the creditor for the debt to be paid by him under the provisions of a registered instrument conveying to him all the moveable and immovable properties of the original debtor and the acknowledgment had been communicated to the creditor and accepted by him. In these circumstances it was held that the obligation undertaken by the transferee was for and intended to be for the benefit of the creditor and the creditor was entitled to sue the transferee on the registered instrument. The facts in Deb Narain Dutt's case (10) were somewhat peculiar and at first sight it may seem that the decision proceeded on the difference between 'consideration' as defined in English law and as defined in the Contract Act. But a closer examination of the case justifies, in my opinion, the criticism passed on it by Page, J., in the case of Jiban Krishna v. Nirupama (11) and the judgment, when properly analysed, does not really go beyond the terms of the actual decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Khawaja Mahomad Khan v. Husaini Begum (11). The same remarks apply to the case of Dwarika Nath v. Priyanath (13). In this connexion reference may be made to an English case where the facts were as follows: A tradesman made a will bequeathing an interest to M, his wife's sister. M married. Her husband and the testator entered into partnership articles with a proviso that, if the testator should die during the partnership, his widow should be entitled to his interest. It was held by Turner, V. C. [Page v. Cox (14)] that the effect of the agreement between M's husband and the testator was to create an obligation in equity upon the surviving partner and in that respect it did not differ from a trust, i.e., that the partnership articles created a trust in favour of the widow. He further held that a trust could not be the less capable of being enforced because it was founded on contract.

(14) 10 Hare 133=33 E. R. 832.

The point now before us for determination is, in my opinion, covered by authority [see Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association (15)]. There the money due under a life assurance policy was payable to a wife, if living, otherwise to the legal personal representative of the assured. Lord Esher, M. R., observed as follows:

The contract is with the husband and with nobody else. The wife is no party to it. The promise is one which could only take effect upon the husband's death and therefore it must be meant to be enforced then. Apart from any statute the right to sue on a contract would clearly pass to the legal personal representatives of the deceased. It does not seem to me that apart from any statute such a policy would create any trust in favour of the wife. The husband might have altered the destination of the money at any time and might have dealt with it by will or settlement. I think that, apart from any statute, no interest would have passed to the wife by reason merely of her being named in the policy.

This case has been followed in Bombay in the case of Shankar v. Uma Bai (2) and in Calcutta in the case of Eshani Dasi v. Gopal Chandra Dey (3). In my opinion I can see nothing in the present case which would justify me to distinguish it from the cases referred to above. The result is that the first contention on behalf of the respondent must be negatived.

The second contention is that the Married Women's Property Act of 1874 is applicable to this case and that by virtue of S. 6 of the Act a trust has been created in favour of the plaintiff. Of course, if this contention is well founded, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. In my opinion, the correct rule has been laid down by Fletcher and Richardson, JJ. in the case of Eshani Dasi v. Gopal Chandra Dey (3) and for the reasons given by them I am of opinion that the Married Women's Property Act does not apply to this case and that the plaintiff cannot invoke in aid the provisions of S. 6 thereof. In other words, we ought not to follow the decision reported in Balamba v. Krishnayya (16). The second contention urged on behalf of the respondent must also be negatived.

The third contention is absolutely devoid of substance and there is nothing in S. 60, Civil P. C., which could prevent the creditors of the son of the deceased from attaching the money payable under the policy.

In my opinion, this appeal succeeds and must be allowed with costs. Defendants 1 and 2 will also be entitled to the costs in the Courts below.

Raikin, C. J. — I agree. Cl. (d), S. 2, Contract Act, widens the definition of "consideration" so as to enable a party to a contract to enforce the same in India in certain cases in which the English law would regard that party as the recipient of a purely voluntary promise and would refuse to him a right of action on the ground of nudum pactum. Not only, however, is there nothing in S. 2 to encourage the idea that contracts can be enforced by a person who is not a party to the contract but this notion is rigidly excluded by the definition of "promisor" and "promisee." The decision of Tweedle v. Atkinson (12) was a decision at law and was unaffected by the rules of equity. For this reason the Judicial Committee in Khwaja Muhammad Khan v. Husaini Beyum (11) regarded it as inapplicable to the facts of the case before them where the agreement included a specific charge on immovable property. In my judgment it is erroneous on the basis of that case or on the observations of Jenkins, C. J., in Deb Narain Dutt v. Chuni Lal Ghose, 41 Calcutta 137, to suppose that in India persons who are not parties to a contract can be admitted to sue thereon, except where there is an obligation in equity amounting to a trust arising out of the contract. I say nothing as to whether special rules of law may be applicable to communities among whom marriages are contracted for minors by parents and guardians, but, putting aside such cases, I see no reason to think that the law in India contains a series of exceptions to the principle that a contract can only be sued upon as such by a party thereto. A trust may be founded on a contract and is capable of being enforced by a party to the trust in appropriate proceedings as was pointed out in Page v Cox (14). It is another matter altogether to say that a person not a party to a contract may bring a suit upon the contract by reason of near relationship to the promisee. Nearness of relationship is a fact which, like many other facts, cannot be disregarded in determining the question whether or not a trust arises out of or is founded on a contract, but it has no other importance. Cases such as the present can be decided, and ought to be decided, on the settled principles of equity. In Cleaver's case (15) the Court considered whether the policy amounted to a trust for the widow and having found that it did not, determined the matter by the ordinary law of contract. This in my judgment is the only method which can be justified in principle. To hark back to such cases as Dutton v. Poole (17) and Browne v. Mason (18) is in my judgment a clear mistake and the mistake is not cured by the circumstance that under the Contract Act the definition of "consideration" is wider than in English law.

Swarnamanjuri Dassi — Claimant—Appellant.

Secy. of State—Opposite Party—Respondent.

Appeal No. 24 of 1926, Decided on 22nd December 1927, from original decree of President, Calcutta Improvement Tribunal, D/- 17th November 1925.

(a) Land Acquisition Act, S. 23—In calculating the price of a property which is subject to a lease, rent ought to be taken into consideration.

It is an absurd thing to say that the lease should not be taken into consideration at all and in calculating the price of a property which is subject to a lease, the rent derived by the landlord should be taken into consideration in arriving at the value of the property.

(b) Land Acquisition Act, S. 23—Market value is one which a willing purchaser will pay to a willing seller.

The market value of the land acquired is the price that the owner willing, and not obliged to sell, might reasonably expect from a willing purchaser with whom he was bargaining for the sale of the property: (Case-law discussed).

(c) Land Acquisition Act, S. 23—Market value—Land to be acquired likely to continue to produce rent—Rent is basis on which the value will be calculated.

If the land which has been taken is likely to continue to produce rent which is being paid for it, the rent does offer the basis on which the value will be calculated : Earl of Eldon v. N. E. Ry. Co. (1899) 80 L. T. (N. S.) 723, Foll. [P 525 C 2]

B. B. Ghosh, J.—This is an appeal on behalf of claimant 1 under the Calcutta Improvement (appeal) Act, against the judgment of the Calcutta Improvement Tribunal modifying to some extent the award made by the Collector for the acquisition of certain premises in Lower Chitpore Road and Chhatawalla Gales in this town under the Calcutta Improvement Act. The appellant was the owner of the premises. She as administratrix of the estate granted a lease for 99 years to one Elias of these premises under an Indenture dated 1st March 1920. The lessee paid a selami of Rs. 5,000 for the lease on 22nd September 1919. The rent reserved was the net amount of Rs. 2000 per month. There was a stipulation in the lease that the lessee was to build structures on the demised premises at a cost of one lac of rupees within a certain period, and as security for the performance of that agreement he had to deposit Rs. 50,000 with some bank. Apparently this was done. Subsequently under the Calcutta Improvement Act, a scheme for acquisition of the lands was sanctioned on 20th January 1922 and a declaration for the acquisition was made on 10th January 1923. The Collector made an award in favour of the appellant to the extent of Rs. 3,14,000 odd plus the statutory allowance. The claimant asked for a reference, and on the reference the Tribunal varied the award of the Collector by adding to the award Rs. 19,000 odd with the usual interest and statutory allowance. The Collector made a separate award of Rs. 18,500 in favour of the lessee, claimant 2 who had also asked for a reference to the Tribunal and whose claim for the excess amount was rejected in its entirety. Claimant 2 has also appealed against that judgment and his appeal which is No. 32 of 1926 will be dealt with separately.

It is argued on behalf of the appellant that in determining the market value under S. 23, Land Acquisition Act, the learned President of the Tribunal in his judgment has not taken into consideration the lease in favour of claimant 2 under which the appellant was entitled to the net income of Rs. 2,000 per month; and it is urged that the President has not acted according to the correct principle of valuation of the property acquired under the Land Acquisition Act. What the learned President has done is, according to this contention, to ignore the lease altogether; and it is submitted for the appellant that the President has entirely gone wrong in doing so. The President has stated in the greater portion of his judgment that this lease with reference to which claimant 1 pressed him to arrive at the valuation of the property should not be taken into consideration. In enunciating the mode in which the valuation should be made, the learned President has made certain observations to which no exception can possibly be taken and to which no exception was taken in the course of the argument. What was objected to was that the learned President had, in certain other portions, misstated the principles, which should guide him in arriving at the valuation: For example, when he states at p 68 that in deciding what price a purchaser will pay for a property which is under a lease, the purchaser will not be guided by the terms of the lease, because the President assumes that when the purchaser desires to purchase, the lease should be surrendered to the lessor for no considerations whatsoever. Again in another portion of his judgment, he observes that in the case of a perpetual lease at a fixed rent the lease should not be taken into account, because if that is done, it would lead to the absurd result that the value would be the same for all time to come unless something happened to alter the security.

It is contended that the President has gone wholly wrong in his view. If the property acquired is subject to a perpetual lease bringing a fixed income and the security is not impaired, the value must be calculated upon the basis of the income derived and the fluctuation can only be with regard to the number of years' purchase that the property would fetch at the time of acquisition; that is, if money is plentiful the property may be sold at 20, 30 or even 40 years' purchase, if money is scarce the property may be sold at 10 or 15 years' purchase; but at all times the basis of the calculation must be the income derived from the lease. It seems to me that the President is wrong in his view that in calculating the price of a property which is subject to a lease, the rent derived by the landlord should not be taken into consideration in arriving at the value of the property. Take for instance a property which has been leased out at a very profitable rent permanently. The rent is well secured, may be as a charge upon some other property of the lessee, then the leasehold falls into decay and the income derived by the lessee amounts to nothing. If this property is sold, would it be right to say that this property should be sold for nothing and the lease should not be taken into consideration at all? If that were so, I think that would lead to an absurd result. Take another instance, if the Secretary of State happens to take a lease of a house as is often done in this city, for a particular purpose, and if the lease is taken at a time when rent rules high and the lease is taken for a period of 99 years and subsequent to that, rent falls and the value of landed properties falls consequently, can it be said that at that time if the Secretary of State seeks to acquire that property under the Land Acquisition Act, his liability to pay rent at the high rate contracted for in the lease should be ignored altogether and he can get the property at a low valuation which may be fixed at the time when it is acquired? I think that it also would be an absurd thing to say that the lease should not be taken into consideration at all.

It is further contended on behalf of the appellant that the learned President has fallen into another error in arriving at the valuation, as he has taken into account only the fact as to what a purchaser would pay for the property at the time of the acquisition and not what the loss to the seller would be at that point of time. Mr. Langford James who appears for the Secretary of State has conceded and very rightly that the President is wrong so far as he states that the lease should not be taken into consideration; but he contends that the lease is not the only factor which should be taken into consideration. There cannot be any dispute as regards that proposition. Mr. Langford James further contends that although the President has gone wrong in his view that the lease should not be taken into consideration at all and also that he has gone wrong in his reading of the result of the cases cited by the President in his judgment, he has as a matter of fact taken the lease into consideration while dealing with some of the arguments addressed to him on behalf of the appellant and, therefore, his judgment cannot be assailed as on a question of law. I shall consider that point presently. But before I do so, I would like to point out the principle of valuation of lands acquired, which has been laid down authoritatively in a number of cases. Mr. James refers to the case of Kailash Chandra Mitra v. Secy. of State (1) where Sir Lawrence Jenkins observes that the market value of the land acquired is the price that the owner willing, and not obliged to sell might reasonably expect from a willing purchaser with whom he was bargaining for the sale of the property. That proposition cannot be disputed. Again, it has been decided in the case of Government of Bombay v. Merwanji Muncherji Cama (2) that there is no difference between the term "value to the owner" as used in the Lands Clauses Act in England and the expression "market value" as used in S. 23, Land Acquisition Act. Therefore in arriving at the market value of the property, it must be considered what the owner was actually receiving from the property and what would be the amount of loss to him by the acquisition. The same thing was laid down in the case of Secy. of State v. Shanmugaraya Mudaliar (3), where their Lordships observed that the District Judge was right in estimating rent for the whole of the land instead of taking the rent actually received for a part by the owner in coming to his conclusion as to the valuation of the property acquired. It was, their Lordships stated, the best, if not the only, method he had for getting at the "market value of the ownership." Lastly I should refer to the case of Narsingdas v. Secy. of State (4). At p. 824 their Lordships of the Privy Council observe:

Now the principle upon which the valuation of the property compulsorily acquired should be measured has been repeatedly laid down by this Board and by the House of Lords.

To use the words to be found in Fraser v. City of Fraserville (5):

It is the value to the seller of the property in its actual condition at the time of its expropriation with all its existing advantages and with all its possibilities excluding any advantage due to the carrying out of the scheme for the purposes for which the property is compulsorily acquired.

The decision in Fraser's case was that of the Judicial Committee and it was pronounced by Lord Buckmaster himself who also delivered the judgment in the case of Narsingdas. It has therefore been laid down by the highest authority which we are bound to follow that the value to the seller of the property in its actual condition at the time of the sale should be taken into consideration in arriving at the market value. It is not necessary for me to cite all the other cases which have been referred to at the Bar in order to substantiate the proposition submitted for our consideration that it is the value to the seller which should be taken into consideration. But I would refer to one other case only which is instructive as regards the manner in which the matter should be considered. It is the case In re Athlone Rifle Range (6). There the question arose with regard to the acquisition of a certain land of which the Secretary of State for War was the lessee. It is unnecessary to state the facts in detail. But there the question arose whether the Secretary of State who was the lessee could be taken as having surrendered the lease at the time of the acquisition and thus reduce the amount of compensation that the owner of the land would otherwise get for the property acquired. The Master of the Rolls in dealing with this argument on behalf of the Secretary of State says:

If the clause of surrender and all the covenants in the lease are gone then the rent is gone also and the arbitrator is bound to deal with the land as free of rent which would amount to an estate in possession. That would be a good way of getting at the land for less than is paid for it as rent, apart from the circumstance that Percy is entitled to a beneficial lease. But is that a sound application of the law? It is not; because, though the service of notice to treat makes the Secretary of State the equitable owner of the land, the interest he takes is subject to the lease, and the assessment of compensation is not to be made as of a date subsequent to the service of notice to treat. But the circumstances are to be considered as they existed at the date of the notice, that is immediately before its service. That was the very case in Penny v. Penny (7), referred to by Mr. Bowen; and Earl of Eldon v. N. F. Ry. Co. (8) is an authority for the proposition that if the land which has been taken is likely to continue to produce rent which is being paid for it, the rent does offer the basis on which the value will be calculated.

It seems to me, therefore, that the learned President is not right in the way in which he proceeded to make the valuation by ignoring the lease altogether.

Mr. James, however, contends that the lease cannot be treated as the only basis for making the valuation. For example, what the appellant wanted in the lower Court was to have the valuation made on the basis of 20 years purchase of the rents reserved in the lease and that appears to have been the contention of Sir Benode here at the opening. Mr. Langford James has argued that the lease is certainly a factor to be taken into consideration, but that other matters should also be considered as to whether the lessee was likely to continue to get the rent reserved having regard to the circumstances disclosed, that is to say, whether the personal liability which the lessor undertook by his covenant in the lease is to continue to be of any value for the entire period of the lease, or whether there was any chance of the lessor losing the income stipulated in the lease after the expiry of Mr. Elias's life. Further it should also be taken into consideration as to whether the solvency of Mr. Elias himself would continue for any appreciable period of time. I quite agree with this contention. No doubt these factors should be considered along with the income derived from the lease itself in order to arrive at the proper valuation of the property. But it is contended by Sir Benode on behalf of the appellant that although these other matters put forward by Mr. James should be considered, the President has ignored the lease altogether and there he has gone wrong. He has not considered the lease; he has not considered the other circumstances also. It seems to me that the appellant is correct in the contention he makes.

(8) [1899] 80 L. T. (N. S.) 723.

I must now deal with the argument of Mr. James that the learned President has actually taken the lease into consideration although he said it should not be done. He has apparently done so, but it seems to me he has done it in a very round about way. In dealing with the argument of the advocate for the claimant that the lease amounted to an absolute sale to the lessee and the rent was a mere annuity, the learned President has observed that in finding the present value of the annuity the rate of interest to be taken cannot be less than that of a mortgage on the property which in Calcutta is ordinarily in the neighbourhood of 8 per cent. Mr. James has argued upon this that the President has taken the lease into consideration and holds that having done so he would give the valuation at the rate of 8 per cent. It may be possible to support the judgment in that way. But as it seems to me to be quite clear that the President has approached the question from a wrong point of view, it would not be proper for us to hold that he did consider the lease in arriving at the true valuation of the property. Similarly in dealing with another argument of the advocate for the claimant the learned President observes:

When the rent has been fixed at an amount which is in excess of the present capacity of the land, the consideration of the security of rent would be entirely absurd and the personal security of the lessee would be the primary guarantee for such a rent.

and for the capitalization of the income the rent should be on very much the same footing as an unsecured annuity which must rank much lower than interest on Government securities and so forth. It may be that the learned President was dealing with the lease in the same roundabout way as he did when considering the other argument on behalf of the claimant. But as in the major portion of his judgment he has elaborately discussed the question as to whether the lease should be taken into consideration in arriving at the valuation of the property and has rejected it I do not think it would be right for us to hold that his judgment takes the correct view of the principle of valuation and should be supported. One of the assessors agreed in the view of the President and the other assessor understood the judgment of the President to have laid down that the lease should not be taken into consideration at all.

Under these circumstances I think that the judgment of the tribunal should be set aside and the case sent back to that tribunal for dealing with the question of valuation in the light of the observations made above. The lease in question should be taken into consideration and also the other circumstances which would afford the basis for coming to the proper valuation of the land as I have indicated above.

The costs of all Courts will abide the final result.

Cammiade, J.—I am also of the opinion that this case must go back for a reconsideration of the question of valuation on the footing of the lease executed by the tenant, Elias, in favour of the first claimant. It is true that in the judgment delivered by the learned President of the tribunal a reference has been made to this lease and the learned President has made certain observations from which it may be taken that his opinion was that even if the lease was taken into consideration, the valuation based on it would not amount to more than the valuation arrived at by him. It appears, however, from the wording of his judgment that the lease has not been considered in all its aspects and in all its bearings in regard to the question at issue. There is the undoubted fact that the property at the time of acquisition yielded a monthly rent of Rs. 2,000 clear to the first claimant and this rent was reserved to the claimant for a period close upon a century. This matter could not be left out of consideration by any person seeking to purchase the land as an investment, because there would be a ready return for his money for a number of years. This of course assumes that the tenant is a solvent person, a question which has also to be gone into in deciding how far the lease should be taken into consideration in calculating the present market value of the land.

There is also the fact that according to the terms of the lease the tenant is bound to erect buildings at a cost not below one lac of rupees. This is also a factor which the intending purchaser would take into consideration; and it is one which the learned President has entirely overlooked. At how many years' purchase an intending purchaser would purchase the property which was subject to a lease for a long term of years is a question which can only be answered by taking evidence as to the general custom of business with the purchasers in Calcutta; and this is a matter which the learned President will have to look into and if it is necessary he would have to take evidence on the subject.

Appeal No. 125 of 1926, Decided on 23rd March 1927, from appellate order of Dist Judge, Zillah Cachar, D/- 19th December 1925.

An adjustment which does not consist of stipulations that had been carried out but consists merely of terms that had to be carried out in future does not come within the purview of O. 21, R. 2, but may come within the purview of O. 23. The adjustment referred to in O. 21, R. 2, is such an adjustment as completely or partly extinguishes the decree under execution and cannot mean an adjustment to give effect to the terms of which would be to create a new decree at variance with the decree under execution and which will again have to be executed: (1915) M.W.N. 225, Rel. on. [P 523 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C., O. 23, R. 4—Adjustment before a decree—Cognizance cannot be taken by an executing Court—Separate suit to restrain the decree-holder from executing the decree must be filed.

If an adjustment be taken as having been prior to the decree, then it is in effect an agreement not to execute the decree which in future would be passed, and such an agreement cannot be taken cognizance of by an executing Court but to avail of it the judgment-debtors will have to institute a separate suit, to restrain the decree-holder from executing the decree: 31 Cal. 179; 29 Cal. 810, Rel. on.; 22 Bom. 463 (*F. (c) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 2—Adjustment not certified—Executing Court cannot inquire even if fraud is imputed to the decree-holder.

It is not competent to a Court executing a decree to enquire into the fact of a payment or adjustment which has not been certified as required by O. 21, R. 2, even if fraud is imputed to the decree-holder: 21 C. L. J. 462; 21 Mad. 409; 29 Mad. 812; 36 Mad. 357; 49 Mad. 548 and 5 P. L. J. 70, Rel. on. [P 530 C 2]

Sarat Chandra Roy Choudhury and Satyendra Kishore Ghose—for Appellants.

Gunada Charan Sen and Priya Nath Dutt—for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.—This appeal has been preferred by the judgment-debtors from an order passed by the District Judge of Cachar affirming on appeal an order passed by the Sadar Munsif at Silchar overruling the judgment-debtors' objection in connexion with certain execution proceedings. The proceedings in the Courts below have been so irregular that it is necessary to set out the facts somewhat in detail in order to understand what has exactly happened. The execution proceedings relate to a decree that was passed on 23rd November 1921, in a suit which had been instituted by two persons Aliraja Choudhury and Elim Miah Chowdhury as the plaintiffs against Mansur Miah, Abdul Jalil and Azizur Rahman as the principal defendants. The decree declared the plaintiffs' right of easement on a certain pathway, directed the removal of certain obstructions that had been caused therein and granted a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from putting up such obstructions in future. The defendants thereupon preferred an appeal from the aforesaid decree to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Cachar. During the pendency of this appeal one of the defendants, namely, Mansur Miah died and at the hearing of the said appeal it was represented to the Court on behalf of the defendants that there had been adjustment of the said decree and that, therefore, the appeal would not be proceeded with. The adjustment was thus brought to the notice of the Court on 7th May 1923, and on that day the Court disposed of the appeal in the following words:

Appellant's pleader says that he will not proceed with the appeal as his clients who are alive informed him that there has been a compromise out of Court. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed for default.

From the certified copy of this order which is on the record it appears that the order was shown to two pleaders, one Babu R. R. Dutt and the other Babu B. L. Dhar and they put down their initials under the said order with the endorsement "Seen." It may be presumed that these two gentlemen were the pleaders of the parties to the said appeal. On 15th September 1923, an application was filed purporting to have been made by the two decree-holders Aliraja Chowdhury and Elim Miah Choudhury for the execution of the said decree. On 13th November 1923 the two defendants Abdul Jalil and Azizur Rahman who were then the surviving judgment-debtors, Mansur Miah having died, as I have already stated, during the pendency of the appeal, objected to the execution going on, on the ground that the decree that was sought to be executed had been adjusted out of Court by the judgment-debtors having given the decree-holders a pathway somewhat different from what had been awarded to the decree-holders by the decree and because on accepting the same the decree-holders had given up their claim to the decretal costs. This objection was taken up for the consideration by the learned Munsif before whom five witnesses were examined on 8th December 1923. The fact that the said witnesses were examined appears from the record of the depositions of the said witnesses but it is curious that the order-sheet does not contain any entry under that date showing that any witnesses had been so examined. One of these witnesses so examined was one of the decree-holders Elim Miah who supported the objection that was put forward on behalf of the judgment-debtors and who stated that there had been such an adjustment and who further represented to the Court that his name had been signed in the execution proceedings by his son, but that he himself did not want to proceed with the execution. The record does not show that the learned Munsiff arrived at any finding on the question as to whether there was such an adjustment or not. But on 10th December 1923, an application was put in on behalf of the judgment-debtors in which they stated that if the Court would care to go to the locality it would be apparent to the Court that there had been such an adjustment and that the parties had been acting upon the said adjustment for a good long time. The Munsif went to the locality on 24th December 1923 as appears from certain statements that are to be found in the petitions that were subsequently filed on behalf of the parties. I may note here again that this local investigation is not referred to in the order-sheet of these execution proceedings and there is no trace whatsoever therein as to what transpired in the course of this local investigation.

The next order in the order-sheet which has any bearing on this matter is dated 5th January 1924 which shows that on that date a petition was filed on behalf of the judgment-debtors stating that on the spot at the time of the local investigation there were certain proposals for giving the decree-holders another pathway and that the said proposals had been accepted and the ultimate result of the negotiations was embodied in a draft agreement a copy of which was filed along with the petition. The judgment-debtors prayed that effect might be given to this agreement that was reached between the parties on the local investigation as aforesaid. On this the decree-holders took time once on 5th January 1924 till 12th January 1924, again on 12th February 1924 and thereafter again on 12th February 1924 till 1st March 1924. On this day the Court made an order to the effect that the parties should bring evidence to prove the compromise mentioned in petition 210. Petition 210, it may be stated, was the petition which had been filed on behalf of the judgment-debtors on 5th January 1924 alleging that there had been a compromise on the spot and filing along with it the draft agreement to which I have already referred. Thereafter the matter was again adjourned from time to time till 10th May 1924. On the last mentioned day an objection was taken on behalf of the decree-holders that the compromise could not be given effect to by reason of the provisions of O. 21, R. 2, Civil P. C. This objection must have referred not to the compromise that was alleged to have been arrived at on the spot because that was in the course of the execution proceedings themselves and the fact that there had been such a compromise was brought to the notice of the Court well within 90 days from the date on which it had been arrived at but it must have referred to the earlier adjustment which is said to have taken place during the pendency of the appeal. There is a note of this objection in the ordersheet, but it does not appear that the Court came to any finding as regards this objection at any time during the pendency of the proceedings.

We find next that after several adjournments of these proceedings, on 17th May 1924 three witnesses were examined in the case, namely, two on behalf of the judgment-debtors and the decree-holder Aliraja Chakudhury himself—all these witnesses having deposed to the adjustment that was alleged to have been arrived at on the spot during the local investigation. On 2nd June 1924, the learned Munsif disposed of the case holding that there was no doubt about the compromise but that the compromise could not be given effect to inasmuch as the terms thereof were at variance with the terms of the decree and because to allow this compromise to stand would be to substitute for the decree in execution a new executable decree which is not permitted under the law. He referred to the decision in the case of Ladd Govindoss Krishnadoss v. Ramdoss Vishnadoss (1). The judgment-debtors thereupon preferred an appeal to the District Judge who affirmed the decision of the Munsif holding that the compromise had not been satisfactorily proved and further that even if it was proved, the agreement could not be acted upon because it was arrived at in the course of execution proceedings. He relied upon the aforesaid case reported in Ladd Govindoss Krishnadoss

v. Ramdoss Vishnadoss (1) as also on the provisions of O. 23, R. 4, Civil P. C. From this order the present appeal has been preferred on behalf of the judgment-debtors.

Now, as regards the adjustment which is sought to have been arrived at on the spot during the local investigation we have looked into the terms of the compromise that is alleged to have been so arrived at and which are embodied in the draft agreement that was filed on behalf of the judgment-debtors and we find that the adjustment did not consist of stipulations that had been carried out but consisted merely of terms that had to be carried out in future. Such an adjustment does not come within the purview of O. 21, R. 2, Civil P. C., and must, if at all, come within the purview of O. 23 of the Code. Under O. 23, R. 4, however, the provisions of that order do not apply to execution proceedings. The reason of the provision contained in O. 23, R. 4 is that O. 21, R. 2 and S. 47 taken together provide a complete procedure for recording compromises arrived at in execution proceedings. The adjustment referred to in O. 21, R. 2 is such an adjustment as completely or partly extinguishes the decree under execution and cannot mean an adjustment to give effect to the terms of which would be to create a new decree at variance with the decree under execution and which will again have to be executed. The view taken in the case reported in 23 I. C. 376, in my opinion, is correct and accordingly even if the latter compromise or adjustment is said to have been proved, in view of the terms thereof, it cannot be given effect to in the course of the execution proceedings.

Turning now to the earlier adjustment, namely, the one which is said to have taken place while the appeal was pending: it was argued before us on behalf of the appellants that the said adjustment should have been given effect to by the learned Munsif. On behalf of the respondent it has been urged that having regard to the conduct of the judgment-debtors as disclosed in the statement which they made in the petition that they filed in the executing Court after the local investigation was held, it should be held that the judgment-debtors no longer relied upon the earlier adjustment, but only relied upon the latter one as affording a bar to the execution proceedings. Having examined the materials that are on the record it is not possible for us to hold that the judgment-debtors ever abandoned the position that they had taken up in the first instance, namely, that the decree under execution had already been adjusted before the appeal was disposed of. I am, therefore, of opinion that this argument advanced on behalf of the respondent should not be allowed to prevail. The question then is whether this adjustment can be taken cognizance of by the executing Court and if so, what is the order that we should pass.

It has been argued on behalf of the decree-holders that this was an adjustment which took place before the appellate decree was passed and therefore the objection that such an adjustment stood in the way of execution of the decree is really an objection under S. 47 as to the executability of the decree itself and it need not be certified to the Court under the provisions of O 21, R. 2, Civil P. C. This contention, in my opinion, is not well founded. For if the adjustment be taken as having been prior to the decree, then it was, in effect, an agreement not to execute the decree which in future would be passed. According to the uniform current of authorities of this Court such an agreement cannot be taken cognizance of by an executing Court but to avail of it the judgment-debtors will have to institute a separate suit, to restrain the decree holders from executing the decree: see Hassan Ali v. Ganzi Ali (2) and Benode Lal Pakrashi v. Brajendra Kumar Saha (3) though the other High Courts have taken a different view on this point (e.g., Laldas v. Kishordas (4), Subramania Pillai v. Kumara Velu (5), Chidambaram Chettiar v. Krishna Vathiyar (6) and Gavri Singh v. Gajadhar Das (7)).

It has next been contended on behalf of the decree-holders that inasmuch as fraud was alleged, O. 21, R. 2, has no application and that on account of the allegation of fraud the matter is brought within the purview of S. 47, Civil P. C. This proposition also is not well founded because although it has for its support some earlier cases of the Bombay and the Madras High Courts, it is well settled now, the decisions of this Court having all along been consistent on this point, that it is not competent to a Court executing a decree to enquire into the fact of a payment or adjustment which has not been certified as required by O. 21, R. 2, even if fraud is imputed to the decree-holder, Biroo Gorain v. Jaimural Koer (8), Jogendra v. Ashutosh (9), Periatambi v. Vellaya (10), Ganapathi Aiyar v. Chenga Reddi (11), Budruddin v. Gulam Mohideen (12), Mehbunissa Begam v. Mahednissa (13) and Imamuddin v. Bindabasini (14).

The last contention on behalf of the appellants is of considerable substance. Having regard to the fact that the adjustment was notified to the appellate Court at a time when that Court was in seisin of the whole case and the statement that there had been such an adjustment not having been objected to on behalf of the decree-holders as is clear from the endorsements "Seen" of their pleaders to which I have already referred, the said representation made to the appellate Court may well be taken in connexion with the subsequent petition that was filed before the executing Court and the two together may be regarded as satisfying the requirements of O. 21, R. 2, Civil P. C. That this position is maintainable has been held by this Court in the case of Biroo Gorain v. Jaimural (8). The facts of that case are exactly on all fours with the facts of the present case. I am therefore of opinion that the adjustment cannot be said to be one which has not been duly certified within the meaning of O. 21, R. 2 of the Code. As the learned Munsif does not seem to have arrived at any finding on the question of fact, namely, as to whether there had been such an adjustment or not the proper order to pass in this case, in my opinion, is to set aside the orders passed by both the Courts below and to direct Criminal Revn. No. 41 of 1928, Decided on 2nd May 1928, from order of Dy. Magistrate, Howrah, D/- 13th September 1927.

Calcutta Municipal Act (1899), S. 193—Person in Calcutta tendering for goods to be supplied to the Howrah Municipality—Sale of goods to the Municipality in pursuance of the tender—Such person cannot be held to be carrying on business in Howrah and so cannot be prosecuted for not having a license.

A person who carried on business in Calcutta tendered for certain goods to be supplied to the Municipality of Howrah. His tender was accepted and, in pursuance of the contract between the parties, the person sold goods from time to time to the Howrah Municipality. The Howrah Municipality asked him to take out a license and prosecuted him for his failure to do so :

Held : that the person could not be said by any stretch of language to be one who carried on business in Howrah and, therefore, the prosecution could not stand. [P 531 C 2]

Judgment—This is a rule against an acquittal. What happened in this case is this : The opposite party are a firm who carry on business in Calcutta. They tendered for certain goods to be supplied to the Municipality of Howrah. Their tender apparently was accepted and, in pursuance of the contract between the parties, the opposite party have sold goods from time to time to the Howrah Municipality. It is said on behalf of the Howrah Municipality that the opposite party who supply goods to the Howrah Municipality pursuant to the orders received in Calcutta carry on business in Howrah. A statement of this nature carries its own refutation and it is unnecessary to pursue the point further. The opposite party cannot be said by any stretch of language to be people who carry on business in Howrah. It follows, therefore, that the order made by the Deputy Magistrate on 13th September 1927 complained of by the Howrah Municipality cannot in any way be interfered with. The result is that this rule is discharged.

Judgment.—This is plaintiff's appeal against the decision of the District Judge of Chittagong dated 14th August 1925 which affirmed a decision of the Munsif of Faticokhari dated 27th August 1924.

Plaintiff brought the suit in which this appeal arises to recover possession of the disputed land from the defendants on the ground that he is a raiyat and that the predecessor of the defendants Rahamat Ali had dar-raiyati right under him and that Rahamat Ali having died the defendants have acquired no right to the dar-raiyati as the said interest is not heritable.

The defence of the defendants was that the plaintiff was a raiyat at fixed rate in respect of the land in suit. He granted a permanent and heritable jotedari right to the defendants' predecessor Rahamat Ali by a patta executed in the year 1258 M. E.=1896 and the plaintiff was estopped from denying defendants' title to the land and from claiming khas possession. The Munsif held that the plaintiff was a raiyat at fixed rent and was competent to grant a permanent heritable lease to the defendants' predecessor. To this suit for khas possession a claim for arrears of rent for 1283 and 1284 M. E. was joined. The Munsif dismissed plaintiff's claim for khas possession and decreed the claim for arrears of rent.

An appeal was taken by the defendant to the District Judge. The learned District Judge held that the status of the plaintiff was not that of a raiyat at fixed rent, but was that of an occupancy raiyat. The learned District Judge, however, came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was estopped from setting up that the interest created by the patta was dar-raiyati and dismissed plaintiff's appeal.

A second appeal has been taken to this Court and it has been strenuously argued by the learned vakil for the appellant that the patta on the face of it shows that the interest of plaintiff's predecessor was that of a raiyat and that therefore the patta which purported to grant a permanent heritable dar-raiyati lease contravened the provisions of S. 85, Ben. Ten. Act, and could not be admitted in evidence and is not operative as a permanent lease between the plaintiff and the defendants' predecessor and on the death of the defendants' predecessor the tenancy must be taken to have been terminated. Reliance is placed on the decision of the Full Bench in Chandra Kanta v. Amjad Ali (1), and it is contended that the present case is governed by the first of the three propositions laid down by the Full Bench. I cannot accept this contention, for it would appear from the statements contained in the patta of 1258 that plaintiff represented to the defendants' predecessor Rahamat Ali that his status was not that of an ordinary occupancy raiyat, but of a raiyat whose interest was transferable, for it is stated that it was the original raiyati of Abinas Chandra Acharjya and had been purchased at an auction by Sarat Chandra Mahajan. The lease which was granted to Rahamat Ali was described as "bundobasti istemrari daimi kayemi harsana jotedari" The word "daimi" means relating to what is perpetual the perpetual settlement of the revenue. See Wilsons, Glossary, p.119.

So it was intended to convey the notion of fixity of rent. The word "daimi" imports the notion of fixity of rent. It is stated that in certain localities in Chittagong kayemi raiyats have written leases at fixed rates of rent so that plaintiff by the patta purported to grant a permanent lease with a fixed rental and he represented that his own interest was that of a raiyat whose interest was transferable: see District Gazeteer of 1903 (Chittagong), 152. These representations would certainly convey the impression that the plaintiff was a raiyat at a fixed rent. The learned District Judge says, the only way in which the terms of the patta can be made consistent is by interpreting raiyati to mean raiyati at fixed rent.

The plaintiff in his evidence does not deny that he represented himself to have mokarari rights; on the contrary he says that he does not know whether his interest is mokarari or not. Plaintiff's raiyati was acquired by auction purchase by his brother Sarat. The sale certificate has not been produced, and the fact that permanent lease at a fixed rental was being granted in respect of a raiyati which was transferable carries with it the plainest implication that the raiyati was a raiyati at a fixed rent, which alone is transferable under the law without the consent of the landlord. The case, therefore, falls within the second proposition laid down by the Full Bench as the patta was granted by the plaintiff who, on the face of the document, professed to have a higher status than that of a raiyat and consequently the defendant may rightly invoke the doctrine of estoppel and plead that the plaintiff cannot be permitted to prove that his status was not that of a raiyati at fixed rent.

The defendants' predecessor and the defendant after his death had been in possession since 1888 under the patta. I think the lower appellate Court has put a correct interpretation on the patta. The appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeals Nos. 736 to 740 of 1925, Decided on 3rd August 1927, from appellate decrees of 2nd Sub-Judge, 24-Parganas, D/- 19th December 1924.

Bengal Tenancy Act (8 of 1885), S. 46—Suit for ejectment—Court should first determine fair and equitable rent and decree for ejectment should not be passed if the tenant agrees to pay such rent.

In a suit for ejectment of non-occupancy tenant, before passing a decree under S. 46, Cl. (6), the Court should determine the fair and equitable rent and fix a time within which the tenants are to appear and signify their election to pay the rent so determined. The Court may record an order in the ordersheet determining what the fair and equitable rent is. If the tenants do not appear within the time fixed by the Court and recorded in the order determining fair and equitable rent or appear and signify their unwillingness to accept the fair and equitable rent determined by the Court, then the Court should pass a decree in ejectment. But such a decree should not be passed where the tenants agree to pay the fair and equitable rent fixed by the Court before ejectment.

Ram Chandra Majumdar, Rama Prasad Mukhopadhyaya and Mahendra Kumar Ghosh—for Appellants.

Mitter, J.—These five appeals arise out of five suits brought by the plaintiff-company in the Court of the Munsif of Basirhat, for enhancement of rent of the tenants-respondents, who are non-occupancy raiyats, after service of notice under S. 46, Ben. Ten. Act. The plaintiff company tendered to the tenants-respondents in each of five suits an agreement to pay enhanced rents and the tenants-respondents within three months before the institution of each suit refused to execute the agreement. Thereupon the plaintiff-company brought five suits for determination of fair and equitable rent and for ejectment in case the tenants-respondents failed to pay the fair and equitable rent determined by the Court under S. 46, Cl. (6), Ben. Ten. Act. Decrees were passed in each of the five suits to the effect that if the tenants-respondents agreed to pay the rent determined under S. 46, Cl. (6), they shall be entitled to remain in possession of the holding at that rent for a term of five years from the date of the agreements respectively, but, on the expiration of the terms, shall be liable to ejectment, unless they have acquired a right of occupancy and that if the tenants did not agree to pay the rent within the time fixed by the Court they would be ejected at the end of the agricultural year in which the decree was passed. The tenants did not appear to signify their election to pay the fair and equitable rent within the time fixed by the Court in each of the five suits and notwithstanding this the Court refused to pass decrees for ejectment. The Court of first instance held that the tenants-respondents may signify their election to pay the fair and equitable rent before the decree for ejectment is actually passed and the Court had power to enlarge the time for signifying election. In this view the trial Court refused to pass decrees for ejectment in the five suits.

Appeals were taken to the Subordinate Judge of 24-Parganas against the decrees of the Munsif refusing ejectment and the Subordinate Judge affirmed the decrees of the Munsif.

Five second appeals have been preferred to this Court by the plaintiff-company and it is argued by Mr. Ram Chandra Majumdar, who has appeared on behalf of the plaintiff-company, that the decrees of the Courts below refusing ejectment are wrong, as the Court had no power to extend the time fixed in the decrees for the tenants to signify their election. The argument is put in this way: It is said that the Courts below are in error in holding that two decrees are contemplated by S. 46, Ben. Ten. Act. It is argued that the decrees having fixed a time for signifying election and having prescribed ejectment as the penalty for non-compliance within the stipulated time with the order of the Court, the Courts below were bound to pass decrees for ejectment. It is said that there is no provision in the Bengal Tenancy Act, for enlarging the time fixed by the decree for signifying willingness to pay the fair and equitable rent determined by the Court and that S. 148, Civil P. C., does not apply where time is allowed for doing an act fixed by a decree of the Court. In support of this contention our attention has been drawn to notes under S. 148, Civil P. C. (Mulla's edition), where authorities in support of this contention are cited. The point made in the argument is that the Court has no power to extend the time fixed by its decree. Mr. Majumdar, however, has very fairly drawn our attention to the fact that his client, the plaintiff company, treated the decrees passed in these five suits as conditional decrees for ejectment and applied for final decrees, as the time for signifying election granted by the Court had expired.

It is said that, though the plaintiff company might have misread the law and had made an application for a final decree, the law contemplates only one decree and when in S. 46, Cl. (8), it is said that if the raiyat does not agree to pay the rent so determined the Court shall pass a decree for ejectment, the willingness to agree or otherwise must be signified before the decree is passed. It seems to me that the Act contemplates that before passing a decree for ejectment the Court shall determine what is a fair and equitable rent: see S. 46, Cl. (6), Ben. Ten. Act. Under S. 46, Cl. (8), if the raiyat does not agree to pay the rent so determined, the Court shall pass a decree for ejectment. If a certain time is allowed in this case for signifying the election to execute the agreement for enhanced rent, it seems only logical that after the expiration of the period a decree for ejectment should be passed. In other words, the scheme of the Act seems to be this: It provides that before ordering ejectment the Court shall determine what is a fair and equitable rent. Keeping this intention of the legislature in view, I think, the proper procedure ought to be this: Under S. 46, Cl. (6), the Court should determine the fair and equitable rent and fix a time within which the tenants are to appear and signify their election to pay the rent so determined. This may be a fortnight or a month from the date of the determination of the fair and equitable rent. Whether it is necessary or advisable to serve notice on the tenants of the rent fixed and the date by which their election has to be signified is a matter of discretion in the circumstances of each case. The Court may record an order in the ordersheet determining what the fair and equitable rent is. It is not necessary that a preliminary decree be passed determining what the rent is. The Bengal Tenancy Act does not either prohibit or enjoin the passing of a preliminary and a final decree. If the tenants do not appear within the time fixed by the Court and recorded in the order determining fair and equitable rent or appear and signify their unwillingness to accept the fair and equitable rent determined by the Court, then the Court should pass a decree in ejectment. Under S. 44, Cl. (d), a non-occupancy raiyat shall be liable to ejectment on the ground that he has refused to agree to pay a fair and equitable rent determined under S. 46, so that he could not be ejected until an opportunity is given to him to agree to pay the fair and equitable rent within a certain period, after which an effective decree for ejectment can only be passed. S. 46, Cl. (6), only contemplates the determination of what rent is fair and equitable for the holding; Cl. 8 contemplates that if the raiyat does not agree to pay the rent so determined then a decree for ejectment could be passed and Cl. (10) provides that the decree for ejectment shall take effect from the end of the agricultural year in which it was passed.

It seems to me, whether the Bengal Tenancy Act contemplated one decree or two decrees, under S. 46, Ben. Ten. Act, in the present cases, the plaintiff company proceeded on the footing that there are two decrees in each suit and the objection does not come from it with good grace that there should be only one decree in each case. As the tenants-respondents had agreed to pay the fair and equitable rent fixed by the Court before ejectment, they ought not in the circumstances of the present cases to be ejected. The result is that, in my opinion, the appeals should fail and should be dismissed, but without costs, as the respondents have not appeared.

It is said by Mr. Majumdar that these are test cases and we should express our final opinion on the question. While dismissing these appeals on their special facts, I have indicated what the proper procedure is which should be followed in suits for enhancement of rent and ejectment under S. 46, Ben Ten. Act.

Appeals Nos. 571 to 573 of 1925, Decided on 2nd August 1927, from appellate decrees of Sub-Judge, Sylhet, D/- 4th November 1924.

Cosharers — Separate occupation of a cosharer even after objection from his cosharers and in defiance of their claim to be in joint possession of the land — Cosharers who are excluded and ousted from joint possession can bring a suit to obtain joint possession of the property—Whether there is exclusion or ouster depends upon circumstances of each case.

If one cosharer separately occupies a portion of the common land without objection from his cosharers, and with their express or implied consent, he is not to be subjected to a suit in which the plaintiffs claim joint possession of the plot of which the defendant is in sole occupation. If the separate occupation of the defendant is with the tacit or express assent of his cosharers, and the cosharers are dissatisfied with the manner in which the joint land is being held in possession by tenants-in-common, their proper remedy is to bring a suit for partition. On the other hand, if the separate occupation of a cosharer is continued after objection from any of his cosharers and in defiance of their claim to be in joint possession of the land, then the cosharers who are excluded and ousted from joint possession are entitled to bring a suit to obtain joint possession of the property. Braja Lal Chakrabarty and Birentra Kumar De—for Appellant.

Gunada Charan Sen and Priya Nath Dutta—for Respondents.

Page, J.—This is an appeal from a decree of the learned Subordinate Judge of Sylhet, affirming a decree of the learned Munsif of Habiganj. The suit was brought by one cosharer in order to obtain joint possession of what was admitted to be joint property from another cosharer, upon the ground that the defendant cosharer had excluded and ousted the plaintiff from his right to joint possession of the land in dispute. It appears that the plaintiff and the contesting defendant were two of three cosharers entitled as tenants-in-common to certain ejmali land. On a portion of the joint property there was a person in occupation who was possessed of a non-transferable occupancy title, and the tenant used to pay rent to the three cosharers. The contesting defendant, now the appellant, purchased the tenure, and after the purchase the tenant abandoned his holding. Thereupon, the appellant went into possession of the land, and has been cultivating it in khas possession. The purchase of the holding by the appellant, and the abandonment by the tenant took place in 1911, and the present suit was brought in 1921. Notwithstanding the labours of the learned advocate for the respondent no evidence has been brought to our attention of any claim by the plaintiff to joint possession of this land during those ten years. Nevertheless, the learned Judges in the lower Courts have held as a matter of fact that the plaintiff respondent was excluded and ousted by the appellant from joint possession of this plot of land. The learned Subordinate Judge passed the following observations in the course of his judgment:

The appellant purchased the tenants' holdings which were abandoned by the original tenants. So defendant 2 virtually expelled the common tenant, and possessed himself to the exclusion of the plaintiffs. Therefore the plaintiffs were ousted from the lands in suits by act of defendant 2.

Now, to hold that a cosharer is in possession of part of the common land to the exclusion of the other cosharers, in my opinion, is much the same thing in the eye of the law as saying that he has ousted his cosharers, for to exclude is to "keep out", to oust" to put out" of possession. But to find that a co-tenant is in sole occupation of part of the joint land may or may not, according to the facts of the particular case, be the same thing as to say that he is in exclusive occupation of the property or has ousted his cosharers from the property. If the Court were to hold that evidence of separate occupation was necessarily proof of ouster it seems to me that the difficulties which are great enough as matters now are) attendant upon the joint occupation of joint property would become insuperable. For whenever a cosharer is found to be in sole occupation of part of the common land he will be deemed to have ousted therefrom his cosharers. In my opinion, according to well-settled law, if one cosharer separately occupies a portion of the common land without objection from his cosharers, and with their express or implied consent, he is not to be subjected to a suit in which the plaintiffs claim joint possession of the plot of which the defendant is in sole occupation. If the separate occupation of the defendant is with the tacit or express assent of his cosharers, and the cosharers are dissatisfied with the manner in which the joint land is being held in possession by the tenants-in-common, their proper remedy is to bring a suit for partition. On the other hand, if the separate occupation of a cosharer is continued after objection from any of his cosharers and in defiance of their claim to be in joint possession of the land, then the cosharers who are excluded and ousted from joint possession are entitled to bring a suit to obtain joint possession of the ejmuli property: see the case of Bisanta Kumari Dassya v. Mohesh Chandra Shaha (1). Whether there is exclusion or ouster depends upon the circumstances prevailing in the particular case under consideration. Now, in the present case, the appellant has been in sole occupation of the property in dispute. The question, therefore, is one of fact: Was that separate occupation such that it amounted to an exclusion or ouster of the respondents or not?

The learned Subordinate Judge has held that the separate occupation of the appellant amounted to ouster because, as I understand his judgment, by reason of the separate occupation by the appellant the respondents have been deprived of their share of the profits of the land. The question at once arises: Have the respondents asked for joint possession? The answer is that they have not. The learned advocate for the respondents have been unable to point to any claim by the plaintiffs either to joint possession, or to a share in the profit of the land in suit, or to any objection to the occupation by the appellant of the land in suit throughout the ten years which elapsed after the appellant went into possession of the land. In my opinion, in such circumstances, there is no room for a finding that the appellant excluded the respondents from joint possession of the property; and the mere fact that the appellant is found to be in sole occupation of the land is not to be regarded as proof that he has either excluded or ousted the respondents from joint possession thereof. The ground, therefore, upon which the lower Courts have based the finding of ouster cannot stand. The learned advocate on behalf of the respondents, however, has urged that, if this finding cannot stand, the proceedings should be remanded in order that there should be a finding upon the issue whether or not having regard to the evidence on the record there was a claim or objection by the respondents, or an assertion of an adverse or exclusive title by the appellant to this parcel of land which would amount to an exclusion or ouster at law. I should have thought that a remand would have been the right course if the learned advocate for the respondents had been in a position to point to any evidence upon the record which, if believed, would justify a finding upon that issue in their favour. Notwithstanding his researches and those of his junior, however, not a shred or tittle of evidence has been brought to our attention which would support the plaintiffs' case on such an issue. In the circumstances, in my opinion, we should not be justified in remanding this case for further consideration. In my opinion, inasmuch as the plaintiffs-respondents have failed to prove exclusion or ouster from the plot of land of which the defendant-appellant has been for this long period in sole occupation, their claim in the suit to be given joint possession fails.

The appeal, therefore, will be allowed the decrees of the lower Courts set aside and the suit will be dismissed with costs in all the Courts.

This judgment will also govern the other two analogous appeals.

Graham, J.—Though there is a clear finding in the judgment of the Court of appeal below in regard to ouster I agree that in the proper sense of the word no ouster has been proved in this case, nor does it appear that there are any materials whatever on the record to justify the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge on the point. I agree with my learned brother that the appeals succeed and must be allowed.

Appeal No. 1360 of 1925, Decided on 12th August 1927, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Nadia, D. 11th March 1925.

(a) Specific Relief Act, S. 41—Section applies only when plaintiff is suing to cancel an instrument.

Section 41 is not ad rem, for it applies to proceedings in which plaintiff is seeking the cancellation of an instrument. It does not apply to a suit where the plaintiff is not seeking the cancellation of an instrument but dis-regards it as a nullity: 30 Cal. 539 and 31 Cal. 329, Foll. [P 538 C 1]

(b) Specific Relief Act, S. 41—Contract by minor—Restoration was not ordered.

The doctrine that "those who seek equity must do equity" does not apply to a contract by a minor as the Court cannot say that it is equitable to compel a person to pay money in respect of a transaction which, against that person, the legislature has declared to be void: 30 Cal. 539 (P. C.), Foll. [P 538 C 2]

(c) Evidence Act, S. 115—Suit by a minor without a next friend—Defendant, though aware of plaintiff's minority, not raising objection as to the maintainability of the suit—He cannot raise this objection for the first time on appeal.

Proceedings in a suit instituted by a minor, and not by the minor's next friend in his name, are not void. The policy of the legislature in enacting O. 32 was that where a minor has instituted a suit in his own name the proceedings in normal cases should not be treated as abortive, but that an opportunity should be given to constitute the suit in the regular manner. O. 32, R. 1, is intended for the protection and benefit of the defendant. But the ground upon which the protection is afforded to the defendant in a suit instituted by a minor is removed when the defendant at all material times is aware or has received notice, of the minority of the plaintiff and yet elects to proceed to trial and take his chance of obtaining a decree in his favour on the merits without raising any objection to, or issue upon, the maintainability of the suit and prefers the objection for the first time on appeal when the trial has gone against him: 22 Cal. 270, and 19 Mad. 127, Bel. on. [P 539 C 1]

Radha Binode Pal and Bhupendra Kishore Basu—for Appellants.

Santosh Kumar Bose and Radika Ranjan Guha—for Respondents.

Page, J.—On 21st January 1920 the appellants Fuli and Amini, who were minors, executed a kobala by which they transferred to the respondents their shares of a ryoti interest in certain lands that they had inherited. Fuli was born on 21st December 1902 and Amini on 7th March 1905. It was alleged by the respondents that Rs. 950 was paid as consideration for the transfer, and both the lower Courts have held that part, but not the whole, of this sum was received by or on behalf of the appellants.

On 24th January 1923 the appellants brought the present suit against the respondents claiming a declaration that they were entitled to their respective shares in the property, and joint possession with their cosharers, whom they impleaded as pro forma defendants. They also claimed damages and mesne profits against the respondents. When the suit was filed the appellants' mother, Bhadi, was joined as a co-plaintiff, but subsequently she withdrew her claim. The trial Court dismissed Fuli's claim and decreed Amini's claim in part; but the lower appellate Court rejected the claims of both of the appellants, and dismissed the suit with costs. From that decree the appellants have preferred the present appeal.

The kobala in suit was executed by Fuli, and on behalf of Amini by her husband as her guardian. But as the husband of a minor is not her guardian under Mahomedan law, and the lower appellate Court has found that both Fuli and Amini were minors at the time when the kobala was executed, it was conceded that the kobala was null and void as against both the appellants.

I went to the Sub-Registrar for registering the document. As he found me minor he then asked my mother about my age, and said that if she stated my age as major he could register it. My mother then told my age as 17 to 18 years to him.

Now, it is admitted that Fuli would not be estopped by a misrepresentation as to her age made by her mother, Ram Charan Das v Joy Ram Majhi (1), and there is no finding, and no evidence to justify a finding, that either Fuli or Amini herself made any representation as to her age to the respondents, or that Fuli's conduct was such as would render her amenable to the rule of estoppel by negligence: Gregg v. Wells (2), Freeman v. Cooke (3). The interesting question that was much canvassed at the hearing of the appeal, whether a minor is a "person" within S 115, Evidence Act (1 of 1877), therefore, does not arise. Brohmo Dutt v. Dharmodas Ghose (4), Dadasaheb Dasarathrao v. Bai Nahani (5), R. Leslie v. Sheill (6). There being no evidence or finding that either of the appellants was guilty of misrepresentation or fraud prima facie the appellants are entitled to succeed.

Two contentions, however, have been raised by the respondents in support of the decree of the lower appellate Court: (i) that as a condition precedent to passing a decree in their favour the Court ought to require the appellants to repay to the respondents the moneys which they respectively have received as consideration for the transfer, either under S. 41, Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877) or pursuant to the principle that "those who seek equity, must do equity"; (ii) that as the suit was instituted by Amini who was then a minor, and not by her next friend acting in her name, she is not entitled to any relief in the suit which, so far as she is concerned, must be treated as a nullity.

The answer to the first contention is not far to seek. S. 41, Specific Relief Act, is not ad rem for it applies to proceedings in which the plaintiff is seeking "the cancellation of an instrument" whereas in the present suit the appellants are not seeking the cancellation of the kobala, which is void and may be disregarded by the appellants as a nullity. Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (7), Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Krishna Mahishi Deli (8). The attempt of the respondents to pray in aid of their case the equitable doctrine that "those who seek equity must do equity" is countered by the decision in Thurston v Nottingham Permanent Benefit Building Society (9). In that case the plaintiff, a minor, in order to be enabled to purchase some land, and to complete the building of houses in course of erection thereon, applied to the defendants for a loan, and executed a mortgage of the property in their favour to secure advances up to a limit of £1,200. On attaining her majority the plaintiff brought a suit against the defendants in which she claimed a declaration that the mortgage was void, and that she was entitled to possession of the mortgaged property. The defendants did not allege that the plaintiff had been guilty of any fraud or misrepresentation in connexion with the transaction. It was held that to the extent to which the money advanced by the defendants had been paid to the vendor to complete the purchase the plaintiff could not affirm the purchase and repudiate the advance, and that she must repay to the defendants the money so advanced. The defendants contended, however, that the plaintiff ought to be compelled to refund also the moneys advanced by the Society upon the security of the mortgage after the purchase had been completed. This contention was rejected, Romer, L. J. observing, that the short answer is, that a Court of equity cannot say that it is equitable to compel a person to pay any moneys in respect of a transaction which, as against that person, the legislature has declared to be void. (ibid p. 13).

The law thus enunciated by Romer, L. J., has been affirmed in ipsissimis verbis both by the house of Lords: Thurston v Nottingham Permanent Benefit Building Society (10) and by the Privy Council: Mohiri Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (7): see also Guru Shiddswami v. P. D. Narendra (11), and concludes the matter against the respondents.

In support of their second contention, which prevailed in the lower appellate Court, the respondents relied upon the language in which O. 32, R. 1 is couched; and urged that all proceedings in a suit instituted by a minor, and not by the minor's next friend in his or her name, are void and of no effect, and, therefore, that Amini's suit must fail. In my opinion, however, there is no substance in this contention. The policy of the legislature in enacting O 32 was that where a minor has instituted a suit in his own name the proceedings in normal cases should not be treated as abortive, but that an opportunity should be given to constitute the suit in the regular manner.

The reason why no proceeding can be taken by an infant without the assistance of a next friend is, as stated in Daniell's Chancery Practice, 6th Edn. p. 105 "on account of an infant's supposed want of discretion, and his inability to bind himself, and make himself liable for costs." And it would seem that the rule was intended for the protection and benefit of defendants; for it has been held that when a defendant waives this benefit and protection the suit may proceed without a next friend. [Per Sale, J. in Doorga Mohun Dass v. Tahir Ally (12).]

But the ground upon which protection is afforded to a defendant in a suit instituted by a minor is removed when the defendant at all material times is aware, or has received notice, of the minority of the plaintiff, and yet elects to proceed to trial and take his chance of obtaining a decree in his favour on the merits without raising any objection to, or issue upon, the maintainability of the suit; and prefers the objection for the first time on appeal when the trial has gone against him. These, however, are the circumstances obtaining in the present case; for it would appear that the respondents, one of whom is a close relation of the appellants, were fully aware of the age of each of the appellants, and, at any rate after the additional plaint was filed, cannot be heard to say that they had not received notice of the dates upon which Fuli and Amini respectively were born. Moreover, before the suit was heard Amini had attained her majority, and became bound by the decrees and others passed therein. Too often in this country is a suit won or lost because the form has been allowed to swallow up the substance of the case. No doubt, rules and regulations are necessary, and useful when sensibly applied. But let there be too rigid an adherence to the technicalities of the law and litigation tends to become as uncertain in its event as a game of chance; to the detriment of justice, and the consternation of litigants. That ought not to be. This contention of the respondents, to my mind, is misconceived and cannot be sustained either on principle or on authority. Kamalakshi v. Ramasami Chetti (13). Doorga Mohun Dass v. Tahir Ally (12).

For these reasons, the appeal must be allowed, the decree of the lower appellate Court set aside, and the decree of the trial Court varied. Each of the appellants is declared entitled to an one anna ten gandas one kara and $6\frac{1}{2}$ dantis share of the property in suit, and to joint possession thereof with their cosharers. No sum is awarded to the appellants for damages or mesne profits. The respondents will pay the appellants' costs in all the Courts.

Appeal No. 1601 of 1925, Decided on 5th January 1928, from appellate decree of 2nd Sub-Judge, Tippera, D/- 31st March 1925.

(a) Decree—Setting aside—Once a decree is passed the suit cannot be dismissed unless the decree is reversed on appeal—Any party can apply to have it enforced.

After a decree has once been made in a suit, the suit cannot be dismissed unless the decree is reversed on appeal. The word "family" as used in S. 4 ought to be given a liberal and comprehensive meaning, and it includes a group of persons related in blood, who live in one house under one head or management. It is not restricted to a body of persons who can trace their descent from a common ancestor; and it is not necessary for the members to constitute an undivided family that they should constantly reside in the dwelling house, nor is it necessary that they should be joint in mess. It is sufficient if the members of the family are undivided qua the dwelling house which they own; and it is the ownership of the dwelling house and not its actual occupation which brings the operation of the section into play; and the object of the section is to prevent a transferee of a member of a family who is an outsider from forcing his way into a dwelling house in which other members of his transferor's family have a right to live: 12 C. Judgment.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit which was instituted for partition of certain homestead lands, to a one third share in which the plaintiffs had been declared entitled to in a previous suit between the parties. The trial Court made a preliminary decree for partition declaring the plaintiffs' right to get a one-third share in the lands and directing the appointment of a commissioner to effect the partition by metes and bounds. On an appeal being preferred by the defendants the Subordinate Judge discharged the preliminary decree aforesaid and ordered that as the defendants are willing to buy the plaintiff's share and to pay a reasonable price of the land in suit, a value of the plaintiff's share would be made by a commissioner by a local inquiry unless the price be agreed to by the parties, and that share of the plaintiffs would be sold to the defendants under S. 4, Partition Act.

The plaintiffs then appealed to this Court. The decree of the Subordinate Judge was made on 31st March 1925, and the appeal was preferred to this Court on 29th June 1925. The record of the suit, however, arrived in the Court of first instance on 13th May 1925, and notwithstanding that orders were passed for agreeing upon a price of the share or taking steps for the appointment of a Commissioner to ascertain the same, neither party did anything in connexion with the suit in that Court till December 1925. In the meantime, it may be observed, the suit was put up before the Munsif on no less than sixteen occasions and on as many different dates. On one of these dates the plaintiffs were called upon to deposit the fees for the commission, but this order was not complied with. On 9th December 1925, peremptory order was passed adjourning the suit to 21st December 1925, and warning the parties that no further time would be allowed. On 21st December 1925 the plaintiff applied for a further adjournment, but the Munsif refused the application as the pleader who moved the application had no further instructions and the suit was dismissed. Whether there was any appearance on behalf of the defendants on that date it does not appear nor is it clear what their attitude was with reference to the suit. Be that as it may, the order that was passed was worded thus:

The learned pleader has no further instructions. As the plaintiff does not deposit costs of commissioner as directed hence the Court is not in a position to move further. I do not see I have any other alternative than to dismiss the suit. It is accordingly dismissed.

No steps have been taken to set aside the dismissal of the suit.

The first question which arises is whether in the circumstances aforesaid the appeal is maintainable. It is argued on behalf of the appellant: first, that with the reversal of the Subordinate Judge's decision in this appeal, all subsequent orders that may have been passed in the suit, including the order of dismissal aforesaid, will as a necessary consequence of such reversal pass away; second, that the Munsif had no jurisdiction to dismiss the suit in view of the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Lachmi Narayan Marwary v. Bal-makund Marwary (1), and so his order should be treated as a nullity; and third, that the present appeal may be converted into an appeal embracing a challenge against the decree of the Munsif dismissing the suit.

(1) A. I. R. 1924 P. C. 198=4 Pat. 61=51 I A. 321 (P. C.).

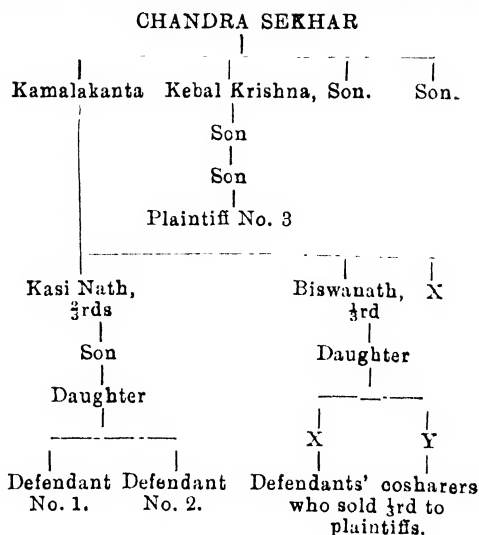

There are difficulties in the way of accepting the first and the third of the aforesaid contentions in their entirety. As regards the second contention it seems unnecessary to go into the question whether in the events that happened the order of dismissal could be justified on the failure on the part of the plaintiffs either to appear or to take steps for the further progress of the proceedings. It is clear, however, on the authority of the decision in the case of Lachmi Narayan Marwary v. Bal-makund Marwary (1) that after a decree has once been made in a suit, the suit cannot be dismissed unless the decree is reversed on appeal. The parties have, on the making of the decree, acquired rights or incurred liabilities which are fixed, unless or until the decree is varied or set aside. After a decree any party can apply to have it enforced.

Any order of dismissal that was passed, assuming that it was rightly passed, could only affect the further proceedings that followed upon the decree which the Subordinate Judge had made and could not touch the decree itself. The appeal, therefore, in my opinion, is competent and must be dealt with on its merits.

The validity of the decree made by the Subordinate Judge has been challenged on several grounds which may be enumerated as follows: first, the defendants and their cosharers from whom the plaintiffs have purchased, the plaintiffs under their purchase being entitled to one-third share and the remaining two-thirds share belonging to the defendants, do not constitute an undivided family within the meaning of S. 4, Partition Act 4, 1893; second, that if the said cosharers may be regarded as members of "an undivided family" with the defendants, the plaintiffs are equally entitled to be treated as such members as well; third, that the property in suit is not a "dwelling house" within the meaning of that section; and fourth, that besides the portion on which the house stood, there is a quantity of land lying vacant and that the plaintiffs are entitled to have their share allotted out of the same, the findings of the Court below not being sufficient to prevent the same from being partitioned.

To deal with these contentions it will be convenient to give a genealogy of the parties. It is as follows:

who live in one house under one head or management; that it is not restricted to a body of persons who can trace their descent from a common ancestor; that it is not necessary for the members to constitute an undivided family that they should constantly reside in the dwelling house, nor is it necessary that they should be joint in mess; that it is sufficient if the members of the family are undivided qua the dwelling house which they own; that it is the ownership of the dwelling house and not its actual occupation which brings the operation of the section into play: and that the object of the section is to prevent a transferee of a member of a family who is an outsider from forcing his way into a dwelling house in which other members of his transferor's family have a right to live. Judged by these tests the defendants and their co-sharers must be held to belong to an undivided family; and the admission contained in para. 1 of the plaint and the fact that there was a partition of the ancestral properties amongst the four sons of Chandra Sekhar about a hundred years ago, and that the plaintiffs have no right to live in the house apart from their right under the purchase, clearly make them strangers to such family. The fact that the huts have been blown down does not make the dwelling house any the less a dwelling house so long as the members have not abandoned it or, at any rate, given up the idea of using it as such. These contentions, therefore, must fail. As regards the remaining contention, it appears that the property in suit comprises an area of 22½ gandas of which only 10 gandas form the site of the house itself and the remaining 12 gandas are appurtenant lands.

As pointed out in the case of Khirole Chandra Ghoshal v. Saroda Prosad Mitra (2), the term "house" embraces, not merely the structure or building but includes also adjacent buildings, curtilages, garden, courtyard, orchard and all that is necessary for the convenient occupation of the house, but not that which is only for the personal use and convenience of the occupier. It includes the land on which the structure of the dwelling house stands, and whether a particular plot of land is or is not necessary to the enjoyment of a house is to be determined on the evidence. The finding in this respect that the learned Subordinate Judge has recorded is that the vacant land is quite necessary for the due enjoyment of the dwelling house and it was so long used as such, and that:

both the plots (meaning the site of the house itself and the vacant land) constitute the dwelling house.

This finding, in my opinion, is sufficient and this contention also fails.

The result is that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

BUCKLAND, J.

Ashoke Kumar De—Plaintiff.

v.

Corporation of Calcutta—Defendant.

Civil Suit No. 134 of 1927, Decided on 27th July 1927.

(a) Calcutta Municipal Act (1923), S. 538—Special period of limitation does not apply to a suit by the son for the recovery of Provident Fund of an employee of the Corporation.

Special period of limitation prescribed in S. 538 cannot apply to a suit, against the Corporation of Calcutta, in which the plaintiff claims as the only son and sole heir of his deceased father to recover from the Corporation a certain sum on account of his father's Provident Fund, unpaid salary and contributions for the purchase of a war bond. [P 543 C 1]

(b) Provident Fund Act (9 of 1897), S. 3 (1) (b)—"Representative" means a legal representative of the deceased.

The word "representative" in S. 3 (1) (b), is intended to mean, though it is not very happily expressed, the legal representative of the deceased. [P 543 C 2]

(c) Provident Fund Act, S. 5—A person alleging to be an uncle of a deceased employee in the Calcutta Corporation taking payment of the Provident Fund—Son suing the Corporation for the same—Corporation was held to have no business to pay to the uncle, he not being a representative of the deceased under R. 19 framed under the Provident Fund Act.

A person who said he was the uncle of the deceased, an employee in the Calcutta Corporation, appeared before the Corporation with some kind of certificate stamped by an Honorary Magistrate and professing to bear the seal of the Court of which that individual was an Honorary Magistrate, and with this certificate he succeeded in getting payment of the Provident Fund of the deceased from the Corporation of Calcutta. The son of the deceased sued the Corporation for the sum but it was pleaded that the sum was already paid to a deceased's representative.

Held: that the person to whom the payment was made was not the representative and the Corporation had no business under the rules to pay anybody other than the legal representatives, executors or administrators of the deceased under R. 19 framed under the Provident Fund Act. [P 543 C 2]

Judgment.—This is a suit against the Corporation of Calcutta, in which the plaintiff claims as the only son and sole heir of his deceased father to recover from the Corporation of Calcutta the sum of Rs. 1,236-13-7 on account of his father's Provident Fund, unpaid salary and contributions for the purchase of a war bond.

The defences put forward on behalf of the Corporation are two. It is first objected that the suit is barred by limitation under S. 538, Calcutta Municipal Act (1923). That is a section which prescribes a period of limitation for suits in respect of any act purporting to be done under the Act or under any rule or by-law made thereunder. The plaintiff does not sue in respect of any act purporting to be done under the Act or any rule made under it, nor has learned counsel for the Corporation been able to point out to me that the Provident Fund is in any way within the Calcutta Municipal Act. There is no question of anything done under the Calcutta Municipal Act. The claim is a simple money claim and the special period of limitation prescribed cannot apply to the suit.

Then a defence is based upon Ss. 3 and 5, Provident Fund Act (Act 9 of 1897). It is doubtful whether this is a Government Provident Fund, to which the Act applies, because, as I understand the position, it is a Provident Fund kept for the employees of the Corporation of Calcutta. I doubt whether a Provident Fund constituted by the Corporation of Calcutta is within this Act at all. But the matter has been argued by learned counsel for the defendant upon that basis, and I will so deal with it, for I have not called upon learned counsel for the defendant to meet the point. S 5 says:

No suit or other legal proceedings shall lie against any person in respect of anything done or in good faith intended to be done in pursuance of the provisions of this Act.

The same answer meets this point, mutatis mutandis as that applicable to the defence under S. 538, Municipal Act.

Section 3 (1) (a) provides that payment should be made to any person entitled to receive the money according to the rules of the Fund. The rules of the Fund have been placed before me. R. 19 says:

On the death of any subscriber the Manager shall pay to his representatives, executors or administrators the amount standing to his credit in the account prepared in accordance with the provisions of R. 14.

Section 3 (1) (b) provides that in cases not provided for the money may be paid to any person appearing to be entitled to receive it. It has been argued that the word "representatives" in the rule is synonymous with the words "any person appearing to him to be entitled to receive it" in S. 3 (1) (b), Provident Fund Rules. With that I cannot agree. The word "representatives" in my judgment, is intended to mean though it is not very happily expressed the legal representatives of the deceased.

What actually happened in this case was that a person who said he was the uncle of the deceased, and whether he was or was not has not been established and, there is nothing to show to the contrary appeared before the Corporation with some kind of certificate stamped by an Honorary Magistrate of Baraset and professing to bear the seal of the Court of which that individual was an Honorary Magistrate, and with this certificate he succeeded in getting payment of this sum from the Corporation of Calcutta. That he succeeded in duping the Corporation there can be no question, but to what extent the Corporation was an incurious dupe and what enquiries were made there is nothing to show. This has been stated in the written statement and it is not denied. I do not suppose there is any doubt about it, but it is no defence to the suit. The matter is governed by the rules, and the Corporation had no business under the rules to pay anybody other than the representatives, executors or administrators of the deceased. In these circumstances, both the defences must fail.

The Corporation say that the deceased took an advance from his Provident Fund during his lifetime, and that the net amount due under all these heads now amounts to Rs. 977-13-4. This on behalf of the plaintiff is very properly not challenged by his counsel, and he is prepared to accept the figures as they appear in the books of the Corporation. There must, therefore, be judgment for Rs. 977-13-4.

In the course of this judgment and while I was engaged in delivering it, my attention was drawn by Mr. S N. Banerji for the defendant Corporation to S. 56, Calcutta Municipal Act, 1923, on which he says the Provident Fund is founded. It has not been possible for me to deal with this section, and no argument has been founded upon this. I leave the matter as I have dealt with it, namely, upon the basis upon which it was argued on behalf of the defendant Corporation.

The plaintiff is entitled to costs on scale No. 2.

E. I. Ry. Co.—Defendant—Respondent.

Appeal No 2113 of 1925, Decided on 29th July 1927, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Nadia, D/- 29th June 1925

Railways Act, S. 72—A consigning a wagon of coal to a certain station for the use of a Railway Company—Company rejecting the coal as unsuitable for consumption—Re-sale by A to C—C again selling to B—Company issuing a fresh invoice though the coal was used up by them—B suing for damages—B was held to have every right to sue because he had perfectly a good contract with C who had a perfectly good contract with A.

A consigned a wagon of coal from Pathardih station to a certain station on the E. I. Ry. This coal was consigned to the loco Foreman of the E. I. Ry. Co., and was intended for use by the E. I. Ry. After some time, A received a notice from the Company stating that that coal was unsuitable for their purposes and it was rejected. A resold that wagon of coal to C who sold it again to B. In the meantime the coal was retained and consumed by the Company. However, the Company issued a new railway receipt or fresh invoice issued in supersession of the old invoice, and on that invoice the sender was A and the consignee was C. The railway receipt was endorsed on the back by C to B. Thereupon, B sued the Company for the recovery of damages. It was contended that B had no locus standi.

Held: that B had every right to sue the Railway Company for the coal that had not been delivered. He had a perfectly good contract with C who had a perfectly good contract with A as regards a specific ascertained wagon-load of coal. The Company accepted a change in that instruction, and they were under an obligation to deliver that coal to A or his nominee and they had no right to use it after they had rejected it. It was an ordinary case by a purchaser of coal against a Railway Company who lost the coal or had converted the coal to its own use by mistake.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed. The judgments of the Courts below are singularly deficient in dates of the material transactions, but the facts appear to be as follows: Dana Premji & Co. consigned a wagon of coal from Pathardih station to Sahebganj station on the E. I. Ry. This coal was consigned to the loco Foreman of the E. I. Ry. Co., and was intended for use by the E. I. Ry. That consignment was on 9th February 1922, and there was a consignment note. The next thing which happened, so far as Dana Premji & Co. are concerned, is that they received a notice from the E. I. Ry. Co., stating that that coal was unsuitable for their purposes and that it was rejected. The date of that notice is not given in the judgments. The next thing that happened was that they resold that wagon of coal to defendant 3. Defendant 3, at some date before 13th March 1922, sold it again to the plaintiff, the plaintiff being a person at Kushtia on the E. B. Ry. The exact dates of the contracts between Dana Premji & Co. and Biswas, defendant 3, and between Biswas and the plaintiff are not given, but they must have taken place before the 13th March 1922.

It now appears, according to the case of the E. I. Ry., that although the wagon of coal was rejected, the Railway Company nevertheless retained it and were proposing to use it. They say that the rejection was a mistake; but I need not point out that however much the Railway Company might have been mistaken, their refusal addressed to Dana Premji & Co. to accept this wagon of coal put Dana Premji & Co. in the position of being re-vested with the ownership of the coal and entitled to resell it. The property in that coal would pass upon such a resale. It is said for the Railway Company that the coal came to Sahebganj and was immediately sent on to Jamalpur in order to be used. When it was used, by whom it was used and when it ceased to be in existence, there is no evidence at all. It may have been about a week or a month on one of the Railway Company's sidings or it may have been immediately consumed. On this point there appears to be no evidence at all, to which the learned advocates on either side are able to point, nor is there any mention of any finding as to this matter or any details about it given in the judgments.

What happened was this: that, in these circumstances, the Railway Company issued a new railway receipt at Sahebganj. It is a railway receipt or fresh invoice issued in supersession of old invoice No. 41 of 9th February 1922 to Sahebganj, and on that invoice the senders are Dana Premji & Co. and the consignee is S. C. Biswas. The address for carriage is Kushtia. This railway receipt was endorsed on the back by S. C. Biswas to the plaintiff. Plaintiff says that he has paid Biswas for this coal and there is no finding to the contrary, nor does it matter.

The plaintiff brings this suit against the E. I. Ry. Co., amongst other defendants and the question is whether, in these circumstances, the E. I. Ry. Co. has any answer to the plaintiff. In my opinion it has none.

The Courts below have differed in opinion. The learned Subordinate Judge of Krishnagar has taken the view, first, that the plaintiff has no locus standi. He has also been under some misapprehension, as is now admitted, upon facts, and says:

It appears that the wagon was first booked to Sahebganj and then was re-booked to Jamalpur; but, as a matter of fact, the coal was used up at Sahebganj. So that there was nothing to send to Kushtia. There was only a paper transaction regarding the fresh invoice No. 10.

That, as is now admitted, is an entire mistake.

Mr. Bose, on behalf of the E. I. Ry. Co., contends that the plaintiff has no locus standi and that unless it can be shown that this coal was not consumed before 13th March 1922 there was no contract vesting the coal in the plaintiff, and the plaintiff cannot recover it. It is to be observed that the Railway Company entered into this matter originally, not merely as carriers, but as purchasers. The coal was delivered to them by their own railway. They rejected the coal and the coal again became the property of Dana Premji & Co. They were as people who had rejected that coal under an obligation to deal properly with Dana Premji & Co.'s property. Dana Premji & Co. required them to re-consign the coal to Biswas. That is the basis of the document,—the invoice—to which I have already referred. This is an invoice in supersession of the original invoice. The Railway Company says by it:

We received certain coal at Pathardihi on the 9th February and we now undertake as carriers to send that to Kushtia to the order of S. C. Biswas.

That is the meaning of it. Dana Premji & Co. were quite entitled to give them that instruction and that instruction they accepted as carriers. S. C. Biswas, the nominal consignee, was a servant of the real consignee, defendant 3, J. N. Biswas. I need not say that the fact that he had no title of his own and was a bare trustee for J. N. Biswas does not make him any the less the proper person to endorse over the railway receipt to the plaintiff and the plaintiff gets as good a title in that way as he could have got. Indeed, if it had been endorsed over by J. N. Biswas, then the transaction would have been irregular, because it was for the consignee to make the endorsement. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the plaintiff has every right to sue the Railway Company for the coal that has not been delivered. He had a perfectly good contract with Biswas, who had a perfectly good contract with Dana Premji & Co., as regards a specific ascertained wagon-load of coal. It is not shown, nor is there any evidence that can be pointed out, that this coal ceased to exist on 13th March 1922. I am clearly of opinion that the burden of proving that it ceased to exist rests upon the person who asserts that proposition. Whether it ceased to exist or not, in my opinion, makes no difference to the present case, because the Railway Company on these facts received the coal on the 9th February upon certain instructions. They accepted, as they were bound to do, a change in that instruction, and they were under an obligation to deliver that coal to Dana Premji & Co. or their nominee and they had no right to use it after they had rejected it. It seems to me that it is an ordinary case by a purchaser of coal against a Railway Company who has lost the coal or, as in this case, has converted the coal to its own use by mistake.

In my judgment, the judgment of the trial Court is right. The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and that of the trial Court is restored with costs against the E. I. Ry. Co. in this Court and in the lower appellate Court.

B. B. Ghosh, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant against the judgment and decree of the Additional District Judge of Hooghly at Howrah. The facts are these: It has been found that the plaintiff let out the premises in suit to the defendant at a certain rate of rent. He afterwards served a notice terminating the tenancy and then sued to recover possession of the property in question and also rent for the period the defendant was in possession as tenant. The plea of the defendant shortly stated was denial of the plaintiff's right to the entire share of the property. He stated that a certain share belonged to the sisters of the plaintiff and the letting out of the property was not by the plaintiff alone. He denied service of notice and he also alleged that the plaintiff was not entitled to any rent as the defendant had spent a large sum of money for repairing the premises on the basis of a contract by which the owners had agreed that no rent should be demanded until the house was thoroughly repaired. The trial Court found that the plaintiff was the sole person who demised the premises to the defendant and inducted him on the land. He also found that proper notice to quit had been served on the defendant. With regard to the question of title to the property the trial Court held that the plaintiff was only a cosharer, but the defendant was estopped from disputing the title of the plaintiff who had demised the premises to him. Upon that view that Court made a decree for ejectment. With regard to the question of arrears of rent which was put in issue 7 the Munsif held that there was no evidence in the suit that the arrears claimed were due and unpaid, and upon that ground he dismissed the claim for rent. There were two appeals before the lower appellate Court, one by the plaintiff for arrears of rent and the other by the defendant as against the decree for ejectment. The learned Additional District Judge who heard both the appeals affirmed the decree of the Munsif for ejectment on the ground that the defendant was estopped from disputing the title of the plaintiff, but he remanded the case on the question of arrears of rent to the Munsif in the appeal preferred by the plaintiff, that is 252 of 1924, for a fresh trial on the question regarding the claim for rent.

From this decree of the lower appellate Court the defendant appeals, and the principal question that is urged on his behalf is that the defendant is entitled to show that the title of the plaintiff has ceased to exist with regard to the share belonging to the sisters of the plaintiff which the defendant has purchased shortly before the suit was instituted. The Additional District Judge did not allow the plea to be raised on the ground of estoppel as well as on the ground that the decision of this question would involve enquiries of a more complicated nature than an enquiry in a simple suit for ejectment.

The question of fact that it was the plaintiff who put the defendant into possession of the house cannot be questioned. The sole question for decision in this appeal, therefore, is whether the defendant is estopped from raising the plea that the plaintiff was not the sole owner of the property when he was let into possession by the plaintiff; and substantiating his plea that he had purchased the share from the sisters of the plaintiff and therefore entitled to resist the plaintiff's claim for ejectment. S. 116, Evidence Act, lays down that no tenant of immovable property or person claiming through such tenant shall during the continuance of the tenancy be permitted to deny that the landlord of such tenant had at the beginning of the tenancy a title to such immovable property.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the tenancy does not continue now as it was terminated by a proper notice to quit. Therefore S. 116, Evidence Act, has no application to this case. That is quite true, but it has been established by a long series of decisions that S. 116, Evidence Act, does not contain the whole law of estoppel. It has been held in this Court that the tenant's estoppel operates even after the termination of the tenancy. That was held in the case of Bhaiginta Bewa v. Himmat Bidyalar (1), relying upon the observation of Chief Justice Tindal in Doe Dun Joseph Munton v. Austin (2). This argument therefore that the defendant is not estopped from denying the plaintiff's title because the tenancy is not continuing must fail.

With regard to the general principle of law there cannot be any dispute. Now it has been settled that a tenant may show in an action of ejectment brought by the landlord who put the tenant into possession of the demised premises, that the title of the landlord has determined. But no plea can be set up of which the necessary effect is to dispute the title of the person who gave possession at the point of time of the demise. It is open to the tenant, as I have already said, to show that the title of the person who delivered possession to him has ceased to exist subsequent to the demise. But he cannot say that the interest of the landlord was less in quality than what he must have in order to put the tenant in possession of the entire property. In other words in an action in ejectment by the landlord who put the tenant into possession the tenant cannot plead that the landlord had no title to grant the lease when possession was given, nor can he defend the suit on the ground that he had acquired an outstanding title adverse to the landlord. It is sought to support the argument on behalf of the appellant on the basis of the analogy of dispossession by a title paramount. It is argued that if a third person having a higher right than that of the plaintiff had dispossessed the defendant, not physically but in case of such dispossession as would amount to legal ouster, the tenant would be in a position to show that the person who put him into possession had no title. Similarly in this case it is said that the co-sharers of the plaintiff had asserted their title and the defendant was obliged to purchase that interest in order to save himself from being sued by those co-sharers. The facts of the case are said to be parallel to the case when there is ouster by title paramount where the landlord's title has ceased subsequent to the demise. But the present is not such a case as that. Here the defendant asserts that the plaintiff who put him into possession had no title to the entire interest at the time when he put him into possession. This is a position which he is not entitled to take. He must give up possession and if he has acquired any right adverse to that of the landlord he may assert it at some future litigation if he is so advised. But he cannot resist the landlord's claim on that ground.

The appeal so far as the question of ejectment is concerned must be dismissed.

Next with regard to the question of the order of the Additional District Judge sending back the case to the Munsif for fresh trial, we are of opinion that this order is wrong in form. What the Judge ought to have done was to decide the issue himself. The Munsif framed the issue and decided it against the plaintiff. If the learned Judge on appeal thought that it was not properly decided he might reverse that decision if he chose, but he had no right to set aside the judgment of the trial Judge and remand that issue for retrial. The learned Judge must himself decide the issue upon the evidence on the record and if he thinks that it is necessary for him to take any additional evidence under O. 41, R. 27, if there is any good ground for such evidence being admitted, he may follow that procedure; but in any case he had no right to send the matter back for trial to the Court of first instance.

Bengal Tenancy Act (3 of 1885), S. 52—Joint tenants—Right to abatement of rent must be asserted jointly by all.

Narendra Chandra Bose and Nalini Chandra Pal—for Appellant

Satindra Nath Roy Chaulhuri—for Respondents.

Page, J.—This is a suit brought by a cosharer landlord under S. 148A, Ben. Ten. Act, to recover arrears of rent. The plaintiff has impleaded the two tenants of the land whose names are recorded in the Record-of-Rights, and has made his cosharer landlords pro forma defendants. One of the two tenants-defendants has not appeared. The other has pleaded that he is entitled to an abatement of rent on account of diluvion. The fact of diluvion has been established. It appears, however, that there are two other co-tenants of the holding who are not parties to the suit, and the plaintiff contended that the contesting defendant is not entitled to an abatement of rent in the absence of the other cosharer tenants. The trial Court upheld the plaintiff's contention, and passed a decree for the full arrears of rent claimed without abatement. On appeal the decree of the trial Court was set aside, and the suit was remanded for the ascertainment of the amount of the abatement to which the defendant was entitled. From that decree the plaintiff has preferred the present appeal.

The case was argued exhaustively before us, and we have no doubt what our decision should be. It is conceded by the appellant that if all the co-tenants are parties an abatement of rent may be claimed by the tenants either in a separate proceeding or in a suit for rent, and by the respondent that if S. 52, Ben. Ten. Act, is applicable one co-tenant cannot claim abatement in the absence of his co-tenants, and that the present case is covered by the decision of this Court in Bhoopendra Narain Dutt v. Romon Krishna Dutt (1). The respondent contended, however, that this is not a suit to which the Bengal Tenancy Act applies, and that under the general law the respondent is entitled to claim proportionate abatement. We are of opinion that S. 52, Ben. Ten. Act, does apply to the present suit, and that the decision of the trial Court was correct. But if it be assumed, contrary to our opinion that the present suit is not brought under the Bengal Tenancy Act, but under the general law Enayutoollah v. Elahee Buksh (2), Salimullah Bahadur v. Kali Prosonno (3), Kailash Chandra Mitra v. Brojendra K. Chakravarti (4), that circumstance will make no difference, for we think that the principles laid down in Bhoopendra Narain Dutt v. Romon Krishna Dutt (1), would equally be applicable. In that case Banerji, J., observed:

I may add that, so far as the landlord's right to claim enhancement or increase of rent is concerned, that right can be claimed only in a suit brought by all the joint landlords. It is true that under the Bengal Tenancy Act that is so under the express terms of S. 198 of that Act; but under the law as it stood before the passing of the Bengal Tenancy Act, the rule was the same, and the rule was based upon considerations of justice. And if that was so, there is no reason why similar considerations should not be given effect to in the converse case of a tenant seeking to obtain against one of several joint landlords abatement of rent, though such a case may not be provided for by any express provision of the Tenancy Act applicable to it.

In Kisho Prasad Singh v. Ramdeni Singh (5), Das, J., also stated that the only principle which underlies S. 188 of the Act is that where two or more persons have a joint right between them, they cannot assert it except jointly. That principle is recognized in S. 52 of the Act and I quite accept that if two or more coshare tenants have a joint right for abatement of rent, they can only assert that right in a suit to which all the tenants are parties.

We agree with the above observations, and think that they are based both upon good sense and good law. The decision in Sivadas Dutt v. Birendra Krishna Dutt (6), is not an authority to the contrary, for in that case all the tenants of the holding were parties to the suit: see also Narendra Nath Kuti v. Satyadhan Ghosal (7). Appeal No. 872 of 1925, Decided on 18th January 1928, from appellate decree of 2nd Sub-Judge, Zillah Faridpur, D/- 19th January 1925.

(a) Mahomedan Law—Marriage—Option of puberty—Marriage effected by a guardian other than the father or grandfather—The minor has the right of repudiation.

When marriage is effected through the guardianship of the father or grandfather, the minor has no right to avoid such marriage, except in very special circumstances, but if it is contracted by any other person the minor has the right of repudiation which is technically called "the option of puberty." In order the minor may be entitled to exercise the "option of puberty" it is necessary that there should be a marriage which is binding on him or her unless such option is exercised; and for that purpose the marriage must be valid ab origine and brought about by a person other than the father, etc., who stands for the time being in the position of a guardian in marriage of the minor.

(b) Mahomedan Law—Marriage—Repudiation—There is need for obtaining a judicial decree to confirm repudiation, but it is not compulsory to obtain it in a proceeding apart from that in which the question of validity of marriage is raised.

The very fact that the Court declares in a suit or in a case which comes before it, that there was repudiation is enough to satisfy the requirement of the Mahomedan law about judicial decree confirming a repudiation. It is undoubtedly true that there is need for obtaining a judicial decree, but there is no authority for saying that the judicial decree must be obtained in a proceeding apart from that in which the question of the validity of the marriage is raised: 19, Cal. 79, Rel. on. [P 550 C 2]

(Obitor) In exercising a right of repudiating a marriage by the girl the Imam does not make a knowledge of her right of option a condition, because that is an institute of the law, and ignorance is no plea with respect of an institute of the law, with which it is supposed that every person ought to be acquainted: A. I. R. 1922 All. 155, Ref. [P 551 C 1]

Asita Ranjan Ghose—for Appellant

Rajendra Chandra Guha and Bhagirath Chandra Das—for Respondents.

Suhrawardy, J.—This is an appeal by the husband in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights which has been dismissed by both the Courts below. The facts found by the Courts below are that the mother of the girl, who is a defendant in the case gave her in marriage to the plaintiff in 1319 B. S., but the defendant exercised her "option of puberty" given to her under the Sunni Mahomedan law, by which the parties are governed, in 1330 soon after she had attained puberty, by marrying defendant 5. In this view the plaintiff's suit for restitution has been dismissed inasmuch as the alleged marriage between the plaintiff and defendant 1 does not any longer exist. The learned vakil who appears for the appellant has strenuously argued that the marriage between the plaintiff and the defendant having been found to have been contracted as a matter of fact, there should be a judicial decree confirming the repudiation of such marriage. The learned vakil's contention is met completely by the decision in Badal Aurat v. Queen Empress (1). If that decision is correct there can be no question that the decree of the lower appellate Court is also correct.

Before entering into a discussion of the question it is necessary to point out that it was not proved before the Courts below or raised in the pleading as to whether the mother was the guardian of the girl for the purpose of the marriage at the date when the marriage took place. Under the Mahomedan law as affects the Sunnis, the guardianship in marriage originally vests in the father, and, failing him, on the father's father, how highsoever. Failing these, the right to contract the minor in marriage provisionally, i.e., subject to the option of repudiation devolves upon the brother and agnate relations of the minor in the same order as they stand under the law of inheritance. Failing these it devolves upon the mother and the maternal kindred; and failing these upon the Sultan or the ruler and then on the Judge or a person appointed by him. According to a saying of the Prophet which is the foundation of the rule of guardianship in marriage the nearer guardian excludes the more remote; that is, in the presence of the nearer guardian the more remote guardian has no right to give the minor in a valid marriage. It will thus be seen that when marriage is effected through the guardianship of the father or grandfather the minor has no right to avoid such marriage, except in very special circumstances, but if it is contracted by any other person the minor has the right of repudiation which is technically called "the option of puberty". In order that the minor may be entitled to exercise the "option of puberty" it is necessary that there should be a marriage which is binding on him or her unless such option is exercised; and for that purpose the marriage must be valid ab origine and brought about by a person other than the father, etc., who stands for the time being in the position of a guardian in marriage of the minor. In the present case it ought to have been enquired as to whether there was no paternal relation who could be the guardian of the minor at the time when the marriage is said to have taken place or whether the mother had the right to give her daughter in a valid marriage. This point seems to have been lost sight of in most of the cases that come before us and also in some of the reported cases.

As to the question whether there should be a judicial decree confirming the repudiation before a suit for restitution of conjugal rights or relating to the marriage is brought, no authority has been placed before us in support of this proposition. In Badal Aural's case Ameer Ali, J., whose opinion it is needless to say carries a very great weight on a question of Mahomedan law, is of opinion that the very fact that the Court declares in a suit or in a case which comes before it that there was repudiation is enough to satisfy the requirement of the Mahomedan law about a judicial decree confirming a repudiation. It is undoubtedly true that there is need for obtaining a judicial decree. The law insists that the repudiation should be made soon after attainment of puberty and it will not be effective unless a judicial decree is obtained confirming it; and for this there are many passages in the text-books, but there is no authority for saying that the judicial decree must be obtained in a proceeding apart from that in which the question of the validity of the marriage is raised.

There is another consideration which has weighed very greatly with me in giving effect to the decision in Badal Aural's case (1). Since it was pronounced in 1891 it has been consistently followed by Courts of this presidency and outside it and the principle of stare decisis ought to apply to a doubtful question of law, if it is so regarded, the decisions on which may have affected the marital relation of many persons and the legitimacy of their offsprings.

Our attention has been drawn to various text-books on Mahomedan law which lay down that a judicial decree is necessary to give legal effect to the exercise of the option of puberty. There is no doubt that the law is so, but in my judgment its requirements are fully complied with if the Court in any judicial proceeding declares in favour of such exercise.

In this connexion another question has been raised as to whether the right was exercised immediately after the attainment of puberty by defendant 1. The finding is that she attained puberty in May 1923 and that she married defendant 5 in November 1923. There is no finding, however, when she came to know of the marriage. There is also no finding that she knew that under her personal law she had the right to repudiate the marriage. Knowledge of the last fact has been considered to be essential in the case of Bismilla Begum v Nur Mahomed (2). There the learned Judges have held that if the girl does not know that she has the right of rescinding the marriage she will have the right to do so when she becomes aware of it; and in support of this view they rely upon the opinion of Imam Mahommad one of the Mahomedan jurists who is followed in this country. It appears that the opinion of Imam Mahommad is just the other way. What the learned jurist has said is this:

It should be a condition in a case like this that the girl be duly informed of the marriage because she cannot exert her right of option without a knowledge of that circumstance, as the guardian may effect the marriage altogether unknown to her and that she would in such a case be excused on the ground of ignorance. But the learned author of the Hedaya says that the Imam does not make a knowledge of her right of option a condition, because that is an institute of the law, and ignorance is no plea with respect to an institute of the law, with which it is supposed that every person ought to be acquainted, Hamilton's Hedaya, vol. 1, p. 104.

This view is in accordance with the well-known maxim that ignorance of law is no excuse. If the opinion of the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court is correct the defendant, as is expected from an ignorant woman, was probably not aware that she had such a right under the law. But the question as to whether option was exercised immediately after the attainment of majority or her knowledge of the marriage was not raised in any of the Courts below and we have not the necessary findings of fact on that point. As appears from the judgment of the trial Court, the option was exercised immediately after she had attained puberty and the lower appellate Court finds that the marriage between the plaintiff and the defendant was never consummated. These findings are enough to support the validity of the exercise of the option of puberty by the girl. In this view the appeal has no force and it should be dismissed with costs.

Graham, J.—On the facts proved in in this case and upon the law the Courts below were in my opinion right in dismissing the suit. I agree with my learned brother that the appeal fails and it should be dismissed.

Mritunjoy Chatterjee and Fazlul Huq — for Appellants.

Satindra Nath Mukerjee — for the Crown.

Cammiade, J—The two appellants were charged with offences under Ss. 295, 297 and 436, I. P. C. They were found guilty by a majority of 3:2 of the jury of offences under the first two sections. They have been found not guilty by the unanimous verdict of the jury of the offence under S 436. The objections taken in regard to the trial are : firstly, that the procedure in empannelling the jury was illegal ; secondly, that the learned Judge did not point out to the jury that in regard to circumstantial evidence, it is necessary that the jury should find that the circumstances placed before them are not consistent with the innocence of the accused ; thirdly, it has been pointed out that the learned Judge has misdirected the jury with regard to the statement of one of the witnesses to the effect that the culprits had not been recognized at the time of the occurrence ; and lastly, it has been pointed out that the learned Judge is wrong in stating to the jury that there is a presumption of law that the witness who has spoken untruth must be believed in so far as they depose to facts spoken to by other witnesses.

In regard to the first matter what happened is this : Out of 12 jurors summoned only two were in attendance. The learned Judge sent for three of the professors from the local college, and when objection was taken to the sitting of one of them as a juror, he sent for another professor of the same college to fill up the vacancy in the jury. This procedure is not justified by the provisions of S. 276, Criminal P. C. Provision 2 to that section provides that in case of a deficiency in the required number of jurors, the Court may empannel other persons present in Court to fill up the vacancy in the jury. There has been illegality in regard to the empannelling of the jury and this illegality has vitiated the trial.

The second objection is also good. The learned Judge has not put it to the jury that when a case is based on circumstantial evidence, the circumstances should be such that there can be no reasonable possibility of the innocence of the accused.

The third matter has come up in the following circumstances : One of the witnesses in answer to a question put in cross-examination said that the reason why information was not given to the police immediately after the occurrence although the police station was only a short distance away from the scene of occurrence was that the persons who had committed the offence were then unknown. The Judge then told the foreman of the jury to put the question in another form to the witness and the witness said that he and others had recognized the appellants at the place of occurrence and seen them running away. The learned Judge has said to the jury in his charge :

As to Hridoy, he has no doubt said in answer to an invalid question from Khan Bahadur, the learned pleader for the defence which was repeated by me, that the culprits could not be ascertained that night. If you think that he gave the answer after understanding the question there is an end of the case for prosecution and the accused should be forthwith acquitted. If on the other hand you think that he did not understand the question you are to consider what he had stated before and what he said later on in answer to foreman's question.

This is a very improper way of dealing with an answer in favour of the defence. The learned Judge has not recorded anything from which it can be inferred that the witness did not understand the question put to him. The question itself is a simple question and we do not see how the witness could have had any difficulty in understanding it. If it was possible that the witness could have misunderstood the question put to him it was necessary that the facts which led to the inference that the witness had misunderstood it should have been placed on the record and should have been placed before the jury for their consideration. Nothing of this sort was done and the procedure followed by the learned Judge was wrong.

Lastly the presumption laid down by the Judge in regard to the testimony of witnesses is entirely without authority. If a witness says something which appears to be untrue, it is still open to the jury to believe any other statement made by that witness. But that is a matter entirely within their own discretion and there is no hard-and-fast rule making other statements which are not proved to be false binding on the jury, as the learned Judge has put it to them. The case relates to the setting fire to a thatched hut used as a temple to the goddess Sitala and to the desecration of certain earthenware images in another hut standing near it. It is stated that the accused Sagiruddin was seen standing close to these huts when the fire started and that the accused Jahiruddin was seen coming out of the Kali temple and joining Sagiruddin and running away with him. The jury have unanimously found the accused Jahiruddin not guilty of the charge of arson. There was no reason why they should find Sagiruddin guilty and Jahiruddin not guilty. Both men are said to have been seen at the spot. Neither of them is said to have been seen setting fire to the huts and it is therefore impossible to understand how one of them could be found guilty and the other not. As regards the charge of desecration: the circumstances of the case clearly indicate that that charge is without foundation. The earthen images which were in the hut known as Kali Ghar were not destroyed; only the heads of those earthen images were found lying on the ground.

If these images had been broken by a person who intended to desecrate the temple, it is extremely improbable, in fact utterly improbable, that the person who desecrated the temple would have contented himself with merely removing the heads of the images and placing them on the ground. We have it in evidence that these earthen images are made on the occasion of a certain puja and that they are kept for the whole year and destroyed when new images are put up when the puja comes round again. As these images are made of cheap earthenware, it is quite likely that the heads and other parts which are stuck on should fall off. In such circumstances the charge does not seem to be justifiable. Further, as already stated, the police station is very near to the temples, and although the occurrence is said to have taken place at midnight information was not given at the police station till the following evening. If the case had been a true one and any person had been recognized, there is no reason why information should not have been given at once or at least in the morning. The fact of the delay in lodging the first information is in itself strongly suggestive of fabrication. The explanation that has been offered is that the Muchies who were owners of the temples, were afraid of going to the police station at night and that in the morning, instead of going to the police station, they went to the Panchayet and as the Panchayet was absent from home they went to him again in the evening and after consulting him they gave information at the police station. Considering how suspicious the other circumstances of the case are this additional circumstance of the delay in giving the information makes the case unworthy of credit. We find that the juror's verdict cannot be maintained because the Court was wrongly constituted and the only question left to decide is whether or not there should be a retrial. In the circumstances stated above we do not think that we should be justified in ordering a fresh trial. The appellants are therefore acquitted. They will be discharged from their bail bond.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Special Judge of Jessore, affirming a refusal on the part of the Assistant Settlement Officer of Jessore to give to the appellant additional rent for additional area under S. 52, Ben Ten. Act

Plaintiff's case is that there was a partition under the Estates Partition Act in the year 1909, that the Deputy Collector in accordance with powers given to him under Ch. 6 of that Act, measured the lands comprised in the tenancy and that it was found upon that measurement that the area in the occupation of the tenant was some 78 bighas. It is said that in the Record-of-Rights it is found that the area now in the occupation of the tenant has increased. Accordingly it is said that there have been two scientific measurements and that the previous measurement for the purposes of the Estates Partition Act should be taken as showing what the area was for which the tenant was then paying rent, and that he is now proved to be in possession of additional area and must pay additional rent therefor

The Assistant Settlement Officer has taken the view that the measurement for purposes of the Estates Partition Act is not reliable, that while it is quite true that the tenant gets information of the proceeding, he is not seriously interested in checking the area or disputing the figure of the area at which it is proposed to record the tenancy for the purpose of partition of the superior interest. That being so, he has refused to accept the area found in the partition proceeding as being a reliable measurement of the right of the tenant at that time. He has also taken the view (which for the purposes of this case I shall assume to be inaccurate) that the standard of measurement adopted in 1909 is not shown. As a matter of fact the area is stated in terms of acres and therefore it has been represented to us that the standard measurement was the measurement employed.

When the matter came before the learned Special Judge the question was decided in this way :

It is clear, however, that the tenancy existed at the same rate from long before the partition of 1916 B. S. The onus is upon the plaintiff to show that the present area is greater than the area at the inception of the tenancy.

On the view, therefore, that the proceedings in 1909 were not proceedings which throw any light upon the inception of the tenancy and the original terms of the tenancy, the learned Special Judge has affirmed the decision of the Assistant Settlement Officer

On appeal to this Court, the learned advocate for the plaintiff points out that the doctrine that in all cases the plaintiff has to show what the area was at the inception of the tenancy cannot be supported. The true principle is one which permits of additional rent being granted not on the basis of what happened at the inception of the tenancy, but on the basis of what happened at any subsequent occasion when the rent was last assessed or adjusted. That doctrine is to be found laid down in several cases, though in cases where there is no question of an intermediate assessment or adjustment, the language of the decisions is sometimes apt to mislead. In particular, there is a decision of my own in Manindra Chandra Nandi v Kaulat Shrik (1), where no question of intermediate assessment or adjustment was raised and it may be that the language used with reference to those particular facts is open to the comment that it does not take account of the circumstance that the occasion, which is important, is not necessarily the first assessment or adjustment of rent, but the last assessment or adjustment of rent—that adjustment under which the tenancy was being held at the time of the alleged discovery of excess area. If authority be wanted for the proposition that it is sufficient for the landlord to establish that since the inception of the tenancy rent has been assessed on the basis of a certain area and that the tenant is in possession of land not included in that area and on which no rent was assessed, it may be sufficient to refer to the case of Durga Priya v. Nazra Gain (2). In these circumstances, it is contended on the part of the appellant that the present case is really governed in principle by a decision of the Patna High Court in the case of Bishun Pragash Narayan Singh v. Acharb Dusadh (3). In that case there had been a previous measurement at the time of a settlement made in 1898 under Ch. 10, Ben. Ten. Act. The tenant was recorded in the Record-of-Rights as holding such and such an area for certain rent and when the case came first before that High Court, Mr. Justice Ross refused the landlord's claim to additional rent on the ground that it was not shown what were the conditions of the tenancy at the inception thereof. The Court, on Letters Patent appeal, dissented from that view and the principle which they proceeded on was this: that the Record-of-Rights defines the relationship between the landlord and tenant in various respects, including the area of the holdings for which rent is paid and is presumed to be correct until the contrary is proved. In other words they treat the settlement proceedings as being an assessment or adjustment of rent, a restatement prima facie binding on both parties, not merely of the area in fact in the occupation of the tenant and of the rent he is in fact paying, but a correct statement of the tenant's right—a statement, namely, that that is the area which he is entitled to hold. The principle of the decision may be exhibited from a passage in the judgment of Adami, J. :

The rent payable by the tenants was ascertained and recorded, and it must be presumed that the tenants accepted that rent as the rent payable for the area as recorded. They did not come forward and prove that the area recorded was less than the area of the holding at its inception. The entry shows that the rent entered there was either the rent for the area which the tenants had been paying previous to 1898, or was the rent assessed or adjusted after dispute during the settlement proceedings between the parties as to the amount payable. In my opinion, the area shown in the Record-of-Rights was the area with reference to which the rent previously paid by the respondents was assessed or adjusted.

If that view be right, it is reasonably clear that there is nothing in this decision which in any way detracts from the authority of the principle that the words "the area for which rent has been previously paid by him" in Cl. (1) (a) of

S. 52 mean the area with reference to which rent was assessed or adjusted.

In the present case we are asked to hold that the landlord's claim to additional rent can be made out on the basis of a measurement made for purposes of the Estates Partition Act, and it appears to me that such a measurement is in a different position for this purpose from the measurement recorded under Ch. 10, Ben. Ten. Act. Under Ch. 6, Estates Partition Act, it is quite true that a Deputy Collector has all the powers of a Revenue Officer under Ch. 10. What he is to do, however, is merely to assess or describe the assets of the estate under partition for the purpose of partition. It is not impossible that the tenant's interest may be affected, as for example, if the superior right over his own tenancy should be divided under Ch. 8 but what the Deputy Collector has to do is really to make a list and valuation of the assets of the estate under partition. He has to record the situation, the area and the boundaries of the tenancy, the rent as stated by the landlord, as stated by the tenant and as taken by himself for the purpose of partition. It is true enough that he has to publish a notification, that he has to be present in the village, that he has to read out the particulars and attest, as it is called, the survey papers and record of the existing rents and other assets. If the correctness of an entry is disputed, he may pass a summary order. If the correctness of any measurement is disputed, he may require the costs of re-measurement to be deposited. He has to publish the survey papers and the record. He has to send a copy to the landlord and to the tenant. When he has done that, he fixes a day to determine the partition of the land into several estates.

Now, it will be reasonably clear from this: that, from the point of view of evidence, the statement of area as regards a tenancy may be of no great value as against the tenant. Indeed, in one of the cases which were cited to us, this was pointed out : Janki Dobe v. Kirtarath Roy (4). But apart from the mere value of evidence it seems to me that there is a question of principle, whether or not it can be said of such a measurement that it is an occasion upon which the rent is assessed or adjusted. In my opinion it is not such an occasion and while I am not disposed to dispute that the settlement under Ch. 10, Ben Ten. Act may be such an occasion, I think it would be extending the principle of the case decided by the Patna High Court, if we were to hold that on the basis of this measurement the landlord is entitled to additional rent. It has to be remembered that we are dealing, as the Patna High Court was dealing, with a case where there is nothing to show when the tenancy was created, how the rent was assessed, whether the rent was a consolidated rent or whether assessed at a certain rate per bigha and whether there was any measurement of the holding at the inception of the tenancy. In these circumstances, it seems to me that, on the authority of the case-law and on principle it is necessary for the landlord to base his claim upon some measurement on the basis of which the rent was assessed or adjusted, otherwise we should be bound to hold that if at any time any reliable measurement was made of a tenant's land and if at any subsequent time it was found that he was in possession of a greater area the landlord would have made out a case prima facie for additional rent. No case in this Court has ever gone so far.

In my judgment the ground upon which the learned Special Judge based his decision is incomplete and taken by itself incorrect, but the result at which he has arrived is correct. I think, in these circumstances, that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing-fee at two gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 1530 of 1925, Decided on 11th May 1928, from appellate decree of District Judge, Nadia, D/- 19th March 1925.

Compromise—Maintenance—One wife claiming property under a gift—Suit by husband to set aside the alleged gift—Compromise that certain sum should be paid annually by the wife to the husband and after his death to the second wife—Second wife making a will and appointing plaintiff as executor and beneficiary—Plaintiffs suing for recovering arrears of maintenance—Plaintiff is not entitled to recover arrears as the maintenance charge being intended to be kept alive for the benefit of the family only and not for the strangers or assignees.

One M had two wives and one of them claimed the whole of a certain property under a gift. There was a suit in which M sought to set aside the alleged gift. The suit was compromised and in the compromise it was agreed that a certain sum should be paid annually by the first wife and her successor to M and after him to the other wife, if she survived him, and to her heirs and successors. M died and was succeeded by the second wife who enjoyed the maintenance; and when she died she made a will appointing the plaintiffs as executors and also a beneficiary under the will. Thereupon plaintiffs sued to recover arrears of maintenance under the terms of a compromise entered into between the defendants and M.

Held: that the maintenance charge was intended to be kept alive for the benefit of the family only and not for the benefit of the strangers or assignees or persons who may take it as legatees from one of the members of the family. [P 557 C 1]

Judgment—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs against the decree of dismissal of their suit which was for recovery of arrears of maintenance under the terms of a compromise that had been entered into between the predecessor of the defendants and a certain Mahatap Mukherjee. This Mahatap Mukherjee had two wives and one of them claimed the whole of a certain property under a gift. There was a suit in which Mahatap sought to set aside the alleged gift. The suit was compromised and in the compromise it was agreed that a certain sum should be paid annually by the first wife and her successor to Mahatap and after him to the other wife, if she survived him, and to her heirs and successors. Mahatap died and was succeeded by the second wife who enjoyed the maintenance; and when she died she made a will, appointing the plaintiffs as executors and also making one of them the beneficiary under the will. The plaintiffs have therefore sued to recover the arrears of maintenance. The learned Court of appeal below has held that the will does not devise the maintenance subsequent to the death of the testatrix to the legatees. The terms of the will have been correctly interpreted by the learned District Judge. The will expressly states that it devises the moveable and immovable properties of the testatrix and the claim for future maintenance cannot come under either of those heads. That the testatrix did not intend to make any disposition of the future maintenance is abundantly clear from the provisions in the will that the maintenance due to her up to the time of her death should be taken by the plaintiffs. The fact that she made such a provision showed clearly that the testatrix did not intend to make any disposition of the maintenance allowance in the clauses relating to the disposal of moveable and immovable properties. Over and above this, there can be no doubt that the maintenance allowance was purely one for the benefit of the family of the descendants of Mahatap. The compromise that was recorded states that the heirs, successors and representatives of the second wife should be entitled to this maintenance from the first wife and her successors. If the property had been ordinary property undoubtedly the terms of the compromise would indicate that the intention was to convey the property out and out; in other words a hereditary estate capable of being transferred. But the property dealt with in the compromise is an allowance taken from another property which was given to the first wife as compensation for the taking of the property by the first wife; and because the family had been deprived of the profits from that property, and the compromise was entered into so as to compensate the family for the loss. In these circumstances the proper construction of the terms of the compromise would be that the maintenance charge was intended to be kept alive for the benefit of the family only and not for the benefit of the strangers or assigns or persons who may take it as legatees from one of the members of the family. In all these circumstances it appears that the decision of the learned District Judge is correct. The appeal therefore fails and is dismissed with costs.

Government Appeals Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of 1928, and Criminal Revs. Nos. 120, 154, 179, 180 and 181 of 1928, Decided on 1st June 1928, from order of Dy Magistrate, Howrah, D. 28th October 1927.

Factories Act, S. 42—Under S. 42 one proceeding is split into two proceedings—Manager or occupier initially charged with an offence under the Factories Act can go into the witness-box and give the evidence himself because, he goes into the witness-box not as an accused in the case originally started but in his own right as a complainant on the complaint against the other person whom he has brought in—Criminal P. C., S. 342 (4).

The structure of S. 42, Factories Act, indicates that one proceeding is split up into two proceedings and while the manager or occupier is accused of having committed an offence under the Act, he is also a complainant on his complaint against the other person or persons he has brought in. In the proceeding in which the manager or the occupier is the complainant, he is liable to be cross-examined by the other person or persons who has or have been brought before the Court on his complaint. This must mean that the manager or occupier quæ complainant must give evidence himself. There is no substance in the objection that the manager or occupier who initially is charged with an offence against the Act cannot go into the witness box and give evidence himself, because he goes into the witness-box not as an accused in the case originally started against him, but in his own right as a complainant on his complaint against the other person or persons whom he has brought in. It is not a material irregularity to dispose of the two matters by one judgment or to record the evidence in the two matters together. [159 C 1]

Judgment—This is an appeal on behalf of the Local Government against an order of the Deputy Magistrate of Howrah dated 28th October 1927, by which he acquitted the accused under S. 245, Criminal P. C., of the offences alleged to have been committed by him under S. 41 (a) read with S. 26 and S. 41 (h) read with S. 35, Factories Act (Act 12 of 1911, as amended by Act 5 of 1923).

What happened in this case was as follows: On 28th June 1927, the Inspector of Factories, Bengal, inspected the Howrah Jute Mills of which the accused Murray was the Manager and found three persons, named, Jokadia, Varalee and Sukfaria, employed and working in the Drawing Department without having any specified hours fixed for their employment in contravention of S. 26, Factories Act, and further found that though the said three persons had commenced to work at 9-30 a. m. their names had not been entered in the prescribed register at 10-20 in contravention of S. 35 of the Act and R. 76 thereunder.

The accused Murray appeared before the Magistrate on 16th August 1927, and filed two petitions of complaint under S. 42 of the Act in respect of the aforesaid offences against three other persons named Whitton, Charan Das Chatterjee and Sali Dutt, alleging inter alia that he had always used due diligence to enforce the provisions of the Act, that the offence if committed at all, was committed without his knowledge and consent and that the persons mentioned in his petition of complaint who were under him and whose duty it was to look to the proper and lawful working of their department were directly responsible for any wrongful acts of commission or omission.

The Magistrate enquired into the complaint of Mr Murray. He started two order-sheets, one being numbered 1136 of 1927 and the other 1149 of 1927. The three persons named by Mr Murray appeared before the Magistrate on 26th August 1927 and pleaded not guilty to both the charges. It is alleged that the Magistrate proceeded to try Mr. Murray and the aforesaid three persons on the two accusations summarily and in one proceeding and that although Mr. Murray was an accused person under trial, the Magistrate allowed him to give evidence on oath.

It appears from the Magistrate's judgment that he went into the merits and found that it was Charan Das Chatterjee whose duty it was to keep the register properly and that the manager, Mr. Murray, took all necessary steps to see that the Factories Act and the rules thereunder were not violated. He came to the conclusion that Murray, Whitton and Sali Dutt were not guilty and acquitted them. He found accused Charan Das Chatterjee guilty under S. 41 (h), Factories Act, and fined him Rs 30 and, in default, fifteen days rigorous imprisonment.

The contention on behalf of the Local Government is that the joint trial of the several persons involved in the two accusations is contrary to the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure and that the procedure adopted by the learned Magistrate in examining an accused person as a witness in the case is contrary to law and has vitiated the trial.

Section 42, sub-S. 1, Factories Act, runs as follows:

Where the occupier or manager of a factory is charged with an offence against this Act, he shall be entitled upon complaint duly made by him to have any other persons whom he charges as the actual offender brought before the Court at the time appointed for hearing the charge, and if, after the commission of the offence has been proved, the occupier or the manager of the factory proves to the satisfaction of the Court:

(a) That he has used due diligence to enforce the execution of this Act, and;

(b) That the said other person committed the offence in question without his knowledge, consent or connivance;

that other person shall be convicted of the offence and shall be liable to the like fine as if he were the occupier or manager, and the occupier or manager, shall be discharged from any liability under this Act.

It is quite clear from the language used that when the manager or occupier of a factory is charged with an offence, he is entitled to make a complaint against these whom he considers the offender or offenders and to have such person or persons brought before the Court at the time appointed for hearing of the charge brought against him. This means that the manager or occupier who is charged and the person or persons whom he complains against are both before the Court at the same time; in other words, the section contemplates both sets of complainants and accused being before the Court at one and the same time. When both parties, i.e., both sets of complainants and accused are before the Court, it must in the first instance be proved in the case against the manager or occupier that an offence against the Act has been committed. As soon as this is proved, the manager or occupier has to prove two things, namely, that he has himself used due diligence to enforce the execution of the Act and that the other persons named by him have committed the offence in question without his knowledge, consent or connivance. If these two things are proved, the persons named by the manager or occupier shall be convicted and the manager or occupier shall be discharged from liability under the Act.

The structure of the portion of the section quoted above indicates that one proceeding is split up into two proceedings and that while the manager or occupier is accused of having committed an offence under the Act, he is also a complainant on his complaint against the other person or persons he has brought in. In the proceeding in which the manager or the occupier is the complainant, he is liable to be cross-examined by the other person or persons who has or have been brought before the Court on his complaint. This, of course, must mean that the manager or occupier qua complainant must give evidence himself. The procedure indicated above is a special one prescribed by the Act and it would appear from an examination of the record in this case that the Magistrate has in no way departed from that procedure. In our opinion, there is no substance in the objection that the manager or occupier who initially is charged with an offence against the Act cannot go into the witness-box and give evidence himself. In the circumstances contemplated in the latter part of the section quoted above he goes into the witness-box not as an accused in the case originally started against him but in his own right as a complainant on his complaint against the other person or persons whom he has brought in. We have examined the record for ourselves and are of opinion that what the Magistrate has done in this matter is in substantial compliance with the provisions of the Act. But even if it be considered an irregularity to dispose of the two matters by one judgment, or to record the evidence in the two matters together, it is an irregularity which in no way has caused any prejudice to any of the parties concerned and is as a matter of fact well covered by the provisions of S. 537, Criminal P. C. In our opinion the present appeal fails, and must be dismissed. We desire to observe that we have examined the merits also and on the merits it is not a matter for our interference.

Appeals Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 6.

The facts of these cases are on all fours with the facts in appeal No 2 and the order that we have just passed will apply to them also.

The connected rule in Revision Cases Nos. 120, 154, 179, 180 and 181 must also be discharged.

Appeal No. 390 of 1926, Decided on 27th February 1928, from original order of 2nd Sub-Judge, Pabna, D. 21st August 1926.

Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 15—Joint decree—Decree holders giving up a portion of the decree—Application for the execution of the rest is not illegal.

A judgment-debtor cannot be harassed by different applications for execution made by different decree-holders for their own shares of the decretal amount. But if some of the joint decree-holders apply for execution with regard to certain portion of the decree giving up the rest, making the joint decree-holders parties to the application who do not object to the application giving up the rest of the decree, the application is not liable to be dismissed.

Judgment.—The application for execution out of which this appeal arises was dismissed on the ground that it contravened O 21, R. 15, Civil P. C. We do not see how it contravenes that rule. The decree was made in favour of the applicants and the pro forma defendant in the original suit for a lump sum of Rs. 1,000. On a previous occasion it was held by the Subordinate Judge that the application was barred by limitation. On appeal to this Court that judgment was set aside, and it was held that the application was not barred as it was a joint decree that was sought to be executed by the other decree holders within the period of limitation. The matter was sent back for the decision of the other questions in dispute. This time the Subordinate Judge has held that the applicants have done what is forbidden by O 21, R. 15. O 21, R. 15 does not forbid anything to be done. It is rather an enabling rule. It enables one or more of the persons in whose favour a decree has been passed to apply for execution of the whole decree for the benefit of them all. Sub-R (2), R. 15 provides for safeguarding the interest of persons who have not joined in the application. In the present application the applicants asked in the tenth column for the entire decretal amount being realized by attachment and sale of the immovable properties of the judgment-debtors. In the seventh column they stated that the total amount of the decree was Rs 1,000. Out of this they deducted one-half share of the pro forma defendant and asked for their own share of Rs 500. It is hardly necessary to state that a judgment-debtor cannot be harassed by different applications for execution made by different decree-holders for their own shares of the decretal amount. But if some of the joint decree-holders apply for execution with regard to certain portion of the decree giving up the rest making the joint decree-holders parties to the application who do not object to the application giving up the rest of the decree, we do not see how it can be said that the application is liable to be dismissed. If one decree-holder gives up a portion of his decree the application for execution for the rest cannot be said to be illegal; and in the present case the circumstances amount to that. The present application cannot be held to be contrary to law. The judgment-debtors cannot, however, be harassed by any subsequent application for execution of the balance of the same decree either by the present applicants or by the pro forma defendant who has been made a party to this execution proceeding.

The appeal therefore should be allowed and the execution shall proceed on the application made by the appellants with costs to the appellants in both Courts. We assess the hearing-fee at three gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 891 of 1925, Decided on 25th January 1923, from appellate decree of 2nd Sub-Judge, Faridpur, D/- 12th January 1925

(a) Bengal Estates Partition Act (5 of 1897), S. 81 — Power of the Collector to split up a tenure should be exercised only where necessary for equitable partition.

Under S. 81, the right to split up, for the purposes of partition, any tenure or holding is given to the Collector under which he can divide any tenure or holding into separate parts apportioning the rent to be attached to each such part and giving an opportunity to the tenants to raise any objection to such division. But the right should be exercised only where it is reasonably necessary to do so in order to effect an equitable partition. [P 561 C 2]

(b) Bengal Estates Partition Act (5 of 1897), S. 81—"Split up" means completely sever in parcels.

The word "split" in S. 81 means to cause to part under or to divide by a quick or sharp cut. The addition of the word "up" intensifies the meaning of "split" and means severing completely in several parcels the holding, which before the partition was held under several persons: 10 C. W. N. 818, Foll. [P 561 C 2]

(c) Bengal Estates Partition Act (5 of 1897), S. 81—A cosharer landlord after partition of an estate under the Act can evict a transferee prior to partition of a non-transferable holding.

Plaintiffs were cosharer landlords with some other persons in respect of a holding within more than one estate. The original tenants transferred to the defendants a portion of a holding in one of the estates and the defendants were in possession of that portion. Subsequently there was a partition of that estate under the Estates Partition Act among the cosharer landlords of the holding. The transferred plots fell to the saham of the plaintiffs alone. They therefore claimed ejectment of the defendants on the ground that they were trespassers being the transferees of a non-transferable holding.

Held: that, as against the plaintiffs, defendants have acquired no title or interest although the plaintiffs for the time being had no right to evict them, as under the law they had no right to re-enter unless the entire holding had been transferred by the original tenants. But so soon as the plaintiffs acquired, instead of a share of the rent to which they were entitled, a specified portion of the lands comprised in the holding, they obtained the right to enter on it if they found it to be in the occupation of a trespasser. Dwarka Nath Chakravarti, Rajendra Chandra Guha and Diptendra Mohan Ghose for Charu Chandra Choudhuri — for Respondents.

Suhrawardy, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit by the plaintiffs for ejectment of defendants 1 and 2 from the lands in suit on the allegation that the holding was abandoned by the former tenants and the defendants as transferees from them of the holding which is a non-transferable one are liable to be ejected. The plaintiffs were cosharer landlords with some other persons in respect of a holding within more than one estate. The original tenants Kokai and Mehar Ali transferred to the defendants appellants a portion of the holding comprising settlement plots 189 and 190 of mauza Kedarpur appertaining to Estate No 4054 and the defendants were in possession of that portion of the holding. Subsequently there was a partition of this estate under the Estate Partition Act among the cosharer landlords of the holding. The disputed plots fell to the saham of the plaintiffs alone. Thereupon the plaintiffs claimed ejectment of the defendants on the ground that they were trespassers being the transferees of a non-transferable occupancy holding. Both the Courts below have decreed the suit.

Defendants 1 and 2 have appealed and it has been argued on their behalf that the view of the law taken by the Courts below is erroneous and should be reversed. The sole point involved in this case is one of construction of S. 81, Estates Partition Act 5 of 1897 Bengal Council. The plaintiffs' case is that before the holding was split up by the Collector among the different cosharers, the defendants being transferees of a portion of it, the plaintiffs had no right to eject them. But after the partition the plots now in possession of the defendants being allotted solely to the plaintiffs formed into a new holding and the plaintiff being the sole landlords of that holding have obtained the right of ejecting the defendants as transferees of that newly-formed holding. The defendants on the other hand contend that the effect of the partition is to divide the landlord's interest in the lands among the cosharer landlords, but not to destroy the character of the holding as it stood before. In my opinion the view taken by the Courts below seems to be correct and should be upheld. Under S. 81, Estates Partition Act, the right to split up for the purposes of partition any tenure or holding is given to the Collector. But the right should be exercised only when it is reasonably necessary to do so in order to effect an equitable partition. And further, if the tenure or holding is split up, the existing rent should be apportioned among the several parts into which it is divided. The section further provides that before such a division of the tenure or holding is effected notice ought to be served on the tenants and that objections by them to such division should be heard. The provisions standing by themselves clearly indicate that the law confers upon the partition authorities the power to divide any tenure or holding into separate parts apportioning the rent to be attached to each such part and giving an opportunity to the tenants to raise any objection to such division. All these provisions are necessary only in a case where it is proposed to create several holdings out of one holding. If the intention was to keep the holding intact and only to divide the superior interest of the landlords it would not have been necessary to hear the tenants with reference to the division. The word used in the section is "split" which lexicographically means "to cause to part asunder or to divide by a quick or sharp cut". The addition of the word "up" intensifies the meaning of "split" and it has been used in my judgment in the sense of severing completely in several parcels the holding which before the partition was held under several persons. This view has been taken by this Court in the case of Protap Chandra Das v. Kamala Kanta Shaha (1). The facts are similar to those in this case with a slight difference to which reference will be made below. The learned Judges observed that the partition made by the Collector had the effect of dividing the old holding into new ones and the plaintiffs became the sole landlords of 5 kais held by the defendants and which defendant 6 clearly had abandoned.

This case has been attempted to be distinguished on the ground that in that case the Collector had made the partition before the defendants' purchase. I fail to see what difference in principle which underlies the decision this fact is calculated to make. From the judgment it does not appear that this special fact had any influence on the view which was taken of the law in that case. The mere fact that the Collector proposes allotment does not change the position of the parties before such allotment is sanctioned by the higher authorities. It makes no difference whether the defendants entered upon the land previous to the allotment made by the Collector or after it. There is an unreported decision of this Court which was placed before the lower appellate Court and which took the same view, though in that case [it was subsequent to Protap Chandra Das's case (1)] the latter case was not cited. It has got this merit that two other learned Judges of this Court came to the same conclusion independently and uninfluenced by the view taken in the previous case. In Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 1425 of 1907, decided on 14th April 1909, Chitty and Vincent, JJ, observed that it was urged before them that the Deputy Collector had no power to split up the holding of the original tenants for the purposes of partition but no tangible reason had been given to show why he had not that power.

According to the learned Judges S. 81, Estates Partition Act, 1897 distinctly gave him that power though, no doubt, it imposes the condition that it must be reasonably necessary to exercise it. Then in dealing with the defendants similarly situated as in this case their Lordships observed:

The main argument for the appellants was that, having been recognized by the cosharers of the plaintiff, they were in the position of joint tenants, of the whole jote including that portion of it which fell to the plaintiff's share; but we cannot accede to this argument. If the partition was duly effected and the holding split up the plaintiffs' portion of that holding would become a complete jote in itself and Baku and Naimuddi (the original tenants) would have no right to sell their interest in that to the predecessors of defendants 1 to 4 who could not claim to be the tenants of the plaintiff and her cosharers in that land. It would not be a case of transfer of a portion of a holding the remainder being held under the same landlord, but it could be a transfer of a complete jote and Baku and Naimuddi having ceased to occupy that jote, to pay rent for it, or to have any connexion with it may fairly be held to have abandoned it in which case the landlord had a right to re-enter.

This case in all its facts is similar to the one before us as it is claimed by the appellants in this case that they were recognized by all the cosharer landlords except the plaintiffs and such as they could not be ejected from the lands in suit. Then it is attempted on behalf of the appellants to distinguish the unreported case on the same ground as the case of Protap Chandra Das (1), as it appears from the statement of facts in the judgment that the defendants-appellants in that case had purchased the portion of the holding after the proposed allotment by the Deputy Collector. As I have said before, this fact has nothing to do with the application of the law and does not seem to have in any way affected the conclusion of the learned Judges. Against these decisions of this Court certain decisions of the Patna High Court have been cited before us. They are reported in a series of reports called Indian Cases which do not seem to be authorized reports. The attention of the Courts has been drawn on several occasions to the desirability of avoiding citing cases from unauthorized reports specially of cases of other High Courts as there are no means available to check the correctness of the reports and of the facts stated there. But as the point is of some interest we have looked into those reports and considered the arguments in the judgments of those cases. The decision in Suraj Deo Narayan Singh v. Pachh Narain Singh (2), takes a view at variance with that expressed in Protap Chandra Das's case (1). But it appears that the decision of this Court was not cited before their Lordships of the Patna High Court. The view expressed by the learned Judges in the Patna case may be treated as obiter on the facts of the case as it was a case in which the occupancy holding was found to be a transferable one. Another case of that Court is to be found in Radha Krishun v. Bhagwat Prasad (3), decided by the same learned Judges.

There also no case was cited and the learned Judges did not discuss the point beyond making an observation that the partition between the maliks did not give the plaintiffs a right to treat the transfers of parts of holdings as transfers of the entire holdings merely because those parts were allotted to his patti at the partition. I am unable to follow the view taken in those cases and I am of opinion that the interpretation of the Appeals Nos. 1787 and 1788 of 1925, Decided on 5th January 1928, from appellate decrees of 2nd Sub-Judge, Tipperah, D/- 8th April 1925.

Adverse Possession—A, B and C jointly inheriting a homestead though in separate occupation of different huts therein—Landlord getting ejectment decree but never executing it—C alone executing a kabuliyaat in favour of landlord for a certain period—Landlord trying to eject all after that period—A and B can acquire title by adverse possession in respect of the shares in their possession.

A, B and C, three brothers, jointly inherited a certain homestead. A and B had two-thirds share and C one-third share, all being in joint possession of the homestead though in separate occupation of the different huts therein. In 1905 the landlord under whom they held the homestead obtained a decree for ejectment against the three brothers but the decree was never executed and the three brothers remained in possession as before. Subsequently one of the brothers, C, executed a kabuliyaat in favour of the landlord for a term of five years. On the expiry of the said term he obtained another ejectment decree against C and attempted to pull down the huts in execution of the decree. A and B then instituted the suit for declaration of their nuskir title to a two-thirds share in the homestead, for confirmation of possession therein and for injunction restraining the landlord from interfering with their possession.

Held: that A and B were entitled to the decree. C could not, by entering into arrangements with the landlord, put him in constructive possession of anything in excess of the share of which he was in possession. There was no obstacle to A and B having acquired a title by adverse possession in respect of the shares to the extent of which they were in possession for the statutory period. [P 564 C 2]

Judgment.—These two appeals arise out of two suits, Nos. 17 and 18, for declaration of title and confirmation of possession of two different homesteads. In Suit No. 17 the plaintiff's case was that the disputed homestead formerly belonged to their father who left behind him his three sons, the two plaintiffs and the pro forma defendant, as his heirs; that the two plaintiffs thus acquired two-thirds share and the pro forma

Act which appealed to the learned Judges of this Court is more convincing. It appears that the Patna High Court too is not unanimous on this point. In Ram Lochan Koer v. Jagarnath Misir (4), Mullick, J., took a different view and followed Protap Chandra Das's case (1) of this Court. The learned Judge went further to say that even if there were private partition among the landlords the effect would have been the same as in a partition under the Estate Partition Act.

The learned Subordinate Judge in his considered judgment has referred to the various inconveniences which would flow from the adoption of a contrary view. Thus he says:

If it is held that the defendants are entitled to remain on the land, the effect would be that the plaintiffs would be compelled to recognize the transfer although they did not recognize it. They can no longer sue the old tenants . . . There can be no gainsaying the fact that the defendants had no interest in the lands before partition (as against the plaintiffs) . . . It would be conferring an interest on them by partition if they are allowed to remain on the lands and the plaintiffs are compelled to receive rent from them.

If the appellants' contention be allowed to prevail the plaintiffs would be compelled to recognize the defendants as their tenants although the relation between them was not created either by contract or by operation of law. The position seems to me to be absurd and must be relieved against. As against the plaintiffs the defendants-appellants have acquired no title or interest although the plaintiffs for the time being had no right to evict them, as under the law they had no right to re-enter unless the entire holding had been transferred by the original tenants. But so soon as they acquired, instead of a share of the rent to which they were entitled, a specified portion of the lands comprised in the holding they obtained the right to enter on it if they found it to be in the occupation of a trespasser. Considering all the circumstances and there being clear authorities of this Court which are binding upon me, I hold that the view taken by the Courts below is correct in law.

defendant one-third share, all being in joint possession of the homestead though in separate occupation of the different huts therein : that they held the same under the Maharajah of Hill Tipperah ; that in 1906 the Maharajah obtained a decree for ejectment against the three brothers but the decree was never executed and the three brothers remained in possession as before ; that subsequently one of the brothers, namely, the pro forma defendant, executed a kabuliyat in favour of the Maharajah for a term of five years from 1318 to 1322 ; that on the expiry of the said term the Maharajah obtained another ejectment decree against the pro forma defendant and attempted to pull down the huts in execution of the decree. The two plaintiffs then instituted the suit for declaration of their niskar title to a two-thirds share in the homestead for confirmation of possession therein and for an injunction restraining the Maharajah from interfering with the plaintiff's possession. In Suit No. 18 the facts were somewhat similar except that the plaintiff therein claims a one-half share in the homestead concerned in that suit.

The Munsif decreed Suit No. 17 declaring the plaintiff's title to a two-thirds share and confirming their possession therein and granting the injunction prayed for ; the plaintiffs' niskar title not being proved, he dismissed Suit No. 18.

There were appeals from both the decisions by the plaintiffs in Suit No. 18 and the Maharajah in Suit No. 17. There were some cross-objections as regards the order for costs, but with these we are not concerned. The Subordinate Judge upheld the Munsif's decision in Suit No. 17 and reversed his decision in Suit No 18 and gave the plaintiff a decree therein. The Maharajah has appealed.

The view upon which the Subordinate Judge has proceeded is that the Maharajah's case, that the plaintiffs vacated their respective homesteads after the ejectment decrees obtained against them and the pro forma defendant, has not been made out, that they remained in possession after the said decrees as before, that they were not affected by any arrangement which may have been entered into by the pro forma defendant in favour of the Maharajah, and that their possession since they were treated as trespassers in the said ejectment suits was adverse to the Maharajah.

The main contention that has been urged in support of the appeals is that if during the continuance of a trespasser's possession which is adverse to that of a true owner some acts of possession, though slight, are performed by the true owner, a title by adverse possession cannot accrue in favour of the trespasser, his possession having, in the eye of the law, ceased during the time that the true owner has performed those acts. As a proposition of law the argument, no doubt, is sound, but the principle in my opinion has hardly any scope for application in the present case. The possession of the two plaintiffs to the extent of two-thirds in the homestead concerned in Suit No 17, and that to the extent of one-half belonging to the plaintiff of Suit No. 18 in the homestead concerned therein, has continued all along upon the findings of the Subordinate Judge. The pro forma defendant could not by entering into arrangements with the Maharajah put him in constructive possession of anything in excess of the shares of which they themselves were in possession. Whatever may have been the nature of the possession of the Maharajah, that is to say, by realization of rent or anything of that sort such possession could only extend to the share which legitimately belonged to the said pro forma defendant. There was no obstacle to the plaintiffs having acquired a title by adverse possession in respect of the shares to the extent of which they were in possession for the statutory period. The plaintiffs, therefore, are clearly entitled to have a declaration of their right to the shares which they claimed and also the consequential reliefs that they prayed for.

There was a further contention put forward in Appeal No. 1788 of 1925 which arises out of Suit No. 18. The contention is that the decree of the Subordinate Judge, in so far as it purports to decree the plaintiff's suit, must involve a declaration in his favour of the niskar right which he set up, but there is no finding in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge that that right has been established. On looking into the materials which the plaintiff has produced before the Court it seems to me that no serious attempt was made by the plaintiff to prove such right. The result is that this contention will succeed.

Second Appeal No. 1787 of 1925 will be dismissed with costs. Second Appeal No. 1788 of 1925 will be allowed with costs, the decree of the Subordinate Judge to which it relates being modified by the addition of the words "and the plaintiff's prayer for a declaration that he has a niskar right in the property in suit is dismissed."

Appeal No. 1669 of 1925, Decided on 22nd December 1927, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Jessore, D/- 25th March 1925.

* Registration Act, S. 32—Executant dead—All legal representatives need not join in presenting the document—Any one of such persons may present the document for registration.

The object of the legislature in enacting S. 32 is to prevent a mere outsider from presenting for registration a document with which he has no concern, and in which he has no interest. To allow all and sundry to present documents for registration would be to open a door to fraud and forgery, and the legislature, therefore, intended to provide that the registration should be initiated by the document being presented for registration by a person "having a direct relation to the deed." But in order to give effect to that intention, it is not necessary or reasonable that all the representatives of a deceased executant should join in presenting a document: 23 All. 233 (P.C.) and A. Prafulla Kamal Das—for Appellant.

Hemendra Chandra Sen—for Respondents.

Page, J.—This appeal raises an interesting question with respect to the construction of S. 32, Registration Act (3 of 1877), now S. 32 of the Act 16 of 1908. The suit was brought by the plaintiffs for a declaration of their title to a share in certain lands comprised in two jamas, and for partition. As regards an eight annas share of the lands in suit, the plaintiffs traced their title through a kabala which was granted to their vendors by one Panchu. This kabala was executed in 1896 by Panchu, who died shortly after; and, on his death, was presented for registration by his widow. Panchu left him surviving his widow, a brother, a sister, and a mother, and if this kabala was inadmissible as "evidence of any transaction affecting the immovable property comprised therein," (S. 32) it is common ground that each of these four persons as the heirs of Panchu would be entitled to a share of his estate. The kabala having been presented by the widow was registered. The contention of the appellant is that inasmuch as the kabala was presented for registration by the widow alone under S. 49, Registration Act, it could not "be received as evidence of any transaction affecting the property. The question is: Was the kabala presented for registration by "the representative" of Panchu? It is contended on behalf of the appellant that in S. 32 the term "representative of such person" means all the persons who legally represent such person; and that unless all the heirs jointly presented this document to the Registrar, the document was not duly presented, and the Registrar had no jurisdiction to effect the registration of it. In support of this contention, a number of authorities were canvassed before us. It was conceded, however, that there is no direct authority upon the question that falls for determination in this appeal. It has been laid down by Lord Robertson, expressing the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Mujbunnissa v. Abdul Rahim (1), that the power and jurisdiction of the Registrar only come into play when he is invoked by some person having a direct relation to the deed, and later in his judgment his Lordship added that no case had been cited that gives any countenance to the view that the absence of any party legally entitled to present a deed for registration is a defect in procedure falling under S. 87.

In that case the Judicial Committee held that the deed not having been presented by a person entitled in that behalf the registration was illegal. The question which we have to consider is whether when the widow of Panchu presented the kabala for registration the jurisdiction of the Registrar was invoked "by the representative" of Panchu. It is not contended that the widow's interest in Panchu's estate was not directly affected by the deed. But it is said that the intention of the legislature was that all the heirs must combine in presenting a document for registration in order that the jurisdiction of the Registrar should duly be invoked. I am of opinion that that contention is ill-founded. It may be, (though it is unnecessary to decide), that the four heirs of Panchu were bound to admit the execution of the deed under S. 35, although the failure of any of the heirs so to do would amount to a mere irregularity and would not vitiate the registration. But why was it necessary that all the heirs of Panchu should have presented the document for registration? The object of the legislature, as I apprehend, in enacting S. 32 was to prevent a mere outsider from presenting for registration a document with which he had no concern, and in which he had no interest. To allow all and sundry to present documents for registration would be to open a door to fraud and forgery, and the legislature, therefore, intended to provide that the registration should be initiated by the document being presented for registration by a person "having a direct relation to the deed." But in order to give effect to that intention I do not think that it was necessary or reasonable that the other heirs of Panchu should have joined with the widow in presenting the kabala for registration.

If it had been intended that all persons directly concerned in the execution of a document should present the document, one would have expected to find in a case in which, for instance, four persons had jointly executed a registrable document, that the document could only duly be presented for registration by all four of such persons jointly and in combination. But it is provided by S. 32 that any one of such persons may present the document for registration. Ezekiel & Co., v. Annoda Charan Sen (2). I see no reason, if one of four persons who are jointly interested in the execution of a document may present the document for registration, why one of the persons who were the heirs and representatives of Panchu, and who had "a direct relation to the deed," should not in like manner be entitled duly to present the document for registration. In my opinion, in the circumstances of this case, the presentation of the kabala for registration by the widow of Panchu conformed with the requirements of S. 32, Registration Act, and that the kabala was presented for registration according to law. There are no other points raised on behalf of the appellant to which I need advert, or which possess any substance. The result is that the appeal fails, and is dismissed with costs.

In the matter of Stamp Act.

Reference No. 27 of 1928, under S. 57, Indian Stamp Act, Decided on 12th June 1928.

* * Finance Act (5 of 1927), S. 5—Demand drafts are bills of exchange and are exempt from stamp duty—Stamp Act, S. 2 (2).

Demand drafts by one branch of a Bank on another branch of the same Bank in the form a bill of exchange payable on demand to a third party is a bill of exchange within the meaning of S. 2 (2), Stamp Act, and is exempt from stamp duty by virtue of Act 5 of 1927. English and Indian Case Law Discussed. [P 569 C 2]

Rankin, C. J.—This is a Reference made to us under the provisions of S. 57, Stamp Act. It would appear that certain instruments were presented on behalf of the holder for adjudication as to whether it was necessary that they should be stamped under S. 19, Stamp Act. The documents of which three in number are before us may be sufficiently exemplified by choosing one of the three. The one which I shall choose is a document in the form in which bills of exchange are accustomed to be couched. It is headed "Imperial Bank of India." It is addressed from Calcutta. It is signed as drawer by the Secretary and Treasurer and the Accountant of the Imperial Bank of India. It is addressed to the Imperial Bank of India, Lahore, as the addressee or drawee and it is made payable to a third party, the Commercial Syndicate Ltd or order. It will be observed, upon a strict reading of the instrument, that there are two parties and only two parties—the Imperial Bank of India on the one hand and the payee, the Commercial Syndicate Ltd., on the other. The question is whether these instruments are required to be stamped by virtue of the terms of the Stamp Act as amended recently by the Finance Act, 1927, and I shall discuss first whether this instrument is a bill-of-exchange within the meaning of the phrase as it is used in the Stamp Act. If it is a bill-of-exchange, then as by its express terms it is payable on demand, it is prima facie freed from stamp duty by the amendment introduced by the Finance Act (5 of 1927).

When we come to consider the question whether it is a bill-of-exchange, we have to refer to Cl. 2, S. 2, Stamp Act. By that clause "bill-of-exchange" is defined as meaning a bill-of-exchange as defined by the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881 and includes also a hundi, and any other document entitling or purporting to entitle any person, whether named therein or not, to payment by any other person of, or to draw upon any other person for, any sum of money.

Now, the first question is whether this document is a bill-of-exchange as defined by the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, and, on that question, we have to look to S. 5 of the Act. We find that a bill-of-exchange is defined there as an instrument in writing containing an unconditional order, signed by the maker directing a certain person to pay a certain sum of money only to or to the order of a certain person or to the bearer of the instrument.

This definition may be contrasted with the definition contained in S. 3 of the English Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vic 61) whereunder an instrument to be a bill-of-exchange must be an unconditional order in writing, addressed by the person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time a sum certain in money to, or to the order of, a specified person or to bearer. It is to be observed that, whereas in the English Act express provision is made by sub-S. 2, S. 5, for the case where in a bill the drawer and the drawee are the same person, namely, that the holder may treat the instrument either as a bill-of-exchange or as a promissory note; the Indian statute, which has not expressly required that the instrument in order to be a bill-of-exchange must needs be addressed by one person to another, nevertheless contains a provision in S. 17 that where an instrument may be construed either as a promissory note or a bill-of-exchange the holder may at his election treat it as either, and the instrument shall thenceforward be treated accordingly. So far as the first part of the wording of sub-S. 2, S. 2, Stamp Act of 1899 is concerned, the question whether the document before us is a bill-of-exchange as defined by the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881 raises certain considerations. It is, in my judgment, a case which is governed by S. 17, Negotiable Instruments Act, in the sense that it would be open to the holder to treat the document as a promissory note. But I must emphatically decline to say that it is made out to my satisfaction that the instrument itself is not a bill-of-exchange within the definition given by S. 5 of that Act. Indeed if this were so the case would not come under S. 17 at all and in my judgment the reason why the definition in S. 5 does not include the requirement that the drawee should be a different person from the drawer—a requirement which had long been insisted upon in English case-law—is because the intention was that this kind of document should with other cases be dealt with by the general provision made by S. 17. To imply this requirement and thus insert it into the definition of "bill-of-exchange" seems to me to spoil the draftsman's work.

However, let us proceed further to the definition given by the Stamp Act. There we find, that, for the purposes of the Stamp Act, a document is a bill-of-exchange, even although it be not so within the definition in the Negotiable Instruments Act, if it be a document entitling or purporting to entitle any person, whether named therein or not, to payment by any other person of any sum of money.

Now, these words which conclude sub-S. 2, S. 2, Stamp Act, are modelled upon or taken from the provisions of a section which in the English Stamp Act of 1891 (54 and 55 Victoria, Ch. 39) stands as S. 32 and it appears that in the previous English Stamp Act, 1870 it stood as S. 48. It has been held in cases in England, to which I will refer, that the language which I have quoted cannot be taken literally because the language is so wide that it might include all sorts of instruments which are not for any purpose capable of being called or classed as bills of-exchange. It has been pointed out that a mortgage or a lease may be a document entitling a person to payment by another person of a sum of money. Hence, in the present case, we have to consider whether any difficulty that may arise upon the definition in S. 5, Negotiable Instruments Act, is or is not removed by the concluding words of sub-S. 2, S. 2, Stamp Act

Now, on the strength to which those words may legitimately be carried, certain cases have been cited to us and there are two cases to which our attention has been drawn which appear to me to afford some assistance. These cases are illustrations on either side of the line. In the case of Fisher v. Calvert (1), where a person entitled to a sum of money under a will signed a document purporting to authorize and direct the trustee of the will to pay a certain sum of money to a creditor, it was held that although that instrument was within the literal meaning of the wider language used by the English Stamp Act, the case was not one which could be intended to be covered by the expression "bill-of-exchange" even for the purpose of a Stamp Act. The instrument in question in that case was really in the nature of an equitable assignment by way of charge of the right to receive a sum of money under the will; in other words, it was not a document of the general character which was in the contemplation of the legislature while using the wide language to which I have referred. On the other hand, in the case of Rothschild & Sons v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (2) we have an illustration of an instrument which was not a bill-of-exchange in the technical sense, but was held to come within the extension of the usual definition which is operated by the Stamp Act. In that case a certain foreign Government had issued bonds and had issued interest coupons for ten years. As part of the same document, there was what was called talon, namely, a document stating that interest coupons for another ten years would be forthcoming at the end of ten years. The question arose whether these interest coupons were liable to duty as being bills-of-exchange and it was held that, although the documents merely stated that interest would be paid at a certain time and place and were not bills of exchange within the legal definition of that phrase, nevertheless they did come within the more general language by which the Stamp Act had extended the definition

Now, as I have stated already, I am not prepared to say that these instruments are not bills-of-exchange within the definition of the Negotiable Instruments Act, but I am without any difficulty prepared to say that they do come within the extension which the Indian Stamp Act by Cl. 2, S. 2, has put upon the usual definition. We are not here concerned with an equitable assignment or anything foreign to the nature of a bill-of-exchange. The document before us is a document of a mercantile character which has all the appearance of a bill-of-exchange. On the face, it is a bill-of-exchange. In any case the holder can treat it as a bill-of-exchange. It is just such a document as may well be drawn within the concluding terms of sub-S. 2 without running any risk of going beyond the intention of the legislature. In my judgment this document is a bill-of-exchange which is payable on demand.

Two cases of this Court have been cited: Kishori Chand Surana v. Asharam Mahato (3) and Asharam v. Kishari Chand (4). Both cases had reference to Sahajogi hundies which were attested and were drawn by a firm upon itself. Mookerjee, J., held that the instrument before him did not fall within the wider definition of "bill-of-exchange" given by sub-S. 2, S. 2, Stamp Act. I cannot say that it is evident to me that the document before him was not one entitling any person whether named therein or not, to payment by any other person of any sum of money, but his reasons may have been based upon the fact that in a Sahajogi hundi the holder must be a "respectable holder." He also held that it was clear that the document was not a promissory note as it contained no unconditional promise to pay. Fletcher, J., in the earlier case, had held a similar document to be an attested promissory note which for the reasons given later by Mookerjee, J., seems to me to be wrong. He overlooked the statutory provision made in S. 17, Negotiable Instruments Act. In both cases the documents were held to be "bonds," and in this way the claim of the plaintiff succeeded on payment of duty and penalty under S. 35. It will be observed that Fletcher, J., applied S. 6, Stamp Act, and admitted the document under S. 35, although he found that it was a promissory note because it was also a "bond."

In the present case the question which we have to answer seems to me to be this: Can it be said that this document which is a bill-of-exchange and which is not dutiable as such because it is payable on demand is nevertheless dutiable as being a promissory note? The Stamp Act contains no extension applicable to this document of the definition of "promissory note" given by S. 4, Negotiable Instruments Act, and unless this document be an instrument in writing containing an unconditional undertaking signed by the maker to pay a certain sum of money only to or to the order of a certain person or to the bearer of the instrument

it is not a promissory note. This is not a case under S. 6, Stamp Act, of an instrument coming within two descriptions so as to be chargeable with different duties.

It has been pointed out to us that there are English decisions which say that instruments such as this contain all the essentials of a promissory note, Milner v. Thompson (5) and Allen v. Sea Fire & Insurance Co (6). These cases proceed on the ground that there is an absence of the circumstances of there being two distinct parties as drawer and drawee, which is essential to the constitution of a bill-of-exchange. That being so the only alternative is, that this instrument is a promissory note (per Tindal, C. J., in the former case).

The law on this point, so far as we are concerned is declared now in the Negotiable Instruments Act. The document may imply but it does not express any promise to pay, though it is covered by S. 17. If it is for the Crown to show that the language of S. 19, Stamp Act, clearly covers it. Now that the intention to exempt bills-of-exchange payable on demand is clear, we have to see whether it is consistent with the intention of the statute that it should be dutiable as a promissory note though it is a bill-of-exchange within the Stamp Act and is payable on demand. Under the Negotiable Instruments Act it is in form a bill-of-exchange and it may be treated as a bill-of-exchange. It does not seem to me to be at all plain that this document which can claim now exemption under its proper category should be treated under the Act as dutiable under another category to which it never may belong. I think we should answer this Reference by saying that demand drafts such are described therein are exempt from stamp duty. No order as to costs.

The words used in S. 32 on the face of them appear to be of a mandatory character. But S. 32 should be read along with S. 35 which controls it. S. 32 only lays down the procedure by which the enhancement is to be calculated and S. 35 gives a discretion in the Court as to the extent to which the enhancement should be allowed. [P 570 C 2]

Amarendra Nath Bose and Arun Chandra Basu—for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.—(S. A. No. 136).—In this case, since the filing of the appeal, one of the respondents joint tenants died. The suit was one for enhancement of rent. No substitution has been made and the appeal has been dismissed as against him by an order dated 17th February 1926. This appeal must also fail as against respondent 1 and will be dismissed with costs as it cannot proceed when all the tenants are not on the record.

S. A. Nos. 121—134 and 137.—These appeals arise out of suits instituted by the landlord for recovery of rent and for enhancement thereof under S. 30, Cl. (b), Ben Ten. Act. The trial Court enhanced the rent at the rate of 4 annas per rupee. On appeal preferred by the defendants, the learned District Judge has modified the decrees of the trial Court on the question of enhancement by allowing the plaintiff enhancement at the rate of one anna per rupee instead of at the rate of 4 annas per rupee.

Two grounds have been urged in support of this appeal by the learned vakil who appears on behalf of the appellant. The first ground is to the effect that in view of the provisions of S. 32, Cl. (b), Ben Ten. Act, the learned Judge was wrong in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to anything less than what was decreed by the Court of first instance. The second ground is that assuming that the learned Judge was right in holding that he had a discretion as to the amount by which the rent could be enhanced that discretion has been wrongly exercised.

With regard to the first of these contentions, it is true that the words used in S. 32, Ben. Ten. Act, on the face of them, appear to be of a mandatory character. But that section evidently has got to be read along with S. 35 which controls it. S. 35 says that notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing sections—and S. 32 is one of such sections,— the Court shall not in any case decree any enhancement which is under the circumstances of the case unfair or inequitable.

When the two sections are read together, it is clear that S. 32 only lays down the procedure by which the enhancement is to be calculated and S. 35 gives a discretion in the Court as to the extent to which the enhancement should be allowed.

As regards the second contention that has been put forward on behalf of the appellant, I am unable to say that the considerations upon which the learned District Judge has proceeded do not justify the reduction in the enhancement that he has made. He has referred to the fact that the cost of cultivation is now three or four times what it was twenty years ago: he has also referred to the fact that even upon the calculation which the learned Munsif has made, the average price of paddy had increased by 4 annas

3 pies and that the tenant was certainly entitled to a substantial portion out of it and he has also relied upon the fact that it was only so recently as 15 years before these suits that the landlord had succeeded in getting an enhancement. These circumstances in my opinion, are sufficient to justify the decree which the learned District Judge has passed and in this view of the matter I think that there is no substance in any of these appeals and that they should be dismissed with costs.

Jadunath Kanjilal and Subodh Chandra Dutt—for Opposite Party

Judgment.—The question raised by this rule is one of considerable importance. This rule was obtained on behalf of the Secretary of State for India, who is the defendant in the action, and was issued on the plaintiff opposite party to show cause why the decree of the Small Cause Court Judge of Jangipur in his favour should not be set aside. The rule relates to an action commenced by the plaintiff opposite party for recovery of a certain sum as damages on the allegation that on the 18th February 1927 his house and of her properties were destroyed by fire caused by sparks coming out of the engine attached to Saheb-gunge Howrah passenger train (Down train No. 56) and that the said damage was caused by the neglect of the E. I. Ry Co. and its agents or servants for which the defendant Company is liable. To this action the Agent of the E. I. Ry. and the Secretary of State for India in Council were made parties. The Agent's defence was that as the administration of the E. I. Ry had been taken over by the Government he was not a necessary party. The Secretary of State rested his defence on several grounds, viz.: (i) the fire was not caused by spark emitting out of the engine; (ii) damage was not caused by any act on the part of the Railway Administration or its servants; (iii) the engine attached to the passenger train was an A class engine and was fitted with fire arrester and perforated damper and it was not possible for sparks to remain alive and set fire to a house situated at a distance of 115 feet from the railway line where the fire is said to have originated, (iv) the plaint was vague as it did not disclose particulars of the negligence of the Railway Administration or its servants, which had resulted in the fire. The plaintiff was asked by the Court to furnish particulars of acts of negligence on the part of the Railway Administration or its servants. No such particulars of negligence or carelessness were furnished. On the day of hearing when witnesses were being examined on plaintiff's side a new case was made out to the effect that the engine fire was poked by the driver and sparks were emitted.

On these pleadings, the Munsif, after taking evidence, found in favour of the plaintiff and reached the following conclusions:

(i) I believe the evidence of plaintiff and his witnesses to be true and hold that the fire to Hari Maji's house was caused by the spark of the engine due to poking by the driver or the fireman who has not been examined to give a denial and that the fire spread to the huts of the plaintiff;

(ii) In this case plaintiff has proved that though there was dry wind blowing and though there were straw huts lying near the railway line the driver or the fireman poked the fire of the engine against rules and was guilty of negligence or carelessness. It was due to this act of carelessness that the fire spread from Hari Maji's house to plaintiff's house.

(iii) The engine of 56 down train was a C class engine fitted with spark arrester and perforated damper.

(iv) It is admitted that even in a C class engine it is possible for sparks to come out if the fire is poked by a driver or fireman, but that spark is not potent to cause the damage and to run at some distance.

The second finding above referred to is challenged on behalf of the Secretary of State and it is said that there was no rule which forbade the driver from poking the fire of the engine, and this finding that the driver poked the fire against rules is based on no evidence. No rule to that effect was produced before me. It was also not produced before the Munsif. This finding, therefore, must be set aside. The question which therefore arises is whether a Railway Company which had been authorized to run locomotive engines on its line of railway, under the statutory powers given to it, is liable for damages caused by fire which had escaped from its engine although the Company took all reasonable care to provide against such fire by the use of engine of the best construction fitted with fire arrester and perforated damper. The argument of the learned Standing Counsel, who appears for the Secretary of State is that as the E. I. Ry. Co., have got statutory powers to use locomotive for hauling their trains, the necessary use of fire in them, and the occasional escape of sparks from them, must have been anticipated, and therefore if every reasonable precaution is taken against such escapes the Railway Companies are relieved of the consequence of any fires resulting from sparks accidentally escaping. It is argued that the lower Court was wrong in holding that the poking was against rules and that on the other hand the lower Court should have held that poking was necessary for maintaining the necessary steam for running the train. If, as it has been shown in this case that the Railway Company ran an engine provided with fire arrester, etc., the defendant is relieved of liability if notwithstanding these precautions fire escaped.

It is contended on the other hand, on behalf of the opposite party that it was no defence that all possible care and skill had been used in the construction of the engines to prevent the escape of sparks and the burden was on the Railway Company to show that there was no negligence on their part. In support of this contention reference has been made to Powell v. Fall (1) and to Smith v. L. & S. W. Ry Co (2).

In the case of Powell v. Fall (1), the defendant was held liable for damage caused by the escape of fire from locomotive steam engines used by them, and, it is true, that it was held to be no defence that all possible care and skill had been used in the construction and management of these engines to prevent the escape of sparks. But the fact which distinguishes the present case from that is that in that case the engine was not used under any statutory authority which granted any protection against the ordinary rule of liability at common law. It seems clear that that is not a case of absolute liability for fire at all, but is merely illustrative of the familiar principle that if any operation cannot be carried on without causing damage by the escape of deleterious or dangerous things the carrying on of that operation is an actionable nuisance and it is no defence that all possible care and skill were used to prevent the injury or damage done by it.

The facts of the case of Smith v. L. & S. W. Ry. Co. (2) are distinguishable from the facts of the present case. In that case the servants of the defendant Company during exceptionally dry weather, cut the grass and hedges along the line, and left the cuttings lying there in heaps for a fortnight. A spark from a passing train ignited these cuttings and a high wind sprang up and carried the fire across a stubble field and a public road to the plaintiff's cottage situated 200 yards from the railway. There it was held that it was for the jury to decide what the defendants' servants ought as reasonable men to have contemplated as the result of leaving the cuttings and trimmings where and as they did. Now it can scarcely be doubted that the defendants were bound in such a manner knowing that trains were passing from which sparks might fall on them to remove these heaps of trimmings, and at any rate it was a question for the jury whether it was not negligent for them not to do. In this case the liability was based on the negligence of the Railway Company in leaving combustible matter along the banks of the railway-likely to be ignited by sparks from the engine although they used properly equipped engines in a proper manner.

The true rule applicable to the present case is that which had been laid down in the case of Vaughan v. Tuff Vale Ry Co (3) where the defendant Company having statutory authority to use locomotive steam engines was held not liable for a fire caused by an escape of the sparks, it being proved that the engines were constructed with all due care and skill and that it was wholly impossible to prevent the escape of sparks. At common law it would have been an actionable nuisance to use engines which were such a source of danger; and it would have been no defence that they had been made as safe as they could be: see Jones v. Festiniog Ry. Co. (4). This last case is of the same type of cases as Power v. Fall above referred to where the engines were not run under some statutory authority. Statutory protection is, however, possessed by railway companies in respect of various nuisances which are necessarily incident to the management of their business, e.g., noise and vibration. See Hammersmith Ry. Co. v. Brand (5) and London Brighton Ry. Co. v. Truman (6).

The case of Power v. Fall (1) relied on by the learned advocate for the opposite party lays down this principle that where the defendants make use of locomotive engines without having obtained the necessary authority of the law and the plaintiff suffers damage by reason of fire proceeding from the same they are liable though not guilty of any negligence in the management of the engines and the case of Vaughan v. Tuff Vale Co. (3) illustrates the rule that in the same case they would not have been liable had they had the proper authority. This latter case was followed by the Privy Council in Canadian Pacific Ry.

Co. v. Roy (7) where their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council laid it down that a railway company authorized by statute to carry on its railway undertaking in the place and by the means adopted is not responsible in damages for injury not caused by negligence but by the ordinary and normal use of its railway or, in other words, by proper execution of the power conferred by statute. It is true that in that case there was no question of the appellants having been guilty of negligence in the management of their engine or its appliance being defective.

It is a significant circumstance in the present case that the fact of the poking of the fire either by the engine driver or the fireman did not form any item of the particulars of negligence on which the claim of the plaintiffs was founded, and yet it is upon this the Munsif has founded his judgment on the question of the negligence of the defendant company's servants.

My decision proceeds, however, on the assumption that there was poking of the fire by the driver and that such poking was necessary in the ordinary course for maintaining steam. In poking the fire the servants of the company did nothing more than what was necessary for the running of the train and if notwithstanding all precautions known to science taken by the railway company to prevent damage by fire occurring the sparks were emitted, the company cannot be held liable. This principle has been lucidly expounded by Lord Hatherley in the case of Geddis v. Proprietors of Baun Reservoir (8), thus:

If a company, in the position of the defendants there has done nothing but that which the Act authorized—nay may in a sense be said to have directed—and if the damage which arises therefrom is not owing to any negligence on the part of the company in the mode of executing or carrying into effect the powers given by the Act, then the person who is injuriously affected by that which has been done must either find in the Act of Parliament something which gives him compensation, or he must be content to be deprived of that compensation, because there has been nothing done which is inconsistent with the powers conferred by the Act, and with the proper execution of those powers. My Lords, I say the proper mode of executing those powers because it appears to me that it is very neatly and appositely put by Mr. Baron Fitzgerald, in giving his judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in this form, Mr. Baron Fitzgerald says: 'The substantial question raised on the pleadings in the first and second counts of the declaration, appears to me to be whether these acts of the defendants were done in a due exercise of their authority, under the local and personal statute which has been mentioned, without negligence.'

The view which I take is supported by the case of Port Glasgow and Newark Sail Cloth Co. v. Caledonian Ry. (9), in which it was held that the legislature by authorizing the use of steam engines or railway has impliedly indemnified railway companies against the consequence of the use of such engines, provided they are of the best construction, and that the proper safeguards are used for minimizing the risk of fire damage.

I think this rule must be made absolute. The decree of the Small Cause Court Judge must be set aside and plaintiff's suit must be dismissed.

I fully sympathize with the plaintiff in his distress in the loss of his house by fire but I have to administer the law as I find it. I am convinced that the principle for which the Secretary of State contends is supported by English jurisprudence by which Courts in India are governed in all cases in which there is no codified law. In England, however, the Railway Fires Act 1905 (5 Edw. 7 C 11) has been enacted; this Act has to some extent altered the law as laid down in Vaughan v. Tuff Vale Ry. Co. (3), for it provides that, railway company shall be liable, notwithstanding their statutory authority to the extent of £100 at the most for damage done to agricultural land or crops by the escape of sparks and cinders from locomotive engines; but there is no such legislation here in India and the rule in the leading case of Vaughan v. Tuff Vale Ry. Co. (3) must govern the present case. I can find no facts which can distinguish the present case from that of the Vaughan case. Vaughan was the proprietor of a plantation adjoining the embankment of the Tuff Vale Railway Company. One day the plantation was discovered to be on fire, and eight acres of it were burnt. It was not disputed that it had taken fire from a spark from one of the defendants' engines, but they contended, and it was decided, that they were not responsible as they were authorized to use such engines, and had adopted every precaution that science could suggest to prevent injury: Vaughan v. Tuff Vale Ry. Co. (3).

I have given my most anxious consideration to this case and for the reasons I have given this Rule must be made absolute, but, in the circumstances of the present case, there will be no order as to costs.

Atul Chandra Gupta and Nipendra Chandra Das—for Appellants.

Jogesh Chandra Roy, Upendra Kumar Ray and Bhagirath Chandra Das—for Respondents.

C. C. Ghose, J.—In these appeals the defendants 1, 2 and 3 are the appellants before this Court. The plaintiffs in the two suits out of which these appeals have arisen and defendant 1 are cosharers in respect of the lands in suit. These lands were formerly in the occupation of certain tenants. The latter abandoned their holdings and repudiated their tenancies. It is alleged that during the settlement operations in the district where the lands are situate, defendant 1 got his name recorded as purchaser of the holdings. The Record-of-Rights was finally published on 20th October 1919. The plaintiffs contend that the holdings being non-transferable without the consent of the landlords, defendant 1 acquired no rights whatsoever as against the plaintiffs, and in the events that have happened the plaintiffs are entitled to joint khas possession of the lands in accordance with their shares. The two other defendants are other cosharer landlords of the holdings in question. On behalf of the defendant 1, who is the principal defendant, it was alleged that the holdings in question were homestead lands which had been held by tenants from time immemorial at fixed rents and in enjoyment of permanent transferable rights. It was further alleged that defendant 1 after his purchase of these homestead lands had possessed the same, building pucca structures and making various improvements, and that in the circumstances the plaintiffs were merely entitled to receive rent to the extent of their shares (which the defendant had always been willing to pay) and could not recover joint khas possession of any portion of the lands. The defendant further stated that the plaintiffs were in possession of similar lands acquired from former tenants within the joint taluk without payment of rent to the defendant and that this suit was not maintainable so long as the properties remained unpartitioned.

The first Court found that the lands in question were homestead lands and that the principal defendant 1 after his purchase had built pucca structures on the lands, constructed walls and raised the level of the lands at the expenditure of considerable sums of money. It was also found that the plaintiffs and defendant 1 had in many instances purchased the holdings of the tenants within their joint taluk and had separately possessed these lands. It was further found that the lands in suit were transferable holdings, that the transfers in favour of defendant 1 were valid and had been recognized by the plaintiffs who were some of the landlords. In the course of his judgment the learned Munsiff observed as follows :

I am convinced that after the purchase of the homesteads in suit by defendant 1, the plaintiffs allowed him to possess them peacefully and make improvements for his residence just as defendant 1 allowed the plaintiffs to possess their purchased lands. So long as the parties were on good terms there was no difficulty.

The learned Munsif, therefore, dismissed the plaintiffs' suits, holding that the same were not maintainable. On appeal by the plaintiffs, the lower appellate Court held, reversing the judgment of the first Court, that the holdings in question were not mokarari, that there had been no recognition on the part of the plaintiffs of the transfers in favour of defendant 1, that there was no evidence of the erection of pucca structures to the knowledge of the plaintiffs and that on the abandonment of the holdings in question by the tenants all the cosharer landlords were entitled to the possession of the lands proportionate to their shares. The lower appellate Court held that the plaintiffs were entitled to joint khas possession of the lands in proportion to their respective shares.

As far as I can make out from the judgment of the lower appellate Court, the finding of the Munsif as regards the transferability of the holdings in question has not been reversed on appeal. There is no doubt that it has been laid down in this Court in a series of cases that under the law as it stood before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, tenancies, whether of homestead lands or of agricultural lands, were not transferable in the absence of a custom to the contrary or an express contract to that effect ; but there have always been exceptions to this rule and in the case of Benee Madhub v. Joy Krishna (1) Peacock, C. J., observed that if one man granted a tenure to another for the purpose of living upon the land, that tenure in the absence of evidence to the contrary was assignable. The same view was also taken in the case of Doorga Pershad v. Brindaban (2). But in this case, as I have said, there is a clear finding that the holdings in question were and are transferable and it is unnecessary to discuss this point further.

The next question is whether in the circumstances of this case there has been such an ouster of the plaintiffs as to entitle them to maintain suits of this description and to ask for a decree for joint khas possession. As I read the judgments of the two Courts below no hostile title has ever been set up by defendant 1; his position, as I understand, is this: In the taluk owned jointly by the plaintiffs and the defendants there are various plots of land which were formerly in the occupation of tenants but which have been abandoned by them; some of these plots have been taken possession of by the plaintiffs; no objection was ever raised to the plaintiffs possessing these lands separately and there ought not, therefore, to be any objection to defendant 1 possessing certain other lands which were abandoned by the original tenants thereof. In these circumstances defendant 1 contends that the mere fact of occupation by him of the holdings in question does not necessarily constitute an ouster of other cosharers nor does it entitle the latter to a decree for joint khas possession; in other words, defendant 1 contends that his occupation of the holdings in dispute in the circumstances of this case is not inconsistent with joint ownership. The position is according to him somewhat analogous to the case of a tenancy-in-common where each tenant is allowed, for purposes of mutual convenience, to remain solely and severally seized of certain plots within the ambit of the joint property and where his cotenants are not in control or possession of the said plots. I am of opinion that this contention is well founded and ought to be given effect to. This case is on all fours with the case of Basanta Kumari Dassya v. Mohesh Chandra Shaha (3), where it was observed as follows:

When a cosharer is in sole occupation of a portion of the joint property, for instance, by building or by carrying on cultivation on it, the other cosharers are to that extent excluded from making any use of that particular portion, as it is difficult to see how two different cosharers can at the same time build upon or carry on cultivation on one and the same piece of land. If, however, the sole occupation of one cosharer in this manner constitutes ouster of the other cosharers, then in every case the occupation by the cosharers of the lands in their respective possession would constitute an ouster of each other and this certainly cannot be held. Ouster must therefore mean dispossession of one cosharer by another where a hostile title is set up by the latter and where the occupation of the latter is not consistent with joint ownership.

I respectfully agree with what was laid down in the above case and in my opinion, on the facts found in this case and specially in view of the fact that the title of the plaintiffs has always been admitted, no valid reason has been assigned or can be assigned for the passing of a decree in favour of the plaintiffs for joint khas possession. In law such a decree could not in the circumstances of this case have been passed and I would therefore set aside the judgment of the lower appellate Court, restore the judgment of the first Court and allow the appeals with costs both in this Court and in the lower appellate Court.

Judgment.—The plaintiff who is the appellant before us sued for declaration of her tenancy right in certain lands and for recovery of possession. Her case was that the lands formed part of Estate

No. 239 of the Patna Collectorate corresponding to Estate No. 77 of the Rajshahi Collectorate and were comprised within Chaks Nos. 25 and 28 of the Mehalwar map of village Katabari. She alleged that these lands which admittedly had been under water previously had become culturable and had been leased by the zamindar of the Estate No. 239 to third parties who defaulted in the payment of their rent and that the tenancy was sold in execution of a decree for arrears of rent and was purchased at that sale by the plaintiff. The defendants denied these allegations, alleging that the lands belonged to village Mashinda within the district of Rajshahye and that they (the defendants) had been in possession of those lands for at least 28 years under leases granted by the Zemindar of Mashinda. The Court of first instance gave the plaintiff a decree which was reversed by the learned Court of appeal below. The grounds on which the learned Judge of the Court below dismissed the suit are that the lands in suit have not been identified as forming part of the mouza named by the plaintiff and that the suit is barred by limitation because the defendants have been in possession of the lands for at least 28 years. These findings of the learned Court below are assailed in second appeal before us.

With regard to the question of limitation, it is urged that the learned District Judge committed error in not treating the decision of the Survey Officer who demarcated the boundary of the two adjoining villages in the year 1913 as one that proved possession on the part of the plaintiff. This contention has no force having regard to the terms of the order passed by the Survey Officer. S. 47, Survey Act (5 of 1875), directs that the Survey Officer in deciding a dispute as to boundaries between two mauzas must determine the boundary with reference to actual possession. S. 62 of that Act gives that decision the force of the decree. The order passed by the Survey Officer was that he was unable to decide the fact of possession from the evidence collected by him. He therefore refused to decide who was in actual possession and directed that the boundary should be plotted as it stood in the revenue survey map. The contention set up on behalf of the appellant is that because the Survey Officer in his order used the word "determine" and said that the boundary should be determined according to that laid down in the survey map, the use of that word had the effect of making the order an order determining the fact of possession. Such a contention cannot be sustained for a single moment as there would be a contradiction between the conclusion and the premises. The decision of the Survey Officer therefore cannot assist the plaintiff in disproving the possession of the defendants and therefore that decision does not in any manner stand in the way of the learned Court below coming to the conclusion on the facts that the defendants have been in possession for at least 28 years. That is a finding of fact; and, as that finding cannot be disturbed, it follows that the conclusion arrived at by the learned Court below, that the suit is barred by limitation, is correct. It is unnecessary, therefore, to go into the other question whether or not the lands in suit have been identified as the lands which formed part of the tenancy set up by the plaintiff. On this question also it may be said that the findings of the learned Court below are findings of fact. The learned Judge has stated that the evidence brought on the record is insufficient to establish the identity of the lands claimed. The findings therefore cannot be disturbed. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Income-tax Reference, made by Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, Decided on 22nd December 1927.

* Income-tax Act, S. 10—Company running a Club—All share-holders not members of Club—All members not share-holders—Company making profit out of the Club is not a mere mutual trading society making "quasi profit" by trading with its own members and returning such "profits" to the members and is liable to pay income-tax on full amount of profit.

A company ran a club out of which they made profit. All the shareholders of the Club were not members and the membership of the Club was open to shareholders as well as those who were not shareholders.

Held: that though some of the shareholders and some of the members were the same, the Company cannot be called a mere mutual trading society making "quasi profit" by trading with its own members and returning such "profit" to the members, and it would be liable to pay income-tax on the full amount of the profit independently of what it proposed to do with that profit: New York Life Insurance Co. v. Styles, (1889) 14 A. C. 381, Dist.

Rankin, C. J.—The assessee in this case is the Dibrugarh District Club, Limited, which is a company limited by shares incorporated under the Companies Act, 1882. I shall refer to it as "the Company" and I shall not refer to it as "the Club" for the reason that by the terms of its regulation the "Club" is reserved for a different body. The main objects of the Company are to maintain and conduct a Club for the benefit of such persons as may become members of that Club. The Club's membership is unlimited in number and there are two classes of members—permanent and temporary. Save for certain persons who are by the rule of the Club entitled to become permanent members without ballot or entrance fee, all permanent members are elected by ballot. The voters at such ballot are the existing body of permanent members of the Club. The arrangement as to temporary members need not be set forth here. The general management of the Club is vested in a Committee of seven members of whom at least five must be shareholders of the Company and the directors of the Company have an ultimate control in matters affecting the financial position of the Company.

It will be seen, therefore, that membership of the Club is quite a different thing from membership of the Company which involves the ownership of a share or shares. Art. 12 of the Company's Articles of Association provides that: no shareholder as such shall be entitled to use the Company's Club premises, or enjoy the accommodation provided by the Company for the use of members of the Club, unless and until he has been duly elected as a member of the Club, or is exempt from ballot in accordance with the rules and regulations contained in Sch. 2, hereto which shall be read as part of these articles.

Conversely the rules of the Club make it equally clear that persons may become members of the Club without being shareholders in the Company: cf. R. 6.

Now it appears that in 1925-26 the Company made a profit of some ten thousand rupees. It did this clearly enough out of the various charges made to members of the Club but it could be wished that the Commissioner of Income-tax had stated the facts as to this matter more explicitly. (Whether the Article of Association and the Club's rules are logical and consistent on this point may be a question; apparently a member's subscription and the amount of his Club bills are payable by him to the Club; how and on what account the Company becomes entitled to get money from the Club or from a member is not clear.)

The following facts are stated by the Commissioner of Income-tax as showing the position in 1926. The number of shareholders in the Company is not given but the number of shares issued was 445 shares. Of these shares 74 are held by persons who are not members of the Club; by how many of such persons is not stated.

The number of members of the Club was apparently 289 of whom 220 were not shareholders of the Company and 69 held shares.

It appears that in recent years the Company has paid dividends out of its profits—8 and 12 per cent has been declared and paid. By Art. 104 it is provided that the dividend shall not exceed 12 per cent on the issued capital, the balance of profit if any being intended for the reserve, depreciation and sinking funds.

In these circumstances the Company claims to escape payment of income-tax upon its profits and puts forward statements such as these that the Club does no business with and makes no profit on dealings with non-members, that the members of the Club and shareholders are the same save in 13 instances and in these instances the shareholders were at one time members or relations of members.

These statements are confused and erroneous. The Company dealt in 1926 with 220 members of the Club who were not shareholders, i. e. with 220 persons not members of the Company. The Company is not a mere mutual trading society making "quasi profit" by trading with its own members and returning such "profits" to the members. The case is wholly different on the material facts from New York Life Insurance Co. v. Styles (1).

I agree with the Commissioner in his view that in this case it is not a matter of importance that some of the shareholders and some of the Club members are the same people. I am further of opinion that in this case the fact of incorporation cannot be neglected and the Company (which is the assessee) is not to be confounded with the individual shareholders. In this case it is found that the assessee has made a profit and it must pay income-tax on the full amount thereof independently of what it proposes to do with that profit.

The assessee must pay the costs of this reference.

In the matter of Howrah Amta Light Ry. Co. Ltd.

Income-tax Reference made by the Commissioner of Income-tax, Bengal, Decided on 13th December 1927.

* (a) Income-tax Act, S. 10—Profits.

Destination of profits has got nothing to do prima facie with the question of liability to pay income-tax. What may be done with the profits after the tax has been paid upon them is immaterial. [P 580 C 1]

* (b) Income-tax Act, S. 10, sub-S. (2)—Agreement between District Board and Tramway Co. for free use of road for laying down tramway—Tramway Company agreeing to pay moiety of profits exceeding 4 p. c. upon capital for time being—Payment of half profits is not rent and cannot fall under Cl. (5) of sub-S. (2)—It is not sum paid on account of local rate, nor is it "any expenditure (not being in nature of a capital expenditure) incurred solely for purpose of earning such profits or gains."

There was an agreement between a District Board and a Tramway Company as to the free use by the latter of as much portion of a certain road as was necessary for laying a tramway. The Company further agreed to pay moiety of surplus profits to the Board if the same exceeded 4 per cent. upon the capital of the Company for the time being.

Held: that the payment of such moiety is not rent so as to fall under "rent paid for the premises" in Cl. (5), sub-S. (2), S. 10 of the

Act, that it is not a "sum paid on account of local rates" and that it is also not "any expenditure (not being in nature of a capital expenditure) incurred solely for the purpose of earning such profits or gains" so as to fall under Cl. (9) of the said sub-section. The payment is therefore not an allowable item of expenditure under S. 10 of the Act. [P 580 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the Commissioner of Income-tax has been ordered to state and has stated three points for the opinion of the Court. The first question is—whether the assessment is in order. I do not understand that there is any meaning in particular in that passage, but the assessment is plainly in order. The second and the only point is this:

whether the whole or any part of the amount paid to the District Board is or is not an allowable item of expenditure under S. 10 of the Act.

The third question which apparently he was ordered by a Rule issued by this Court to state is not a question at all. It is as follows:

The legal relation subsisting between your petitioners and the District Board and the character of the payment by your petitioners to the District Board.

The Commissioner of Income-tax has in the end said that what it appears to him that it is not his place to define the legal relationship subsisting between the petitioner company and the District Board. I respectfully agree and I am personally sorry that any Rule was ever issued or made absolute calling upon the Commissioner of Income-tax to state something which was not a question at all. I therefore propose to confine my attention to the second question which I have stated and that question takes its meaning from the circumstance that the Howrah-Amta Light Railway Co. Ltd. was apparently constructed in or about 1889 pursuant to an agreement between the District Board of Howrah and certain other persons called the "promoters" dated the 12th June 1889. By that agreement the Board granted to the Company the free use of as much of the portion of a certain road as was necessary for the purpose of laying thereon a steam tramway of two feet gauge to be worked by the Company. It was agreed by Cl. 3 that the Board would for twenty-one years exempt the Company from the tax on account of road cess if the law and the Government so allowed, or would exact only a nominal tax. The Board further promised, so soon as five miles of the tram way should have been constructed and declared open to the public, to pay to the Company any sum which might be required to make the net profit of the Company equivalent to Rs. 850 per mile. It is the fifth clause which is the most important :

If and whenever the net profits of the Company in respect of the said tramway from Howrah to Amta should be in excess of 4 per cent. upon the capital for the time being of the Company such surplus profits shall be divided between the Company and the Board in equal moieties.

Now, the second question to which I have referred has reference to the sum which the Tramway Company, The Light Railway, has to pay to the District Board as being one-half of the surplus profits in excess of 4 per cent. upon the capital for the time being. In my judgment this is a typical case in which to apply the well-settled principle that the destination of profits has got nothing to do prima facie with the question whether they are liable to income-tax. What may be done with the profits after the tax has been paid upon them is a different matter, but the question is whether the Company in this case is liable to pay income-tax upon its profits or only upon that part of its profits which it does not hand over to the District Board under Cl. 5.

In my opinion, the attempt to bring this case under any of the sub-heads of sub-S. (2), S. 10 of the Act cannot succeed. In view of the fact that for the purpose of income-tax assesses have a right to be dealt with according to their own method of accounting I desire to guard myself from assuming that sub-S. (2), S. 10 is intended as an exhaustive list of deductions which are permissible for the purpose of income-tax. But in the present case an attempt is made to bring it under one or other of the three divisions of sub-S. (2). It is said first of all that this payment under Cl. 5 comes under the head of "rent paid for the premises". In my opinion it is certainly not "rent." Again it is said that it comes under the head "sums paid on account of local rates." In my opinion it is not a sum paid on account of local rates. No. (ix) is :

Any expenditure (not being in nature a capital expenditure) incurred solely for the purpose of earning such profits or gains.

In my judgment the Commissioner of Income-tax has very properly held that this is not a description which covers the money in question. The payment to the District Board is not an expenditure incurred solely for the purpose of earning the Tramway Company's profits.

However this matter is looked at I am of opinion that the Commissioner of Income-tax has correctly decided the only question which arises which is the second of the three questions stated. In my opinion the answer to that question is in the negative.

I think, in these circumstances, that the assessee must pay the cost of this reference.

Appeal No 235 of 1926, Decided on 2nd February 1928, from original order of 2nd Addl Dist Judge, Zillah, 24 Parganahs, D/- 6th March 1926.

Succession Act, Ss. 229 and 224—Widow named as executrix along with other executors in husband's will—Executors applying for probate—Widow joined as opposite party disputing will but praying that if will be proved she be granted probate along with others—Court cannot refuse grant to her.

Where there is a statutory law governing a question of grant of probate, it is not open to the Court to refuse grant of probate to a named executor on the ground of his disputing the will or any other ground not authorized by law for the refusal of the grant of probate.

A widow was named as executrix along with other executors in her husband's will. The executors applied for probate and joined the widow as opposite party, as she did not apply for probate. The widow disputed the will, but prayed that if the will be proved she might be granted the probate along with the others. The lower Court refused to grant her the probate.

Held : that the widow could not be refused grant of probate on the ground that she disputed the will.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This appeal arises out of a very novel proceeding before the lower Court. The facts are these: The respondents applied for probate of a will executed by one Jatish Chandra Pal. The appellant in this appeal is his widow. The respondents as well as the appellant were named as executors in the will. The appellant did not apply for probate and so she was joined as opposite party in the application for probate made by the respondents. The lady presented a petition alleging that she did not admit the will nor did she admit that the will had been properly executed or attested according to law. She, however, stated in para. 8 of her petition that if the will be proved to have been properly executed and attested she was willing and claimed to get the probate as executrix; and in her prayer she said that the petition for probate might be dismissed after taking evidence, or if the will be proved to have been properly executed and attested probate might be given to her jointly with the respondents. It appears that the question about the due execution of the will was fought out. The lady in her evidence disputed the genuineness of the will. In spite of her evidence it was found that the will was properly executed and probate was granted to the respondents. Thereupon the lady presented a petition in which she said that by an omission she was not granted probate along with the respondents and prayed that probate might be granted to her along with the other named executors. This matter came up for hearing before the learned Judge who dismissed her application mainly upon the ground that the widow had renounced her executorship and in clearer terms than a mere statement that she desired to renounce the executorship. The learned Judge observed that when a will was challenged by a person and entirely repudiated by him, he could not turn round and say that he was entitled to probate. He observed that the principle was founded on equity that one cannot approbate and reprobate at the same time. The learned Judge also refers to the doctrine of election. At the end the learned Judge stated that by challenging the will as forged the widow repudiated the will and by her conduct renounced her right to probate. Upon that finding he dismissed the application.

She has appealed from that order and it is contended on her behalf that the order of the learned Judge is not warranted by law and that she is entitled to probate. Reference was made in the course of the agreement to S. 230, Succession Act 1925, where it is stated that renunciation may be made only in the presence of the Judge or by writing signed by the person renouncing and it was urged that nothing like that having been done, the widow, although she contested the will, was entitled to ask for probate. The question is free from authority and neither the appellant nor the respondents could point out any authority with reference to this question. The matter of probate is governed by statute and we must look to the statute in order to find whether a particular executor is entitled to grant of probate or not according to the provisions of the law.

It is contended on behalf of the respondents that S. 230 does not apply to the present case. That section must be read along with S. 229. S. 229 provides that letters of administration cannot be granted unless the executor has renounced his executorship and without citation being issued calling upon the executor either to accept or to renounce his executorship, and S. 230 refers to the manner of renunciation in such a case. That argument seems to me to be sound. Leaving the question of applicability of S. 230 of the Act aside there does not appear to be any other provision in the Act which precludes an executor from asking for probate at any time. Under S. 224, Succession Act, where several executors are appointed probate may be granted to them all simultaneously or at different times. Where there is a statutory law governing the question of grant of probate to executors, I do not think that it is open to us to apply any general principles of law and to refuse grant of probate to a named executor on the ground of his disputing the will or any other ground for which the law does not authorize the Court to refuse grant of probate. In this case, therefore, in our judgment we do not think that it would be right to refuse grant of probate to the appellant on the ground that she actually gave evidence against the due execution of the will. To do so might seriously affect her right to any legacy under the will.

We, therefore, set aside the order of the learned Judge and direct that probate be granted to the appellant along with the respondents who have already been granted probate.

The appellant is entitled to her costs in this Court. We assess the hearing fee at five gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 1431 of 1925, Decided on 22nd May 1923, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge., Howrah, D/- 12th May 1925.

Limitation Act, Art. 144—Defendant in possession of plaintiff's property from 1897 for management—Defendant asserting hostile title in 1915—Plaintiff suing in 1922 for recovery of possession—Plaintiff's suit was held not time barred as his title was not extinguished by the defendant's adverse acts.

Plaintiff entrusted for management certain property to defendant who was in possession from 1897. Plaintiff brought in 1922 a suit for recovery of possession of that property. Defendant asserted that he had got adverse title to the property. But it was proved that defendant had been all along in permissive possession and only in 1915 he began to do acts whereby in a way he asserted a hostile title to the plaintiff.

Held: that the suit was not barred by limitation as the title of the plaintiff was not extinguished by adverse possession of defendant. The article applicable in the case was 144, and not 142 or 143. [P 583 C 2]

Judgment—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of possession of some land on a declaration of the plaintiff's title thereto. The allegations on which the plaintiff brought the suit were briefly these: The land belonged to one Preonath Lahiri, the father of defendants 1 to 3 and defendants 17 and 18. In the year 1300 B. S. Preonath sold the land to one Promothonath Ghose. Promotho possessed the land for a short period after which he sold the same to the plaintiff, in the year 1302 B. S. After the purchase the land was for some time under the direct management of the plaintiff but as the plaintiff was an inhabitant of Calcutta it was not very convenient for him to look after the property and so he entrusted the management of the property to Preonath who was no other than his sister's husband. After Preonath's death his sons were placed in charge of the property and they continued managing the property for a pretty long term of years. Preonath's sons subsequently colluded with the landlord's gomasta and caused the rent of the holding to fall into arrears. The holding was sold in execution of a rent decree and purchased by Preonath's sons in the name of their servant Sibu Santra. The plaintiff, when he came to hear of the sale, applied for setting it aside and succeeded in doing so. Thereafter, he brought a suit for rent against defendants 4 to 16 who were the tenants on the land in suit and in this suit the tenants-defendants denied the plaintiff's right, with the result that the plaintiff had to withdraw the suit.

On these allegations, the plaintiff brought a suit for a declaration of his right to the disputed land and for recovery of possession against the sons of Preonath and for khas possession as against the tenant and defendants on the ground that they had forfeited their rights as tenants by their denial of the plaintiff's title. The substantial defence that was set up in the case was that the plaintiff was nothing but benamdar of Preonath and that it was Preonath and not the plaintiff who was the real owner of the property in dispute. The Court of first instance dismissed the plaintiff's suit. On appeal the lower appellate Court held that the plaintiff was not the benamdar of Preonath, but was the real purchaser and owner of the property in dispute; and on that finding the learned Additional District Judge gave a decree to the plaintiff as against the sons of Preonath but refused the plaintiff's prayer for khas possession as against the tenants-defendants on the ground that nothing had been shown to substantiate the allegation that the tenants-defendants had forfeited their tenancy in any way.

Defendants 1 to 3 have appealed to this Court.

The learned advocate for the appellants first of all contended that the lower appellate Court was wrong in law when it came to the finding that the plaintiff was the real owner and not the benamdar of Preonath. We do not think there is much substance in this contention. The plaintiff was the person in whose name the property was purchased and if the defendants wanted to establish that plaintiff was nothing but a benamdar the onus to substantiate that point was on them. The learned Additional District Judge has fully discussed all the circumstances that were present in the case apparently in support of the defence case on the point that after a full discussion of those circumstances he came to the conclusion that those circumstances were of no avail to the defendants. Over and above that, the learned Additional District Judge has found as a fact that it was from the plaintiff and not from Preonath that the purchase money came. In these circumstances, we do not think it can reasonably be contended for a moment that there is any error of law when the learned Additional District Judge came to the finding that the plaintiff was the real purchaser and the real owner of the property and not the benamdar of Preonath as the defence wanted to establish.

The learned advocate next contended that even if it be accepted as a fact that the plaintiff is the real owner of the property, the plaintiff, before he could succeed, was bound to show that he was in possession of the property within twelve years before the institution of the suit. But the finding of the lower appellate Court is that if the defendants were in possession of the property, it was nothing but a permissive possession. The learned advocate took exception to the finding of the lower appellate Court as regards permissive possession and he contended that the finding of fact arrived at by the lower appellate Court was not sufficient to make out a case of permissive possession. In this connexion the learned advocate drew our attention to the observation of the learned Additional District Judge which runs as follows :

It is clear from the facts and circumstances of the case that the plaintiff, when he left his direct connexion with the property in the year 1903 had no idea to possess it or even to claim it and that therefore he allowed the defendants and their father to possess the same as he expected that he would get back his money or would be given some profit at least.

But towards the concluding portion of the judgment the learned Additional District Judge has clearly found also that the plaintiff never intended to abandon his right or to create any absolute right in the defendants. In these circumstances we are unable to agree with the learned advocate in the view that the finding of fact arrived at by the learned Additional District Judge was not sufficient to make out a case of permissive possession.

The third point that was argued before us was in connexion with the question of limitation. It was said on behalf of the appellants that Art. 142 or 143, Sch. 1, Lim. Act, is the article that would be applicable to the present case. Art. 142 cannot, in our opinion, apply to the present case, because the present case is not of dispossession or discontinuance of possession. The defendants no doubt were in possession of the property from about 1903 B. S., but that possession was, as found by the lower appellate Court, a permissive possession. Art. 143 either, cannot apply to the present case. The plaintiff brought the suit not on the allegation of any forfeiture or breach of condition, but on the allegation that he had entrusted the management of the property to the defendants and that from about 1915 the defendants began doing acts whereby in a way they asserted a hostile title to the plaintiff. These being the circumstances of the case, the case, in our opinion, would be governed not by Art. 142 or 143, but by Art. 144. Lim. Act. The plaintiff, as the lower appellate Court has found, is the real owner of the property and if the defendants wanted to defeat his title they could successfully do so only by establishing that the title of the plaintiff had been extinguished by the defendants' adverse possession. It is true that the defendants had been in possession of the property from 1897 and the suit was instituted in the year 1922. But the learned Additional District Judge has found that it was only in the year 1915 that there was something like an assertion by the defendants of a hostile title. If any hostile title was asserted only in the year 1915 the title of the plaintiff could not possibly be extinguished by adverse possession of the defendants, inasmuch as the suit, as observed before, was instituted in the year 1922.

All the points that were taken before us, therefore fail. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Upendra Kumar Roy and Hiran Kumar Roy—for Appellants.

Sasadhar Roy (Sr.) and Biraj Moñan Majumdar—for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.—The plaintiffs are the appellants in this appeal. They instituted the suit which has given rise to this appeal for recovery of possession on declaration of their right of pre-emption in respect of a 4 annas share in a tank with its banks. The entire tank with its banks at one time belonged to the plaintiffs who in Shaban 1325 sold a 6 annas share of the same to defendant 1. There was a condition in the sale-deed, which, translated literally, runs :

Be it mentioned that if any necessity arises for you (i. e., vendees) to sell the tank and its banks, you shall not be entitled to sell the same anywhere else: on receipt of proper price you will give the same to us (i. e., the vendors); and also if any necessity arises for us to sell them instead of selling them elsewhere we shall sell them to you on receiving proper price.

The plaintiffs' case was that in violation of this stipulation defendant 1 sold a 4 annas out of the share purchased by him to defendants 2 to 6, and coming to know of it they made the necessary demands, namely, the talab-i-mowasibat and the talab-i-ishtishhad and then instituted the suit.

Defendants 3, 4 and 5 contested the suit. Their allegations were that defendant 6 was a minor and was not properly represented, that there was no contract for re-sale such as was alleged on behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendants were bona fide purchasers and that the formalities requisite for the demands for pre-emption were not observed.

The minority of defendant 6 was proved and he not being properly represented the Munsif, holding that the requisite demands had been made by the plaintiffs, gave them a decree for 5/6ths share in the property, namely, the 4 annas share of the tank and its banks. He dismissed the suit as against defendant 6. The Subordinate Judge on appeal has dismissed the entire suit.

The plaintiff's first contention relates to the sufficiency of the demands. The position, so far as this matter is concerned, is this : The Subordinate Judge found the talab-i-ishtishhad was invalid inasmuch as it was not proved that when this demand was made there was a reference to the talab-i-mowasibat, and that under the law an express reference to the same is necessary. As regards the talab-i-mowasibat he was of opinion that of the three witnesses, 2, 3 and 4, who were called on behalf of the plaintiff on this point, the first did not really prove it and the last one could not be relied on and that the second witness proved that one of the plaintiffs only offered Rs. 100; and did nothing else. An examination of the evidence of this witness, however, reveals a good deal more than what the Subordinate Judge has referred to in this way. He seems to have missed the point which is apparent on the face of the evidence of this witness, that the demand was made on the banks of the tank and immediately as the plaintiffs came to know of the fact that defendant 1 had sold to the other defendants. On this point the argument that has been advanced on behalf of the appellants is that in the circumstances disclosed there was no necessity for a second demand, and reliance was placed on their behalf in this respect on the following passage in Mr. Ameer Ali's Muhammadan Law, Edn. 4, Vol. 2 p. 727:

But the talab-i-ishtishhad may be combined with the talab-i-mowasibat, e. g., if at the time of the talab-i-mowasibat, the pre-emptor had the opportunity of invoking witnesses in the presence of the seller or the purchaser or on the premises to attest the immediate demand, it would suffice for both demands, and there would be no necessity for the second.

This proposition has received judicial recognition in the case of Nundo Pershad Thakur v. Gopal Thakur (1), in which Garth, C. J., Beverley, J., concurring, quoted in support of it Futawa Alamgiri, (V 268) and said:

The talab-i-ishtishhad is only necessary if at the time of making the talab-i-mowasibat or immediate demand there was no opportunity of invoking witnesses; as for instance, when the pre-emptor, at the time of the hearing of the sale was absent from the seller, the purchaser and the premises. But if he heard it in the presence of any of these and had called on witnesses to attest the immediate demand it would suffice for both demands, and there would be no necessity for the other.

This decision was overruled, but on a different point by a Full Bench of this Court in the case of Rujjub Ali v. Chundi Churn (2). In that case the question referred to the Full Bench was when the person claiming a right of pre-emption has performed the talab-i-mowasibat in the presence of witnesses, but not in the presence either of the seller or of the purchaser, or on the premises, is it necessary, when performing the talab-i-ishtishhad that he should declare that he has made the talab-i-mowasibat, and at the same time should invoke witnesses to attest it?

This question was answered in the affirmative, but the correctness of the proposition referred to above does not appear to have been in any way shaken. Amongst the formalities necessary for the talab-i-ishtishhad, however, is that of invocation of witnesses. If this has been done in the first demand; no second demand, according to the proposition above mentioned would be necessary. The right is strictissimi juris and failure to perform the demands in accordance with the requirements of the Mahomedan law would defeat the plaintiff's claim. This invoking of witnesses, as far as may be gathered from the authorities, is no mere matter of form; it imparts to the demand a solemnity clothed in which the demand becomes not a casual one but on the other hand assumes the nature of a serious transaction. No particular form of words is necessary for the invocation of witnesses, but the claimant in the presence of witnesses must say to the following effect:

Such a person bought such a property (sufficiently indicating the same) of which I am the shafi; I have already claimed my right of shufa and now again claim it, be, therefore, witness thereof: Ameer Ali on Muhomedan law, Edn. 4 Vol. 2, p. 725.

The last word or words to that effect must be said even where the two demands are combined into one. The importance of this invocation as an essential part of the ceremony has been impliedly recognized in several cases amongst which reference may be made to Jadu Singh v. Rajkumar (3), Ramdular Misser v. Jhumack Lal Misser (4). This part of the ceremony being admittedly absent even in respect of the demand that has been proved in plaintiffs' favour by their witness 3, the plaintiffs cannot possibly succeed under the Mahomedan law on which they rely.

The second contention urged on behalf of the appellants is that they are entitled to succeed on the basis of the contract embodied in the sale-deed, to which reference has already been made. There was an issue framed by the trial Court which was to the effect as to whether there was such a contract with the defendant 1 to re-sell and whether defendants 2 to 5 were aware of it. This issue was decided in plaintiffs' favour by the trial Court, but there has been no reference to it in the judgment of the lower appellate Court. It would have been necessary for us to send the case back to the lower appellate Court for the determination of the facts in connexion with that issue and also to express our opinion as regards the validity of this contract. This has been rendered unnecessary by reason of the failure of the plaintiffs to have defendant 6 properly represented in the suit. I am not pressed by the appellants' arguments which have been directed to re open the decree of the Munsif dismissing the suit as against the said defendant. The result is that even if the plaintiffs succeed on the footing of the contract they cannot, in any event, get a decree for the one-sixth share which belongs to that defendant. Now in a suit for specific performance on a contract of this kind the principle on which the Court will proceed is that a contract for the sale of property in one lot will generally be considered indivisible, and the Court will not, as a general rule, compel specific performance of the contract, unless it can execute the whole contract. Or as Lord Romilly, M. R. expressed it :

This Court cannot specifically perform the contract piecemeal, but it must be performed in its entirety if performed at all ; Merchants Trading Co. v. Banner (5).

It is true that there are exceptions to this rule which may be justly made in view of the circumstances of any particular case. Even in cases where the contract is plain and certain in its terms and obligatory on both parties, which cannot readily be said of the contract in the present case, the right to specific execution is not absolute and its enforcement must rest on the sound discretion of the Court, a judicial discretion, to be exercised according to the established principles of equity. In the present case the plaintiffs by their conduct have made it impossible for the Court to give effect to the contract in its entirety. The practical result of it is that defendant 6, a stranger, will have his title to one-sixth share and that both cannot be interfered with. He certainly, and the other defendants through or under him possibly, will always be able to defeat the very object which the law of pre-emption aims at. What reason is there then to give preference to the plaintiffs over the defendants in the matter of the share in suit? I am accordingly of opinion after giving my best consideration to the case that the second contention of the appellant should not be entertained.

The result, in my opinion, is that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

All that Art. 3 says is that the special period of limitation of two years is laid down for suits for recovery of possession by a raiyat or an under-raiyat where the dispossessor is a landlord, and that the date from which the limitation runs is the date of dispossession. If at the time of the actual taking of possession, the person so taking possession occupied the position of landlord, the article applies. Judgment.—This appeal is by the plaintiff against the dismissal by the Courts below of his suit, which was for declaration of his raiyati interest in five plots of land and for recovery of possession. The plaintiff was a co-sharer in a certain taluk and in addition to this he acquired the raiyati interest in the five plots of land in suit. One Peari Poddar sued the plaintiff for money, and obtained a decree, in execution of which he brought the plaintiff's taluki interest to sale. That interest was sold in execution of the decree and was purchased by Peari Poddar. Defendant 1 is a trans-freee from Peari Poddar. Possession was taken some time in the year 1917. The Court of first instance decreed the plaintiff's suit; but the learned Court of appeal below dismissed the suit, holding that it was barred by the special rule of limitation laid down in Art. 3, Sch. 3, Ben. Ten. Act. In appeal it is contended that the rule of limitation applied by the learned Additional Judge is not applicable;...because it is contended that the person who dispossessed the plaintiffs had not occupied the position of landlord, both at the time of dispossession and at the time of his purchase of the interest of the plaintiff.

Reference has been made to the sale certificate which describes the property sold as a share in the taluk and as being in the khas possession of the judgment-debtor. From this it is contended that Peari Poddar purported to purchase not merely the landlord's interest but also the right to khas possession and that, therefore, the article in the schedule of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not apply. There is no force in the argument. All that the article says is that the special period of limitation of two years is laid down for suits for recovery of possession by a raiyat or an under-raiyat where the dispossessor is a landlord and that the date from which the limitation runs is the date of dispossession. The only thing with which we are concerned is whether or not at the time of the actual taking of possession, the person so taking possession occupied the position of landlord. If he did so, the article applies. It is perfectly immaterial whether or not that person occupied that position at the time he purchased or purported to purchase the interest of which he dispossessed the tenant.

The suit has been rightly decided and the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the Commissioner of Income-tax has referred two points of law to this Court for its opinion under S. 66, Income-tax Act (11 of 1922) Before setting out the form of the question it may be as well to premise that the assessee in this case are a firm called Messrs. Harmukhrai Dulichand.

It appears that on 4th May 1926, an ordinary notice was served upon them under Cl. (2), S. 22, requiring them to render a return of their income for the purpose of income-tax. It appears that the year by which this firm goes in maintaining its books of account is the Dewali year and the year of assessment was 1982-83, the previous year or the year of accounting being, therefore, 1981-82. On 22nd July 1926 a notice under S. 22 (4) was served upon them asking that they should produce their books of account for the Dewali year 1980-81 and 1981-82 and on 6th August 1926, the assessee submitted a return. The return which they submitted consists of the words and figures "Loss Rs. 26,000" under the heading "Business." A notice was then issued upon them being a combined notice purporting to be under Cl. (2), S. 23 and also Cl. (4), S. 22. That required them to produce the accounts for 1980-81 and 1981-82 and also gave them an opportunity to call any other evidence on which they might rely in support of their return. On the date fixed by the notice the books of 1981-82 were examined and various adjournments were taken for the production of the books of 1980-81. There was a hearing on appointment on 26th August 1926, on 10th January 1927 and on 16th February 1927, and the final order of assessment was not made till the 26th February 1927. Although, therefore, these books for 1980-81 were called for, at all events, on 6th August 1926, they were not produced by the following February at the time when the assessment was made. The income-tax authorities have held that ample time was given for their production and that their non-production was wilful, as indeed it is reasonably obvious from the dates and also from the inconsistent stories told by these assesseees to the effect that their books for the year in question were sent to Bikaner because of the Calcutta riots and also because of settling some disputes. The finding of fact is that these accounts are still deliberately withheld. There can be no question that for the purpose of finding what was the profit or loss for the year 1981-82 it is necessary to get the books of the year previous to that because on any question of loss caused by fall in the value of stock it is most necessary to see on what basis the valuation has been taken. The result, therefore, was that the assesseees had deliberately withheld the best evidence—indeed the only evidence—that would enable one to test the accuracy of the return.

It is in these circumstances that the assesseees, having failed before the income-tax authorities requested that two points of law should be referred to this High Court by the Commissioner of Income-tax. The first question is:

Was the notice under S. 22 (4) which was issued in the case so defective as to be legally null and void?

The second question is this:

If an assessee has made a return in compliance with a notice under S. 22 (2) and thereafter a notice has been served upon him under S. 23 (2) and also a notice under S. 22 (4), and the assessee has complied with the terms of the notice under S. 23 (2) by producing the evidence upon which he relies, but has failed to comply with the notice under S. 22 (4) is the Income-tax Officer entitled to make an assessment under S. 23 (4), for failure to comply with the notice under S. 22 (4), or is he bound to proceed under S. 23 (3)?

In my opinion both of these questions must be answered against the assesseees.

The first question is whether there is anything illegal in the issue of a notice under S. 23 (2) and S. 22 (4). I am of opinion that there is no reason why these two notices should not be comprised in one document. The position is that the assessee is given one date on which he is first of all to produce certain accounts or documents required by the Income-tax Officer and he is also told that on that same date he will get an opportunity of producing any further evidence upon which he relies. I can see no objection at all to that procedure and I observe that in the case cited to us from the Allahabad High Court decided on 4th January of this year [Chandra Sen Jaini, In the matter of (1)] a Division Bench of that Court was of the same opinion. In my judgment there is no difficulty upon the answer to the first question.

The second question depends upon the construction to be put upon Ss. 22 and 23 of the Income-tax Act. By S. 22 provision is made to the effect, in the case of companies, that the principal officer shall before 15th June in each year furnish a return of income without being asked. Provision is also made, in the case of other persons whose total income is, in the Income-tax Officer's opinion, such as to render such persons liable to income-tax, that the Income-tax Officer may serve a notice requiring a return to be made. The concluding paragraph of that section then provides that the Income-tax Officer may serve on the principal officer of any Company or on any person upon whom a notice has been served under sub-S. (2) a notice requiring him, on a date, to be therein specified, to produce, or cause to be produced, such accounts or documents as the Income-tax Officer may require provided that he shall not require the production of any accounts relating to a period more than three years prior to the previous year. That provision which enables the Income-tax Officer to require the production of accounts or documents is in the case of persons other than companies a power given on condition that a notice has been served requiring the making of a return. There is no sign in that clause of any further condition.

(1) A. I. R. 1928 All. 288.

When we come to the next section we find that the section begins by dealing with the case of a return as to which the Income-tax Officer is satisfied. In that case he assesses on the basis of the return. It then goes on to deal with a case where the Income-tax Officer has a reason to believe that a return made is incorrect or incomplete, and the language of the statute imposes upon the Income-tax Officer the duty of serving upon the assessee a notice requiring him either to attend at the Income-tax Officer's office or to produce any evidence on which such person may rely in support of the return. The meaning of that clause is that when a return is made the Income-tax Officer shall not reject it and take some other basis as the basis of assessment without giving the assessee an opportunity to appear before him and give any evidence which he may desire to give. The power under Cl. (4), S. 22, is power to the Income-tax Officer which has reference to accounts and documents and to no other form of evidence. The right under S. 23 (2) is a right to call any evidence that the assessee may desire to call.

The last clause of S. 23 deals with three different cases and for that reason perhaps the section is not so clearly drafted as it might be. It begins by taking the case of an assessee who makes no return at all and it says that the Income-tax Officer shall assess him to the best of his judgment. It then deals with the case of a person who has been ordered to produce accounts or documents and has failed to comply with the requirement. His is the same fate; the Income-tax Officer makes the assessment to the best of his judgment. It then deals with the third case—the case of a person who having made a return fails to comply with all the terms of a notice issued under sub-S. (2) of S. 23. Upon that the contentions that are raised are, first, that no notice to produce accounts or documents can validly issue after the return is filed; and secondly, that if in fact a notice is issued under S. 23 (2) it is impossible for the assessee to be penalized for the mere non-production of accounts; in other words, the second case contemplated by Cl. (4), S. 23 is no longer a case of which the assessee can be deemed to be an instance.

In my judgment, the exposition which the Commissioner of Income-tax has given is correct. He points out that the sub-section contemplates three distinct cases and, to my mind, it is abundantly shown by him that there is no warrant in the statute for saying that after a return is made the power given by Cl. (4), S. 22 is gone. The only ground which I have discovered for that opinion is the insertion of the harmless words "having made a return" into Cl. (4), S. 23. It seems paradoxical and improbable that the making of a return should put an end to the power of the Income-tax Officer to require the production of accounts. One would naturally suppose that the Income-tax Officer having seen a return may in some cases be in a better position than he would otherwise have been to say whether he thinks it necessary to inspect books of accounts or other documents or not. But apart from that question it is at least extraordinary that a limit upon the power given by Cl. (4), S. 22 should be made in the dubious and inferential manner which is suggested, namely, by the words "having made a return" being inserted in Cl. (4), S. 23. In my judgment, there is no basis either as a matter of business or as a matter of construction for the opinion that the moment a return is filed the right of the Income-tax Officer to require the production of accounts under S. 22 (4) is gone.

If that be so the next question is whether it can be contended that because in fact a notice under Cl. (2), S. 23 was served upon this firm the power provided by Cl. (4) of that section to meet a case of withholding of accounts can no longer be exercised. In my judgment there is no ground for that contention either. The Income-tax Officer in this case had asked the assessee first of all, to produce their books; secondly to attend upon him; and thirdly, at the same time, to produce any other evidence they like. If the assessee is not in default, if they produce their books and attend, then, whether they produce other evidence or not, it will no doubt be for the Income-tax Officer to proceed against the assessee under sub-S. (3) of that section. But if when the date comes it turns out that the assessee is withholding their books of account but want to produce some other evidence it seems to me reasonably plain that the Income-tax Officer may well say :

You are in default for withholding your accounts ; you will be dealt with on that basis. In the absence of available accounts neither argument nor other evidence is anything but a waste of time. It is mera palpatis. You will be treated as defaulters and in no other way.

In my judgment that is what the statute intends. The statute intends that persons who deliberately make default in producing their accounts when asked to do so under Cl. (4), S. 22, shall be treated as defaulters and that the Income-tax Officer shall make the assessment to the best of his judgment.

It has been said that the Income-tax Officer must proceed in a judicial manner and S. 37 has been mentioned in this connexion. Fundamentally no doubt the Income-tax Officer must proceed in a judicial spirit and come to a judicial conclusion upon properly ascertained facts ; though I would point out that the Income-tax Officer is not a Court, he has not the procedure of a Court, and he is to some extent a party and Judge in his own case. However true it be and for whatever purpose it be true that the assessment to income-tax is to be done in a judicial manner, the first thing which must be laid down as a condition before a person can complain of any departure from this principle is this : that he too must produce the evidence which the law requires him to produce. It is idle and absurd for a person who has books of account and deliberately withholds them to complain of not being treated in a judicial manner. The judicial manner is a manner which proceeds upon evidence, and the basis of the statute is to see that available evidence is produced. It is then, and only then, that the assessment is to be made upon a judicial consideration of the evidence. Otherwise it is to be made "to the best of his judgment" and brevis manu.

In my judgment, there is no foundation for the assessee's contention on either of the points that have been referred to us. It seems to me, therefore, that the answer to these two questions should be as I have indicated, to the first "No" to the second "Yes."

It only remains to mention certain cases which have been drawn to our attention. One is a decision of the High Court of Patna which is said to be reported in the Eighth Volume of the

*Patna Law Times and a report from the All India Reporter has been allowed to be used. In that case it would appear that the learned Judges were not satisfied that a notice under S. 22 (4) has been issued at all. They seem to think on the basis of the words "having made a return" under S. 23 (4) that the power to call for books and documents is limited to the period prior to the filing of the return. But they say that even if we assume that notice under S. 22 (4) can be issued after a return has been filed and notice not having been issued in this case summary assessment was illegal.

It appears to me, therefore, that the view that the right to issue a notice under Cl. (4), S. 22, comes to an end on the making of a return was not essential to the decision in that case ; but, in any event, I disagree with that opinion. It seems to me to have no merits whether as a matter of business or of construction of the statute.

The next case to which we were referred was the case of Duni Chand Dhani Ram v. Commissioner of Income-tax (2) decided by Mr. Justice LeRosaignol and Mr. Justice Martineau. That was a case where, it seems to me, that no law was laid down which is not in harmony with the view which I have endeavoured to express. That was a case where an assessee had made a return of his income. He was called upon to produce his books of account and he did produce his books of account. That being so he was in the position of a man who must under Cl. (2), S. 23, be given a proper opportunity to support his own return by such evidence as he desires and whether his return was supported by further evidence or not the Commissioner was bound to assess him not on the footing that he was a defaulter but on the footing that his return ought to be accepted save in so far as there might be good reasons for criticizing it. The learned Judges in that case, so far as I can see, have laid down no law to the effect that a person who is in default by wilful failure to produce accounts is not within the summary power given by Cl. (4), S. 23.

Another case to which we have been referred is a decision of Mr. Justice

(2) A. I. R. 1926 Lah. 161=7 Lah. 201.

Greaves and Mr. Justice Mukerji of this Court in the case of Nirmal Kumar Singh v. The Secretary of State (3). There, again, we have a case of an assessee who made a return and produced his accounts. At the time when he produced his accounts various matters were gone into between his gomasta and the Income-tax Officer. Without giving a proper notice requiring him to produce such evidence as he might desire in support of his return the Income-tax Officer assessed him upon a basis inconsistent with his return and in these circumstances one learned Judge thought that the statute had been substantially complied with and the other learned Judge (Mr. Justice Mukerji) took the view that the informality was one which had not been waived and could not safely be ignored. In the course of that judgment there is not only nothing to the effect that the power to call for accounts must be exercised before the making of the return, but that judgment supports what the Income-tax Officer has done in this case.

Two cases have been drawn to our attention on the part of the Advocate-General. One contains some expressions in a judgment of my own in an Income-tax Reference heard on the 18th January 1927; in the matter of Ram Kissen Das Bagri and the other is a judgment of Mr. Justice Walsh and Mr. Justice Banerji of the Allahabad High Court in Chandra Sen Jaini In the matter of (1). There, too, the dictum in the Patna case to which I have referred was dissented from and there, too, it was held that a combined notice under S. 22 (4) and S. 23 (2) was a proper notice.

In these circumstances it appears to me that the questions put to us must be answered against the assessee and that the assessee must pay the costs of this Reference.

Civil Rule No. 280 of 1928, Decided on 22nd June 1928, from decree of Sm. C. C. 2nd Sub-Judge, Mymensingh.

(a) Bengal Municipal Act (8 of 1884), S. 85 (a)—Defendants holding ijara of a market place within Municipality and issuing licenses to others to sell wares on the land—Ijaradars are the persons who really occupy holding within Municipality.

The petitioners were ijaradars of a certain place, described as a cattle market, within the Municipality and they made their collection of rent and carried on their business on the holding in respect of which the assessment had been made although they resided elsewhere. On that holding a cattle market was held on hat days; and the holding remained vacant on other days. The persons who sold their wares in the market were sort of licensees under petitioners. Municipality brought a suit against the petitioners to recover tax under S. 85 (a). It was contended that this personal tax could not be levied as they were not occupiers of the holding.

Held : that the ijaradars were the persons who really occupied the holding within the Municipality. [P 592 C 1]

(b) Bengal Municipal Act (3 of 1884), S. 85 Cl. (a)—Holding claimed jointly—Tax is to be assessed on each separately according to circumstances and property of each within Municipality.

Judgment.—This Rule was issued on the Chairman of the Muktagacha Municipality to show cause why the decree of the Small Cause Court of the Second Subordinate Judge of Mymensingh for recovery of Rs. 105 from the defendants who are petitioners before me should not be set aside. Two grounds are urged in support of this rule. It is said that the Municipality had no right to levy this personal tax as the defendants were not persons who were occupiers of holdings within the meaning of S. 85, Bengal Municipal Act. It is argued in the second place that, in any event, the assessment of the Municipality is ultra vires seeing that the assessment was a joint assessment against both the defendants who are petitioners before me. It appears that the petitioners who are the servants of the Maharaja, obtained an ijara of a certain place which is described as a cattle market within the Municipality and they make their collection of rent and carry on their business on holding No. 282 in respect of which the assessment has been made although they reside elsewhere. It appears that on this holding a cattle market is held on hat days and the holding remains vacant on other days. The persons who sell their wares in the market are sort of licensees under the ijaradars i. e., the defendants and the ijaradars are the persons who really occupy the holding within the Municipality. The first contention, therefore, that the Municipality had no authority to assess tax on the defendants because they did not occupy the holding within the Municipality must fail.

The second ground taken is one of substance and must prevail. It appears that there has been a joint assessment under S. 85, Cl. (a), Bengal Municipal Act, against both the defendants. S. 85 (a) reads as follows: I need only quote the material portion:

The Commissioners may, from time to time, at a meeting convened expressly for the purpose, of which due notice shall have been given, and with the sanction of the Local Government impose within the limits of the Municipality one or other, 'or' both of the following taxes: (a) a tax upon persons occupying holdings "within the Municipality according to their circumstances and property within the Municipality."

Whether the holding is claimed jointly by two or more persons, Cl. (a) suggests to my mind that a tax is to be assessed on each separately according to the circumstances and property of each within the Municipality. The contention raised by the learned vakil for the opposite party, that these persons should be treated as one person, seems to me not to be tenable. For to accept that construction would be to take a view inconsistent with the language of Cl. (a) which suggests that each person must be taxed personally according to the circumstances and property of each within the Municipality. The circumstances and the property of two joint occupiers must of necessity vary and two persons occupying holdings could not be regarded either as a corporation consisting of several members as one person in the eye of the law or as one Company consisting of several members. This view receives support from a decision of this Court in the case of Chairman of the Jalpaiguri Municipality v. Jalpaiguri Tea Co. Ltd. (1). Mr. Justice Mookerjee in dealing with the question as to what is the proper interpretation which is to be put upon S. 85 (a) observed as follows:

The language does not justify such a restricted interpretation; and there is no good reason why in places where the personal tax is in operation, several persons occupying the same holding should not each be subject to assessment, according to their respective circumstances and property within the Municipality.

Mr. Justice Buckland concurred with Mr. Justice Mookerjee and observed that in his judgment the tax under S. 85 (a) was in the nature of a poll-tax leviable on persons. Not however merely as persons, but according to their circumstances and the property within the Municipality; and he held that there were two Companies in that case who were occupying the holding though joint occupiers of holding and each of them was liable to be taxed under S. 85 (a). In that case separate tax was assessed on each of the Companies and the contention was that they should have been jointly assessed. That contention, however, was not accepted and the view was taken that each person occupying the holding should be assessed separately. The Municipality of Muktagacha, by assessing a joint personal tax on each of the two defendants, has contravened the provisions of S. 85 (a), Bengal Municipal Act. Their action must consequently be regarded as ultra vires and the suit based on such an action which was beyond the powers of the Municipality must be dismissed.

The Rule is made absolute and the judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court must be set aside. There will be order no as to costs.

Appeal No. 597 of 1925, Decided on 30th January 1928, from appellate decree of 2nd Sub-Judge, Midnapur, D/- 19th December 1924.

(a) Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, Sch. 2, Art. 11—Suit framed as money suit—General prayer in plaint for relief to which plaintiff may be entitled—Suit cannot be treated as one under Art. 11.

To bring suit with Art. 11 it must be one brought expressly for determination or enforcement of right to or, interest in immovable property.

Where a suit is framed by the charge-holder as a suit for money, the fact that there is a general prayer in the plaint asking for such other or further reliefs as the Court may in justice and equity consider the plaintiff to be entitled to the suit cannot convert the suit into one under Art. 11. [P 594 C 2]

(b) Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, Sch. 2, Arts. 41, 42, 44—Suit for contribution not cognizable by Small Cause Court must fall within either Art. 41 or Art. 42 or Art. 44.

A suit for contribution is ordinarily cognizable by a Small Cause Court. The suits for contribution over which the Small Cause Court has no jurisdiction are those specified in Arts. 41, and 42, or possibly under Art. 44 : 15 Cal. 713, Foll. [P 594 C 1]

(c) Civil P. C., O. 41, R. 33—Decree passed against some sets of defendants being really a combination of several decrees against several sets of defendants—Only one set of defendants appealing—Decree cannot be set aside in appeal against all defendants.

Per Mukherji, J.—Where the decree passed by the trial Court against some sets of defendants is really a combination of several decrees against the several sets of defendants, and only one set of defendants appeals, the appellate Court cannot set aside the decree in whole. [P 595 C 2]

(d) Transfer of Property Act, S. 100—Person paying off existing charge or mortgage debt is allowed to stand in the shoes of the mortgagee and given a charge on the property.

Per Mukherji, J.—When the act in respect of the doing of which compensation is sought consists in paying off an existing charge or mortgage debt the Courts have never found any difficulty in allowing the person making the payment to stand in the shoes of the mortgagee and in giving him a charge on the property : 2 I. A. 131 ; 10 Cal. 1035 (P. C.) ; 15 All. 304 (P. C.) ; 26 Mad. 686 (F. B.) ; 31 Mad. 439 ; and 40 Bom. 646 ; Foll. [P 595 C 2]

for contribution is suit by one of several parties who discharges common liability—Words “sharer” and “joint property” in Art. 41 are to be understood with reference to common liability and not in sense of “undivided sharer in property” and “property in which shares are undivided.” (contra Cuming, J.)

A common liability is the essence of a right of contribution, and an action for contribution is a suit brought by one of several parties who has discharged a liability common to all of them to compel the others to make good their shares. The words “sharer” and “joint property” are to be understood with reference to this common liability that has been discharged and not in the sense of an “undivided sharer in the property,” and “property in which the sharers are undivided” : 13 A. Purchaser redeeming mortgage is in the position of joint mortgagor—Fact that decree had been obtained on mortgage is immaterial as decree does not extinguish security though security may be merged in decree—(contra. Cuming, J.)—Transfer of Property Act, S. 95.*

A purchaser who redeems the mortgage is in the same position as if he were a joint mortgagor and the fact that a decree had been obtained on the mortgage is also immaterial because the decree on the mortgage does not extinguish the security though the security may be merged in the decree : 13 A. Sarada Charan Maiti and Apurba Charan Mukerji—for Appellant.

Panchanan Ghose and Bhupendra Narayan Bera—for Respondents.

Cuming, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for contribution. A mortgage was executed by one Joy Jana, father of defendant 8, in 1305 in respect of a certain property. Portions of this property were sold at various times to various persons among them being plaintiff and defendants 1 and 2. The mortgagee brought a suit for the realization of the money and the property was put to sale. The plaintiff deposited the mortgage money, saved the property and brought this suit for contribution.

The defendants adduced various pleas in defence. The first Court decreed the suit for various amounts against defendants 1 to 6. On appeal to the District Court it was held that the suit was barred by limitation, that the suit was bad for nonjoinder of one Akhil Seal and, that further there was no evidence to show the value of the different pieces of land, and so the plaintiff could not succeed. That Court allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit. The plaintiff has appealed to this Court. The respondent has raised a preliminary objection that no appeal lies. His contention is that S. 102, Civil P. C., is a bar as the suit is of the nature cognizable by the Court of Small Causes, etc., below the value of Rs. 500. Admittedly the suit is below the value of Rs 500 and the only question then to be decided is whether the present suit is a suit of the nature cognizable by a Court of Small Causes. S. 15, Small Cause Courts Act, provides that a Court of Small Causes shall not take cognizance of the suits specified in Sch. 2 of the Act and that all other suits of which the value shall not exceed Rs 500 shall be cognizable by such Courts.

A suit for contribution is ordinarily cognizable by a Small Cause Court. The suits for contribution over which the Small Cause Court has no jurisdiction are those specified in Arts. 41 and 42, Sch. 2, or possibly under Art. 44. Bisva Nath Shah v. Naba Kumar Chowdhury (1). The present suit does not, as far as I can see, fall under Art. 41.

These persons, plaintiff and defendants, are not cosharers in a joint property. They are specific owners of specific portions having purchased them at various times from defendant 8. Neither does it fall under Art. 42 for none of these persons were mortgagors and the money was not paid by one of several joint mortgagors for redemption of the mortgaged property. It has not been contended that it falls under Art. 44. It has been urged that it is a suit for the determination or enforcement of a charge on immovable property and so falls under Art. 11. The argument is this that the plaintiff having paid up the whole of the mortgage decree and so saved the property from sale has acquired a charge on the properties which he has saved from sale for the amount due from the other owners of the property.

Where immovable property of one person is by act of parties or operation of law made security for the payment of money to another, and the transaction does not amount to a mortgage, the latter person is said to have a charge on the property

It is perhaps difficult to see how the present case can fall within this definition of a charge. Reliance has however been placed on the case of Dhakeswar Prosad Singh v. Harihar Prosad Narain

Singh (2), for holding that the purchaser of one of two properties mortgaged satisfying the mortgage decree has a charge for such sum as the purchasers of the other properties be called upon to contribute. In that decision Mukherji, J. seems to have applied the principles of S. 95, T. P. Act, to the case of purchasers of the mortgaged property. Assuming, without admitting, the correctness of this decision it still remains to be seen whether the present case falls within Art 11, Sch. 2, Small Cause Courts Act. It does not follow that because a person has a right to contribution from another person that he has necessarily a charge over some property in that person's possession.

Therefore, a suit for contribution is not necessarily a suit for the enforcement of a charge. The plaintiff may well be content with merely a personal decree against the defendants without desiring to enforce his remedy by a declaration that he has a charge on some specific property of the defendant against which he desires to enforce his remedy. The mere fact that the plaintiff might perhaps have framed his suit as one for a declaration of a charge on the part of the mortgaged property in the hands of the defendant with all the necessary formalities of such a suit under O. 34 does not make a suit, which is clearly simply one for contribution without a declaration that he had any charge on any property, one for the enforcement of a charge.

A party may have a debt secured by a mortgage. He may be content to bring a simple suit for the money lent without relying on his mortgage. The fact that he concluded his plaint by asking for any other relief to which he might be entitled would not convert his suit into a mortgage suit. In considering whether the plaintiff's suit falls within Art. 11 we must, therefore, look at the suit itself and see what it really was, not what it might have been. As far as I can see from the plaint it was simply a suit for contribution, only for money paid on behalf of another person. The plaintiff did not ask that his charge on the property should be declared and neither does the decree give him any charge on the properties. It is a simple decree for money. The plaintiff's suit does not fall within

(2) [1915] 21 C. L. J. 104=27 I. C. 780.

Art. 11, Sch. 2, per Small Cause Courts Act.

It clearly comes within the purview of S 102 and no second appeal lies.

The result is the appeal stands dismissed with costs.

Mukherji, J.—I regret I take a different view.

This appeal arises out of a suit for contribution. One Joy Jana mortgaged some lands in favour of one Baidyanath Shit. He then sold parts of the lands to the plaintiff, defendants 1 and 2, defendant 3 and defendants 4 to 6, in separate parcels. Shit instituted a suit on the mortgage making all these transferees parties thereto, obtained a decree and put up the lands to sale in execution thereof. The plaintiff paid off the mortgage debt due on the decree to avert the sale, and then instituted the present suit, claiming contribution of separate amounts representing the proportionate shares of the aforesaid three sets of defendants.

The three sets of defendants contested the suit separately. They conceded their liability to contribute, but disputed the amounts claimed.

The Munsif held that the defendants 1 and 2 were liable for Rs. 33-8-0 and the defendant 3 for Rs. 16-12 and defendants 4 to 6 for Rs. 18-3-6. He passed a decree in plaintiff's favour for the said amounts together with interest for three years at the rate of 3 pies per rupee per month and costs in proportion.

This decree was appealed from only by defendants 1 and 2. The Subordinate Judge was able to find reasons for dismissing the entire suit, and he did so with costs and interest. His grounds for dismissal of the suit were: 1st that the suit was barred by limitation; 2nd that one Akhil who was in possession of a portion of the lands was not made a party to the suit, and 3rd that the liability of the defendants was ascertained by the trial Court in a way not supported by the evidence, or that the plaintiff had not placed sufficient evidence before the Court to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

In the appeal before the lower appellate Court defendants 1 and 2 were the appellants and the plaintiff the only respondent. In the appeal here, the plaintiff is the appellant and defendants 1 and 2 the only respondents. Notwithstanding the wide words of O. 41,

R. 33, which rule has always been advised to be cautiously used, I do not think that the Subordinate Judge was at all competent in a case where the decree passed by the trial Court was not really one decree but a combination of three several decrees against three sets of defendants to interfere with the whole decree as he has done, the more so as two of those sets, namely, defendant 3 and defendants 4 to 6 were not parties to the appeal before him. But with the dismissal of the suit as against these two sets of defendants I am not concerned here, as, however erroneous the same may have been, they have not been made parties to the appeal here and I do not see how the said dismissal which is in their favour can be disturbed in their absence. The only matter that need be considered, therefore, is the portion of the plaintiff's claim as against defendants 1 and 2.

These defendants, as respondents to this appeal, have challenged its competency on the ground that the appeal is barred by reason of the provisions of S 102, Civil P. C. This objection is sought to be met by reference to Arts. 11, 41 and 42, of Sch. 2, Provincial Small Cause Courts Act. On mature consideration I have come to the conclusion that Art. 11 will not help the appellant. It is true that if the plaintiff's allegations are established, he would perhaps be entitled in equity to get against the defendants a declaration of a charge on the lands that may belong to them, separately as against the three sets and for the amounts at which their respective liabilities are assessed. When the act in respect of the doing of which compensation is sought consists in paying off an existing charge or mortgage debt the Courts have never found any difficulty in allowing the person making the payment to stand in the shoes of the mortgagee and in giving him a charge on the property. Cases of this kind are numerous and I give only a few: Ram Tuhul Singh v. Biseswar Lal Sahoo (3), Gokaldas Gopaldas v. Puranmal Premsukh Das (4), Bhagwati Prasad v. Radha Kishen (5), Rajah of Vizianagram v. Raja Setrucherla Somasekararaz (6), per Benson and Bhashyam Ayyangar, JJ., Chama Swami v. Padala Anande (7), and Tangya Fala v. Trimbak Daga (8). But although there is the general prayer in the plaint asking for such other or further reliefs as the Court may in justice and equity consider the plaintiff to be entitled to, the suit as framed is a suit for money. To bring the suit within Art. 11, it must be one brought expressly for the determination or enforcement of a right to, or interest in immovable property. It is not possible to construe the plaint as a plaint made for that purpose; and I do not, therefore, think that this article can help the plaintiff. Art. 41, so far as it is relevant runs in these words:

A suit for contribution by a sharer in joint property in respect of a payment made by him of money due from a cosharer.

At first sight it might seem that the plaintiff and the three sets of defendants being separately in possession of separate parcels of land the article would have no application. This view, however, in my opinion is not right. A common liability is the essence of a right of contribution, and an action for contribution is a suit brought by one of several parties who has discharged a liability common to all of them to compel the others to make good their shares: e.g., if A and B are jointly liable for a sum of money and A alone satisfies the whole debt, he is entitled to call upon B to contribute to the extent of his proportionate share, and conversely, if B alone pays the whole debt, he is entitled to call upon A to contribute in similar proportion. The words "sharer" and "joint property," in my opinion, are to be understood with reference to this common liability that has been discharged and not in the sense of an "undivided share in the property" and "property in which the sharers are undivided." The plaintiff and the three sets of defendants were, it is true, owners of separate parcels in the lands, but the mortgage was one and for the purpose of the decree which was satisfied their liability was common to all of them. The mortgagee decree-holder would not take any notice of this division. The parties, therefore, were all sharers in the lands and the lands taken as a whole were joint amongst them; it is difficult to see how else their interest can be described looked at in view of the character of the payment that was made. It is not the rights of the parties inter se which, in my opinion, determine the question. The view I take receives support from the decision in Fatima Bibi v. Hamida Bibi (9), where in respect of parties who had divided the lands of a tenancy amongst themselves, and one of them discharged the rent of the tenancy, and then instituted a suit against the other for recovery of the proportionate share of the latter it was said that as regards the zamindar they were still joint. The same may be said of the parties in this case as regards the mortgage-decree-holder, because the transfers made by the original mortgagor, so far as against the mortgagee created only a joint interest in the lands. The view that some Courts have taken, namely, that when a decree has been passed on the basis of a joint liability under a mortgage the rights of the co-mortgagors merge in the decree and Art. 41 would not, therefore, apply to co-judgment debtors has never been recognized by this Court. I am, therefore, of opinion that the suit was excepted by Art. 41. I am also of opinion that the case is covered by Art. 42. The mortgage was one and indivisible and the plaintiff and the three sets of defendants are in the position of co-mortgagors. Art. 42 says:

A suit by one of several joint mortgagors of immovable property for contribution in respect of money paid by him for the redemption of the mortgaged property.

In a suit for contribution instituted by one of two joint mortgagors, a decree was obtained against them for sale of the mortgaged property, and one of them paid off the decree to save the property from sale, and then sued the other for contribution. It was held that the suit in substance was one falling under Art. 42, as the effect of the payment was to redeem the property from the mortgage under which it was ordered to be sold: Talaimand Singh v. Gobind Singh (10). I entirely agree in the principle of this decision which I think applies fully to the present case. A purchaser who redeems the mortgage is in the same position as if he were a joint mortgagor and the fact that a decree had been obtained on the mortgage is also immaterial because the decree on the mortgage does not extinguish the security though the security may be merged in the decree. Dhakeswar Prosad v. Harihar Prosad (2). For those reasons I am of opinion that the preliminary objection must be overruled.

To turn now to the merits of the appeal; of the three grounds on which the judgment of the Subordinate Judge proceeds, the first relates to the question of limitation. The last day for filing the plaint was the 16th July 1923, which was a holiday. The plaint was filed on 17th July 1923, on which date the Court allowed five days time to put in the deficit Court-fees. The deficit Court-fees were paid on 22nd July 1923. The Subordinate Judge held that the five days expired on the 21st and that in computing the five days 16th was to be taken into account. This view is unsupportable and indeed the respondent declines to justify it. The second ground relates to the omission on the part of the plaintiff to implead one Akhil as a defendant. Akhil, however, is in possession of a part of the plot which belongs to defendants 4 to 6 and has no concern with the portion belonging to defendants 1 and 2. The Subordinate Judge says:

In order to avoid multiplicity of suits the man ought to have been made a party to this suit and in this he is right. He says further that the defect is fatal; but why this should be so I fail to understand. He seems to have overlooked the distinction between proper and necessary parties to an action. It is quite open to the plaintiff not to proceed against Akhil Seal, and if Akhil is not a party to the suit any decision therein will not affect him, but I do not understand why the proportionate liability of defendants 1 and 2 could not be determined in Akhil Seal's absence so long as the necessary materials are before the Court. As regards the third ground: the Subordinate Judge seems to be of opinion that as the plaintiff has not been able to give satisfactory evidence as regards the values of the paddy lands and dhosa lands, as they were in 1305, the date of the mortgage, the proportionate liabilities of the different parties cannot be calculated and so the plaintiff's suit must fail for want of evidence. The mode of calculation adopted by the Munsif, it is true, is not right and it is also true that the values as in 1305 have to be ascertained, but it is obvious that direct evidence thereof it is impossible to give and unreasonable to expect. There is some evidence on the plaintiff's side as well as on the side of the defendants from which the relative value of the paddy lands and dhosa lands at the present time may be arrived at, and this relative value of to-day would perhaps, in the absence of anything to the contrary, represent the relative value in 1305, or, it may be that some allowance will have to be made to ascertain the relative value in 1305. It is only this relative value that is necessary to enable one to determine the proportionate liabilities of the parties. In dealing with this matter I cannot help thinking that the Subordinate Judge has not made a reasonable attempt to arrive at a decision and has set up for his guidance much too exacting a standard. None of the grounds, therefore, upon which the Subordinate Judge has thought fit to dismiss the suit is sound.

The appeal, therefore, in my opinion should be allowed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge dismissing the suit as against defendants 1 and 2 should be set aside and the case should go back to the lower appellate Court so that the appeal of the said defendants may now be reheard and disposed of in the light of the observations contained in this judgment. The costs of this appeal will abide the result.

Kristo Mohan Kundu — Defendant — Respondent.

Appeal No. 2027 of 1925, Decided on 18th January 1928, from appellate decree of 2nd Sub-Judge, Zillah Hooghly, D/-1st May 1925.

(a) Landlord and Tenant—Origin of tenancy unknown—Tenant must prove such facts that the reasonable inference therefrom is that the tenant had been granted a permanent right of occupancy.

Where tenancy is alleged to be permanent and the origin of the tenancy is taken to be unknown, the tenant must needs prove such facts that the reasonable inference therefrom is that the tenant had been granted a permanent right of occupancy: A. I. R. 1924 P. C. 65; 16 Cal. 223 (P. C.); and A. I. R. 1920 P. C. 67, Rel. on. [P 599 C 1]

(b) Landlord and Tenant — Permanent tenure—Court must decide whether a tenancy is permanent or not as an inference of law — Civil P. C., S. 100.

The Court must decide whether the tenancy is a permanent one or not as an inference of law to be drawn from a consideration of all the relevant matters of facts that are proved in evidence before it: A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 309 and 30 C. W. N. 709, Con. [P 599 C 2]

Bijan Kumar Mukherji — for Appellants

R. K. Mitter—for Respondents.

Page, J.—This is a suit to recover possession of premises let for residential purposes. Notice to quit was served upon the tenant, and if the tenant was liable to be ejected after notice to quit it is not contended that the notice was not duly served according to law. The defence set up was that the tenancy was governed by the Bengal Tenancy Act; that it was of an agricultural nature, and that the tenant had acquired a permanent right of occupancy. That defence was negatived by the lower appellate Court, and it was held that the tenancy was not of an agricultural nature but one for residential purposes, and that it was, therefore, outside the ambit of the Bengal Tenancy Act, and governed by the general law. Certain facts have been found, and must be taken to have been correctly found, by the lower appellate Court. The learned Subordinate Judge in the course of his judgment stated that we come to the conclusion that the defendant's tenancy is governed by the general law that prevailed before 1882. The defendant can claim a permanent tenancy only by a contract with his landlord. The relationship (i. e., of landlord and tenant) is established by the decree filed before me. I find that the origin of the defendant's tenancy is not known. I find that it has been inherited by defendant 2 from his father. I find that it has been held for over 50 years, and that a uniform rent of Rs. 7 has been all along paid. I find further that this tenancy was taken for residential purposes. I find there is no brick-built structure of the defendant on the land, and that the structure that is there was built after objection by the plaintiff and after the failure of the plaintiff in the previous suit.

It was also found or admitted that the defendant held a permanent tenure, but that such tenure was not for agricultural purposes or governed by the Bengal Tenancy Act; that before 1920 there was no structure upon the land; that there has been no transfer inter vivos during the currency of the tenancy; and that in 1920, when the defendant was proceeding to erect a building on the land, the plaintiff brought a suit for an injunction to prevent him from putting up a pucca structure on the land without the consent of the landlord. That suit was dismissed upon the ground that the structure which the defendant was erecting was katcha, and not a pucca building. In that case the Court further expressed the opinion that the defendant did not possess any permanent right of occupation. I mention this last fact as part of the narrative, but for the purpose of my judgment I have not relied upon it. The question that falls for determination is whether the proper inference of law to be drawn from these facts is, that the tenancy is a permanent one. Now, the onus of proving that a defendant is in occupation under a tenancy which is not subject to a notice to quit is upon the tenant who sets up that his tenancy is of a permanent nature. The duty of the Court as I apprehend the law, is to take into consideration all the facts proved that are relevant for the determination of the issue, and to decide as a matter of law whether from the facts proved the legitimate inference is that the tenancy was a permanent one. The law upon this subject has been laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Nainapillai Marakayar v. Ramanathan Chettiar (1). In the course of delivering the judgment of the Board Sir John Edge observed :

It cannot now be doubted that when a tenant of lands in India in a suit by his landlord to eject him from them, sets up a defence that he has a right of permanent tenancy in the lands, the onus of proving that he has such right is upon the tenant. In Secretary of State v. Luchmeswar Singh (2), it was held that the onus of proving that they had a permanent right of occupancy in lands was upon the defendants who alleged it as a defence to a suit by their landlord to eject them, and that proof of long occupation at a fixed rent did not satisfy that onus and in Seturatnam Aiyar v. Venkatachala Goundan (3) in a suit by landlords for the ejectment of the defendants from lands in a ryotwari district in Madras, the giving of notice to quit not being disputed, it was held that the onus of proving that the defendants had rights of permanent occupancy was upon them that permanent right of occupancy can only be obtained by a tenant by custom, or by a grant from an owner of the land who happens to have power to grant such a right, or under an Act of the legislature.

In this case it is not contended that the tenant obtained a permanent right of occupancy by custom, or by an act of the legislature. It was, therefore, incumbent upon him to prove that he had obtained it by an express grant from the owner of the land. Now, how can a tenant prove the existence of such a grant? If the origin of the tenure is known cadit questio, for then it is possible to ascertain from the terms of the agreement whether the tenancy was a permanent one or not. But where, as in this case, the origin of the tenancy is taken to be unknown, the tenant must needs prove such facts that the reasonable inference therefrom is that the tenant had been granted a permanent right of occupancy.

A large number of cases have been canvassed before us, but I confess (though I speak with all due deference), that it appears to me that in some of the cases the real issue has been clouded by confounding two different things, an inference to be drawn from facts and a presumption of law. In this country those who are employed in administering the law for the most part are occupied with cases in which presumptions created by statute play a large part in the argument, and it seems to me that from time to time certain facts, if proved, have been treated as raising a presumption of law that a particular tenancy is of a permanent nature rather than as evidence from which an inference that a permanent tenancy has been created may reasonably be drawn. Indeed, in some cases the decisions have gone so far as to state that there can be no legal presumption of permanency unless certain specific facts are proved; for instance, in the case of Abdul Hakim Khan Choudhuri v. Elahi Baksha Sha (4) Chakravarti, J., in the course of delivering a judgment, in which Greaves, J., concurred, stated that an analysis of the cases cited before, in which presumption of permanency was made, shows that the following elements existed in these cases, viz., first, the origin of a tenancy for residential purpose must be unknown; secondly, existence of permanent pucca buildings on the lands built long before any controversy arises and that to the knowledge of the landlord; thirdly, uniform payment of rent, fourthly, recognition of successions and transfers by the landlord. It seems to us that the absence of either of the elements Nos. 1 and 2, as stated above, would be ordinarily fatal to any claim of permanency on the theory of lost grant.

No doubt if the origin of the tenancy was known there would be no room for a discussion of the mode in which the tenancy was created, but the absence of permanent pucca buildings on the land built long before any controversy arose to the knowledge of the landlord with all due deference appears to me, although an important element for the Court to take into consideration, in itself not necessarily conclusive against the tenant. In my opinion the true rule is that the Court must decide whether the tenancy is a permanent one or not as an inference of law to be drawn from a consideration of all the relevant matters of facts that are proved in evidence before it. It would not be difficult to imagine cases in which, notwithstanding that no pucca structure had been erected on the land, the evidence might be such that from it the existence of a permanent tenure might reasonably be inferred. In my opinion in each case the Court must take into consideration all the relevant evidence that has been adduced. In this case, no doubt, there are elements which point to the tenancy being a permanent one, for instance, its origin is unknown, the land has been held in occupation for over fifty years by the present occupant or his father, and the rent has always been paid at a uniform rate. But those are not the only facts that have been found. The mere fact that there has been a transmission on death from father to son without objection from the landlord is not conclusive of the matter; for, as was pointed out by Chakravarti, J. in Abdul Hakim Khan's case, the fact that the tenant is allowed to continue in possession of lands for generations without alteration of the rent is of common occurrence in this country, and is usually attributable to the reluctance of a landlord to eject a tenant from his home so long as he does not make himself objectionable, and regularly pays his rent.

But it is an element which must be taken into consideration. Another important fact is that the defendant himself did not claim in his defence that he was the holder of a permanent tenancy under the general law by reason of a lost grant of a permanent tenancy. That fact is not conclusive against the tenant, but it is an element in the case which cannot be ignored. Again, there is the fact that no structure was upon the land until 1920. If this was a permanent tenancy that had been created at least fifty years ago for residential purpose it is strange that no building was erected upon the land until eight years ago. That fact, in my opinion, militates, but is not necessarily conclusive, against the permanent nature of the tenancy. Further, it is sometimes found that a tenant has put up a substantial structure upon the land without objection from the landlord. In my opinion, that is evidence of considerable weight that the parties intended and agreed that the tenancy should be a permanent one, for in this country landlords are not wont to allow ticea tenants to put up substantial structures on the land. But, in my opinion, such a fact is not conclusive against the landlord, nor in itself does it necessarily give rise to a praesumptio juris that the tenancy is of a permanent nature. On the other hand the landlord sometimes is found to have objected to a structure being erected on the land by the tenant. If he has failed to raise any objection until the structure has been in existence for a considerable period the landlord may be met in a proper case by the equitable doctrine of acquiescence. But if the landlord has objected forthwith or while the work upon the structure was proceeding, that circumstance, no doubt, is evidence that the tenancy was not a permanent one; a fortiori, if, as in this case, while the building was in process of construction he brought a suit for an injunction to prevent the tenant from building a pucca structure upon the land. In short, each case must turn upon its own facts (Bireswar Mookerji v. Troilochin Dasi (5) and, in my opinion, taking into consideration all the facts that have been found in the present case, the proper inference of law to be drawn therefrom is that the defendant has failed to establish that his tenancy of the land is a permanent tenure under the general law.

The result is, that the decrees of the lower Courts must be set aside, and a decree for possession passed in favour of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are entitled to their costs in all the Courts

Marie Josephine Walter—Respondent.

Appeal No. 123 of 1927, Decided on 15th June 1927, from original order of Addl. Dist. Judge, Alipore, D/- 17th January 1927.

(a) Contract Act, S. 23—Agreement by father to give up entirely the control and custody of his child to the mother is illegal.

An agreement by a father to give up entirely the custody and control of his child to the mother is opposed to public policy and is therefore illegal: Hope v. Hope, (1857) 8 De. G. M. & G. 731 and St. John v. St. John, (1805) 11 Ves. 531, Ref. [P 601 C 2]

(b) Guardians and Wards Act, S. 7—Court can exercise its jurisdiction to appoint a guardian of the person of the minor even if he is possessed of no property.

Court can exercise its jurisdiction to appoint a guardian of the person of the minor even if he is possessed of no property. It is the duty of the father to maintain and educate his children who are incapable of supporting themselves and although the law has always recognized this duty, the civil Courts have no direct means of enforcing this obligation, so as to compel him to maintain them out of property in which they have no interest: 19 Bom. 96, Rel. on. [P 603 C 2]

(c) Guardians and Wards Act, S. 26—Leave for the permanent residence of the child abroad and out of the Court's jurisdiction is not permitted except where it is manifestly advantageous to the child as regards the health and the like.

While, leave for permanent residence outside the jurisdiction of the Court may be granted for good and sufficient grounds and under sufficient safeguards, leave for the permanent residence of the child abroad and out of the Court's jurisdiction is not permitted except where it is manifestly advantageous to the child as regards health and the like. [P 604 C 2; P 605 C 1]

(d) Guardians and Wards Act, S. 7—Parents found unfit to be guardian—Court will interfere and deprive them of the custody of their children and appoint a suitable person as guardian to take care of them and to superintend their education.

Although in general, parents are entrusted with the custody and education of their children, yet this is done upon the natural presumption that the children will be properly taken care of, and will be brought up with a due education in literature and morals and religion and they will be treated with kindness and affection. But whenever the presumption is removed, whenever (for example) it is found that a father is guilty of gross ill-treatment or cruelty towards his infant children; or he is in constant habit of drunkenness and blasphemy or low and gross debauchery; or he professes atheistical or irreligious principles; or that his domestic associations are such as tend to the corruption and contamination of his children; or that he otherwise acts in a manner injurious to the morals or interests of his children; in every such case the Court will interfere and deprive him of the custody of his children, and appoint a suitable person to act as guardian and take care of them and to superintend their education. [P 605 C 1]

(e) Guardians and Wards Act, S. 17, Cl. (1)—Welfare of the minor—Court must look to child's welfare generally, as regards moral, religious and physical well being.

In considering the matter from the point of view of the welfare of the minor the Court should with advantage look to the circumstances which may possibly stand in the way of the child being properly looked after. The first and paramount consideration of the Court is the welfare of the child which is not to be measured by money only or by physical comfort only but is to be taken in its widest sense. The moral and religious welfare of the child must be considered, as well as its physical well being, nor are the ties of affection to be disregarded though they are not conclusive. [P 603 C 1]

N. Barwell and Sudhansu Sekhar Kar—for Appellant.

J. W. Chippendale and Hari Prosanna Mukerji—for Respondent 1.

Mukherji, J.—The appellant, Victor Justin Walter, is the husband of the respondent 1, Marie Josephine Walter. They are European British subjects within the meaning of the Guardians and Wards Act 8 of 1890, and are Roman Catholics by religion. They were married in 1921 and the child, Leon Walter, born on 27th September 1923, is the only issue of that marriage.

On 16th June 1926, respondent 1 applied to be appointed guardian of the person of the child under circumstances which have been set out in detail in the order from which this appeal has been preferred. This application was opposed by the appellant. The Second Additional District Judge, by an order dated 17th January 1927, allowed the application of respondent 1 with costs and also made an order on the appellant to pay a sum of Rs. 100 a month to respondent 1 for the maintenance of the child. Hence this appeal.

The marriage, it seems, has not been quite a happy one. The appellant is a purser in the employ of the British India Steam Navigation Company drawing a pay of Rs. 250 or so. His duties keep him away from his home for nearly nine months in the year, if not more, and he can only be at home for a few days at the end of every two months or so. Respondent 1 suffers badly from severe filarial troubles and, as far as we can gather, is a young woman somewhat sick of her environments, with a feeling of deep-rooted disgust for what she considers to be neglect on the part of her husband; and a vein of utter dissatisfaction runs through all her utterances, which sometimes border on hysterics. For a few months after the marriage, she she was left by the appellant with his sister with whom she could not agree and thereafter she returned to her mother, Mrs. Bridget Katherin Antonio, to Lucknow, where the latter lived at the time. The mother is a trained nurse, and her husband is fairly well-off and in service.

When respondent 1 thus went to Lucknow, the appellant issued an advertisement in the Statesman that she had left his protection. About the end of 1922 a reconciliation was brought about by the parish priest. Respondent 1 remained in Calcutta or at Lucknow from time to time. The child was born in Calcutta and, when it was about five weeks old, she again went to Lucknow to her mother, as the child was ill. When the child was about 18 months old she came down to Calcutta with the child and Mrs. Antonio at the appellant's request. This was in February 1925. A temporary lull was sought to be brought about by an agreement (Ex. D) which she executed or was made to execute. The two essential conditions in this agreement were that she was to look after the home and the child for a round sum of Rs. 170 a month and that if she again left her husband she was to leave the child with the husband's sister-in-law and waive all claims for maintenance and support. We do not think much of this agreement and shall not refer to it again beyond stating that, apart from the circumstances under which it was executed and which would make us hesitate to act on it, it is somewhat like an agreement by a father to give up entirely the custody and control of his child to the mother and is therefore opposed to public policy: Hope v. Hope (1), St. John v. St. John (2). A house, 16 Crooked Lane, was taken on rent, and this was shared by the appellant and his wife and child, and by the appellant's brother and sister-in-law. On 1st June 1925 the wife was obliged to go to the Medical College Hospital on account of filarial troubles. She returned home on 16th June but found that the child had disappeared. The appellant had in the meantime put it into St Vincent's Home at Kidderpore. He tried to make her believe that it had been sent to Rangoon as he apprehended that if she knew that it had been put into the Home, she would go and worry the nuns there. He tried to send her again to the hospital, but either she was refused admission or she refused to be admitted and remained at 16 Crooked Lane. At the end of the year Mrs. Antonio was able to discover where the child was. Owing to the strict injunctions of the appellant, respondent 1 was allowed to see the child at the Home only once in January and again in May 1926. Thereafter, the present proceedings were commenced, on the application of respondent 1, filed on 16th June 1926. Since the order of the learned Judge passed on 17th January 1927, the child was taken from the Home to Lucknow. The mother and the child lived with Mrs. Antonio at Lucknow for some time. Since some date in April, they were putting up at Nainital. The appellant, respondent 1, the child and Mrs. Antonio were present in Court when this appeal was heard. During the hearing of the appeal an endeavour was made to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement with the mutual consent of the parties. It was all but concluded when it failed. We are nevertheless thankful to Mr. Barwell and Mr. Chippendale for the generous assistance we received from them in this respect.

One of the complaints made by the appellant against the order passed by the Judge is that the case was heard in his absence, no proper orders having been passed on the application for adjournment that was filed by him, asking the Court to fix a date on which he would be in a position to attend. The order fixing the date of hearing on receipt of this application does not appear to have taken due note of the appellant's difficulties, but as no further representation was made to the Judge when the case was taken up for hearing, we are not inclined to hold that the appellant really desired to be present. On the merits the validity of the order has been assailed or sought to be supported by the parties before us, much on the same lines on which the proceedings were fought out in the Court below. The appellant has sought to make out that respondent 1, by reason of her lack of education, and her temperament, mental faculties and conduct, is unfit to look after the child, that she has on occasions showed symptoms of insanity, more particularly in threatening to destroy her own life and that of the child, also that she is not likely to be helped by her parents who are dissatisfied with her and that her mother had already expressed much dissatisfaction on more occasions than one. On his own behalf, he says he has done nothing which can justify the removal of the child to the custody of somebody else, that he has provided his wife with Rs. 170 out of his pay of Rs. 250 and that it is beyond his means to do anything more, and that he removed the child to St. Vincent's Home at Kidderpore with the very best of motives. Respondent 1, on the other hand, charges the appellant with callousness and neglect, nay even cruelty and ill-treatment, in respect of herself, and also drunkenness and incapacity to take care of himself and far greater incapacity to look after the child. We have heard all that has been argued at the Bar on their respective cases thus presented by the parties and we have taken into consideration all the materials that are on the record as bearing on these matters. It will serve no useful purpose discussing these materials. It is sufficient to say that the charges levelled against respondent 1 are baseless and the explanation that has been offered on her behalf as to her conduct or utterances fits in with the probabilities and we agree generally in the estimate that the learned Judge has formed of her. With regard to the opinion that the learned Judge appears to have formed of the appellant himself as regards his character and the sufficiency of his resources, we may say we are not quite in agreement with him. The learned Judge on this question observes thus in his judgment :

Objector (meaning the appellant) is a purser on board a steamer living free and practically free of cost and even if his income be limited to his pay it cannot be denied that under the circumstances he took a considerable share of it for himself. His wife had to pay rent, servant and maintenance for two or roughly double what her husband kept back for his luxuries. From the evidence of his own witnesses it is clear that he always had money for drink and this probably accounts for his neglect to provide his wife with proper medical attention.

We do not think that the evidence quite supports this conclusion and this appraisal of the appellant's conduct, in our opinion, is somewhat harsh. There is very little to suggest that the appellant is given to luxuries and the evidence that he is a habitual drunkard is not very convincing. Bearing the conclusions of the learned Judge in mind and also the dissent we have expressed above, it has to be considered whether the appointment of respondent 1 as guardian of the child is one that should be disturbed.

The parties are European British subjects within the meaning of the Act. Cl. (4), S. 17 of the Act provides that as between parents who are European British subjects adversely claiming the guardianship of the person neither parent is entitled to it as a right, but other things being equal, if the minor is a male of tender years, or a female, the minor should be given to the mother, and if the minor is a male of an age to require education and preparation for labour and business, then to the father. According to this principle, if other things were equal, the child in the present case should be given to the mother. But are other things equal? In considering the matter from the point of view of the welfare of the minor, as we must under general principles, as also in view of the express provisions of S. 17, Cl. (1), read with the other clauses of the section, we may with advantage look to the circumstances which may possibly stand in the way of the child being properly looked after. The first and paramount matter for the consideration of the Court is the welfare of the child, which is not to be measured by money only or by physical comfort only, but is to be taken in its widest sense. The moral and religious welfare of the child must be considered, as well as its physical well-being, nor are the ties of affection to be disregarded, though they are not conclusive (Eversley on Domestic Relations, 4th edn, at p. 638). So far as respondent 1 is concerned we cannot help thinking that the learned Judge ignored the disadvantages that she will experience in discharging her duties as guardian and has overestimated her qualifications by putting to her credit the fitness of Mrs. Antonio to look after her and her child. He says that Mrs. Antonio is a fit and proper person for mother and child to live with. Coupled with the condition that respondent 1 with her child will be able to live with Mrs. Antonio, she, in the opinion of the learned Judge, is a proper guardian. In this view we entirely agree. Mrs. Antonio, as far as can be made out, did not approve of the marriage and she was for some time very cross with her daughter for having contracted this marriage against her wishes. But there is no question that she has centred all her affections on the child since it was born and it is apparent that she will take every care of her. Other matters, however, have to be considered and they will be referred to presently.

Respondent 1 has no home or means of her own, and the child has no property. The Judge has made an order on the appellant to pay Rs. 100 monthly to her for the maintenance of the child. This order is sought to be supported by reference to S. 22, Cl. (1) of the Act, but it is plain that that clause is of no assistance; it provides for an allowance for the guardian for his care and pains in the execution of his duty. Under Act 40 of 1858, a guardian of the person could only be appointed in the case of a certificate to manage the minor's property being granted: see Ss. 7 and 11 of that Act and also Act 20 of 1864. The older English cases show that the Court of Chancery could not exercise its jurisdiction except where the minor had property but latterly the case has been different: Barnarda v. McHugh (3) and In re McGrath (4). The same power is exercisable by the High Court: Re Jagannath Ramji (5). Act 8 of 1890 is clear and shows that the Court can exercise its jurisdiction to appoint a guardian of the person of the minor even if he is possessed of no property. It is the duty of the father to maintain and educate his children who are incapable of supporting themselves and although the law has always recognized this duty, the civil Courts have no direct means of enforcing this obligation, so as to compel him to maintain them out of property in which they have no interest. Lord Eldon, L.C., in Wellesley v. Duke of Beaufort (6), remarked :

You may go to the Court of King's Bench for a habeas corpus, to restore the child to the father ; but when you have restored the child to the father, can you go to the Court of King's Bench to compel that father to subscribe even to the amount of five shillings a year for the maintenance of that child ? A Magistrate may compel a trifling allowance, but I cannot believe that there was ever a mandamus from the Court of King's Bench upon the subject. Wherever the power of the law rests with respect to the protection of children, it is clear that it ought to exist somewhere ; if it be not in this Court where does it exist ? The Courts of law can enforce the rights of the father, but they are not equal to the office of enforcing the duties of the father. Those duties have been acknowledged in His Majesty's Courts for centuries past.

There can be no doubt as to the full jurisdiction of the Court in all questions relating to maintenance ; it is a jurisdiction that can only be exercised where there is some property belonging to the infant: Simpson on Infants, fourth edition, p 189 ; Macpherson on Infants, p 24 Lord Eldon in Wellesley v. Beauford (6), remarked :

It is not, however, from any want of jurisdiction that it does not act, but from a want of means to exercise that jurisdiction ; because the Court cannot take on itself the maintenance of all the children in the kingdom. It can exercise the jurisdiction usefully and practically only when it has the means of doing so ; that is to say, by its having the means of applying property for the use and maintenance of the infants.

The act is silent in this respect. The Code of Criminal Procedure provides a mode of compelling a father to maintain his infant children, but under that Act he cannot be compelled to educate them or even to support them according to his own position. It is true that where there is no specific provision in the statute the Court has to act in accordance with the principles of justice, equity and good conscience, and the rules of the Court of Chancery in England may form a safe and useful guide ; but the power of allowing maintenance to minors such as is exercised by the Court of Chancery in England is exercised upon certain well-settled rules, and an order cannot be made unless the minor possesses a clear fund or income applicable to the purpose ; the minor must have a vested interest in the fund : see Trevelyan on Minors, edn. 5 p. 216. The broad proposition that under general principles the father of a child is bound to provide for its maintenance such as was suggested in the case of Ghana Kanta v. Gereli (7) has hardly any foundation.

Respondent 1 has no house of her own and the place where she is expected to take the minor to is Lucknow or some other place where Mrs. Antonio may be putting up. Mrs. Antonio's evidence, upon which the learned Judge has relied is that she is willing to have respondent 1 and the child and look after them. The learned Judge says :

If this were not so it does not appear to be likely that she would have spent a year in Calcutta with her daughter trying to get the custody of the child.

So far so it is all right, but is this not a precarious assurance ? Complaint has been made before us that the child has been removed from the limits of the Court's jurisdiction without its leave and reference has been made to S 31 of the Act. It may be said in answer, and has been so said, that though there is no express leave, the learned Judge was perfectly aware of the fact that in all probability, the child will be taken to the place where Mrs Antonio might be living, and that was what was intended by the order of the learned Judge. The section is based upon the English law. Under the law in England where the persons of infants are, by due and proper course of law, brought before the Court, it will take special care that they remain within its jurisdiction, and obey its directions therein, and will not in general, whether they be actual wards or not, be permitted to be taken or to go out. Under special circumstances, the Court has permitted infants to go out of the jurisdiction for the purpose of temporary or even permanent residence there, or when already abroad, to remain there under restrictions whereby their property and their education and marriage will remain within its control, and this must be on the ground of advantage to the infants (Daniell's Chancery Practice, 8th Edn, p. 982). While, therefore, leave for permanent residence outside the jurisdiction of the Court may be granted for good and sufficient grounds and under sufficient safeguards, leave for the permanent residence of the child abroad and out of the Court's jurisdiction is not permitted except where it is manifestly advantageous to the child as regards health and the like. Eversely on Domestic Relations, 4th Edn., p. 639. It may be doubted whether the present case fulfils these requirements, as it is merely because Mrs. Antonio is willing to let respondent 1 and the child to remain with them that the order should be taken to have been made, if it can be said to have been made at all. Respondent 1 herself is in indifferent health and it may be necessary for her to go to other places or to hospital. How then should she be able to look after the child?

If for the above reasons the respondent 1 be not considered a suitable person to act as guardian of the person of the child, the appellant may say that he should be declared guardian in view of the provisions of S. 17, Cl. (4) of the Act. Story in his Equity Jurisprudence, 14th edn., S. 1757, says:

Although in general parents are entrusted with the custody and education of their children, yet this is done upon the natural presumption that the children will be properly taken care of, and will be brought up with a due education in literature and morals and religion and that they will be treated with kindness and affection. But whenever the presumption is removed, whenever (for example) it is found that a father is guilty of gross ill-treatment or cruelty towards his infant children; or that he is in constant habit of drunkenness and blasphemy or low and gross debauchery, or that he professes atheistical or irreligious principles; or that his domestic associations are such as tend to the corruption and contamination of his children; or that he otherwise acts in a manner injurious to the morals or interests of his children, in every such case the Court of Chancery will interfere and deprive him of the custody of his children and appoint a suitable person to act as guardian and take care of them and to superintend their education.

The appellant may not have lost his right, but the fact that he remains away from home for nine months in the year or more and will be able to look after the child personally for a few days only at the end of every two or three months cannot be lost sight of in considering the question of the child's welfare. The fact that he sent the child to the Home makes him stand self-condemned in this respect. The Home is an excellent institution but the care of the nups is a poor substitute for parental affection.

From what has been stated above it will appear that, in our opinion, neither the father nor the mother by himself or herself, is, in view of the circumstances to which we have referred, fit to be entrusted with the guardianship of the child and that a decidedly better arrangement will be to appoint the grandmother as its guardian should she consent to be appointed as such in view of those circumstances. We shall certainly have to pass such final orders as we consider suitable and proper in the circumstances, but before we proceed to do so we hope the parties interested in the welfare of the child will enable us to make the very best arrangement that we can think of. We accordingly defer passing final orders till the 13th June 1927. In the meantime we give Mr. and Mrs. Walter another chance to make an application to be appointed joint guardians of their child on such terms, if any, as they may be able to arrange between them amicably. We also give leave to Mrs. Antonio to make an application, if she so desires, for her own appointment as such guardian, on the understanding that any allowance for the maintenance, etc., of the child, cannot be made in these proceedings, and that for that purpose she or Mrs. Walter have to look to such other remedy or remedies as may be available to them under the law.

Any such application, as aforesaid, will have to be filed by Wednesday next. Final orders in the case will be passed on the 13th June 1927, when the parties, as well as the child, are expected to be present before us.

Graham, J.—I agree with the order that my learned brother proposes to make in this case. On the materials which have been placed before us I think it is clear that neither the appellant, the father of the minor, nor the respondent, the minor's mother, is a fit person to be appointed guardian of the minor. So far as the father is concerned nothing has in my opinion been satisfactorily proved which would in any way unfit him to be appointed the guardian of his son. No substantive application has, however, been filed by the father to be appointed guardian. As a matter of fact he could not in any case be appointed as guardian inasmuch as he goes to sea and is absent.

from Calcutta for long periods and only occasionally comes into port. He could not therefore in the circumstances properly look after the minor. In the case of the mother the reasons why she is ineligible as guardian are quite different. The evidence shows that she is unbalanced, hysterical and wholly incompetent, and therefore the welfare of the minor would certainly not be secured by entrusting him to her charge. No one else has come forward to apply to be appointed as guardian although notices were issued. In the circumstances it is difficult to know what order the Court should make. The only course seems to be, as proposed by my learned brother, to allow the parties an opportunity either to submit a joint application for guardianship, or for the grandmother of the minor, Mrs Antonio, to make such an application (After an application was filed in pursuance of the judgment their Lordships delivered the following judgments.)

Mukherji, J.—In pursuance of our order of the 2nd June 1927, an application has been filed for the guardianship of the child's person by Mrs Bridget Katherin Antonio. There has been no joint application for such guardianship filed by Mrs. and Mr. Walter, but Mr. Walter alone has filed an application for himself. He has also filed an affidavit objecting to the appointment of Mrs. Antonio.

We expected that good sense would prevail with the parties and the matter would be allowed to end in this Court for the benefit of all concerned, but evidently the parties are inclined to take a different view. Under the circumstances, we proceed to pass suitable orders.

In view of the remarks made by us in our judgments, dated the 2nd June 1927, the appeal must be allowed and the order passed by the Court below must be set aside, but there will be no order as to costs. For the reasons we have given in these judgments, we do not consider that the appointment of Mr. Walter will be for the welfare of the child and we, accordingly, reject his application filed before us since then and disallow the prayer contained therein. We send down the petition of Mrs. B. Antonio filed before us as aforesaid to the trial Court so that it may be registered as an application for her own appointment as such guardian. Mrs. B. Antonio was putting up at Nainital and she had to come down with the child for the purposes of these proceedings. It is, therefore, extremely important that the proceedings should be terminated as quickly as possible. As the learned vakil for Mrs. Walter does not object to and on the contrary supports Mrs. B. Antonio's application, it will be enough for the Court below to give notice of the proceedings to Mr. Walter alone.

The material question for the consideration of the Court below will be the truth or otherwise of the allegations of Mr. Walter in the affidavit that he has filed in this Court in opposition to Mrs. Antonio's appointment. The Court below will proceed to pass final orders on the application as soon as this investigation is finished.

As regards interim custody we direct that Mrs. B. Antonio do continue to be in custody of the child until final orders are passed on her application. She will be at liberty to keep the child anywhere she likes, the parents, of course, having liberty to see the child at such place where it may be kept. She will be at liberty to take the child to Nainital or any other place that she may desire during this period, and unless the Court below makes a specific order to the contrary it will not be necessary for her to produce the child before that Court during the continuance of the proceedings.

The records, together with the petition of Mrs. B. Antonio and the affidavit of Mr. Walter, will be sent down to the Court below (copies thereof being kept with the High Court file of this appeal) as early as possible.

Graham, J.—I agree.

Mitter, J.—This is a plaintiff landlord's appeal against the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Dacca dated 9th April 1925 affirming the decision of the Munsif of Manikgunj dated 2nd October 1923. The plaintiff commenced the suit in which this appeal arises for rent and claimed arrears of rent at the rate of Rs. 17-1-3½ gandas. Defendant 2, now respondent, who alone contested the suit pleaded that the rental was Rs. 10-0-15 gds. and that the rent was liable to be suspended on the ground of partial dispossession. So far as the defence of suspension of rent is concerned, both the lower Courts overruled the objection taken by the defendant, but gave effect to the plea that the plaintiff was not entitled to more than Rs. 10-0-15 gds. The ground on which the defendant rested his defence which had prevailed in both the Courts below that the plaintiff is not entitled to a higher rent than Rs. 10-0-15 gds. is that the previous compromise decree between the plaintiff and the defendant was in contravention of the provisions of S. 29, Ben. Ten.

Act, and could not be given effect to. The facts which have led to this litigation may be shortly stated thus: The lands in respect of which this rent suit has been instituted along with other lands form certain chur lands and they were recorded in the finally published Record-of-Rights as khas lands in possession of the landlord. But the defendants went on possessing the lands after they had re-formed in situ and claimed them as appertaining to their original holding. In 1919 a suit was instituted by the present plaintiff for declaration of title to and recovery of possession in respect of certain chur lands including the disputed lands. The suit was compromised between the plaintiff and the defendants. By the compromise the plaintiff admitted that the disputed lands were the defendant's raiyati jote lands with occupancy right and the defendants admitted that the disputed plots and the yearly rent payable for the said plots were correctly specified against the names of the respective tenants-defendants in the schedule to the solenama and with regard to the disputed lands the quantity of which is stated to be 29 bighas odd, the yearly rent was shown to be Rs. 17-1-3 gds. 1 kara. Both the Courts held that this compromise which was made under O. 23, R. 3, Civil P. C., and which was embodied in a decree could not be given effect to as the rental mentioned in the compromise exceeded more than two annas in the rupee, the rental which had previously been paid in respect of these lands, and consequently contravened the provisions of S. 29, Ben. Ten. Act, as admittedly the disputed lands were raiyati holdings. The Munsif, accordingly, gave a decree to the plaintiff at the rate of Rs. 10 odd. On appeal to the Subordinate Judge, he affirmed the decision of the Munsif. A second appeal has been taken to this Court by the plaintiff and two points have been urged before us by the learned vakil for the appellant.

It is argued in the first place that the compromise should be given effect to, even if it contravened the provisions of S. 29, Ben. Ten. Act, for the compromise decree was binding unless the same was set aside and it was admitted in this case that the compromise decree stands.

It is argued in the second place that S. 29, Ben. Ten. Act has no application, because there was a bona fide dispute prior to the institution of the previous title suit which was settled by the compromise arrived at therein.

In support of the first ground, reliance has been placed on the case of Romesh Chandra Banikya v. Moomraj Khan (1), where the learned Judges held that a decree passed in contravention of the provisions of S. 147-A, Ben. Ten. Act, as applicable to Eastern Bengal and Assam, cannot be treated in a subsequent suit between the parties as without jurisdiction and a nullity but is operative and binding until vacated by appropriate proceedings. This decision, it was pointed out in that case, received support from two Full Bench decisions of this Court in the cases of Hriday Nath Roy v. Ram Chandra Barna (2), and Gora Chand Halder v. Prafulla Kumar Roy (3). There can be no doubt that the decision in Romesh Chandra v. Moomraj Khan (1) cited above, supports the first ground on which the learned vakil for the appellant rests his appeal. But it has been argued by the learned vakil for the respondent that the view taken in the case in Romesh Chandra v. Moomraj Khan (1), is contrary to the view taken by Cox and N. R. Chatterjee, JJ., in the case of Sharjug Sharam Lal v. Rukhit Mahto (4). There the learned Judge held that a decree for rent passed in accordance with a compromise in contravention of the provisions of S. 147-A, Ben. Ten. Act, i. e., without recording evidence to show what the amount of rent was before the dispute arose, is made without jurisdiction, and the tenant is not bound to have it set aside, for, according to the learned Judges, the decree was a nullity. No doubt this case supports the contention of the respondent. But it seems to me extremely doubtful whether the view taken in this case can be regarded as sound, having regard to the decisions in the Full Bench cases to which I have just referred. As was pointed out in the Full Bench case in Hriday Nath Roy v. Ram Chandra Barna (2) it is the authority to decide a case at all and not the decision given therein which constitutes jurisdiction.

Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine and it does not depend either upon the regularity of the exercise of that power or upon the correctness of the decision pronounced, for the power to decide necessarily carries with it the power to decide wrongly as well as rightly. In this connexion, reference may be made to the observations of Lord Hobhouse in the case of Malkarjan v. Narhari (5), where it is pointed out that a Court has jurisdiction to decide wrongly as well as rightly and that the irregular exercise of jurisdiction does not render the order made in the case without jurisdiction and that such orders regularly made must be set aside and cannot be challenged in a collateral proceeding. Chatterjee, J., who was a party to the decision in the case in Sharjug Sharan v. Rukhit Mahto (4) had to consider in a later case the soundness of his own decision. In the case of Hem Ch. Choudhury v. Chandra Mohan Namadas (6) Chatterjee, J. observed with reference to the case in 17 C. W. Notes as follows :

The question whether a non-compliance with a particular provision of the law constitutes an irregularity or renders an order a nullity, has been considered in the recent Full Bench decision in the case of Hriday Nath v. Ram Chandra (2). It is unnecessary, however, to discuss how far (if any) the principle laid down by the Full Bench affects the decision in the case of Sharjug Sharan Lal v. Rukhit Mahto (4), because we think that the present case is distinguishable from that case.

We think that in view of the Full Bench decisions to which we have referred and to the observations of the Judicial Committee in Malkarjan's case, it cannot be said that the compromise decree in this case was passed without jurisdiction. The result is that the first ground prevails.

We also think that the second ground taken is a good ground. It seems to us that there was bona fide dispute with regard to the title to the lands in respect of which the present rent suit was instituted. In the Record-of-Rights these lands were shown to be in the khas possession of the plaintiff. The entry in the finally published Record-of-Rights must be presumed to be correct until the contrary was shown and that gave the landlord a just reason to institute the suit for recovery of possession of these lands which were recored in his khas possession as the tenant-defendants had not abandoned the possession of those lands. The lands had recently come out of water and, as naturally happens in these cases, there is a sort of dispute between persons to whose holdings the lands were annexed and the proprietor of the land. There was such a dispute and a bona fide dispute by reason of the entry in the Record-of Rights in favour of the plaintiff landlord and it was in settlement of that dispute that this compromise was arrived at. Both the parties realized, as the compromise petition shows, that if the said title suit continued, they would both be ruined on account of useless expenditure, and neither party would gain much. Therefore, both the plaintiff and the defendant in that suit without any reference to the plaint and the written statement compromised the suit in the manner namely, that for 29½ bighas of land the defendant was to pay an yearly rent of Rs. 17 odd. The second ground is a substantial ground and must also prevail.

The result, accordingly, is that the decrees of the Courts below are set aside and in lieu thereof, we direct that the plaintiff do get rent from the defendant at the rate of Rs. 17-1-3½ gandas for the period in suit. The plaintiff-appellant is entitled to his costs both here and in the Courts below.

Appeal No. 313 of 1926, Decided on 6th January 1928.

(a) Provincial Insolvency Act, S. 4—Court has jurisdiction to require proof of claim by a creditor to be a secured creditor.

The Court has in insolvency proceedings jurisdiction to require from a creditor of the insolvent claiming to be secured creditor, proof of such a claim. It is not imperative that the Receiver should file a regular petition in the nature of plaint or there must be at first an enquiry under Ss. 53 or 54. The ipse dixit of a creditor that he is a secured creditor cannot have the effect of precluding the Court from judicially determining the matter. [P 610 C 1]

Graham, J.—This appeal is against an order of the District Judge, 24 Parganas and arises out of insolvency proceedings. The facts shortly stated are that on 27th January 1926, one Jewraj Khariwalla made an application before the District Judge to be declared an insolvent and a Receiver was appointed. Subsequently an order of adjudication was recorded on 3rd May 1926. One of the creditors of the insolvent, the Luxmi Industrial Bank (creditor No. 4) is the present appellant before us. It appears that this bank had advanced, or at all events claim to have advanced various sums of money to the insolvent upon the security of certain ornaments which were deposited with the bank. The Receiver wanted inspection of these articles and of the bank's accounts. The bank objected to produce them on the ground that it was a secured creditor. The learned Judge, however, considered that it was desirable that the articles should be inspected by the Receiver and he accordingly recorded an order directing the bank to grant facilities to the Receiver for the purpose of inspecting and valuing the ornaments. In making the order he observed that the bank had not yet proved that they were actually secured creditors in respect of the articles, and in his opinion it was necessary that this should be done as there were certain allegations in the report of the Receiver which raised some doubt as to the position of the bank in the matter. He accordingly directed the bank to prove that they were secured creditors in respect of the articles and issued an interim injunction restraining the bank from selling the ornaments. It is this order which forms the subject-matter of the present appeal and more particularly that portion of it which restrained the bank from selling the jewellery.

On behalf of the appellants two points have been argued. Firstly, it has been contended that the question whether the appellants are secured creditors or not cannot be gone into in insolvency proceedings; and, secondly, it has been urged that, even assuming that the appellants have to prove their right as secured creditors, the proper procedure was not adopted by the Court below. In my judgment there is no substance in these contentions. With regard to the first point the learned advocate for the appellants was constrained to concede that S. 4 of the Act, as it now stands, confers the widest possible powers upon the Court; but he laid stress on the opening words of the section "subject to the provisions of this Act" and then went on to argue that, as no enquiry or proceeding under S. 53 or S. 54 was started against the bank, the Court below had no jurisdiction to call upon the bank to prove that they are secured creditors, or to issue the injunction. In my opinion this contention is without substance. The appellants, if secured creditors, have their rights. But they must first satisfy the Court that they have the right which they claim, and the Court below certainly had jurisdiction under S. 4, of the Act to require proof that they have that right. If such proof is not forthcoming, the properties in question will be available for distribution among the general body of creditors. The ipse dixit of a creditor that he is a secured creditor cannot have the effect of precluding the Court from judicially determining the matter. The adoption of such a view would render the Court powerless in cases of collusion between the insolvent and a favoured creditor. In my judgment both the order directing an enquiry, and the order of injunction were proper orders to make in the circumstances of this case.

With regard to the second point: it is to be observed in the first place that this has not been included in the grounds of appeal. Apart however from that, it has in my opinion no merits. It was argued that the Receiver should have filed a regular petition in the nature of a plaint so as to enable the appellants to put in a written statement in reply. I do not think that this procedure was imperative. All that was necessary was an enquiry directing to the determination of the question whether the bank were secured creditors or not. In my opinion the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs: three gold mohurs.

Suhrawardy, J.—In my opinion there is no appeal against the order appealed from in this case. It is not necessary to discuss this matter as I agree with my learned brother in dismissing the appeal.

Full Bench Reference No. 1 of 1928 in Criminal Revn. No. 1254 of 1927, Decided on 13th July 1928, from order of Dy. Magistrate, Comilla, D/- 13th August 1927.

 Criminal P. C., S. 145 (1)—(Per Full Bench)—"Actual possession" means actual physical possession though wrongful — "Dispute" means actual disagreement at the time though the question is previously decided by civil Court (Mukherji, J., dissenting.)

Per Full Bench.—The words "actual possession" in sub-S. (1), S. 145, mean actual physical possession even though wrongful, e. g., that of a recent trespasser in actual physical possession at the time of the proceedings under S. 145, and the word "dispute" in the same sub-section means actual disagreement existing between the parties at the time of the proceedings under S. 145 even though the question as to the right to possession has already been decided by a civil Court: 6 W. R. Cr. 10; 16 W. R. Cr. 24; 23 W. R. Cr. 17; 5 C. L. R. 200, 6 Cal. 835; 26 Cal. 625; 29 Cal. 208; 5 C. W. N. 563; 20 C. W. N. 795; and Graham, J., in A. I. Per Mukherji, J.—The word "dispute" in sub-S. (1), S. 145, means actual disagreement existing between the parties at the time of the proceedings under S. 145 even though the question as to right to possession has already been decided by a civil Court, if the decision of the civil Court amounts only to a determination of the right to possession, except in cases where such right and a consequent claim to possession have been negated by a decree which is either inter partes or may be treated as such, as also in cases in which khas or actual possession has been delivered by the civil Court either inter partes or between parties who may, in effect, be regarded as parties to the proceedings. The words "actual possession" in sub-S. (1), S. 145, mean actual physical possession even though wrongful, i. e., that of a recent trespasser in actual physical possession at the time of the proceedings under S. 145, provided the dispute as to possession has not been determined by a civil Court as explained above.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case an application in revision under S. 439, Criminal

P. C., has been made to the Court against an order of 13th August 1927, made by the Deputy Magistrate of Comilla under S. 145 of that Code in proceedings instituted on 9th May 1927. A rule having issued and cause being shown before the Division Bench, a reference has been made to this Full Bench. Three points are formulated in the order of reference, viz.—

(1) Do the words "actual possession" in sub-3. (1), S. 145, Civil P. C., mean actual personal physical possession even though wrongful, e. g., that of a recent trespasser in actual physical possession at the time of the proceedings under S. 145.

(2) Does the word "dispute" in the same subsection mean actual disagreement existing between the parties at the time of the proceedings under S. 145 even though the question as to the right to possession has already been decided by a civil Court.

(3) Has the law been correctly laid down in the case of Ambar Ali v. Piran Ali (1) or in the case of Atul Hazra v. Uma Charan (2) and Akroy Mandal v. Basir Rai (3).

By the rules of this Court (Ch. 7, R. 5, Appellate Sides Rules) the case itself is referred to us and we have not merely to answer the specified points of law.

In these circumstances it is necessary to set out the facts. The applicant before us was the 1st party before the Magistrate. It appears that he took a mortgage in 1906 from Moktar and his wife Arjatannessa, that he sued upon it and after the wife's death recovered a mortgage decree on 15th September 1919, for sale against Moktar and the heirs of the wife. On 16th September 1923, he applied to execute the decree alleging that limitation was saved by an arrangement by which in 1920 he was put in possession of certain portions of the land in lieu of interest. In the end this question was concluded by a decree of this Court on 11th December 1925. The finding was that as against the minor heirs of the wife the decree was no longer capable of execution as the arrangement relied upon to save limitation was not so made as to bind the minors. Thereafter the property was sold as against Moktar and purchased by the decree-holder, an application to set aside the sale for non-service of notices, etc., was prosecuted to the High Court and was dismissed, but this Court on 11th May 1925, made it clear that no decision was arrived at, or could in those proceedings be arrived at, on the question whether the original owner was Moktar or his wife or on the question of their shares. On 8th February 1926, the applicant, i. e., decree-holder first party, was put in possession pursuant to his purchase. It is quite clear that he was not put into actual possession of the homestead and the finding is that he was given possession of the scattered plots of agricultural land by the planting of a bamboo.

The Magistrate has found possession to be with Montazaddin and Afajaddin of the 2nd party. These are sons of Moktar. Afajaddin is the minor or one of the minors against whom the decree was held to be barred in execution. He is an admitted heir of his mother Arjatannessa. It is clear enough therefore that as against his right to possession or as regards the extent of his share there has been no decision of any Court of law.

The applicant contends that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to take action under S. 145; and, alternatively, that if he did take such action he was bound in law to find that the applicant was in possession by reason of the delivery of possession given by the civil Court on 8th February 1926, some 15 months before the date of the Magistrate's proceedings. This argument proceeds upon the view: (1) that the section refers only to bona fide disputes and not to cases in which the claim on one side is without any rational ground or is made without any real belief in its validity; (2) that the section is intended to make interim provision until disputes are determined by the civil Court and that once the civil Court has determined the matter any dispute is at an end, or at all events [to use the words of Glover, J., Raniganj Coal Ass. v. Hem Lall (4)].

There is no more place for a summary order which proceeds not upon title but on mere possession.

In support of this line of reasoning the following cases are relied upon: Shama Sundary v. Jardine Skinner & Co. (5), Rai Mohun Roy v. Wise (6), Raniganj Coal Ass. v. Hem Lall (4), In re. Chutraput Singh (7), Bhola Nath Ghosh v. Mathoor Mundle (8), Gobind v. Abdool (9), Doulat Koer v. Rameswari (10), Kunja Behari v. Khetra Pal (11), Atul Hazra v. Uma Charan (2), Abhoy v. Basu Rai (3), Behari Gir v. Rani Bhubaneswari (12).

The principle or practical necessity which appears to be at the root of the appellants' contention, and which in not a few of the cases cited has been held to govern the construction of S. 145 and the enactments which preceded it has been stated as follows : That the Magistrate is not competent to interfere with the execution of a decree of the civil Court. That he is bound to maintain the party in possession who has obtained a decree and recovered possession in execution of that decree. That there would never be an end to litigation if the Magistrate will not keep in force the decision of a civil Court regarding lands. These expressions will all be found in the judgment in Rai Mohun Roy v. Wise (6) which is the leading case among those relied on by the applicant. In some of the cases, particularly when the decree in question has been passed or affirmed by the High Court, there is a certain amount of embroidery upon this theme which may well be ignored. But there is a reference to Indian conditions in the Raniganj Coal Ass. v. Hem Lall (4), which may usefully be recalled :

If the law were otherwise it would be worth no one's while to go to the trouble and expense of proving title in a regular suit, for the effect of a decree might be to a great extent nullified by parties contriving to get into some kind of possession (which they could easily do in forest lands like those now in question) and then demanding to be retained in possession till a second suit was brought and decided : Per Glover, J., in Raniganj Coal Ass. v. Hemhall (4).

Now I cannot find that this point, that he had no jurisdiction, was taken before the Magistrate. It appears to me that the applicant contended that he was entitled to an order declaring his possession under sub-S (4) and although I appreciate that the Magistrate took action on a police report and not on the applicant's complaint, I think the applicant has waited and taken the chance of a judgment in his favour. In these circumstances I should have great difficulty in giving effect to his contention at this stage : Kulada Kinkar Roy v. Danesh Mir (13), Basanta Kumari v. Mohesh Chandra (14).

Secondly, the principle appealed to is not applicable to the facts of this case. It is not true that the applicant has obtained any decision from a civil Court establishing as against Afajaddin his right to possession of these plots. The whole question of the latter's right has been kept open. It has not been held that the mortgage decree can be executed against him or that he can be ejected on the strength of the sale held thereunder. The first party has been claiming to be entitled to, and to have obtained, exclusive possession. It has not been determined what the share of Mantajuddin is. How in these circumstances it can be contended that the case is outside the jurisdiction given to the Magistrate by S. 145 is not intelligible to me.

However, as the Magistrate has found in favour of Mantajaddin also, I will deal in the third place, with the question whether the jurisdiction given by the section is limited in the manner contended for by the applicant. This raises the second of the three questions stated for our decision by the Division Bench. Does the word "dispute" in sub-S (1) of S. 145 refer only to a "bona fide" dispute, or to a dispute which has not already been decided inter partes by a competent Court? If so does the Magistrate's jurisdiction depend upon a finding of fact that both parties to the dispute have an honest belief in the validity of their claim to be entitled to possession or has the Magistrate to examine the respective claims as to the right to possession to see whether on both sides there is some reason in the claim. In Gobinda Chunder Moitra's case (9), at 841, Field, J., said :

I take it that the term dispute . . . means a reasonable dispute, a bona fide dispute, a dispute between parties who have each some semblance of right or supposed right.

What exactly is this test?

Again, where there has been a decree inter partes determining the question of right but no delivery of possession in execution thereunder, is the jurisdiction under S. 145 ousted? In point of logic it would seem that a decree deciding the right would be enough, and the language of the judgments in Rai Mohun Roy's case (6) and the Raniganj Coal case (4) is to this effect. Though in the former case there had been delivery of possession, in the latter case no such fact appears from the report. On the other hand the principle involved cannot be said on the authorities to be applicable in the absence of delivery of possession or its equivalent.

Again, in holding the principle to be applicable reliance has in several cases been placed on the fact that the decree or delivery of possession thereunder has been recent or "within a time not remote" (per Prinsep, J. in Doulat Koor's case (10) or within a very short time, that is within three months: Kunja Behari's case (11).

The question arises whether it is for the Magistrate to enquire whether the claim of one of the parties is based on a reasonable case consistent with the decree, e. g., on subsequent transactions between the parties and whether in the absence of such a case any decree however old will oust his jurisdiction.

Other questions arise: as regards decrees which on a complicated narrative and argument are said to be wholly without jurisdiction and a nullity whether because minors were not duly represented or for other reasons; as regards decrees to set aside which proceedings have been taken or are threatened, as regards decrees which are statute-barred for execution purposes. If in any such case the person who recently, or whose predecessor in-title years ago, failed before the civil Court claims to be in actual possession or is found to be in actual possession is the Magistrate's jurisdiction under S. 145 ousted altogether or dependent upon his being satisfied by an examination of the claim to title that it is consistent with the civil Court's decree? In Abhoj Mondal's case (3) A had obtained symbolical possession in a suit against B before a Court which on the Magistrate's view had no jurisdiction. The Magistrate acting on a prior entry in the Record-of-Rights held B to be in possession. The High Court held that it was not for the Magistrate to question the validity of a decree that had not been set aside by a competent Court. His order was set aside as being grossly irregular, but it was not said to be without jurisdiction.

The difficulties to which I have referred arise from the doctrine that because a decree has at some time been passed inter partes and possession has at some time been delivered thereunder there is no dispute or no bona fide dispute or no such dispute as is contemplated by S. 145. In my opinion the doctrine itself and much of the reason upon which it has been rested are erroneous and I much regret in the interests of the public peace and of the Magistrate whose duty is to preserve the peace that these questions have not long ago been brought before a Full Bench in order that the jungle of decisions might be reduced to order. In Syed Ambar Ali v. Teran Ali (1) may be found lists of contradictory decisions and that the contentions advanced before us by the applicant have failed after over fifty years to establish themselves in our case law may be shown by a reference to that case and to such cases as Kuloda Kinkar Roy v. Danesh Mir (13) and Shahabaj Mandal v. Bhajahari Nath (15). In my judgment they have failed so to do: (1) because they are wholly without warrant in the statute and represent an unworkable and unreasonable attempt to thrust into the section qualifications and conditions which are rejected by its letter no less than by its general intention; (2) because these qualifications and conditions have their sources in misapprehension of certain principles of law.

In exhibiting the law as I find it in the Code I will take note first of the fact that S. 145 is not the only weapon with which a Magistrate is entrusted for the maintenance of the peace in connexion with dispute over land. He has a power specially adopted to cases of urgency under S. 144 and he has a power under S. 107 which in some cases will suffice. It is clear enough that whatever force be given to the word "shall" in sub-S. 1, S. 145, it need in no way embarrass any Magistrate in exercising his discretion. If he is of opinion that an order under S. 107 will meet the case and proposes to make one he has only to make it to justify himself in holding that the dispute no longer is likely to cause a breach of the peace; he can do this either without taking action under S. 145 or at any stage of proceedings under that section. If he thinks that the case calls for action under S. 144 he can take such action and if he thinks this sufficient to prevent the likelihood of a breach of the peace he can postpone all action under S. 145. Whether in the midst of S. 145 proceedings he can on making an order under S. 144 drop such proceedings is a particular question on which I say nothing. In exercising his discretion the Magistrate will regard as supreme the necessity of maintaining the public peace. The attempt to classify cases as appropriate to one section or another can be carried only a little way and it is not to be wondered at if the decided cases contain little general advice of practical utility. The discretion is to be exercised on the particular facts of each case considered as a whole and by an officer with knowledge of the local conditions. I am not saying that under the present Code it cannot be controlled or corrected in revision. But I do say first that it is an error to suppose that decree-holders are a class of men so favoured by the law that in any conflict between their convenience and maintenance of the public peace the latter must give way under S. 145, and secondly, that the conditions of jurisdiction are reasonably plain and complete under each section of the statute.

Where the express conditions are satisfied and the Magistrate has acted under S. 145, according to its terms, it is still possible that for special reasons the result of his action may give just cause of complaint. Thus in Aran Sardar v. Hara Sundar (16) the Magistrate had made a previous order under S. 145 between the same parties in interest declaring the first party to be in possession. The second party's successor-in-interest disobeyed this order and secured a footing on the land. Instead of taking steps to enforce his previous order the Magistrate drew up a new proceeding under S. 145 and made an interim attachment of the land. The High Court held this to be an abuse of his powers.

Where orders are made under more than one section the Magistrate must be careful that his action as a whole does not operate to defeat the rights of the party in possession. It would be obviously wrong to use S. 144 to forbid a party in possession to exercise any rights of possession and then later on to hold under S. 145 that no one is in possession (16) A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 95.

and attach the land: cf. Joyanti v. Middleton (17). Nor could a Magistrate properly so use his power as to defeat revisional jurisdiction, e. g., by commencing a fresh proceeding under S. 145 pending the decision of a rule granted by the High Court to set aside a previous order of the same character: cf. Pran Ballav Mitter v. Rash Behari Mitter (18). Nor can the section be applied to disputes between parties who are in joint possession as a matter of fact as distinct from actual exclusive possession of separate plots, Basanta v. Mohesh (14). These illustrations will serve to show that it is not always enough for a Magistrate to be within the letter of the section. He must be within the true construction of it and even then he must not abuse his power. The contentions of the applicant before us, however, are not justified by these considerations.

I dissent altogether from the doctrine that the words "dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace" refer only to bona fide disputes or only to reasonable disputes. The first sub-section is concerned with the maintenance of the public peace and with the reality of disputes, the danger of disputes. It matters little to a broken head whether it be broken in good faith or in bad and the Magistrate can have no preference. When he finds from a police report that he must take action, he can hardly be in a position to enter into such question. The section requires him to call for written statements and to enquire only as to the fact of actual possession. The nature of the claim to title may affect the question of fact as to possession, but he is expressly debarred from enquiring into the merits of the claims. It has been contended before us that he may and must enquire into the bona fides and the reasonableness of claims under sub-S. 5, but it is clear to me that this provision is made with no such object. I do not know that it is generally true in India or elsewhere that unreasonable or mala fide disputes are less dangerous than others or more readily accommodated. A Court of law might as well commit itself to the proposition that family disputes are always the mildest. The section is based upon the notion that whether a man has the best or the worst claim in the world he must not take the law into his own hand and so disturb the public peace.

Nor, on the other hand, is it clear to me that disputants with mala fide or unreasonable claims are specially amenable to orders for security under S. 107. The Magistrate's discretion in such matters must be determined by the facts as a whole. In particular everything depends upon the question which party is now in actual possession? To say that where the claim of one party is mala fide or is unreasonable the Magistrate cannot act under S. 145 and should act under S. 107 is both bad advice and bad law. If the party who seems to have no case on title is out of possession there can be no reason why the other party's possession should not be declared. But if he is really and actually in possession what then? Let us suppose that the case cannot be brought under Pro., sub-S 4, S. 145 or under S. 522. Is a Magistrate whose power to restore possession so strictly limited to say to one party that he may take possession at his own hand and to the other party that if he does not withdraw or let himself be evicted peaceably he will have committed an offence (what offence?) and forfeited his security. I cannot think it at all clear that the words in S. 107 "or to do any wrongful act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace" can reasonably or legally be pushed so far; and, if want of bona fides in one party is to justify an indirect order for recovery of possession. I fear that Magistrates will be busy and that the public peace will suffer even more than civil justice from this magisterial form of title suit. While a Magistrate acting under S. 145 is under no duty to enquire into the question of right there may be some rare cases in which both parties being out of possession the right of one party is so very clear as to make it more just and reasonable that he should act against the other under S. 107 than that he should attach the property so as to compel the former party to bring a suit. But there is great danger in inviting Magistrates to act upon their view as to the right of parties, and jurisdiction under S. 145 or S. 146 cannot possibly be affected by any consideration of this character. Even in clear cases of this character the maintenance of the peace may make it wiser to attach under S. 146 than to order security under S. 107.

It is not a proposition of law, but I think it is a sound opinion, that when the Magistrate cannot after due enquiry decide as to which party is in possession, he will almost always act wisely in attaching the property under S. 146, and unwisely in attempting to deal with the matter under S. 107. As to S. 144 it is sufficient to point out that it is intended for cases requiring an "immediate prevention or speedy remedy": S. 145 is an ordinary measure of precaution when breach of the peace is "likely." How little substance there is in this part of the appellant's contention may be seen from the definition of "criminal trespass" in S. 441, I. P. C. This shows the importance which the substantive criminal law attaches to possession. For the rightful owner to enter upon land in the possession of a mala fide claimant with intent to intimidate or annoy him would be an act of criminal trespass. Finally, upon this part of the argument I would observe that the supposed need for bona fides and reasonableness has no special reference to the rights of decree-holders.

But the main ground upon which the appellant's contention rests and has not seldom been put, is a notion that it is the duty of the Magistrate "to maintain the civil Court's decree." There are senses in which a true meaning may be given to such a phrase, but for the present purpose and in the sense required by the argument it is the statement not of a principle but of an error.

In civil suits there is a limited class of cases in which the plaintiff is allowed to ask for no relief beyond a declaration of his rights. It is common in this province for a plaintiff who claims to be in possession to ask for "confirmation of possession," an ambiguous phrase which may cover several forms of relief which might be more accurately described. Again, it is a common—much too common—practice to ask for ancillary declarations in addition to the ordinary relief. Now where a plaintiff stands in need of relief other than a declaration it is for him to ask for it and to see that he gets it by execution of the Court's decree. Suits for ejectment are important examples of this principle. It is only in the case of decrees for joint possession or for delivery of immovable property in the occupancy of a tenant or other person entitled to occupy the same and not bound by the decree to relinquish such occupancy that the Civil Procedure Code knows anything of "symbolical possession." That is to be given by affixing a copy of the warrant and proclaiming the substance of the decree.

In other cases the Code directs that possession of immovable property is to be delivered to the party or to such person as he may appoint and if necessary by removing any person bound by the decree who refuses to vacate the property. It may or may not be useful to signalize the event, e g., by planting a bamboo; but it is the business of the Court's officer to give actual possession to the party under O. 21, R. 35 (1) and to the purchaser under R. 95. Rule 97 et seq of the same order make provision enabling any resistance to be overcome. The judgment-debtor or his creatures may be sent to jail; bona fide claimants are protected. A decree-holder or purchaser who is entitled to possession can get it and if the Court's officer does not give it the Court will make him give it if applied to at the time. Once he is put into possession and the officer has effected the delivery the decree-holder has had his remedy. For purposes of further litigation he has incidental advantages in that partly or wholly he has cleared his title in a way readily proved and is entitled to the benefit of the doctrine of res judicata. But otherwise he is in no different position from that of a person who has come by the possession of land by inheritance from his grandfather or by purchase at a private sale. There are cases in which an injunction to restrain trespassers may be obtained but a previous decree is no necessary condition. The decree-holder, like any one else must maintain his own possession once he has obtained it. The law gives him the same assistance in this behalf as it gives to others and on the same terms in all material respects. It leaves to him the same liberty to part with his possession. Indeed he may be a decree-holder as against A and a trespasser as against B.

Now for the present purpose the duty of the Magistrate is to obtain possession; not to "maintain the decree." The terms upon which the Magistrate is to maintain any man's possession are laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code and in the Penal Code which have no separate law for decree-holders as a class. Against forcible and wrongful entry within two months of the proceedings the Magistrate can maintain possession under S. 145 by restoring it even after it has been lost: he can act after a conviction for criminal trespass under S. 522 in cases of a certain character and without any limit as to the date of the trespass. Whether he can restore possession indirectly under any other of his powers may be a question. But the substance of the matter is clear enough. It is the civil Court's duty to give possession on the ground of right: it is the Magistrate's duty to maintain possession against force or show of force. To say that when a Magistrate twelve months after a civil Court peon has delivered possession, finds that the judgment-debtor is back in possession of the land, he is interrupting or interfering with the execution proceedings of the civil Court, if he acts under S. 145, is a violent abuse of language. On the other hand it is true that if on a given date the plaintiff has been put into possession by the civil Court, however inefficiently or irregularly, then on that date the plaintiff got possession as against the defendant. The defendant's actual possession has been broken as a matter of fact even if only for the moment. This is as true of symbolical possession improperly so called as of any other possession though what happened at the time of delivery may well be important on the question whether the plaintiff continued in possession very long or was ousted in the following week. Still it is an error to hold in such cases that the decree-holder was never in possession [cf Atul Hazra's case (2)] or to ignore the delivery to him. This is a particularly grievous error in cases of boundary disputes or disputes as to outlying portions of the land delivered. Cases in which it has been said that the Magistrate has interfered with or nullified the civil Court's decree will on examination be found to be cases where the Magistrate has come to a wrong finding on the fact of possession by reason of this error: e. g., Shama Sundery's case (5), Rai Mohun Roy's case (6), Chutraput Singh's case (7), Bhola Nath Ghose's (8).

When large tracts of forest land or churs or inaccessible areas are recovered in ejectment it may well be true that the owner may find it difficult to look after his property or even to come to the Magistrate while dispossession is recent. This, however, does not show that it will be almost idle to appeal to a civil Court if S. 145 be applied to the actual facts of a case when breach of the peace is likely, in spite of the civil Court's decree. Still less does it justify a Magistrate in allowing breaches of the peace to take place when he can obviate them. It shows that certain kinds of property are somewhat inconvenient possessions.

The same considerations seem to me to afford an answer to the contention that once the civil Court has pronounced upon the right of one party as against another there is no place for an order under S. 145 which proceeds upon mere possession. If the party is out of possession and is attempting to retake possession at his own hand forcibly so as to disturb the public peace, I am at a loss to know why the Magistrate should not require him to assert his right in the proper way. A civil Court by its decree can give possession. It does not attempt in the same suit to keep the plaintiff in perfect peace because this is impracticable; new causes of action require a fresh consideration of the facts. The Magistrate is not there to give a form of execution that the civil Courts cannot give. His duty in substance is to maintain possession because the forcible disturbance of possession is contrary to the criminal law. This is clear enough from the words "until evicted therefrom in due course of law" which contrast with the words used in S. 146. Where possession cannot be shown in spite of a previous decree, and cannot be taken without a breach of the peace, the Magistrate is to take the land into his own possession by attachment and to hand it over not to the person whom he thinks to be entitled but to the person whom the civil Court decides to be entitled. A breach of the peace requires the Magistrate to act: necessarily it makes place for an order which proceeds on "mere possession" because it makes place for a Magistrate who is not the judge of titles or the bailiff of a civil Court.

On this question of jurisdiction to act under S. 145 I have discussed the principles involved in view of dicta in the decided cases. I do not propose to discuss all the cases, but there are a few old cases which have done much to introduce false doctrine on this subject. Shama Sundery's case (5) may possibly have been one in which the Magistrate's order literally and not as a matter of hyperbole interfered with the execution of a civil Court's decree. The dates are not given nor is it quite clear what case was then pending in the miscellaneous department. But it is no authority on the question of jurisdiction to act under S. 145 if only for the reason that the Judges suggest that the Magistrate might have made an order under S. 319 of the Code of 1861 i. e., under the present S. 146. The same may be said of Ram Mohun Roy's case (6), where it is said that the decree should have been maintained under S. 319.

In this case the delivery of possession would seem to have been given several years before the Magistrate's order but it was said that the Magistrate was not competent under S. 318 to "interfere with the execution." Both these were cases of disputed possession and the ruling seems to be: (1) that the Magistrate should have decided that neither party was in possession or that he could not satisfy himself as to which was in possession, (2) that then the previous decree of the civil Court would have under S. 319 enabled him to give possession to the decree-holder. This latter proposition seems to be highly questionable. These views do not seem to have been adopted in later cases but dicta in the judgments are often quoted. In the Raneegunj Coal case (4), which was an undefended case, Glover, J. arrives for the first time at the full doctrine that once a civil decree is passed Magistrate's duty is to "maintain the decree," that he cannot institute proceedings under the present S. 145 and that he must cope with any breach of the peace by taking security. Chatraput Singh's case (7) is no authority on the question of jurisdiction to act under S. 145 because the order made by the High Court was to declare him entitled to retain possession until ousted in due course of law. Possession of a hat had been given by the Nazir in March or April 1879. The Magistrate's final order was on 10th July of the same year, so the dispute followed close upon the delivery of possession. It appeared that the Nazir gave possession by a proclamation at the hat and by planting a bamboo elsewhere. The decree-holder maintained his possession by trying to collect his dues but the old proprietor also collected dues, and with more success. The Magistrate ignored the delivery of possession and went solely upon actual receipt of dues. The case was one in which the Magistrate came to a wrong finding as to the fact of possession. It was said that the Magistrate was not competent to nullify the action of a civil Court. Bhola Nath Ghose's case (8) was exactly similar; it was a case of a wrong finding of fact that a person evicted from possession was still in possession on the ground that the landlord decree-holder had done no acts of cultivation. Here too the case arose immediately after the eviction and by his wrong notions as to possession the Magistrate had nullified the civil Court's decree by failing to recognize and maintain existing possession thereunder.

There is nothing in this case that can be questioned save for the approval of dicta in Rai Mohan Roy's case (6) and in the Raneegunj Coal case (4). In Gobind Chunder's case (9) the same Magistrate had found under the Land Registration Act, that A was in possession and under S. 530, Criminal P. C., 1872 that B was in possession and not A. This latter proceeding was instituted while the former proceedings were still pending before the Commissioner. The case was a wretched instance of mishandling, and it appeared that there were no reasons for supposing that either A or B would commit a breach of the peace. There is nothing in the judgment of Pontifex, J., which can well be questioned, but Field, J., refers to the dicta in Rai Mohan's case (6) and elaborates them. The dispute must be bona fide and reasonable, the dispute is at an end, the Magistrate must maintain the rights of the successful party, he must not neutralize the effect of the decree, he has no power to institute proceedings under S. 530 (149) but must take security under S. 491 (107). In Doulat Koer v. Rameswari (10) A was given possession on 29th August under order made inter partes by the Civil Court and on 1st November initiated proceedings under S 145. The Magistrate declared that Dulin Saheba was in possession, on the strength of some rent receipts from raiyats. It was held that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction under S 145. It is said by one Judge that he should have contented himself with declaring that the orders of the civil Court should be maintained: by the other Judge that he should have directed Dulin Saheba to assert her rights as she might be advised. Under the Code as it then stood the Court held that it could only interfere on a point of jurisdiction, and from the judgment of Prinsep, J., it would appear that the jurisdiction was ousted by reason that the decree was "within a time not remote." The same circumstance is stressed in Kunja Behari's case (11) where the decree was still under appeal and the Magistrate is said to have "ignored" the decree. These cases show an inclination to resile from the broad dicta of previous cases as to the effect of a decree. They also show an increasing haziness as to whether it is the final order of the Magistrate which is ultra vires if he does not "maintain the decree" or whether the whole proceedings are without jurisdiction in view of the decree.

In S. Gordon Sims v. Johurilal (19 and 20) both parties produced civil Court decrees and the Magistrate held that one party had decrees which applied to the land in question and made an order in his favour under S. 145. This was affirmed by the High Court as being in accordance with the case of Doulat Koer (10). The decree in question was not inter partes. The Court stated:

We are aware of no ruling which prescribes that the Magistrate is to maintain a party in possession in accordance with the decree of the civil Court only when the opposite party is a party to that proceeding.

Another case in which appeal was made to the principle that the Magistrate must maintain the possession given by the Civil Court though the parties are not the same is Kulada Kinkar Roy v. Danesh Mir (13). In that case the language used in the cases of Gobind Chunder (9), Doulat Koer (10), and Gordon Sims v. Johury Lal (20) was shown to be too broad and it was laid down that while possession given previously under a decree may be presumptive evidence it has to be taken along with other circumstances and other evidence as to the fact of possession at a later date.

In Atul Hazra's case (2) the Magistrate found that five or six months after delivery of possession under a decree inter partes the party against whom the civil Court had decided was back in possession. The Court held that the party ought not to be allowed to assert this and seem to have thought that proceedings under S. 145 were improper. The same principle that a party ought not under S. 145 to be allowed to assert that he is in possession even when the fact is so, if his possession is not lawful possession but the possession of a trespasser and a wrongdoer, was affirmed by Graham, J., in Syed Ambar Ali v. Teran Ali (1). In my opinion this line of reasoning must be discarded for all purposes in applying S. 145 for the reason that it is plainly contrary to the express provisions of the section and inconsistent, as I have endeavoured to show, with the principles applicable to the subject. In order to maintain the peace and take effective action the Magistrate has to deal with the facts: estoppels between the disputants are only in place on a question of right as between one party and another. In this jurisdiction the interests of the public are supreme. Suum cuique tribuendo is not the function of the Magistrate: that object must be achieved at a later stage and by more appropriate means.

As regards the second contention of the applicant that if the Magistrate had jurisdiction to act under S. 145 at all he was bound in law to find possession according to the civil Court's decree and therefore to find that fifteen months after the delivery of possession given as against Mantazaddin that the applicant was in possession, the fallacy of this contention is in my opinion sufficiently exposed by what I have already said. If a case is within S. 145 the Magistrate acting under the section must deal with it as the section prescribes. It is clear on the facts of the present case that on 9th May 1927 the applicant was not in possession.

It remains only to deal formally with the three questions stated in the order of Reference. If the word "personal" be deleted—it is a word whose meaning in this connexion is ambiguous—I think that the first question as well as the second should be answered in the affirmative. As regards the third question I am in general agreement with the judgment of Cuming, J., in Syed Ambar Ali v. Portal Ali (1), but I do not think it necessary or advisable to answer this question as framed. The application in revision should be dismissed.

Suhrawardy, J.—As I am a party to some of the decisions referred to in this connexion I should like to say a few words in defence of the position I am advised to take after giving the point raised my anxious and earnest consideration. I have had the advantage of reading the judgments of my Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Mukherji, J., which have lucidly presented both sides of the picture. They have given me a much desired opportunity of looking at the question from all points of view and weighing the arguments for and against. I, however, feel great diffidence in differing from a line of decisions from 1861 downwards pronounced by very high authorities, specially in view of the fact that the legislature has not yet thought fit to intervene to clear up the matter. I do not propose to discuss the cases on the point as they have been so thoroughly examined by the learned Chief Justice and Mukherji, J. But as notes of dissent have now been definitely struck, I should like to approach the question untrammelled by precedents and treat it as a case of first impression. I therefore content myself with recording my opinion on the various points raised.

The term "dispute" in S. 145 (1) has not been defined anywhere in the Code but to my mind it has been clearly and sufficiently explained in the section itself as meaning a dispute which is likely to cause breach of the peace. To add any other explanation to the term will not be, in my opinion construing the Act but legislating. The requisites to attract the jurisdiction of the Magistrate under S. 145, Criminal P. C., are (a) dispute, (b) which is likely to cause a breach of the peace, (c) which concerns land or water etc. To say that the dispute must be bona fide or reasonable is to restrict the jurisdiction of the Magistrate given him by the statute. "Bona fide" is an expression which is extremely elastic and may depend upon the ethical, moral or equitable notion of the speaker. If two persons are fighting over possession of a piece of waste land or a newly formed chur to which both of them know they have no title, can the dispute be called bona fide or reasonable? An ordinary man with normal moral ideas will call it otherwise. I do not see any reason why it should be supposed to be bona fide or reasonable in law and I take it that those who maintain that "dispute" in S. 145 must be bona fide or reasonable will hesitate to oust the jurisdiction of the Magistrate under that section in such a case.

Now it cannot be doubted that a decree of the civil Court must have its due force and it is not desirable that one arm of the law should fight the other. But this is a concern of the legislature and not of Courts, however just and expedient it may seem to avoid such a conflict. It is argued that once the difference between the parties on the question of title to the land has been settled by a civil Court there is no further dispute that remains to be decided under Cl. 6 of S. 145 and therefore the Magistrate cannot regard such a dispute as one within the section. The logical conclusion from this view is that if a person obtains a decree for recovery of possession in the civil Court he need only go to the land with some lathials and create a disturbance there and the Magistrate is bound to put in possession, thus acting as the Court of execution of the civil Court decree. This apparently impossible position was conceded by the learned advocate who appeared in support of the rule. But my learned brother Mukherji, J., does not go so far and maintains that in order to oust the jurisdiction of the Magistrate the decree must have been executed. I do not see, in principle, any difference between an executed and unexecuted decree so far as the meaning of "dispute" is concerned. O. 21, Rs 35, 95 and 98 give sufficient facilities to a decree-holder or auction-purchaser to obtain actual possession. If he cannot retain such possession no one but himself is to blame for it. If the decree-holder is a peaceful citizen and is dispossessed his only course is to bring a fresh suit or if he is within time, to avail himself of S. 9, Specific Relief Act. If he is a turbulent person and by recourse to criminal force threatens breach of the peace, the Magistrate, according to the petitioners' contention, is bound in law to put him in possession. This position seems to me unreasonable : it is setting a premium on lawlessness. Take for example the facts of the present case. The judgment-debtors are allowed to remain in unobstructed and apparently peaceful possession for more than a year. The decree-holder on one day after such a long time takes it into his head to collect men and attempts to make a forcible entry. From the point of view of criminal administration of justice the decree-holder is the party against whom punitive or preventive measures should be taken as the apprehension of the breach of the peace comes from his side. Does it stand to reason that the Magistrate should tell the judgment-debtor :

You must lie low and give up your peaceful possession because the other side is armed with a civil Court decree backed up by hirelings ready to use criminal force ?

In my opinion the word "dispute" is used in its ordinary sense meaning a disagreement, struggle, scramble or quarrel for possession of land, etc., which is likely to cause a breach of the peace, without reference to the respective claims of the disputants.

It is possible that the legislature has not entirely overlooked cases like the present. If the decree-holder or auction-purchaser obtains actual possession through the civil Court or such possession as in the eye of law is equivalent to actual possession and is subsequently dispossessed by the judgment-debtor he can come, to the Magistrate within two months under Cl. (4) and the Magistrate will reinstate him in possession. If he does not do so and sleeps over his right his claim for reinstatement by the criminal Court, so to speak, becomes barred by limitation. For the foregoing reasons I will answer the questions referred to the Full Bench in the way the learned Chief Justice proposes to do.

B. B. Ghose, J.—The facts on which the reference was made are as follows : The first party who is the petitioner in this Court obtained a mortgage decree against the second party and in execution of his decree purchased the property in question. The judgment-debtors, second party, were in possession of the property and the petitioner as auction-purchaser was put into possession under O. 21, R. 95, Civil P. C. on 8th February 1926. The finding is that although the petitioner was entitled to obtain possession by evicting the judgment-debtors that was not done and he obtained what is called "symbolical possession." It cannot, however, be questioned that such "symbolical possession" as against a judgment debtor amounts to actual possession in law and it should be taken as such. In spite of such delivery of possession the judgment-debtors, opposite party, continued in possession of the lands. In May 1927 a dispute arose regarding the possession of the land and proceedings were taken by the Magistrate on 9th May 1927 under S. 145, Criminal P. C. The Magistrate having found that the opposite parties were in actual possession made an order under sub-S. (6) in their favour. The petitioner obtained the rule against that order which has occasioned this reference to the Full Bench. It should, however, be stated that it appears that the execution proceedings against one of the second party, Afazaddin, were ineffectual and so possession cannot be said to have been delivered as against him by the civil Court.

I shall now deal with the arguments advanced on behalf of the petitioner. It is argued that where the civil Court has already decided the question of title and possession between the parties in controversy there is no jurisdiction in the Magistrate to take proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. It is urged that the dispute referred to in sub-S. (1) means bona fide dispute. Reference is made to sub-S. (6) and it is argued that the Magistrate's order under S. 145, is to remain in force only until the decision of the civil Court, but where a civil Court has already decided the right of a party to possession of the property and has actually put him into possession it should be held that the Magistrate has no jurisdiction to take proceedings under this section. It is further argued that to hold otherwise would be to place a person in the position of the petitioner under great difficulty as he may be dispossessed by a lawless and turbulent antagonist who has been worsted in the litigation by a decree passed against him in the civil Court and against whom possession has been delivered, if that person is retained in possession by the Magistrate. The result may be that the rightful owner would be compelled to go again and again to the civil Court and continue the process without ever getting possession of the land.

It is conceded that a construction of the section according to the ordinary meaning of the words used would go against the contention of the petitioner, but it is urged that owing to the obvious inconvenience of construing the section in that manner, the construction contended for should be accepted. Further it is argued that the construction contended for has been accepted in numerous decisions of this Court and those decision should not be departed from.

In order to hold that the plain natural meaning of the words in S. 145, Criminal P. C., should not be accepted it is necessary to consider the object aimed at by orders under its provisions. It has been said by the Privy Council with reference to similar orders in the case of Dinomoni v. Brojomohini (21) :

These orders are merely police orders made to prevent breaches of the peace. They decide no question of title ; but under S. 145, Criminal P. C., 1882 (relating to disputes as to immovable property) the Magistrate is, if possible to decide which of the parties is in possession of the land in dispute ; and if he decides that one of the disputants is in possession, the Magistrate is to make an order declaring such party to be entitled to retain possession until evicted in due course of law, and forbidding all disturbance of such possession until such eviction. The Criminal Procedure Acts in force in 1866 and 1876 were to the same effect.

If the Magistrate is required to decide whether a dispute is bona fide or not it would be to require him to go into the question of the merits or the claims of a party to a right to possess the subject of dispute, which he is forbidden to do by sub-S. (4). For unless he goes into the question of the rights of the parties, how is he to decide whether the dispute is bona fide? Bona fides does not merely depend upon the fact that one party has obtained a decree in a civil Court. A person may have as clear a right by reason of succession as on the basis of a decree. But it is not contended that the Magistrate should consider any such right. The argument therefore that the word "dispute" should be read as "bona fide dispute" cannot in my judgment be accepted. Nor does the argument that the Magistrate has no jurisdiction to take action under this section where actual possession had been delivered to one of the parties by the civil Court appear to be sound. Where there is a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace as contemplated under sub-S. (1) what is the Magistrate to do? He cannot sit idle and allow the contending parties to settle their dispute by a free fight. It is argued that he should proceed under S. 107. No doubt he can do so as provided in sub-S. (10), S. 145, and I think the Magistrate would take action under that section if he finds that the possession given by the civil Court is being sought to be disturbed by the unsuccessful litigant in the civil Court. But can it be said that when such a person is found to be in peaceful possession at the time of the order under S. 135 (1), notwithstanding that the other party was put into possession by the civil Court, that the person in peaceful possession should be proceeded against under S. 107 because his possession is without right? He is not going to commit a breach of the peace, but it is the other person who desires to take the law into his own hands.

It is, however, argued that he is doing a wrongful act, a continuing tortious act, by remaining in wrongful possession and so brings himself within the provisions of S. 107. I do not think that that section refers to any such act as retaining wrongful possession, as it refers to a person "likely to do any wrongful act." But even assuming that such person is ordered to execute a bond to keep the peace the rightful owner cannot be put into possession unless he himself intends to get it by force. It has not been argued that the person in possession being bound down the other would be entitled to remove him from possession by force. But the argument leads to that result. To hold that the Magistrate may by an order under S. 107 enable the rightful owner to take possession without recourse to the Court, would be to delegate the function of the civil Court to the Magistrate. Nor do I think that the Magistrate can take action in such a case as this under S. 144, as was suggested, and remove the person in possession. I do not also think that it would be right to hold that the word "dispute" in S. 145 means a dispute not decided by the civil Court. In my opinion, when two parties are quarrelling over possession, which is likely to endanger public peace there is a dispute under the section. The plain meaning of the words in the section should be adopted and there is no reason why there should be a strained and fictitious meaning given to the words where the maintenance of peace is concerned.

Then with regard to the question of expediency I think that the Magistrate has ample powers to maintain the person put into possession by the civil Court in such possession if he takes prompt action. It seems to me that the distinction between an act of trespass and wrongful possession of a trespasser has not always been borne in mind. In the latter case if the person who was put into possession by the civil Court allows the judgment-debtor to remain in possession for more than 12 years he loses his right to the property altogether. He has 12 years to bring his suit for recovery of possession in the civil Court: see Hari Mohan v. Baburahi (22), Bhulu Beg v. Jatindra (23). It is conceded that after the lapse of 12 years from the delivery of possession the Magistrate may take action under this section as the right of the petitioner would then be lost. But it is argued that the Magistrate has no jurisdiction to take action under S. 145 if the dispute arises within 12 years of the delivery of possession. This brings us back again to the question of the Magistrate's exercising the functions of a civil Court. The simple way would have been to extend the period under Prov. 1, sub-S. (4) to 12 years if that was the intention of the legislature. This argument also does not seem to me logical, as the exercise of the power of the Magistrate is said to depend on the fact whether the petitioner has a subsisting right.

No doubt where the question of possession is doubtful on the evidence or where the land is not effectually in the possession of either party or the possession is by collection of rents and in cases of like nature the Magistrate would be well advised to find possession with the person who was put into possession by the civil Court as against the judgment-debtor. The Magistrate also may not take any action under S. 145 if the person who has been put into possession is sought to be proceeded against by the defeated party who seeks to raise a dispute for disturbing the possession of the former and in that case take action under S. 107. Nor should the Magistrate take action if it appears that the provisions of S. 145 are sought to be abused. The argument that it is the duty of the Magistrate to maintain the possession awarded by the civil Court presupposes that such person is in possession at the time in question. But where the judgment-debtor is found to be actually in possession, notwithstanding the possession delivered by the civil Court some time previously and the decree-holder or auction purchaser did not take appropriate steps in proper time against the judgment-debtor when his possession was disturbed but allowed the judgment-debtor to retain possession and later on seeks to take possession without recourse to law, which act is likely to cause a breach of the peace, he cannot complain if the Magistrate makes an order in favour of the judgment-debtor who is found to be in possession. In my opinion the Magistrate has jurisdiction to take action under S. 145 when the dispute is likely to cause breach of the peace in such a case.

I do not propose to discuss the cases cited during the course of the argument in detail. It seems to me if the cases are analyzed it would appear that the decisions were based upon the special facts of each case although the observations in some of the decisions taken unconnected with the facts support the contention of the petitioner about the Magistrate's power. In the case of Rai Mohan v Wise (6) the civil Court gave possession to the first party after settling a disputed boundary. The Magistrate fixed another boundary line. The decision was that the Magistrate should maintain the possession of the first party. It should be noticed that the Magistrate was unable to determine which party was in actual possession. In Ranigunge Coal Association v. Hem Lall (4) the land was forest land and the possession given by the civil Court was sought to be nullified by the defeated party by taking some sort of possession which was no real possession. The case of In re Bholanath Ghose v. Mothoor Mandal (8), is instructive and the circumstances of that case are now provided for under the proviso to sub-S. (4) of S. 145. There the landlord was put into actual possession in execution of a decree against the tenant. The tenant attempted to take forcible possession of the land. The landlord complained; the Magistrate did nothing. The tenant then obtained possession forcibly. The Magistrate acting under the old S. 530, Criminal P. C., awarded possession to the tenant. This order was set aside. In the view I take I do not think it necessary to examine the other cases. It seems to me that where the finding of the Magistrate did not appear to be justified on the facts the learned Judges interfering with the decision made use of expressions regarding the jurisdiction of the Magistrate which cannot be accepted as of general application having regard to the provisions of the section.

To conclude: when a civil Court has delivered possession to a person the Magistrate should maintain that possession as against a party to the suit if the unsuccessful party seeks to disturb such possession, as in fact the possession of every person should be protected against disturbance. If the unsuccessful party takes forcible possession the Magistrate has the power to put the rightful owner into possession under Prov. 1, sub-S (4), S. 145. If, however, the successful party in the civil Court allows the unsuccessful party to get into and retain possession for a sufficiently long period of time, precluding the application of the above proviso, it cannot be said that the Magistrate has no power to take proceedings under S. 145. In such a case he may make a declaration in favour of the unsuccessful party in the civil suit if he clearly finds possession in his favour.

As to the merits of this case there is not much to be said. One of the second party does not seem to be affected by the delivery of possession by the civil Court as the execution proceedings against him were ineffectual. No argument can therefore be put forward against the order retaining him in possession. Again, the case made by the petitioner before the lower Court was that he was actually in possession of all the lands except the homestead, which has been found to be untrue. Having fought out his case on the basis that he was in possession and lost, he cannot be allowed to come up here in revision and urge that the Magistrate ought not to have taken action under S. 145. I agree with my Lord the Chief Justice in the answers proposed by him to the questions referred to. I also agree that the rules should be discharged.

Mukherji, J.—In this reference we have, in the first place, to answer the questions that have been formulated for the decision of the Full Bench and, nextly, to decide the case itself.

At the outset I must observe that I find it somewhat difficult to answer the questions in the form in which they have been put, because they are not capable of one set of answers only, but the answers to them would depend upon the precise circumstance of each particular case. This difficulty necessitates a consideration, in the first instance, of the points which are involved in a case of the kind contemplated by the reference, before an attempt is made to deal with the questions themselves. The reference proceeds upon a set of facts as found. Whether they are really the facts of the particular case before us need not, at the present moment be considered; it will be convenient to treat those facts as constituting a hypothetical case. In the words of the order of reference the facts are as follows:

The first party are auction-purchasers and the second party are judgment-debtors. It would seem to be the first party's case and this seems to be one of the facts found that possession was delivered to the first party by the civil Court. As far as can be seen this possession was delivered by the planting of a bamboo. But it is also found as a fact that in spite of the delivery of possession the judgment-debtors were never dispossessed but remained on in possession. The Magistrate found that actual possession was with the judgment-debtors.

This statement of facts requires to be supplemented by stating a few more facts about which there is no controversy: The subject-matter of the case is a homestead and several plots of arable land. Possession was delivered under O. 21, R. 95, Civil P. C., which is the only provision that can apply to a case in which the property is in the occupancy of the judgment-debtor or of some person on his behalf or of some person claiming under a title created by the judgment-debtor subsequent to the attachment of such property, and the property not having been in the occupation of a tenant or other person entitled to occupy the same in which case O. 21, R. 96, Civil P. C., would have applied. As already stated, possession was delivered by the planting of a bamboo but the judgment-debtors who were in occupation of the homestead were not removed. As regards the plots of arable land, this procedure amounted in law and in fact to delivery of khas or actual possession; while as regards the homestead, since the judgment-debtors were not bodily removed, though in law the auction-purchasers got khas or actual possession as opposed to symbolical possession contemplated by O. 21, R. 96, Civil P. C., in point of fact the judgment-debtors continue in occupation. Delivery of possession took place on 8th February 1926. The proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., that have given rise to the rule were drawn up on 9th May 1927. The referring order states that in spite of this delivery of possession the judgment-debtors continue in possession, and that thereupon proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., were instituted between the auction-purchasers as the first party and the judgment-debtors as the second party and that the Magistrate declared the latter as entitled to possession as provided for in Cl. (6) of that section.

On the facts recited above upon the arguments that have been addressed to us two questions arise for consideration: 1st, Had the Magistrate jurisdiction to institute the proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., or, in other words, to take action under Cl. (1) of that section? and 2nd, Had he jurisdiction to make the order that he did under Cl. (6) thereof; I use the word "jurisdiction" in formulating these questions, as the word has been used in the course of the arguments and also because it finds place in some of the decisions to which our attention has been called. In using this word I wish it to be understood in the sense of "the authority by which judicial officers take cognizance of and decide cases" and to restrict its meaning further with reference to the nature of the subject-matter over which authority is to be exercised as distinguished from the territorial or pecuniary limits of that authority. As pointed out in the Full Bench decision of this Court in the case of Hriday Nath Roy v. Ram Chandra Barna Sarma (24), an examination of the cases in the books discloses numerous attempts to define the term "jurisdiction" and that although there is a clear distinction between jurisdiction and the exercise of it, the extent to which the conditions essential for creating and raising the jurisdiction of a Court or the restraint attaching to the mode of exercise of that jurisdiction that should be included

If there is authority to entertain and decide the cause, jurisdiction would not depend either upon the regularity of the exercise of the authority or upon the correctness of the decision pronounced, for to quote the celebrated dictum of Lord Hobhouse in Malkarjun v. Narahari (25), "a Court has jurisdiction to decide wrongly as well as rightly." It is from the point of view of this restricted, and I may also say true, significance of the word that I propose to consider the two questions aforesaid. Looked at from this point of view the matter is purely one of construction.

Legislation regarding disputes concerning land likely to cause a breach of the peace and for the adjustment of those disputes and by such adjustment preventing them from culminating in a breach of the peace began with Reg. 49 of 1793 and continued practically on the same lines down to the current Act, viz., Act 5 of 1898. The tribunal by which the adjustment was to be made was changed by Reg. 15 of 1824, but the method as laid down by Reg. 49 of 1793 has continued without a break in all subsequent legislations: see Reg. 14 of 1793, Reg. 32 of 1803, Reg. 6 of 1813, Reg. 15 of 1824, Reg. 2 of 1829, Act 4 of 1840, Act 25 of 1861, and the more recent enactments of the Code of Criminal Procedure. That method was to bring before the Court the disputing parties, to ascertain, if possible, which of them was in actual possession irrespective of any consideration as to which of them was entitled to possession, and to say to all the other disputants that the person found in actual possession was to be left in such possession and that such possession was not to be disturbed until that person was evicted in due course of law. The prescribed method was to be resorted to, if the dispute related to land and was of such a character that there was a likelihood of a breach of the peace resulting therefrom. The object to be attained was the prevention of the dispute from culminating in a breach of the peace. The object and the method have remained the same all through. Apart from any cases and upon the plain words of the statute the conclusion that I come to, I can express in no better words than in those of Hill, J., in the Full Bench case of Krishna Kamini v. Abdul Jabbar (26), whose judgment was concurred in by Prinsep, Ag. C. J., and Brett and Henderson, J.J., and, so far as this matter was concerned, was not dissented from by Banerjee, J., who differed in that case on other points from the rest of his colleagues. He said:

Then as to the question of jurisdiction: On being satisfied of the existence of a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace concerning land, etc., within his local jurisdiction, the duty, which is imperative, is cast upon the Magistrate of taking action under S. 145. The two essentials are that there should be a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace, and that the dispute concerns land, etc. The section does not primarily contemplate cases in which there have already been acts of violence. All the disputants may be persons of peaceable disposition, but if the dispute is in its nature of such a kind that it is likely, having regard to the known conditions of society, to lead to a breach of the peace, that is enough to warrant the Magistrate's intervention and to give him jurisdiction over the subject of dispute. Upon the existence of these conditions and these conditions only, is the jurisdiction of the Magistrate in my opinion dependent. The object, I think, is to take the subject of dispute out of the hands of the disputants, and to constitute one of them, whose possession the law will protect, its custodian until the other has established his right (if any) to possession in a civil Court; or, to be more correct, until the other has been evicted therefrom in due course of law if the order is one under S. 145, Cl. (6), or until a competent Court has determined the rights of the parties thereto or the persons entitled to possession thereof, if the order is under S. 146. As regards the decision: for it to be in excess of the Magistrate's jurisdiction, it must be in violation of some express direction of the law, e.g., where the law says that the decision shall be one way or that it shall not be that way and he has decided otherwise. These are the fundamental principles that have to be borne in mind in an attempt to answer the two questions that I have set forth above, read with reference to the case as recited in the reference. That there was an apprehension of a breach of the peace is admitted on all hands. That there is no provision of the law which forbids an order under Cl. (6), S. 145, being made against the auction-purchaser who has been put in possession in execution of a decree is also not challenged. The law only says, except as to a case of dispossession coming under the first proviso to Cl. (4) that if the Magistrate decides that one of the parties was in such (meaning, actual) possession of the subject he shall issue an order, etc.

It is clear, therefore, that to consider the question of jurisdiction, as regards the first question the true meaning of the word "dispute" and as regards the second question that of the expressive words "possession" and "actual possession" will have to be investigated and it will have to be seen whether in the circumstances of the case recited above and in the eye of the law there was a "dispute" between the parties, or the second party were in "actual possession." It will be convenient at this stage to deal with the relevant cases that are to be found in the books.

In the case of Shama Soondery Debya v. Messrs. Jardine Skinner & Co. (5) the petitioner Rani Shama Soondery had been put in possession of a share in certain lands under a decree of a civil Court which had been confirmed by the High Court, the amin having given her 'khas possession of that share. The opposite party, Messrs. Jardine Skinner & Co., who were parties to the suit, raised a dispute alleging that they were in actual and tangible possession of certain lands which had not been actually defined or interfered with by the amin.

They set up a right of occupancy as tenants in those lands. They contended that the word "khas" as used in giving possession was "an error." Their objection to the delivery of possession was pending in appeal. The Magistrate finding that there was an apprehension of a breach of the peace made an order in favour of the opposite party. Seton-Karr and Markby, J.J., said :

"We are clear that the order of the Magistrate is illegal and cannot be permitted to stand We hold that it was not competent to the Magistrate to interfere under S. 318, Criminal P. O., with the execution of a decree of the civil Court, affirmed as it has been by the highest Court of the country, and to say that the word "khas" as used in giving possession must be an error, or to lay it down that the petitioner had no right to come on the lands "except as collector of rent." Moreover, we are informed that the case giving the Rani possession is pending in appeal in the miscellaneous department, and if there had been any doubt as to the exact meaning, intent and object of the decree the matter was one which ought to be adjudicated on in that department and not in the criminal Court. In fact, looking to the possession of the parties and to the state of the dispute the Magistrate, if called in to interfere under Ch. 22, Criminal P. O., because he was apprehensive of a breach of the peace, should have kept the Rani in possession under S. 319, as the party who had been actually placed in possession by a decree of the civil Court. We quash the proceedings of the Magistrate under S. 318 and declare them null and void.

The word "jurisdiction" does not appear in the decision, but the competency—which is more or less the same thing—of the Magistrate to take action under S. 318, was held against and the proceedings instituted and decided under that section were quashed and declared null and void ; but it was also held that if by reason of the apprehension of a breach of the peace the Magistrate was called upon to interfere at all under Ch. 22, he should have kept the Rani in possession under S. 319. The decision was not a clear authority on the question of jurisdiction. The learned Judges further observed that in passing the aforesaid order they were acting in strict accordance with a previous decision of the High Court (Loch & L. S. Jackson, J.J.) dated 27th July 1864, in the case of Kali Soondery Chowdhurani.

In the case of Rai Mohan Roy v. J. P. Wise (6) the facts were as follows: There was in 1848 a proceeding under Act 4 of 1840 which was decided in favour of the predecessors of Wise. The Roys brought a suit to set aside the possessory order passed by the criminal authorities, obtained a decree and got possession through the Court in execution of the decree. There was a dispute on which proceedings under S. 318, Criminal P. O., were started. The Roys contended before the Magistrate that Wise was attempting to take possession of a portion of the land decreed to them by the civil Court and prayed that the Magistrate would be pleased to maintain them in the possession given to them in execution. Wise on the other hand urged that the land in dispute was outside the decree and belonged to his estate and that he had all along been and still was in possession of it. The Magistrate went to the locale and after enquiry decided that the Roys should be maintained in possession of the land on the east of a line drawn by him, and that Wise should remain in possession of the land to the west of that line. Onocool Chunder Mookerjee, J., said :

The Magistrate is not competent to interfere under S. 318 with the execution of a decree of the civil Court. He is bound to maintain the party in possession who has obtained a decree from the highest Court of the country and recovered possession in execution of that decree The point, therefore, for his decision was, in the first instance, whether the decree covers the land which is the subject of the dispute in the present case. If he finds that point in favour of the Roys he should, under S. 319, maintain them in possession, but if he finds that the lands are not the lands decreed in 1865 he should try to find out who is in de facto possession.

H. Jackson, J., observed:

I think that it is the duty of the Magistrate in proceedings taken under S. 318 when it appears that a civil Court decree has been passed regarding the whole or any portion of the disputed land, to maintain that decree. The Magistrate's powers under S. 318 relate to land regarding which there is a dispute which has not been decided by a civil Court, and his order for possession remains in force only until such decree is passed. When such decree has been given the Magistrate has no power again to institute a S. 318 proceedings regarding the land covered by it. The dispute regarding the land has been finally determined and it is then the Magistrate's duty to treat the decree-holder in the civil Court as the owner of that land and give him every protection and enjoyment of it. If after making every enquiry, the Magistrate cannot ascertain where the boundary line is, he must act under S. 319. There would never be an end to litigation if the Magistrate will not keep in force the decision of the civil Court regarding lands.

Reading the judgment of Mookerjee, J., it would appear that all that he meant to lay down was that it was not competent for a criminal Court to upset by proceedings taken under S. 318, Criminal P. C., the result of delivery of possession in execution of a decree passed by a civil Court and that the criminal Court is bound to maintain in possession a party who has obtained such possession in execution of decree. E. Jackson, J., appears to have gone very much further. His judgment, in the first place, indicates that if in such a case proceedings are taken under S. 318, the duty of the Magistrate is to try and find out what the civil Court has done and, if he succeeds in doing so, to maintain the same, and if he is unable to find that out then to act under S. 319. To this extent, the view of E. Jackson, J., was very similar to, if not quite in agreement with, that of Mookerjee, J., quoted above. E. Jackson, J., went a good deal further because his judgment indicates that in such a case, namely, when a dispute has been determined by the civil Court—the criminal Court should regard the dispute at an end. He, however, did not say that for that reason or on that account the Magistrate has no jurisdiction or is not competent to take proceedings under S. 318, while on the other hand, he pointed out how the Magistrate should proceed and what decision he should make and under what circumstances in those proceedings. Nextly, his judgment speaks of the decree of the civil Court as having finally determined the dispute; but it may be that in reality he was thinking of the dispute as to possession having been determined by the delivery of possession in execution, because towards the end of his judgment he said:

That line (namely, the line drawn by the Magistrate) has not been drawn as being the boundary in the civil Court decree and execution proceedings.

In Ranegunj Coal Association Ltd. v. Hem Lal Ghatwal (4), the Ghatwal was unsuccessful in a civil suit which he had instituted against the Coal Company and thereafter obtained an order from and was put in possession by the Magistrate under S. 530 of Act 10, 1872. It was thus said by Glover and Mitter, JJ.:

When a civil Court decree is once passed the right as between the litigants is decided; and there is no more place for a summary order which proceeds not upon title, but on mere possession. It having been once declared by a competent Court that the parties now represented by the Ranigunge Coal Company were the owners of the disputed land no further proceedings could be taken. If the law were otherwise, it would be worth no man's while to go to the trouble and expense of proving title in a regular suit, for the effect of a decree might be to a great extent nullified by parties contriving to get into some kind of possession (which they could easily do in forest lands like these now in question), and then demanding to be retained in possession till the second suit was brought and decided We therefore quash the Assistant Magistrate's order passed under S. 530. Criminal P. C., and direct him to abstain from interference with what he admits to be the Coal Company's property. If he is apprehensive of a breach of the peace between the parties he can proceed in the usual way under Chap. 37 of the Code.

This judgment, it will be observed, says that in the circumstances no further proceedings could be taken under S. 530. It is noteworthy also that the dispute, that there was between the parties, was of a nature that could be determined by the decree itself by which the Ghatwal's suit was dismissed—presumably a suit for possession on declaration of title—and it was not necessary for any execution proceedings to settle the dispute any further.

In Nobin Chandra Koondoo v. Jogandra Nath Bhattacharjya (27) the auction-purchaser had taken possession in execution of a decree against a third party. Glover and Mitter, JJ., said thus:

If it had appeared that in a final decree binding between the parties before him the question of title had been conclusively determined he would have been justified in refusing to proceed under S. 530. The proceeding, namely, of the peon in execution against a third party does not take away the power of the Deputy Magistrate to enquire into the disputed question of possession between parties before him under S. 530, Act 10, 1872.

The decision seems to be an authority not on the question of jurisdiction but rather on the question of propriety, the word used being "would have been justified in refusing to proceed." The case was not one of delivery of possession inter partes, but the decree-holder had been put in possession against a third party not a party to the decree.

The case of Sheikh Mungloo v. Durga Narain Nag (28), in which the contest as to possession was between the auction-purchaser, the judgment-debtor and the auction-purchaser's gomastha on the one hand, and certain persons who, on the other hand, claimed to be ijaradars and so entitled as against the judgment-debtor to collect the rents from the tenants in occupation, Garth, C. J., said:

Now it is quite true that as against a party (namely, the ijaradar) who is proved to be in such actual possession of the rents from the ryots the fact of such symbolical possession would not be entitled to much weight, but it is impossible to say that it is not some legal evidence of possession which the Magistrate was bound to take into consideration.

Kemp, J, expressed the view that such symbolical possession would be no evidence against the ijaradar upon which the Magistrate could proceed in enquiring and deciding which party is in actual possession of the subject of dispute. The case has very little relevancy for our present purposes.

In the matter of Ram Soondaree Debee (29) was a very important case decided by White and Mitter, JJ., In that case, the applicant was, so far back as 1866, by an order of the Magistrate, put in possession of the land, which was the subject-matter of the proceedings under consideration, as against one B. B. then instituted a suit for establishment of title in which he succeeded as regards part of the land and failed as regards the remainder. He, however, did not have execution of the decree. Then there was, nearly ten years later than the Magistrate's order, a fresh proceedings under S. 530, Act 10, 1872 and an order of attachment was made under S. 531 of the Act. White, J., attached no importance to the decree inter partes, obviously for the reason that it had not been executed, but as regards the previous order of the Magistrate passed ten years back he observed:

Taking it that possession of the land was in 1866 awarded to the applicant, it is clear that she is entitled to retain possession of it until ousted by law and the only fact that could give the Magistrate jurisdiction to entertain an application under S. 530 would be if shown that the applicant had lost possession of the land and a new dispute had arisen fact of actual possession.

The case may be treated as an authority for the proposition that a decree of possession, even if inter partes if not executed by delivery of possession, does not conclude the question of actual possession that a Magistrate has to determine, and also for the proposition that a previous magisterial order of possession would deprive the criminal Court of jurisdiction to take similar proceedings even ten years after unless in the meantime two conditions have come into existence, viz., the party put or declared in possession by the previous order had lost his possession and a new dispute has arisen.

The view expressed by E. Jackson, J, in Rani Mohan Roy v. Wise (6) was entirely concurred in by Morris and Prinsep, JJ., in In the matter of Chutraput Singh (7), in which case the plea of a judgment-debtor questioning the fact of delivery of possession in respect of some property as also the fact of the property being included in the decree, was overruled, the learned Judges observing as follows:

The sole object of a Magistrate in taking action under S. 530 is to prevent a breach of the peace between rival claimants to a particular property. For that purpose he satisfied himself as to the party actually in possession at the time that the proceedings were instituted, and declares such party entitled to retain possession until ousted in due course of law. In other words he declares one party entitled to retain possession until the civil Court declares which party has the better right, and puts such party in possession. Here the Nazir, acting under the authority of the civil Court had in due course of law, put Chutraput Singh into possession of the land in dispute, and yet in the view taken by the Magistrate he cannot be allowed to retain the possession which the Nazir gave him, until a fresh order has emanated from the civil Court and another Nazir has put him in possession. Such a course of proceeding seems to us manifestly improper, as it defeats the objects for which S. 530 was framed.

In this case a purchaser claimed that a certain haut which appertained to a mouzah in respect of which he had obtained a decree on a mortgage and that he had been put in possession of the haut as well in execution of the said decree. The judgment-debtor after the delivery of possession had refused to give up actual possession of the haut maintaining that it was debutter property of which he was the Shebait and had remained in such possession. Proceedings under S. 530, Act 10, 1872 were started. The Nazir had delivered possession by planting a bamboo, though not in the haut itself and by proclaiming by beat of drum mentioning the haut in his proclamation. The Magistrate held that actual possession of the haut had remained with the judgment-debtor and made an order in his favour. In the result the learned Judges declared the auction-purchaser entitled to retain the possession that he purported to have obtained through the civil Court. The decision of the High Court, broadly stated, is an authority for the proposition that whatever may be the nature of the delivery of possession, if the delivery purports to be of actual possession against a judgment-debtor, actual possession retained by the latter against such delivery does not count in proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C.

Bhola Nath Ghose v. Mothur Mundle (8) is a very important decision. It was a case in which the tenant of a jote having failed to pay his rent the landlord brought a suit, obtained a decree in ejectment and got possession delivered to him under S. 263, Civil P. C., then in force. The tenant applied for setting aside the execution, failed, and then somehow or other regained possession, grew crops on the land (vide at p. 520) and there was a dispute. The Magistrate took proceedings under S. 530, and awarded possession to the tenant. Garth, C. J., (Maclean, J., concurring) observed thus :

Thus the latter (i. e., the tenant) was directly rewarded by the Magistrate for persistently disregarding the process and the authority of the civil Court..... The case certainly illustrates in a very remarkable way how grievously the powers given to Magistrates by S. 530 may be misapplied, and how useless it is for suitors in this country to establish and enforce their rights in the civil Courts unless the Magistracy will lend their aid with vigour and good will to protect those rights when they are once established. But in this case the landlord had already not only established but enforced his right in the civil Court. He had been placed in possession of the 13 bighas of land by the only process which the law provides for that purpose..... He (i. e., the Magistrate) seems to imagine that when a party to a suit is placed in possession of land by a civil Court, unless he at once begins to cultivate, or to exercise some acts of ownership over it, he must be taken after a reasonable time, to have relinquished his rights, and that, if the other party, against whom he has recovered his decree, re-enters upon the land under such circumstances and a quarrel consequently ensues a Magistrate has a right to proceed under S. 530, to try the question of possession between the parties with regard to the decree and execution of the civil Court. If this were the law, it is difficult to see how the right to land could ever be finally determined. It is clear that the Magistrate is quite in error; and if anything were required to show that he is so the cases referred to by the District Judge are directly in point [Rai Mohan Roy v. E. Wise (6) and the Raneegunj Coal Association v. Hem Lal Ghatwal (4)]. In both these cases it is clearly laid down that when a civil Court decree has once been passed, determining the rights of parties to disputed land, it is the Magistrate's duty to uphold that decree, and he cannot (as between the parties) proceed under S. 530 to decide afresh upon the question of possession.

In another part of the decision the learned Chief Justice commenting on the error made by the Magistrate in appreciating the nature of the possession that had been given by the civil Court observed :

The Magistrate seems to have been under the impression that what is symbolical possession was given to the landlord; but this is a mistake. Symbolical possession is given under S. 264 (O. 21, R. 36) and is only applicable to cases where the party entitled to execution does not obtain actual possession of the land, but only the right to receive the rent of it. Here under S. 263 (O. 21, R. 36) the landlord obtained actual possession; and from that time the possession of the tenant was at an end.

In considering the effect of this decision, one should not lose sight of the fact that the case itself was one in which the decree was inter partes and that the decree was executed and possession was taken under it under the usual process available under S. 263 of the then Civil P. C., Leaving aside the concluding words of the former of the two passages quoted above, which merely repeated the principle which Rai Mohan Roy case (6) and the Raneegunge Coal Association case (4) laid down as regards the conclusive character of decree in relation to S. 145, proceedings inter partes, two propositions definitely emerge from the decision : 1st, that possession taken by a decree-holder against a judgment-debtor under S. 263 (O. 21, R. 35), which in the case of a purchaser would correspond to the kind of possession taken under Or. 21, R. 95, is actual and not symbolical in the eye of the law ; and 2nd, that where there has not only been an adjustment of rights but also an enforcement thereof by the process of the civil Court, it is the clear duty of the Magistrate to uphold the effect of such enforcement.

In the matter of the petition of Govind Moitra (9), the facts were that in proceedings under the Land Registration Act the Deputy Collector decided in the presence of one party that the other party, Govinda Chandra Moitra, had proved his possession. While the said proceedings were pending certain ryots submitted a petition of complaint alleging that certain other ryots at the instigation of Govinda Chandra Moitra were going to do certain acts which tended to a breach of the peace. On that a police report was called for. This report showed that there was a dispute inasmuch as it stated that two persons claimed to be rival landlords and certain of the ryots took the part of the one side and others of the other side. The Magistrate took proceedings under S. 530, and though he happened in his capacity as Deputy Collector to have decided the land registration proceedings a short while ago—a fact on which, in my opinion, nothing turns—declared the other party, namely, the party antagonistic to Govinda Chandra Moitra, to be in possession. Pontifex, J. said :

Now in my opinion the fact, that these registration proceedings were pending at the time the application was made for interference under the Criminal Procedure Code, should have made the Deputy Magistrate extremely careful not to make any order as to possession under S. 530 unless he was quite satisfied that a bona fide dispute existed, and that a breach of the peace was imminent.

Field, J., said :

There is another ground upon which it appears to me that the order of the Deputy Magistrate in this case should be set aside ; and that is because there was no such dispute as is contemplated by S. 530. When once a Magistrate has recorded the preliminary proceeding under the section, and has called upon the parties concerned in the dispute to appear before him, the express language of the section does not provide for any further inquiry into the fact of the existence of a dispute likely to induce a breach of the peace. When the parties appear before the Magistrate the law expressly requires only that the fact of actual possession be inquired into. It appears to me that the essence and basis of the jurisdiction, which a Magistrate can exercise under S. 530, depends upon there being a dispute likely to create a breach of the peace ; and that when the parties appear before the Magistrate if they are able to show, or if it otherwise appears to the Magistrate, that there is no dispute, or no such dispute as is likely to induce a breach of the peace, the Magistrate should hold his hand and not proceed further. I take it that the term "dispute" in S. 530 means a reasonable dispute, a bona fide dispute, a dispute between parties who have each some semblance of right or supposed right. It has been decided by this Court, in the case of Rai Mohan Roy v. Wise (6), that when a decree has been passed by a civil Court regarding the land in dispute, it is the duty of a Magistrate to maintain it, and he has no power again to institute proceedings regarding such land under this section of the Criminal Procedure Code. The principle of this decision is this that when the rights of parties have been determined by a competent Court, the dispute is at an end, and it is the duty of the Magistrate to maintain the rights of the successful party. In other words, the defeated party will not be allowed to go to the original Court, and alleging the existence of a dispute, invoke the aid of the Magistrate and the police to neutralize the effect of the decree of a competent civil Court. When the rights of the parties have been determined, there is no longer a "dispute" within the meaning of S. 530; and the proper course for a Magistrate to pursue, if the defeated party does any act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace, is to take action under S. 491, Criminal P. C., and require from such person security to keep the peace. In the case of Rai Mohan Roy v. Wise (6), the question of title had been definitively determined by the civil Court, and no case has, so far as I am aware, as yet arisen in which the principle of that decision has been carried further, or extended to cases in which there has been merely assuming adjudication upon the question of possession. I think, however, that the proceedings under the Land Registration Act, are proceedings to which the same principle should be extended.

I have carefully considered the terms of the police report to which reference was made in the judgment of Pontifex, J., and I have no doubt whatever that there was a dispute between the two landlords each claiming the property for himself and a number of men siding with one landlord and a number again siding with the other. It was, therefore, a dispute that existed in fact. The terms of the police report, so far as they may be gathered, however, do not appear to be sufficiently specific as regards the likelihood of a breach of the peace. But the absence of an apprehension of a breach of the peace as emanating from the dispute is not the only ground upon which either of the learned Judges proceeded. Apart from that circumstance, they examined the nature of the dispute and both of them dealt with its bona fides as dependent upon the circumstance that it had already been decided by the civil Court. I understand the judgment of both the learned Judges as meaning in substance, that when the dispute as to possession has already been determined by a civil Court, it can no longer be regarded as a bona fide dispute which the criminal Court will take notice of. The defining words a dispute between parties who have each some semblance of right or supposed right used by Field, J., may not be quite happy. The judgment of Field, J., it may be noted, appears to have been before the legislature when the Code was re-drafted in 1882. His complaint of the omission on the part of the legislature to provide for an inquiry into the question as to whether in fact there was a dispute, after a preliminary order was once recorded, was duly taken notice of, and his words when the parties appear before the Magistrate, if they are able to show, or if it otherwise appears to the Magistrate that there is no dispute, or no such dispute as is likely to induce a breach of the peace the Magistrate should hold his hand and not proceed further, were reproduced almost verbatim in para. 4 of the section as it was introduced by Act 10, 1882 which came into force on 1st January 1883, and is, in the Code of 1898, Cl. (5) of the section. If the legislature did not amend or modify the section with this judgment before them, the inference, in my opinion, is irresistible that this is the interpretation that should be put upon the section.

The decision in the case of Doulat Koer v. Rameswari Koeri (10), lays down very generally what the duties of a criminal Court are in relation to decrees and orders of a civil Court. It was not a case of delivery of actual possession against a party to the proceedings. The possession, to quote the words of Prinsep, J., in his judgment in that case, was "possession of some sort" that was given by a civil Court, and for all that one can see it may have been a case of symbolic possession only. Prinsep, J., appears more to have been concerned with the evidentiary value of a decree or order declaring the rights of the parties, for he says:

It is consequently his (i. e., the Magistrate's) duty when that right has been declared within a time "not remote" from his taking proceedings under S. 145, to maintain any order which has been passed by any competent Court, and, therefore, to take proceedings which necessarily must have the effect of modifying or cancelling such order, is to assume a jurisdiction which the law does not contemplate . . . The duty of the Magistrate was to carry out the orders of the civil Court and to maintain those orders by assisting the possession of the person whose title is found by the Court. Under such circumstances we are of opinion that the proceedings under S. 145 were without jurisdiction and that a Magistrate, on a breach of the peace being certified to him, ought to have contented himself by declaring that the orders of the civil Court should be maintained. In this view we think that the proceedings under S. 145 were without jurisdiction and must be set aside, and the possession of Doulat Koer maintained until a competent Court awards possession to some other persons.

Now with the utmost respect to the learned Judge I find it exceedingly difficult to treat this decision of his as laying down anything else than a very general proposition for the guidance of Courts in the matter of the weight to be attached to decrees or orders passed by a civil Court with reference to their age. I cannot regard it as a pronouncement of any very high value, as the word "jurisdiction" seems to have been used only in order to make out a case for interference, the Code of 1898 having only recently taken away the ordinary revisional powers of the High Court in respect of cases under S. 145, and I cannot understand how, if the proceedings were to be set aside as being without jurisdiction, any order could again be passed under that section maintaining the possession of one of the parties. Wilkins, J., said that he generally concurred in what was said by Prinsep, J. His own judgment, however, raises points of difficulty into which it is not necessary to enter, for, as I read it, it suggests that when a person who gets into possession is a trespasser there is no question of possession within the power of the Magistrate to decide—a proposition which, in the form in which it has been put, is not supportable.

Doulat Koer v. Rameswari Koeri (10) was followed in Kunja Behari Das v. Khetra Pal Singh (11), and symbolical possession given as against one of the opposite parties, at least to the proceedings, was held to determine possession in favour of the decree-holder auction-purchaser against all the opposite parties. The learned Judges, Ghose and Taylor, JJ., emphasized, on the lines of the case of Doulat Koer v. Rameswari Koeri (10), the fact that the delivery of possession by the civil Court was "recent" having taken place only three months before the proceedings, and purported to give effect to the decree of the civil Court as well as to maintain the possession that had been taken under it. It may be mentioned in connexion with this case that there is no very intelligible ground why the possession delivered by the civil Court was considered "symbolical" only.

Shortly after there was another case decided, namely, that of Gordon Sims v. Johuri Lal (20), which purported to go far beyond any other case and professing to follow Doulat Koer v. Rameswari Koeri (10), but really taking it a step further, laid down that the duty of a criminal Court in a case under S. 145, Criminal P. C., where there is a decree of a civil Court for possession in respect of the disputed land is to find which party held such civil Court decree, and then to maintain that party in possession; it is not necessary that such decree should be a decree for possession as between the parties to the proceeding under S. 145, Criminal P. C.

It was followed in the case of Krishna Alhadini Dasi v. Radha Syam Panday (30) and in that case the possession given by a civil Court was maintained, though it was a case in which, unlike the case of Gordon Sims v. Johuri Lal (20), the decree was inter partes. Gordon Sims v. Johuri Lal (20), however, was soon dissented from, and not being founded on any good reason or principle, need not be further discussed.

A definite note of dissent was struck in the case of Lowsen Santal v. Kali Charan Santal (31) where a twenty-years old decree had been considered by the Magistrate conclusive on the question of possession.

In Guljar Marwari v. Sheikh Bhatu (32). Henderson and Geidt, JJ., reversed an order of attachment that had been made by the Magistrate under S. 146, Criminal P. C., in spite of a delivery of possession by the civil Court by which one party had obtained possession in execution of a decree against a person, under or in collusion with whom the other parties claimed, only eight days before the initiation of the proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. It was held that the order under S. 146 was passed without jurisdiction and an order was made in favour of the party who had been put in possession by the civil Court, presumably because the proceedings themselves were not without jurisdiction. The same learned Judges in Kedar Prosonna Lahiri v. Lalit Mondal (33), while holding that possession found by a criminal Court is not such as can be treated in the manner in which recent possession given under the decree of a civil Court is treated in cases under S. 145, Criminal P. C., very clearly laid down that in proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., the Magistrate should uphold possession given by a civil Court, so that a person who has obtained a decree declaring his right to possession and had been put in possession might not find himself again forced to litigate his title. There is little doubt that the learned Judges were speaking of delivery of possession inter partes.

Some of the above cases were considered in the case of Kuloda Kinkar Roy v. Danesh Mir (13) by Rampini and Mookherjee, JJ. That was a case in which what the Court was concerned with was a previous order under S. 530, Act 10 (?) of 1872 made 21 years, and the civil Court decree 17 years, before the date of the proceedings then under consideration, and the lands, to which the said order and the decree related had been washed away in the meantime. It was held that there is no inflexible rule of law that a Magistrate in deciding the question of possession under S. 145 is concluded by every previous order of a civil Court or criminal Court relating to the subject of dispute, and the weight to be attached to any such previous order depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. It should be noted that this decision does not purport to consider the effect of delivery of possession in execution of a decree in relation to proceedings under S. 145 inter partes subsequently instituted.

Leaving aside cases of lesser importance we come to the case of Atul Hazra v. Uma Charan Chongdar (2), in which a clear cut proposition was laid down by Chitty and Walmsley, JJ. In that case one of the parties to a proceeding under S. 145, had obtained a decree against a member of the other party and a stranger, and purchased in execution the undivided one-fourth share of the said defendant in the properties which subsequently formed the subject-matter of the proceedings under S. 145 and obtained delivery of possession of that share through Court. The Magistrate finding that the other party to the proceeding was in actual possession of the property notwithstanding the said delivery of possession and had grown the crops made an order in their favour. The learned Judges set aside the order observing:

It seems contrary to all principles of justice that a judgment-debtor should be allowed to retain possession against the decree-holder who has actually been given possession against him by a civil Court and, in a criminal proceeding, to assert that possession and by force of the order of the Magistrate drive the decree-holder and auction-purchaser for a further declaration of his rights.

The learned Judges expressed their full accord with the principles laid down in Basanta Kumari Das v. Mohesh Chandra Saha (14), but held that that case was distinguishable.

In the case of a decree inter partes, when one party was put in execution in possession against the other, the possession delivered was held to be "symbolical" and the Magistrate disregarded that possession and made an order in favour of the other party. Newbould and Suhrawardy, JJ., set aside the order observing as follows:

The Magistrate here has erred in thinking that the decree can be ignored because the Subordinate Judge of Purulia had no jurisdiction over this land and because the delivery of possession was symbolical. It is not for the Magistrate to question the validity of the decree that has been passed by a competent Court. Also when the decree is inter partes it is immaterial whether the delivery of possession is symbolical or not. We hold that in this case in disregarding this delivery of possession the Magistrate acted with gross irregularity and in a manner that was likely to cause a failure of justice.

In Akhoy Mondal v. Basir Rai (3), the word "jurisdiction" was not used, but unless the order was without jurisdiction the learned Judges could not have interfered.

In the case of Aran Sardar v. Hara Sundar Majumdar (16) B. B. Ghose and Chotzner, JJ., held that when a declaration was made in 1919 in favour of one party under S. 145, Criminal P. C., fresh proceedings under S. 145 initiated in 1922 between the parties who were subsequently identical with those in the former proceedings were without jurisdiction. It was said:

The result of such a course would be that the binding effect of an order under S. 145, Criminal P. C., would be disregarded and any number of proceedings may be initiated by any disappointed party leading to no result whatever, a position which would be surely intolerable.

The cases of Hazari Khan v. Nafar Chandra Pal (34 & 35), Atul Chandra Mondal v. Srinath Laik (36) and Shahabaz Mondal v. Bhajahari Nath (15), referred to in the order of reference need not be discussed as they were cases in which the delivery of possession was not inter partes and they are authorities for the proposition that the evidentiary value of previous decree or orders of civil Courts, or of delivery of possession against third parties or of delivery of mere symbolical possession depends upon the particular circumstances of each individual case and upon a variety of factors.

The last case of this Court that I shall notice is that of Ambar Ali v. Piran Ali (1), the case which practically was the occasion for this reference and in which on a disagreement between Graham and Cammiade, JJ., the matter being referred to Cumming, J., he held that, except in cases coming within Prov. 1, sub-S. (4), the Magistrate is bound to declare, under S. 145, the possession of the person whom he finds to be in actual possession of the land in dispute and that he is not bound to maintain symbolical possession delivered in execution of a civil Court decree where in spite of the delivery of possession to one party actual possession remained with another. The delivery of possession in this case was inter partes, and the use of the word "symbolical" only means that the judgment-debtor may not have been turned bodily out of the property. This comment is necessary to understand the exact import of this decision.

Turning now to the other High Courts I propose quite shortly to refer to the more important of the cases in those Courts. As regards the Patna High Court, Puri Das v. Kahlui Behera (37) a Bench of three Judges, Champier, C. J., and Sharfuddin and Roe, JJ., held on a review of the authorities that when the civil Court decree is "of a very recent date" it should be followed but that there is no inflexible rule that any decree of a civil Court should be followed "blindly." Three years later Sultan Ahmed, J., in the case of Rai Bhubaneswari Koeri (12) held that where possession of immovable property has been delivered to an auction purchaser under O. 21, R. 25, Civil P. C., that is not symbolical but actual possession and a Magistrate acts without jurisdiction in proceeding under S. 145, Criminal P. C., and in making an order against the auction-purchaser under that section.

Indeed said he,

if a Magistrate would be permitted to start proceedings under S. 145 under the circumstances in this case I cannot conceive any finality of dispute between the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor. I cannot conceive that the legislature ever intended the multiplicity of fruitless actions which must result if an order of this character is upheld.

The Allahabad High Court is inclined to the view that when the dispute between the parties has been adjudicated upon by a competent Court proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. should not be resorted to, but preventive measures under S. 107, Criminal P. C. should be taken: Brahmanath v. Sundar Nath (38). In Baldeo Baksh Singh v. Raj Ballam Singh (39) which was the case of a decree inter partes, and the question of jurisdiction arose by reason of the fact that the Code of 1898-1923 had excluded orders under S. 145, Criminal P. C., from the ordinary revisional powers of the High Court and such orders during that period could only be revised on the ground of jurisdiction only Stanley, C. J., observed thus :

If the applicants were put into actual possession of the property in dispute upon the occasion of the execution of the decree in 1902, I should doubtless have no hesitation in following the decision to which I have referred in the case of Dowlut Koer v. Rameswari Koeri (10).

He found, however, that the decree dealt merely with the question of proprietary rights of the petitioner and that the opposite party's possession was never disturbed in execution, and on that ground he declined to interfere. The proposition that the Criminal Court acts wrongly in taking proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., which may cancel or modify the effect of delivery of possession given by a civil Court has not been dissented from in later cases, though orders under S. 145, Criminal P. C., were held to be not open to revision under Statute 24 and 25 Vic. Cap. 104, S. 15 merely because they were tainted with such an error: Maharaja Tewari v. Haricharan Rai (40), Jhingai Singh v. Ram Pratap (41), Sayeda Khatun v. Lal Singh (42).

The Bombay High Court concurred in the view of the law enunciated in Dowlut Koer v. Rameswari Koeri (10) with the reservation that it applies where there is no doubt whatever as to what the civil Court has done, that is to say where it cannot be disputed that certain party has been put in possession by the civil Court: [In re. Motilal (43)].

The Madras High Court in the case of Raghava Aiyangar v. Krishnasamy Aiyar (44) made a distinction between cases in which there was delivery of possession in execution of a decree and those in which there was not and declined to interfere with a Magistrate's order by which, in a case of the latter kind, the decree had not been respected. There are other cases of that Court in which symbolical possession delivered under O. 21, R. 96, Civil P. C., was disregarded in an enquiry or to actual possession under S. 145, Criminal P. C., e.g., Ramalingam v. Raja of Ramnad (45) or a decree determining the question of title only was not followed in the order made under S. 145, Criminal P. C., e.g., Anna Swamy v. Muthukumara (46).

These are practically all the cases in this country since 1861 which may throw any light upon the question as to the views that have been taken with regard to the matters that are involved in the two questions which arise for consideration and which may for the sake of convenience be repeated here, viz., first. Had he Magistrate jurisdiction to institute the proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P.C., or in other words, to take action under Cl. (1) of that section; and second. Had the jurisdiction to make the order that he did under Cl. (6) thereof; the word "jurisdiction" being understood in the strict sense explained above. It must be conceded that the decisions, far from being uniform, present innumerable points of diversity. Some of these decisions, though comparatively few in number, are indefensible in principle. Others, though correct, do not profess to lay down any principle at all. Of these that purport to proceed on some principle or other, not a few state it wrongly, inaccurately or inadequately. Sitting on a Full Bench we are not handicapped by any of them, and if I have discussed them somewhat in detail I have done so only in order to appreciate their exact significance and importance. Confining the examination to those decisions only which seemingly purport to look at the matter from the point of view of jurisdiction, one finds that there are infirmities of at least four kinds which mar, or at any rate, detract from their worth. In the first place that the High Courts, during the Code of 1898-1923, when their ordinary power of revision was excluded, often used the word "jurisdiction" in order to make out a case for interference. Then there are cases in which, while holding that the initiation of the proceedings were without jurisdiction the High Courts have proceeded to pass or have advised the Magistrate to pass possessory orders on the basis of those very proceedings. Again, there are cases in which the initiation of the proceedings, though not approved, was not declared as being without jurisdiction, while the final order was held to be so. Lastly, there seems to have been another factor that influenced some of the decisions, viz., that for cases within S. 145 Judges have not liked to hold, in view of the word "shall" in the section, that the Magistrate had any discretion and so they used the word "jurisdiction" in order to advise action under S. 107 once the case came within S. 145.

The view that the proceedings were without jurisdiction is supportable on the reasoning that when the dispute as to possession has been effectively determined there is no longer any dispute which requires adjudication and so none of which the criminal Court need take any notice. Ch 12 of the Code is headed "Disputes as to immovable property," but when one looks at the contents of the chapter one finds that S. 135 speaks of disputes.....concerning any land or water or the boundaries thereof, while S. 147 deals with "alleged right of user of any land or water." The question whether in some cases the two may wholly or partly overlap need not detain us. It is clear, however, that "dispute" in S. 145 cannot mean all kinds of dispute, but only dispute as to actual possession. To take one example out of many. Suppose A and B are quarrelling over a right of pre-emption in respect of property in the possession of C: nobody will think of S. 145 in respect of such a dispute though it may be of the worst character and fraught with immense potentialities as regards imminence of a breach of the peace. The method prescribed, namely, of calling for written statements of the respective claims of the parties as respects the fact of actual possession, and the means provided, namely, that of making an order declaring a party to be entitled to possession or attaching the property makes this perfectly clear. The words "dispute concerning land, etc." therefore have to be understood not quite literally but as a dispute relating to actual possession. For a dispute as to actual possession to be effectively determined it is not enough that there has been a decree determining the rights of the parties, unless it is a decree by which a suit for declaration of right and recovery or confirmation of possession has been dismissed thus putting an end to the plaintiff's rights and claim for possession for ever and beyond all controversy. In cases of decrees which merely determine the rights of the parties, even if they decide that one party is entitled to possession as against the other the dispute as to possession still remains; and it is only by delivery of possession in execution of such a decree and in favour of one party as against another that the dispute can be said to be determined beyond any controversy. Such possession, however, must be actual or khas possession and not merely symbolical possession because it is actual possession and not a right to possession that S. 145 is concerned with. If all these requisites are present, there is no dispute in the eye of the law, though in point of fact there may be one.

Then again the nature of the enquiry contemplated by the section shows that the "respective claims as respects the fact of actual possession" is to be investigated. A claim when put forward before a tribunal involves an idea of its capability to be adjudicated upon. I find it exceedingly difficult to conceive how one can put forward a claim before any Court saying:

There is a serious apprehension of a breach of peace. I have been turned out of possession by the civil Court. I am still in possession by some means or other. I cannot get the civil Court to decide on my right to possession again. Please declare my possession, maintain the possession that I have, forbid my opponent to disturb it and ask him to go to the civil Court and to request that Court to reopen and reconsider the matter.

That in substance is what a claim of this character comes to. Widely different is the possession of an ordinary trespasser or wrongdoer, whose claim has never been decided by a competent Court; and between him and the rightful owner the criminal Court can hardly give any preference to either except on the footing of actual possession, because to attempt to go on any other footing would be to do the very thing that the law forbids, namely, to decide on the merits of the claim as to the right to possess. This, I understand, is what E. Jackson, J. meant by saying that a Magistrate's powers under S. 318 relate to land regarding which there is a dispute which has not been decided by a civil Court Rai Mohan Roy v. J. P. Wise (6), and Pontifex and Field, J.J. meant by saying that it must be a bona fide dispute, In the matter of the petition of Govinda Chunder Moitra (9), and Richards, J., meant by saying that it must be a bona fide or real dispute and not a bogus one: Emperor v. Ram Baran Singh (47). It is this principle of finality that White, J. was thinking of when with reference to a previous order under S. 530, Criminal P. C., he said that it must be shown that the possession thereunder had been lost and a new dispute had arisen: In the matter of Ram Soondaree Debee (29).

It has been urged that determination of the question whether a dispute is bona fide or not involves practical difficulties and so this construction should be avoided. In the first place, it is said, S. 145 by its very terms excludes a consideration as to whether any of the parties have a right to possess, and a determination as to whether a dispute is bona fide and means a determination of a right to persons which is precluded by the section. I am not prepared to accede to this contention, because it is only a fact that will have to be ascertained, namely, whether the aforesaid conditions are satisfied or not. If on the materials on which the proceedings are sought to be found such conditions appear, the proceedings will not be taken. If after the proceedings are taken such conditions are brought to the notice of the Magistrate he will cancel the preliminary order as he is competent to do under Cl. 5 of the section. The maxim of English law that where the title to property is in question the exercise of a summary jurisdiction by Justices of the peace is ousted, obtained for ages in England, and as observed by Crompton, J. in R. v. Cridland (48), should still be applied there by every Act relating to such matters though not specifically mentioned; or as said by Blackburn, J., in White v. Feast (49), every statute giving summary jurisdiction has the implied restriction as to title. The doctrine, however, has not been consistently applied even in England at all times: see the Full Bench case of Ram Sagar Mandal v. Alek Naskar (50), per Richardson, J. In this last mentioned Full Bench case of this Court Richardson, J. also pointed out that in England the superior Courts derive their jurisdiction to decide question of right and title from the common law and may at one time have regarded encroachments with suspicion, while the jurisdiction of the Indian Courts, from the highest to the lowest, depends on statute and that is one of the reasons why the old English doctrine should not be applied in this country.

All this, however, does not mean that the Magistrate cannot embark on an enquiry in order to find out whether the case would or would not attract his jurisdiction. An enquiry, however informal, into the character of the dispute has in practice to be daily made in order to find out whether action should be taken under one section rather than another, e g., under S. 107 or S. 144 or S. 145. See the cases discussed in the order of reference in the Full Bench decision in the case of Emperor v. Abbas (51), also Emperor v. Ram Baran Singh (47), Kaniz Amina v. Emperor (52), Ganpat Singh v. Emperor (53), Mahadeo Kunwar v. Bisu (54). The word "shall" used in Cl. (1), S. 145, is no doubt mandatory but much of a mandatory meaning need not be given to it, because it is always open to a Magistrate to take other preventive action and thus put an end to an apprehension of a breach of the peace, and as soon as that element disappears the foundation is gone. I do not see why it should be said, as was said in the arguments, that a trespasser who is continuing in possession cannot be removed from possession by an order against him under S. 107, Criminal P. C., in my opinion the words "doing a wrongful act" in S. 107, Criminal P. C. are sufficiently wide to include a continuing act of trespass, and although the bond that the trespasser will give under S. 107, Criminal P. C., will require him not to break the peace, if he resists the other party or prevents him from enjoying his exclusive possession and a breach of the peace ensues in consequence, I do not see how the trespasser can escape a forfeiture of his bond. If this meaning of the word "dispute" he adopted, the initiation of the proceeding under Cl. (1), S. 145, being without jurisdiction it logically follows that no order can possibly be made under Cl. (6) of that section.

If, however, the aforesaid meaning be not attributed to the word "dispute," necessity arises to consider the second question. In dealing with this question one has to look at it in its several aspects. Firstly, the object of the proceedings will have to be borne in mind, namely, to prevent a breach of the peace by making a temporary or tentative order which is to be in operation so long only as the rights of the parties are not decided by a competent Court and the rightful party is not put in possession by eviction, if necessary, of the wrongful one (S. 145) or a decision has been passed as to who is the person entitled to possession (S. 146.). The criminal Court thus exercises only a limited jurisdiction, the limits of which must be co-extensive with the exigencies of the object it seeks to attain. As Turner, C. J. put it in his decision in the Full Bench case of Sundaram Chetti v The Queen (55), which was a case under S. 518, Act 10, 1872 (=S. 144 of the present Code):

The Criminal Procedure Code declares the authority of the Magistrate to suspend the exercise of rights recognized by law when such exercise may conflict with other rights of the public or tend to endanger the public. But by numerous decisions it has been ruled that this authority is limited by the special ends it was designed to secure and is not destructive of the suspended rights . . . I must nevertheless observe that this power is extraordinary and that the Magistrate should resort to it when he is satisfied that the other powers with which he is entrusted are insufficient. Where rights are threatened, the persons entitled to them should receive the fullest protection the law affords them and circumstances admit of. It needs no argument to prove that the authority of the Magistrate should be exerted in the defence of rights rather than in their suspension; in the repression of illegal rather than in interference with lawful rights.

These weighty observations were made in connexion with an order passed, no doubt, under a different section of the Code, but their effect cannot be belittled on that ground. If the Criminal Court finds before it a complete adjudication of the dispute as to actual possession by a competent Court, for it to think of making an order in favour of a party who has been defeated in that Court and to relegate the successful party to get a second adjudication is to ignore the very object which it should have in view and thus would amount to lending countenance to an abuse of the processes of the Court. Nextly, the Civil and the Criminal law are but productions of the same legislature and to permit the criminal Court in the exercise of its limited jurisdiction to override or nullify the proceedings of civil Courts is to attribute an inconsistency to the legislature and to assume against it an intention to create a conflict where harmony is to be presumed. I cannot express my disapproval of such a course in better words than Heaton, J., used, though in a different connexion, in his judgment in the case of In re Markur (56). He said :

If we are to administer justice as a civilized country, if we are to avoid conflicts between civil and criminal Courts which ordinarily must be fraught with evil and can produce no good, if, in short, we are to make the actual administration of justice in this country bear a proper relation to that which we profess it to be, then we cannot have criminal Courts trying over again matters which have been thoroughly dealt with and finally decided by a civil Court of competent jurisdiction. It may be that to this principle there would be rare exceptions, founded on, possibly, the discovery of new, cogent and important evidence. But ordinarily that principle must prevail and if that principle must prevail, it is a matter of the first importance, of the very highest relevancy, to show to a criminal Court that that matter which the criminal Court is asked to adjudicate on has already been fully dealt with by a civil Court.

Thirdly, if the plea of the party who was defeated by the civil Court and ousted from position is nothing more than this that in spite of the delivery of possession by the civil Court he continued in possession, or, in other words, that he was in possession in defiance of that Court, no Court should listen to a plea of that character. In other words in the eye of the law and for the purposes of S. 145, Criminal P. C., such possession cannot be regarded as possession at all. A negative answer, therefore, in my opinion, may be given to the second question also.

But the question of jurisdiction, in my opinion, is now a matter of academic interest only, because by the restoration of our ordinary powers of revision under the Code by the amendment introduced in 1923, it is enough to-day, from a practical point of view, to consider the question of propriety only, as the words used in S. 435, Criminal P. C., are "correctness, legality or propriety."

Looking at the matter from the point of view of propriety—and not as a matter of jurisdiction—I think I am on much firmer ground when I say that it is improper in the circumstances assumed in the reference either to institute proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., or to pass an order in favour of the unsuccessful party in the civil Court proceedings. In saying this I shall try to define the exact limits within which my answer should apply.

A decree of a civil Court, unless it negatives a right and dismisses a claim to possession, does not determine a dispute as to possession; other decrees, even decrees for possession, do not ordinarily determine such a dispute. This proposition was recognized long ago, and I am not aware that it has been dissented from at any time. In a case under S. 318 of the Act of 1861, it was held by Norman and E. Jackson, JJ., that a party out of possession cannot, even on getting a decree for possession from the civil Court, and without obtaining possession by executing the decree, be declared in possession merely by virtue of the decree itself: Mahant Dhansaj Giri Goswami v. Sri-pati Giri Goswami (57). Delivery of possession, to effectively determine the dispute, must be, in fact inter partes or between parties to the proceedings or at least one that may be treated as such. When possession is delivered against a judgment-debtor under O. 21, R. 35, Civil P. C., or to a purchaser under O. 21, R. 95, Civil P. C., that is the only procedure by which khas or actual possession may be delivered, and unless there is a refusal to vacate—a case which necessitates the taking of possession by the physical removal of the judgment-debtor—it is as good as any possession may conceivably be.

Judged by these tests, in the hypothetical case on which the order of reference proceeds the criminal Court, in my opinion, would have acted altogether improperly in initiating proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., if it at all apprehended the true position at the outset. If it did so at any time during the progress of the proceedings its duty was to drop the proceedings under Cl. (5) of the section and to take other suitable measures for preventing a breach of the peace. If it was only at the conclusion of the case that the facts appeared in their true light, the order that the Court passed was, in my judgment, clearly wrong.

To turn now to the order of reference.

The questions referred are :

(57) [1869] 2 B. L. R. App. Cr. 27.

(1) Do the words "actual possession" in sub-S. (1) of S. 145, Criminal P. C., mean actual personal, physical possession even though wrongful, i. e., that of a recent trespasser in actual physical possession at the time of the proceedings under S. 145?

(2) Does the word "dispute" in the same subsection mean actual disagreement existing between the parties at the time of the proceedings under S. 145 even though the question as to right to possession has already been decided by a civil Court?

(3) Had the law been correctly laid down in the case of Ambazali v. Poral Ali (1) or in the case of Atul Hazra v. Uma Charan (2) and Akhoy Mondal v. Basir (3)?

My answers are as follows :

(1) If the word "personal" is omitted from the question, "Yes;" subject to this that the answer is to apply to cases in which the dispute as to possession has not been determined by a civil Court as explained in the next answer.

(2) "Yes"—if the decision of the civil Court amounts only to a determination of the right to possession, except in cases where such right and a consequent claim to possession have been negated by a decree which is either inter partes or may be treated as such, in which excepted cases "No." In cases in which khas or actual possession has been delivered by the civil Court either inter partes or between parties who may, in effect, be regarded as parties to the proceedings, the answer is "No."

(3) The last two cases correctly laid down the law. As regards the first case I give no answer, because the facts found are not, in my opinion, sufficient to put the case to the tests I have indicated above.

Turning now to the case now before us it seems to me that the facts thereof are not exactly what have been stated in the order of reference. In the judgment of my Lord the Chief Justice will be found a careful and accurate summary of the true position. It is apparent that the civil Court has not yet fully and finally adjudicated upon the rights of Afazuddin. It is also clear that the delivery of possession in execution of the decree in favour of the petitioner is of no avail as against Afazuddin, and in the absence of any adjudication as regards Afazuddin's share it was of very little use as an effective decision of the dispute as regards actual possession. I agree therefore in discharging the rule.

Cammiade, J.—I agree with my Lord the Chief Justice. The section empowers Magistrates to take action in order to prevent breaches of the peace, and directs them to ascertain who is in actual possession at the date of the order in writing referred to in sub-S. (1). The Magistrate is prohibited from enquiring into the merits of the parties' claims to possess. The only exception to the rule laid down that actual possession at the date of the order under sub-S. (1) shall be maintained is that provided in the proviso to sub-S. (4) in cases of forcible dispossession within two months prior to the date of that order. In these circumstances, there can be no room for doubt as to the meaning of the section.

There can also be no doubt that the word "dispute" used in the section means actual dispute, irrespective of the merits of the parties' claims to possess the land. The object of the section is to prevent breaches of the peace; and it is the duty of the Magistrate to interfere, wherever such a contingency arises, regardless of the good or bad faith of either of the parties. Even if there were no decree establishing the title of one of the parties to the land, bad faith might be imputed and proved. For instance, there may have been an encroachment subsequent to a formal partition by the Collector under the Estates Partition Act or after partition by act of parties followed by execution of a deed. If on each occasion the Magistrate had to enquire into the good faith of the parties before taking action, many breaches of the peace would occur.

Disputes such as the one in the present case arise from the fact that decree-holders frequently do not take actual possession. This is especially the case where the lands are homestead lands in the occupation of the judgment-debtor. If the decree-holder fears violence on the part of the judgment-debtor, and does not cause him to be removed from the land, he must suffer. He must insist on taking actual possession; and he must protect his possession after he has taken it. When the lands are arable lands, the decree-holder, after taking possession, should try and maintain his possession. At the very first act of trespass on the part of the judgment-debtor, he should seek the Magistrate's protection. If he waits till the judgment-debtor has re-established his possession, the Magistrate will have no authority to restore him to possession. Once the trespass of the judgment-debtor has ripened into possession recognized by law, it is the duty of the Magistrate to maintain that possession and protect it, leaving the other party to seek his remedy in the civil Court.

By the Court.—We are unanimous that the rule should be discharged. The order of the Court, therefore, is that the rule is discharged.

The date of presentation of the second appeal to the High Court is not the date which determines the applicability of the amended Cl. 15, requiring permission of the deciding Judge, for further appeal, but the date of institution of the suit is, in each case, the determining factor : *Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Rankin, C. J.—This is a rule calling upon the respondents to show cause why a certain memorandum of appeal presented to this Court on 30th April 1928 should not be accepted and registered. The question raised is whether or not the applicants have a right of appeal from the decision of a single Judge sitting in second appeal in the absence of a certificate from him that the case is a fit one for appeal. This question arises upon the new Letters Patent which came into effect on 14th January 1928.

The facts are that the suit was instituted on 7th October 1920 and that after an appeal to the District Court a second appeal was filed in this High Court by the present applicants on 4th October 1926. Under certain rules of this Court it was laid before Mallik, J. for disposal on or about 4th April 1928, and on that date the appeal was dismissed the learned Judge refusing to declare that the case was a fit one for a further appeal.

In these circumstances it is plain enough that the applicants have no right of appeal if the present case is to be governed by the terms of the new clause which by the said Letters Patent has been substituted for the 15th clause of the Letters Patent of this High Court as they stood prior to 14th January 1928. The contention of the applicants is that the new clause cannot be applied to this case because to do so would be to apply it retrospectively, and so as to impair and indeed to defeat a substantive right which was in existence prior to 14th January 1928. For this proposition the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Irving (1) is cited and it is clear enough that the law as there laid down is applicable in India: Delhi Cloth Co. v. Income-tax Commissioner (2) and Nana v. Sheku (3).

The only Indian decision upon the effect of an amendment of the Letters Patent as regards rights of appeal would appear to be that of Framjee v. Hormasji (4). The case had been decided at first instance by two Judges and under the Letters Patent of 1862 an appeal lay within the High Court (in practice an appeal to three Judges). By the Letters Patent of 1865 no such appeal was provided and the appeal lay to the Privy Council. The decree not having been perfected before the coming into operation of the Letters Patent of 1865 it was held that there was no right to appeal to the High Court.

The judgment of Sir Richard Couch proceeded upon the footing that the question was one of procedure and of the same character as the question of costs in Wright v. Hale (5). A suggestion was added, however, that S. 2 of the new Letters Patent, though it might bear a more limited meaning, pointed to an intention that pending suits should be treated as if they had been brought under the new Letters Patent. This decision was noticed in Runjit Singh v. Meherban (6), a case really governed by S. 6, General Clauses Act (1 of 1868). There Garth, C. J., noticed that the word "procedure" had been used by Sir Richard Couch in an extended sense but approved of the Bombay decision for other reasons which he did not specify.

It is urged for the applicants that the main ground of the decision in Framji v. Hormasji (4) is untenable in view of what was said by Lord Macnaghten in Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Irving (1) and that any other grounds upon which the decision may be defended are inapplicable to the present case. The applicants crave in aid the observation of Sir Richard Couch that in construing a charter of this kind the Court should, I think, be guided by the rules and principles upon which Acts of Parliament are construed : Framji v. Hormasji (4).

Sir Richard Garth was apparently of the same opinion.

It is not contended that S. 6, General Clauses Act (10 of 1897) or S. 38, Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 and 53 vic. Cap. 63) applies to Letters Patent, but it is contended that these are but expressions of a common law presumption. Reliance is placed on the judgment of Garth, C. J., in Runjit Singh v. Meherban (6) and on other Indian decisions to the effect that a suit and all appeals from the decree made therein are to be regarded as one "legal proceeding" [cf. Ratanchand Srichand v. Hanmat Rav (7); Deb Narain v. Narendra (8) per Sir Arthur Wilson at p. 278] on the principle stated by West, J. in Chinto v. Krishnaji (9) at 216 :

that the legal pursuit of a remedy, suit, appeal and second appeal are really but steps in a series of proceedings connected by an intrinsic unity.

On these grounds the applicants claim that on 7th October 1920 when the suit was instituted their right to a Letters Patent appeal from the decision of a single Judge was a substantive right vested in them by the existing law and that an intention to interfere with it, to clog it with a new condition, or to impair or imperil it, cannot be presumed, and cannot be affirmed, unless it has been clearly manifested by express words or necessary intendment.

Now there is a certain paradox in regarding the right to appeal within the High Court from the decision of a single Judge as a right "vested" in the litigant at the date of the suit, since it is in no way certain that the case will ever be decided by a single Judge. Again as the right of second appeal is the right given by S. 100, Civil P. C., to appeal "to the High Court" it does not seem unreasonable that a litigant should take the internal arrangements of the High Court as he finds them when he gets there. If under the Letters Patent all second appeals had been required to come before two Judges and a new Letters Patent had provided that one Judge should be competent to exercise this jurisdiction, leaving the right of appeal to the High Court and from the High Court as before, it would have been difficult, in my opinion, to hold that any litigant had a right to a hearing before two Judges. Again it is difficult to suppose that the amendment made by the Letters Patent which came into force in January last was made with any other view than to obviate unreasonable, or unreasonably prolonged, litigation, or to suppose that the date of the suit has any rational bearing upon that object or as distinguishing one case from another for this purpose. It may also be thought difficult to arrive at any opinion that the reform introduced is reasonable and necessary, but that it should in effect be postponed for years. The whole weight of these considerations has to be borne by the applicant's argument that the Letters Patent as they stood on 7th October 1920 conferred upon him at that date an existing right.

Now the reasoning of the Judicial Committee in the Colonial Sugar Refining Company v. Irving (1) is a conclusive authority to show that rights of appeal are not matters of procedure and that the right to enter the superior Court is for the present purpose deemed to arise to a litigant before any decision has been given by the inferior Court. If the latter proposition be accepted I can see no intermediate point at which to resist the conclusion that the right arises at the date of the suit. It does not arise as regards Court B alone, when the suit is instituted in Court A and as regards Court C when the first appeal is lodged before Court B. A "present right of appeal" (cf. S. 154, Civil P. C.) is a different matter. The principle must I think involve that an admixture of different systems is not to be applied to a single case. It is quite true that the suitor cannot enter Court C without going through Court B, but neither can he enter Court B till Court A has given its decision. The right must be a right to take the matter to Court C in due course of the existing law.

In the present case, however, there is a further element or contingency in that the case might never have been dealt with by a single Judge, and the right claimed under Cl. 15 of the unamended Letters Patent might never have arisen at all. Whether this element would make the reasoning of the Judicial Committee in the Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Irving (1) inapplicable to the present case is a question which must be answered in the negative, if, as I think, the applicant at the date of the suit had a right to the use of the then existing system of appeals. But this question is I think academic in view of the effect of S. 111 of the Code upon the change introduced by the new Letters Patent. The new clause treats all second appeals in the same way, though it is in the power of the Court by its rules, and of the Chief Justice by administrative action, to ensure that only those second appeals shall be laid before a single Judge in which the value of the subject-matter is below a given limit. Nothing can be founded therefore in the circumstance that by the rules of this Court Rs. 1,000 is imposed as a limit, that in practice Rs. 50 is the limit and that any single Judge can direct the case to be laid before a Bench. Theoretically cases are brought to this Court on second appeal only if they are valued at less than Rs. 5,000. This valuation, however may under the Suits Valuation Act be of an artificial character, and second appeals do from time to time go to the Privy Council either under S. 110 of the Code because the real value is over Rs. 10,000 or because the decree affects property of that value or for special reasons under S. 109 (c).

Section 111 of the Code, however, definitely prohibits an appeal to the Privy Council from a single Judge and to this extent overrides Cl. 39 of the Letters Patent. The section is not a mere provision that nothing in the previous sections shall be deemed to give a right of appeal from the decision of a single Judge. The provisions of Cl. (a) of S. 111 may have been motivated originally by the existence of the right of Letters Patent appeal [cf. Sabhapathi v. Narayanasami, (10),] or by the opinion that it is not reasonable in Indian cases that the Privy Council should be called upon to decide cases until a Bench has dealt with them. But in any case the effect of S. 111, upon Cl. 39, Letters Patent, cannot now be controlled by such considerations: Satya Narayana v. Venkata (11). It appears to me, therefore, that the new clause in the Letters Patent takes away in all second appeals decided by a single Judge (without his giving a certificate that the case is a fit one for appeal) the right to go to the Privy Council under the ordinary law, though the right of the Judicial Committee to give special leave is not of course affected. That right was a limited and qualified right; but such as it was, it was open to the party prior to 14th January 1928. It depended upon no contingency but merely on his prosecuting his case up to that point. It is reasonably clear that to determine the effect of the new Letters Patent upon pending cases these cannot be distinguished according as they are or are not fit to be taken on appeal to the Privy Council.

Considering the several safeguards that are provided the joint effect of the new clause in the Letters Patent and of S. 111 of the Code is doubtless admirable, but it prevents me from holding that the new Letters Patent can be applied to pending cases without taking away existing rights of appeal. Nor can I doubt that when the legislature has authorized His Majesty to legislate by Letters Patent upon questions which include rights of appeal the same principles of construction must be applied as would at common law be applicable to a statute dealing with the like subject-matter.

(11) A. I. R. 1924 Mad. 399=46 Mad. 958.

In this view the only question which remains is the question whether the new clause can be given retrospective effect. The provision that the new Letters Patent shall come into force on the date of publication in the Gazette does not operate to give it such effect. Nor does the fact that the jurisdiction and authority of the Court is the primary subject of the Letters Patent found a valid argument to the effect that after the date of commencement the Court can have no authority to entertain such an appeal as this. Unless the contrary can be shown the provision which takes away jurisdiction is itself subject to the implied saving of the litigants' rights. Indeed that there is an implied saving of such rights in some cases cannot well be denied. It will not be supposed, for example, that jurisdiction is taken away as regards cases heard by a single Judge on second appeal prior to the date of commencement, viz., 14th January 1928, on which date for the first time the Judge had any duty or right to determine whether the case was fit for further appeal.

The question before us is thus narrowed down to this: Whether it is any necessary part of the intendment of the Letters Patent that they should operate upon appeals arising out of suits instituted before 14th January 1928, when such appeals were heard after that date?

As there is nothing in the language of the Letters Patent to evidence this intention, we must enquire whether it is manifest from the subject-matter.

Baron Parke said Lord Hatherly in Pardo v. Bingham (12) at 740.

did not consider it an invariable rule that a statute could not be retrospective unless so expressed in the very terms of the section which had to be construed and said that the question in each case was whether the legislature had sufficiently expressed that intention. In fact we must look to the general scope and purview of the Statute and at the remedy sought to be applied and consider what was the former state of the law and what it was that the legislature contemplated.

A strong instance of an inference of this character was the decision in Quilter v. Mapleson (13) where Jessel, M. R., held that the right given by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to obtain relief against forfeiture could be claimed in a suit that had been instituted and tried at first instance before the Act came into operation. There, however, a similar right under the Common Law Procedure Act had been abrogated by the Act of 1881 and was thus lost to the lessee.

Now in this case I cannot say that it appears to me that there is much material upon which to base a definite conclusion that the intention was to bring pending suits under the new system. The long postponement of a desirable reform may have been thought wise and it would hardly be correct for a Court of law to proceed merely upon its own opinion as to the degree of respect to which the right of a third appeal is entitled. In this aspect the present case may reasonably be thought less strong than the case of Bourke v. Nutt (14) where a similar argument was ultimately negatived. If bankrupts may continue to become members of School Boards I cannot say that litigants may not continue to have a third appeal unless it otherwise appears that this construction of the Letters Patent is not reasonably possible. Far be it from me to distinguish between such forms of excess or to divide such claims to toleration.

There is, however, another ground which should be mentioned. Cl. 15 of the Letters Patent is not read with what is now S. 108, Government of India Act, (formerly Ss. 13 and 14, High Courts Act of 1861). It puts a limit to the power that can be entrusted by the Court to the discretion of a single Judge, and both the rules of the Court and the administrative action of the Chief Justice have to be controlled by its provisions. It follows that when the amended clause begins to operate at all, it may well become necessary that second appeals should be differently dealt with according as they arise from suits filed before or after the 14th January 1928. This is likely to cause much inconvenience which would be avoided by treating the clause as applicable to all second appeals heard by a single Judge after the said date. Such an argument, however, falls obviously short of what is required to entitle the Court to draw the inference that retrospective effect must have been intended by the new clause.

No clear inference can, in my opinion, be drawn from that part of the new Letters Patent which deals with difference of opinion between the Judges of a Division Bench and I do not think it necessary to discuss this subject.

I cannot see any logical reason which would on the authorities entitle us to hold that the date of presentation of the second appeal to this Court is the date which determines the applicability of the amended clause and I very regretfully assent to the argument of the applicants that as the matter now stands the date of institution of the suit is in each case the determining factor.

The rule should therefore be made absolute but without costs.

Appeal No. 81 of 1927, Decided on 3rd January 1928.

Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, S. 9, Cl. (e)—Cl. (e) does not apply to a person against whom an adjudication order is taking operation.

Section 9, Cl. (e) is intended to apply to a person who is responsible for the payment of his own debts. It has no application to a person who has been adjudicated and to the acts of the Official Assignee in the process of the insolvency administration.

On 13th July 1926 A made an application for the adjudication of B. The adjudication order was made on 23rd July 1926. But it was rescinded in March 1927 on the ground that no act of insolvency had been made. In the meantime on 20th January 1927 A got the property of D sold in execution of a decree for the payment of money. The Official Assignee had been added as a party to the proceedings. On 27th April 1927 A filed an application for the adjudication in insolvency of D alleging that B had committed an act of insolvency as he had allowed the property to be sold on 28th January 1927.

Held: that the sale was not an act of insolvency. [P 645 C 1]

J. N. Roy—for Appellant.

Arun Sen—for Respondent.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case a petition was filed on 27th April 1927 for the adjudication in insolvency of one Bipin Behari Ghose. The act of insolvency alleged was that the debtor had allowed certain premises to be sold on 28th January 1927 in execution of a decree for the payment of money. It appears that the facts are that on 13th July 1926 the present creditor made an application for adjudication of the present debtor. That adjudication order was made on 23rd July. But an application for review having been made and an appeal taken both from the adjudication order and from the order dismissing the application for review the whole matter was remanded in appeal. That ultimately came before Page, J. who in March 1927 held that no act of insolvency had been made out and rescinded the adjudication order. The act of insolvency now alleged is a sale on 28th January 1927. It was a sale in a proceeding in which the Official Assignee had been added as a party in view of the adjudication order that was then subsisting and the question, and the only question, is whether in a case like this with a subsisting adjudication order and the Official Assignee being added as a party the sale in a mortgage suit comes within Cl. (e), S. 9, Act 3, 1919. S. 9 deals with acts of insolvency and it will be observed that everything in that section with the exception, which I am about to mention, refers to the acts of the man or his agent.

Nobody is to be adjudicated as insolvent unless there is something in his conduct or in his agent's conduct imputed to him amounting to an act of insolvency so as to attract this form of jurisdiction. But there are in this S. 2, Cls. (e) and (h), which are intended to enable a creditor to procure an act of insolvency, in other words, to compel the debtor to commit an act of insolvency, in order that the creditor may get, if he wants them, the advantages of insolvency jurisdiction. One is Cl. (e), namely, to have a man's property attached for 21 days or sold in execution of a decree for the payment of a sum of money. Another way in which a man may be forced into an insolvency Court is under Cl. (h) if he is imprisoned in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money. A debtor who is not willing to commit any of the other acts of insolvency mentioned in S. 9 may in either of these two ways be compelled to commit an act of insolvency. But Cl. (e) does not in my opinion apply to a person against whom an adjudication order is taking operation. That is intended to apply to a person who is responsible for the payment of his own debts. It is he who may be compelled by the creditor to commit an act of insolvency. The clause has no application to a person who has been adjudicated and to the acts of the Official Assignee in the process of the insolvency administration. The argument on behalf of the appellant has dealt with a number of matters. It is pointed out that if one looks to the principle embodied in S. 23 of this Act of 1909 one finds that when an adjudication order is annulled it is as though it had never been made with certain exceptions. The act of the Official Assignee and of the Court if duly done are allowed to stand and subject to that the property vests in the bankrupt retrospectively that is to say, as it was at the time when the adjudication order was first made. That is perfectly true, but it is an entirely different thing to impute to a person an act of insolvency by means of this retrospective operation. It is quite right that a man should get his property back and get it as from the previous date. It is another thing to make him responsible for something that he could not possibly resist. In my opinion the learned Judge was perfectly right in refusing to hold that this was an act of insolvency.

In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Criminal Appeal No. 164 of 1927, Decided on 8th November 1927, from order of Addl. Sess Judge, Comilla, D/- 24th January 1927.

Criminal P. C., Ss. 326 and 274—Trial by jury under S. 302, Penal Code—12 persons summoned as jurors—Eight appearing and seven chosen—Tribunal is illegally constituted—Proceedings are illegal.

In a case of trial by jury for an offence under S. 302, Penal Code, only 12 persons were summoned to attend the Court as jurors. Of these eight appeared on the day of the trial and, from the eight who appeared, seven persons were chosen to act as the jury.

Held: that the tribunal was illegally constituted, as, contrary to the intention of the Code and to the standard set by the legislature, an unreasonably small number of jurors was summoned with the result that it was not possible to have a jury of 9 and the proceedings should be set aside. [P 645 C 2 ; P 646 C 1]

A. K. Fazlul Huq and Debendra Narain Bhattacharya—for Appellants.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case it appears that the eight appellants and another person were put upon their trial before the Sessions Judge and a jury on charge under S. 302, I. P. C., and also upon charges under Ss. 147 and 148.

What was done with reference to the jury was this: that only 12 persons were summoned to attend the Court as jurors. Of these eight appeared on the day of the trial and, from the eight who appeared, seven persons were chosen to act as the jury. In these circumstances, Mr. Fazlul Huq, for the appellants, calls our attention to Ss. 274 and 326, Criminal P. C., and he contends that the tribunal was illegally constituted and that all the proceedings should be set aside.

Now, it is quite clear that under S. 274 where any accused person is charged with an offence punishable with death, the jury should consist of not less than seven persons and, if practicable, of nine persons. By S. 326 it is provided that the Sessions Judge, should send a letter to the District Magistrate requesting him to summon a number of persons, the number to be summoned not being less than double the number required for any such trial. The exact effect of that section I will not now attempt to define, but it, at least, sets a minimum standard for the number to be summoned and S. 327 also (where it is applied) can and should be applied so as to comply with this. In the present case only twelve jurors were summoned; and only eight persons appeared out of the 12. In these circumstances, the concluding words of S. 274 could take no operation whatever. Now, so far as can be seen, it was quite practicable to have this case tried by a jury of nine; but the manner in which the jury was empanelled and the insufficiency of the number of jurors summoned defeated the intention of the section.

Mr. Fazlul Huq, in addition to this, has referred to the judgment of my learned brother, C. C. Ghose, J., in the case of Roson Ali v. Emperor (1). This judgment gives rise to several additional questions to which it is open to Mr. Huq to refer. With regard to these questions, I do not propose to say anything now, because, in my judgment, it is unnecessary to delay this case so as to deal with them. I am of opinion that, contrary to the intention of the Code and to the standard set by the legislature, an unreasonably small number of jurors was summoned with the result that it was not possible to have a jury of nine and that the proceedings ought not to be allowed to stand. The position is that the tribunal was illegally constituted and, in my judgment, in a case of this character it is necessary that the whole proceedings should be set aside and the case remitted for retrial.

As regards bail: we will put the appellants back to the position in which they were at the time when the original trial commenced so that they may give security to the satisfaction of the District Magistrate in the same amounts.

Rankin, C. J.—In these cases Mr. Suhrawardy and Graham, JJ. have differed on a question of law which has been referred to us under S. 98, Civil P. C., in the following terms :

Whether in the circumstances of the present cases, time to be reckoned under S. 181, Lim. Act, should be counted from the date of the decrees of the High Court dismissing the appeals from the decrees of the lower appellate Court, or from the dates of the pronouncement of the decrees of the lower appellate Court, or whether the respondents are entitled to get deduction of the period occupied by the appeals to this Court.

The facts which give meaning to this question of law are as follows :

The plaintiff brought a series of rent suits against tenants and on 31st July 1919 obtained decrees from the Court of first instance for the amount of his claim. During the pendency of appeals in the lower appellate Court, the plaintiff realized by execution the whole of his decretal amounts. Thereafter, on 14th August 1920, the lower appellate Court allowed the appeals in part and reduced the amounts for which the plaintiff could plaintiff's appeal from this decision was dismissed by the High Court. In May and June 1924 the tenants made applications under S. 144, Civil P. C., for restitution of the amounts which in execution of the trial Court's decree had been paid by them in excess of the sums ultimately decreed to be due. These applications have been resisted by the plaintiff upon the ground of limitation, the contention being that Art. 181 of the Schedule of the Lim. Act of 1908 governs this matter and that the right of the tenants to apply for restitution under S. 144, Civil P. C., accrued to them more than three years before May 1924, namely, on 14th August 1920 when the lower appellate Court reduced the amounts of the plaintiff's decrees. The Munsif and the District Judge have both rejected the plaintiff's contention and Graham, J., in this Court has taken the same view. Suhrawardy, J., on the other hand has thought the plaintiff's contention to be correct.

Both the learned Judges in this Court are in agreement that the article applicable to the case is Art. 181 and not Art. 182. Thinking this question to be well settled so far as this High Court is concerned they have not thought fit to state the point of law, upon which they differed, as broadly as they might have done, e. g., by making a reference on the question whether the applications under S. 144, Civil P. C., are barred by limitation. The reference has been made in a limited form and upon the basis that the article applicable is Art. 181. This has been done deliberately by the learned Judges and I see no reason to quarrel with this exercise of discretion. This method of reference is now provided both by Cl. 37, Letters Patent, and by S. 98 of the Code and the method will be productive of much disorder and absurdity unless the terms of these enactments are strictly complied with. However tempting it may be to argue other points than the point or points referred, the temptation must be resisted. At the hearing we accordingly refused to discuss once more the question of the applicability of Art. 181 to applications under S. 144 of the Code. It is a matter upon which different High Courts have taken different views and are likely to go on taking different views for many years.

The view taken by Suhrawardy, J., was that unless it could be held that by reason of the plaintiff's appeal from the decrees of the District Judge the tenants' right to claim restitution was suspended, it must be held that their right accrued on the date of his decrees. Following the decision in Sarat Kamini Dasi v. Nagendra Nath Pal (1), he held that no doctrine of suspension was applicable to these cases and that there was no other principle of law under which the time prescribed by Art. 181 could be extended. Graham, J., on the other hand held that time ran against the tenants only from the date when the final pronouncement was made in the proceedings instituted to test the propriety of the first Court's decrees. He thought it reasonable to hold that in such cases as the present limitation is saved on the ground that the relief granted by the decrees of the District Judge was imperilled by the appeals. He was accordingly prepared to follow the decision of a Division Bench in the case of Atul Chandra v. Kunja Behary (2), and to hold that the tenants' applications for restitution were in time.

It may be as well to deal first with the suggestion that the tenants' conduct in postponing their applications until the decision of the High Court had been given upon the matter, was reasonable and not negligent and that it would be a hardship in the circumstances of these cases to say that the law required them to make their applications within three years from the decision of the District Judge. If the case for the tenants has to be put upon such grounds it must, in my opinion be rejected for more than one reason. It appears to me that in applying the Indian Limitation Act to particular cases the Courts are not warranted in introducing savings or exceptions which are not found in the statute either because these may be within the reason of other exceptions which are to be found in the statute or because of considerations of mere hardship. In this respect I agree entirely with the judgment of Suhrawardy, J. I am of opinion further that in the present cases there is no hardship. In Harish Chandra Saha v. Chandramohan Das (3), an ex-parte decree had been obtained and satisfied in execution. It was subsequently set aside and upon a retrial the suit was dismissed with costs. Upon an application for refund of the money paid in satisfaction of the ex-parte decree, it was contended that the right to apply did not accrue on the setting aside of the ex-parte decree but on the passing of the final decree dismissing the suit. It was said by Stevens, J. :

We think that there is nothing in this contention. The decree which had been satisfied was the ex-parte decree. Since that decree was set aside the appellants were entitled to a refund. They were in no way bound to allow the amount which they had already paid to remain in the decree-holder's hands in case the suit should eventually be decreed against them.

It is to be observed that S. 144 of our present Code makes it obligatory upon the Court of first instance to grant restitution :

Where and in so far as the decree is varied or reversed.

In the present case the decrees of the District Judge were dated 14th August 1920 and those of the High Court 8th August 1923. It seems unreasonable to say that for the tenants to leave the excess amounts in the pocket of their landlord for some three years without applying for a refund thereof was to take a course which practical good sense dictated, so as to prevent it being said with truth or justice that their conduct was dilatory. It appears to me therefore that the tenants' case must be rested upon other grounds.

The only other ground to which they can resort is the doctrine of which the best known and most frequently repeated exposition is to be found in the judgment of Mitter, J., in Ram Charan Bysak v. Lakhi Kant Bannik (4), a case decided under the Limitation Act, 1859 :

Whether the decree of the appellate Court is for reversing or for affirming the decree against which the appeal is preferred, it is, in either case, the final decree in the cause, and as such the only decree which is capable of being enforced by execution, after it is once pronounced. If the decree of the lower Court is reversed by the appellate Court it is absolutely dead and gone. If on the other hand it is affirmed by the appellate Court it is equally dead and gone, though in a different way, namely, by being merged in the decree of the superior Court, which takes its place for all intents and purposes. Both the decrees cannot exist simultaneously.

It does not appear to me that the decision in Atul Chandra v. Kunja Behary (2), proceeded upon this principle. Rather it would appear to have proceeded upon notions of due diligence or of hardship from which I have already expressed my dissent. But in Fazalar Rahaman v. Abdul Samad (5), in appeal from an appellate order, where the facts were very similar to the facts of the present cases, it was held that the time for an application for restitution ran from the date when the decree of reversal was affirmed in second appeal and not from the date of the decree of reversal. That was a decision of Newbould and B. B. Ghosh, JJ., and it was based upon the observations of Mitter, J., in the case to which I have referred. Reliance was also placed on Uma Charan v. Nibaran (6), where, on a similar line of reasoning, it was held that when a preliminary decree in a mortgage suit has been affirmed on appeal, an application for a final decree is an application to make final the decree of the appellate Court and that under Art. 181, Lim. Act, time runs from the date of the appellate Court's decree. The decision of Newbould and B. B. Ghosh, JJ., does not appear to have been cited before the Division Bench which made this reference and the line of argument disclosed therein has not been discussed in either of the judgments. In my opinion, however, our answer to this reference must depend upon the view which we take of the applicability to the present question of the principle therein relied on.

Now, the article with which we are concerned, Art. 181, is in the full sense of the word a residuary article which is limited in its scope to applications. The broad scheme of the Limitation Act is that so far as possible the terminus a quo of the period of limitation shall be stated specifically with reference to each class of suit, appeal or application. The old English statutes of limitation had been content to prescribe the period by putting as the limit so many years after the cause of action. The Indian Legislature endeavours in detail by the Limitation Act to state in the third column of the schedule, the event which is to be taken as completing a cause of action, that is the date from which time begins to run. The language of the third column of the schedule should in general, if not indeed always, be so interpreted as to carry out the true intention of the legislature, that is to say to date the cause of action from the date on which the remedy is available to the party. This principle has been applied to the first clause in the third column of Art. 182, Rungiah Goundan & Co. v. Nanjappa Row (7); cf. M. Vittil Seeti v. Kunhi Pathummal (8).

In Art. 181 the legislature makes provision not for one definite type of cases but for an unknown number of cases of all kinds. The provision which it makes is specific as regards the period of limitation but as regards the terminus a quo it is content to state in general language and quite simply the fundamental principle that for the purposes of any particular application time is to run from the moment at which the applicant first had the right to make it.

When in a case such as the present we are asked to import language to the effect that decrees become dead when they are affirmed on appeal, it is necessary to be careful lest we be ridden by a metaphor. This becomes all the more necessary when it appears that the language employed was directed to the question of execution, a question which has since been dealt with by what is now Art. 182 of the Schedule to the Lim. Act, with which we are now concerned. Mitter, J. was applying his mind really to put the matter in terms of the Lim. Act of 1908, to the question whether Art. 182 or Art. 183 is applicable to the cases of execution of a decree of a provincial civil Court which has been affirmed on appeal by the High Court. Still greater caution is suggested by the fact that the language employed by the draftsman of the schedule to the Act of 1908 is in Art. 182 inconsistent with the rigour of the metaphor in question. Art. 182 speaks of the execution of a decree or order and dates the terminus a quo in a case where there has been an appeal from the order sought to be executed, from the date of the final decree or order of the appellate Court or the withdrawal of the appeal. I do not say this by way of casting doubt upon the view that where a decree has been affirmed by a High Court on appeal limitation for purposes of execution runs afresh from the appellate decree. Nor am I desirous of disputing that in such cases the appellate decree is the only decree which can be amended, Muhammad

Sulaiman v. Muhammad Yar Khan (9), or which can be reviewed, Chandra Kant v. Lakshman (10), or which can operate as res judicata, Kailash Chandra v. Girija Sundari (11), or which can be made final or absolute, Gajadhar Singh v. Kishan Jivan Lal Khan (12), Uma Charan v. Nibaran (6), or which puts an end to the period for which mesne profits can be ascertained, Bhup Indar v. Bijai (13). For each of these propositions there is specific practical reason. Indeed there are decisions of the Judicial Committee covering most of these points Brij Narain v. Tejbal Bikram (14), Abdul Majid v. Jawahir Lal (15), Bhup Indar v. Bijai Bahadur (13). If, however, the full vigour of Mitter, J.'s language is pressed in the present case, I cannot omit to point out that that language itself was considered by the Judicial Committee in the case of Kristo Kinkar Roy v. Raja Burroda Caunt Roy (16), at 488 to 492. In the view taken by the Board it became unnecessary to decide the question whether the decree of the High Court affirming a decree of a Zillah Court was to be taken to incorporate the latter in itself, so that for the purposes of execution, the decree to be executed was to be taken to be a decree of the High Court. To that question the words of Mitter, J. were understood to be limited but even so the opinion intimated was:

If the question were res integra, their Lordships would incline to the view taken by the Judges of the High Court in the present case, viz. that the execution ought to proceed on a decree, of which the mandatory part expressly declares the right sought to be enforced. Considering, however, that, for the reasons already given, the question is not of much practical importance, their Lordships will not express dissent from the rulings of the Madras Court, and of the Full Bench of the Bengal Court, further than by saying, that there may be cases in which the appellate Court, particularly on special appeal, might see good reasons to limit its decision to a simple dismissal of the appeal, and to abstain from confirming a decree erroneous or questionable, yet not open to examination by reasons of the special and limited nature of the appeal.

The Privy Council appears to me to have had difficulty in appreciating that there is any necessity or reason that decrees become dead for all purposes when affirmed.

The decision of the Privy Council in Juscurn v Prithichand (17), was a direct refusal to apply the principle that a decree which has been affirmed in appeal is for all purposes dead. In that case the question of limitation arose on a claim by the purchaser of a patni taluq at a sale for arrears of rent under Bengal Regulation 8 of 1819 in suits by the darpattnidars to which the purchaser was a party. The sale had been set aside by the District Judge on 24th August 1905 and the High Court on appeal affirmed his decision on 3rd August 1906. The appellant sued for certain sums he had been required to pay to the zamindar and his suit was treated as a suit for money paid for an existing consideration which afterwards failed. The question was whether the three years prescribed by Art. 97, Lim. Act, 1877, should run from the date of the decision of the District Judge or the decision of the High Court, acting upon the footing that it was the reversal of the sale which constituted the plaintiff's cause of action, the decision of the Board, delivered by Sir Lowrence Jenkins, was in these terms:

Both the Courts have held that the failure of consideration was at the date of the first Court's decree. Their Lordships feel no doubt that as between these two decrees this is the correct view, for whatever may be the theory under other systems of law, under the Indian law and procedure an original decree is not suspended by presentation of an appeal nor is its operation interrupted where the decree on appeal is one of dismissal.

Now Art. 97 is only a particular application of the general principle expressed in Art. 181 and, in my judgment, Art. 181 being a residuary article intended to meet all manner of cases it is necessary in applying it to see whether the nature of the case required that the decree which has been affirmed on appeal should be disregarded in arriving at the date at which the right in the applicant first accrued. That this may sometimes be necessary for the proper application of Art. 181 to applications in execution may well be thought to follow from the circumstance that it cannot be said that Art. 182 covers all possible cases of applications for execution. See Rungiah Goundan & Co. v. Nanjappa Row (7). The case of Uma Charan v. Nibaran (6), relied upon by Newbould and B. B. Ghosh JJ., in the unreported case already mentioned, is another instance of the same thing. The governing consideration in that case was that only one decree can be made final and that must be the preliminary decree of the appellate Court. It is true that the Bombay High Court in Kurgodigauda v. Ningangauda (18) applied Art. 6, Lim. Act, to an application under S. 144, Criminal P. C. on the footing that the words "an application for the execution of a decree" are not to be construed so narrowly as to exclude an application for restitution in consequence of the decree. It is further true that such an application may be said to be concerned with the working out of the decree which varies or reverses the decision of the lower Court. It is an application for relief which is consequential upon the appellate Court's decree of reversal. But the relief is not in all cases granted by the decree of the appellate Court taken by itself. If it is so granted, then a case arises of the character which was decided in this Court in Appeal from Appellate Order 301 of 1922, on 27th August 1923. In such a case the remedy provided by S. 144, Civil P. C. is not required.

All that it is necessary to do is to have execution of the appellate Court's decree as it stands. To such a case Art. 182 would apply as was held by Chatterjea and Panton, JJ. But the application to be made under S. 144 is an application which must be made to the Court of first instance whether the decree varied or reversed was passed by that Court or a higher Court. That Court has to determine whether the applicant is entitled to any and what benefits by way of restitution or otherwise by reason of the decree of the appellate Court varying or reversing a previous decree. We have to determine this case under Art. 181, Lim. Act, which directs us in general language to find out the date on which the applicants' right accrued. In the ordinary and natural meaning of the words their right accrued immediately the District Judge reversed the decision of the trial Court and reduced the amount of the plaintiff's claim. Unless, therefore, we are required by reason of the nature of the matter to ignore the effect of that decision because it was confirmed on appeal it seems to me to be wrong to do so. To refuse so to do does not involve the proposition that two decrees for the same thing may be executed simultaneously. Nor does it involve, so far as I can see, the affirmation of any other proposition that can be regarded as inconvenient or absurd. I am of opinion therefore that we should answer the question put to us by saying that the time to be reckoned under Art. 181, Lim. Act, should be counted from the decrees of the lower appellate Court and that the tenants are not entitled to get deduction of the period occupied by the appeals to the Court.

As no further point remains to be determined the judgment of Suhrawardy, J. must take effect; the appeals of the plaintiff must be allowed and the tenants' application under S. 144, Civil P. C. must in each case be dismissed. There will be no order as to costs save that the plaintiff must have the costs of the hearing before us. Five gold mohurs for the whole case.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal against an order made under O. 22, R 10, Civil P. C. by the District Judge of the 24-Perganas. It arises out of an application made by the appellant for continuing an appeal which has been preferred by the respondent pending in the Court of the District Judge on the allegation that the interest of the respondent in the appeal had devolved on the appellant. The District Judge rejected the application and hence this appeal.

The facts are very simple. There is a well-known foundation of Mohamed Mohsin of the Hooghly Imambara. There is a committee appointed under the Religious Endowment Act 20 of 1863 for the management of the endowment. The committee it appears from time to time appoints a manager or mutwali for the performance of the duties in connexion with the foundation. In this case the President of the managing committee advertised in the news papers, a copy of which has been exhibited in this case Ex. 7, inviting applicants for the post of Mutwali of the Hooghly Imambara. It appears that the respondent answered to the advertisement and an agreement was entered into between the members of the committee and the respondent Syed Altaf Hossain under which he was appointed Mutwali for a period of three years with option to the managing committee to continue the appointment if they so chose. There was a term in the agreement that the Mutwali was liable to dismissal by the Committee without assigning any reason by simply giving him three months notice. What happened was that respondent Altaf Hossain was appointed mutwali or manager from the 1st March 1923. Towards the end of the term this gentleman expressed a desire that the period of his appointment should be extended, and after some correspondence as the Judge notes, the committee informed him on 21st January 1926 that he would be reappointed as mutwali for a further period of three years with effect from the 1st March 1926. Subsequently however on the 16th March the committee addressed a letter to this gentleman in the following terms :

We have the honour to inform you that in accordance with the terms of the agreement approved by you on 17th January 1926 on the basis of which you took charge of the office of mutwali (or manager) of the Hoogly Imambara on the morning of the 1st March 1926, we dispense with your services on and from 1st July 1926 under Cl. 5 of the aforesaid agreement and that you are requested to make over charge of the office of mutwali (or manager) to the new mutwali (or manager) to be appointed by the committee hereafter or in his absence to the Dewan and Seristadar of the Imambara or in his absence to the Peshkar.

It is said that the appellant before us Syed 'Ajaz Hossain Jafri was subsequently appointed mutwali, by the committee. On such appointment the appellant applied to the District Judge for an order under O. 22, R. 10, Civil P. C. The suit out of which the appeal is pending before the District Judge was one for setting aside a lease created in favour of the defendant in that suit by the previous mutwali. The succeeding mutwali named Riezuddin brought the suit originally. He was the mutwali then for a term of three years and after his term expired one Ali Kazmaini was appointed in his place and he was substituted as plaintiff in the suit, and after his term expired the present respondent before us Altaf Hossain was substituted in his place. Now after what has happened the present appellant applies to be substituted in the appeal pending before the District Judge in place of the respondent. The appeal it may be mentioned is Title Appeal No. 386 of 1925.

The reason assigned by the learned District Judge is that under the general provisions of the Mahomedan law the mutwali is a permanent official and, therefore, the position of the mutwali is such that the committee is not in a position to dismiss him. With the general proposition of law as enunciated by the District Judge there is no reason to differ. But in the present case the difficulty seems to me to be this that the mutwali, or by whatever name this manager may be called, is not a mutwali appointed under Mahomedan law.

Under the Mahomedan law the appointment of a mutwali can be made by the donor and the succession to the appointment must be in accordance with the provisions of the deed of endowment if there is any. The succession to the office of mutwali may be in accordance with the desire of the donor if he is alive, or if the intention of the founder cannot be ascertained from any established usage, then the appointment may be made by the executor of the founder and failing all these the power of appointment is in the Court which represents the power of the Kazi. In no circumstances can the mutwali properly so called under the Mahomedan law be appointed in the manner in which the respondent Altaf Hossain was appointed mutwali. It can hardly be consistent with the Mahomedan law that the office of mutwali should be advertized and a gentleman who may be qualified in every respect should be appointed for a period of three years or for a further period at the option of the members of the committee. A person appointed in such a way cannot invoke under the provisions of the Mahomedan law the powers of a mutwali. The respondent Altaf Hossain entered into an agreement, dated 1st March 1923 which embodied the terms by which he was to hold office. It is unnecessary to recite all the terms, but under these terms he was liable to be dismissed by the members of the committee. As the learned District Judge has himself said that ordinarily the authority which has the power to appoint an officer has also the power of dismissal, I do not see why the ordinary power should be held in this present case as not capable of being exercised. In support of the proposition of the learned Judge that the authority which appoints has the power to dismiss, the case of Ram Charan Bajpai v. Rakhal Das Mukherji (1), may be cited. That was a case of appointment in a Hindu Trust, but the principle is the same. I do not therefore, agree with the observation of the learned District Judge that the general principles of Mahomedan law applies to the office of the respondent Altaf Hossain and I am of opinion that he is liable to be dismissed under the terms of the agreement he entered into with the members of the committee.

The next point which was urged on behalf of the respondent seemed to me during the course of the argument to be of substance, and it was urged by the learned advocate for the respondent that if it be held that Altaf Hossain was a mere servant under the members of the committee then he had no interest in the property and there was no devolution of any interest on the appellant Ajaz Hossain and therefore, no order under O. 22, R 10 should be made. It appears, however, that it has been held in the case of Sankra Murthi Mulaliar v. Chidambara Nadan (2), that a manager appointed by the members of the committee has got the right to maintain a suit for recovery of property. And it appears in this case that successive mutwalis appointed in this manner for a term of three years have been substituted in the place of original plaintiff and the present respondent Altaf Hossain was also substituted in the place of his predecessor in office whose term of office expired after three years' service. This objection cannot therefore, be raised by the respondent.

The result therefore, is whether this gentleman is properly called by the name of mutwali or not he is not really a mutwali as understood by the Mahomedan law. That being so as I have already stated his term of office expired in accordance with the contract. Whether he was rightly dismissed or not is another matter. That is a question which I understand is the subject-matter of another litigation. But so far as the present application is concerned it must be held that as the present appellant has been appointed by the committee to act as manager he should be substituted in the place of the respondent in the appeal pending before the District Judge. I do not understand why the gentleman who obtained office according to his own agreement for a limited period in answer to an advertisement in the newspapers should so desire to retain his office when his employers have discharged him in terms of his agreement.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed and it is directed that the appellant should be substituted in the place of the respondent in the appeal pending before the District Judge. The appellant is entitled to his costs in both Courts. We assess the hearing fee in this appeal at five gold mohurs. The costs will be recovered from the respondent Altaf Hossain personally.

Criminal Revns. Nos. 299 and 300 of 1928, Decided on 10th May 1928, from orders of Addl. Sub-Judge, Tippera, D/- 11th January 1928.

Criminal P. C., Ss. 471 and 475—"Detained in custody" does not mean detained in the custody of friends and relatives—It is the local Government and not Magistrate who can deliver the accused to his relations for safe custody.

"Detained in safe custody" in S. 471 does not mean having regard to the language used in S. 475, "detained in the custody of friends or relatives." [P 654 C 1]

What the magistrate or Court can do under S. 471, is to detain the accused in safe custody and report the matter to the Local Government. Under S. 475 it is the Local Government and not the Magistrate who can deliver the accused to any relative or friend of his for safe custody. [P 654 C 1]

Judgment.—No. 299. In this case what happened is this: The opposite party No 1 was tried before the Additional Sessions Judge of Tippera and a jury under S. 302, I. P. C. for having murdered his wife. The case for the defence was that the opposite party No. 1 at the time he committed the act in question was of unsound mind and therefore incapable of knowing what he was doing or that it was wrong or illegal. The jury returned a unanimous verdict of not guilty. In answer to a question put by the learned Sessions Judge to the jury, the foreman stated that the jury were of opinion that the opposite party No. 1 had killed his wife but that he was insane and incapable of knowing what he was doing. The learned Judge agreeing with the verdict of the jury acquitted the accused by his order dated 11th January 1928. He was of opinion that at the date of the aforesaid order, that is, 11th January 1928, the opposite party No. 1 was sane and he accordingly directed that he should be kept in the safe custody of his relatives, upon their furnishing two security bonds of Rs. 2,500, each to keep the opposite party No. 1 in safe custody and to prevent him from doing injury to himself or to others and to produce him if and when required by the Court. It appears that thereafter the opposite party No. 2 who is the father and the opposite party No. 3 who is the brother of opposite Party No. 1 stood surety for the opposite party No. 1 in terms of the order of the learned Judge. This order of the learned Judge was apparently made under the provisions of S. 471, Criminal P. C.

The Local Government has through the Legal Remembrancer now moved this Court and the contention on behalf of the Legal Remembrancer is that having regard to the language used in Ss. 466, 471 and 475, Criminal P. C., the order made by the learned Judge referred to above was clearly one which was without jurisdiction. It is contended that all that he could do under S. 471 was to detain the accused in safe custody and to report the matter to the Local Government and that under S. 475 it is the Local Government who can, if so satisfied, deliver the accused to any relative or friend of his for safe custody.

In our opinion, this contention is well founded, and must be given effect to. "Detained in safe custody" in S. 471 does not mean, having regard to the language used in S. 475, "detained in the custody of friends or relatives." That is quite clear. It would, therefore, follow that the learned Judge was in error in making the order in the form in which he did. That order must, therefore, be set aside and it must be left to the Local Government under S. 475 to pass suitable orders for the delivery of the accused to such relatives or friends of the accused as may apply to the Local Government in that behalf. (A similar order was passed in case No. 300.)

Civil Rule No. 1536 (s) of 1927, Decided on 17th February 1928, from decrees of Newbould and Graham, JJ., D/- 6th July 1925, in Appeal No. 481 of 1923.

Civil P. C., O. 22, R. 4—One of the appellants dying during pendency of second appeal—Legal representatives of deceased not brought on record—Appeal heard and case remanded—Fresh second appeal against decision after remand—Application for vacating the previous order of remand—Proper procedure laid down—Civil P. C., O. 47, R. 5.

While an appeal was pending in the High Court before the Division Bench, one of the appellants (defendants) died, whose legal representatives were not brought on record and the fact of his death was not intimated to the Court when the appeal was heard. Appeal was allowed and the case remanded for consideration. The lower appellate Court dismissed the suit of the plaintiff deciding the appeal in favour of the defendants. Plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court and the heir of the deceased was added as a party respondent. An application was made by the plaintiff to the Division Bench whose members were different from the previous Bench of the High Court for vacating the previous order of remand.

Held: that the proper procedure was to place the matter before the members of the Division Bench, who had decided the previous appeal: A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 676, Foll. [P 655 C 2]

Held, further: that the proper remedy was to make an application for review under O. 47, R. 5, Civil P. C.

Held, further: that it was no doubt the duty of the defendants, then appellants, to make the substitution, but that could not absolve the plaintiff from the duty of bringing to the knowledge of the Court the fact which was known to them that one of the then appellants-defendants had died, so as to secure proper representation of the parties in appeal. Cuming and Mukerji, JJ.—Civil Rule No. 1345 (s) of 1927: We have heard the parties. This rule is made absolute. Let Sreemati Bipin Mohatani the mother and sole heiress of the deceased respondent 17 be added as a party respondent in appeal from appellate decree No. 2232 of 1926.

The opposite party is entitled to the costs of this rule the hearing fee being assessed at two gold mohurs.

Civil Rule No. 1536 (s) of 1927: This rule was issued by my learned brother Mr. Justice Charu Chunder Ghose and Mr. Justice Buckland calling on the defendants-appellants and defendants-respondents to show cause why the decree of this Court dated 6th July 1925, as mentioned in the petition should not be vacated or why such other or further orders should not be passed as to this Court may seem fit and proper for the reasons stated in the application. The facts of the case are briefly as follows: The petitioners who have obtained this rule brought a suit for recovery of khas possession against a number of defendants one of whom was named Dolegobinda. This suit was dismissed. But the plaintiffs appealed to the District Court and on 31st October 1922 this appeal was decreed in favour of the plaintiffs.

On 20th December 1922 a second appeal was filed to this Court by all the defendants, among them was the aforementioned Dolegobinda. On 1st October 1923 Dolegobinda, who was one of the appellants, died. No attempt was made to bring his heirs on the record in his place. Neither does it appear that the Court knew of his death at the time of the hearing of this appeal. There were 28 Respondents to this appeal. This is perhaps the reason why the fact was lost sight of. This appeal was heard by Mr. Justice Newbould and Mr. Justice Graham on 6th July 1925 and it was ordered that the appeal should be remanded to the lower Court for a rehearing of the case. The appeal was heard and decided on 17th July 1926 by the District Court in favour of the defendants. The plaintiffs then filed a second appeal to this Court making Dolegobinda, the dead man, a party. Having now discovered that Dolegobinda died before the decision of the remand order the plaintiffs have now come to this Court and have obtained this rule to show cause why the order of remand of this Court dated 6th July 1925 should not be vacated or why such other or further orders should not be made as to this Court may seem fit and proper. It seems to us that it is not open to us in this rule to vacate the order passed by Mr. Justice Newbould and Mr. Justice Graham. The proper procedure to follow is the one which was described by Mr. Justice Mookerjee in the case of Abdul Aziz v. Lakhmi Chandra Majumdar (1), namely, that the papers of this case should now be placed before Mr. Justice Graham for orders.

Judgment.—This Rule was issued calling upon the opposite parties to show cause why the decree of this Court made by Mr. Justice Newbould and myself on 6th July 1925 should not be vacated or such other order made as might be deemed fit and proper. The rule came before my learned brothers Cuming and Mukerji, JJ., who in their order dated 17th February last expressed their opinion that it was not open to them to vacate the decree, and that the proper procedure to follow in the circumstances was the procedure described by Mr. Justice Asutosh Mookerjee in the case of Abdul Aziz v. Lakhmi Chandra Mazumdar (1), namely that the case should be placed before me for orders.

At the outset of the argument before me Mr. Chakravarti, on behalf of the opposite parties raised the question whether I had jurisdiction to hear the Rule without an order from the Chief Justice, and suggested that the formal orders of the Chief Justice should be obtained. The matter was accordingly referred to the learned Chief Justice who intimated that there is no need of any further order. It may be taken therefore that the order passed by Cuming and Mukerji, JJ., is correct and that there is no substance in the objection as to my jurisdiction.

The facts out of which this Rule has arisen are shortly these: The petitioners brought a suit for recovery of khas possession of certain plots of land against a number of defendants, one of whom was named Dolegobinda. That suit was dismissed by the Munsif on 13th May 1922. The plaintiffs appealed to the District

(1) A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 676.

Judge and on 31st October 1922 the appeal was decreed in favour of the plaintiffs. On 20th December 1922 a second appeal was filed in this Court by the defendants among whom was the aforementioned Dolegobinda. On 1st October 1923 Dolegobinda died. No steps were, however, taken to bring his heirs on the record in his place, and the fact of his death was not known to this Court at the time of the hearing of the appeal. The result of the appeal to this Court was that the case was remanded to the lower Court for re-hearing. Thereafter the appeal was reheard by the District Judge on 17th July 1926 and decided in favour of the defendants. The plaintiffs then filed a second appeal to this Court making Dolegobinda a party. Having now, however, as they allege, discovered that Dolegobinda died before the remand order by this Court, the plaintiffs applied for and obtained this Rule on the ground already stated.

It has been urged on behalf of the petitioners, that the decree being in favour of a dead person, to wit, the said deceased Dolegobinda, is a nullity, and that the appeal was improperly constituted.

On behalf of the opposite parties Mr. Chakravarti urged three points: firstly, that the application is misconceived, and that the decree passed by a Division Bench of this Court can only be set aside or altered on an application for review; secondly, that the petitioners were well aware of the fact of Dolegobinda's death on 12th January 1925, and that notwithstanding that knowledge when after the remand they were appellants in the Court of appeal below they took no steps for substitution, third and lastly, that the matter is now pending in second appeal No. 2232 of 1926 filed in this Court on 8th November 1926, in which the heirs of Dolegobinda have been added as respondents, and that that being so any question as to the effect of the remand by this Court can be decided in that appeal.

In my opinion these contentions on behalf of the opposite parties are well founded and must prevail. In the first place the matter is one which must be dealt with on the footing that it comes under O. 47, R. 5, Civil P. C. As an application for review it is hopelessly out of time, and inasmuch as the petitioners were well aware even before the hearing of the second appeal in July 1925 that Dolegobinda was dead, and that knowledge has not, as they allege, only recently come to them, there can be no question of extension of the period of limitation. When the second appeal was before this Court it was no doubt the duty of the defendants-appellants to make the substitution, but that could not, as it seems to be, absolve the plaintiffs from the duty of bringing to the knowledge of the Court the fact, which was known to them, that one of the defendants had died, so as to secure proper representation of the parties in the appeal.

As to the second contention: it is conclusively established by the affidavit in reply that the petitioners were all along fully aware of the death of Dolegobinda. On 12th January 1925, after they had obtained their decree in the lower appellate Court and during the pendency of the second appeal (No. 481 of 1923) in this Court they instituted a suit for mesne profits in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, of Bankura making Bipin Mohatani defendant 17 in the said suit, on the death of Dolegobinda Mahto, as his sole heir and widow. It is idle for them, therefore, now to pretend they were not aware of this fact.

Finally as Dolegobinda's heirs have been added as respondents in the second appeal (No. 2232 of 1926) now pending in this Court any question as to the effect of the remand by this Court can be if necessary considered in that appeal. The learned vakil for the petitioners conceded that this is so.

For the reasons stated I am of opinion that this application is misconceived and wholly devoid of any merits. The Rule is accordingly discharged with costs which are assessed at three gold mohurs.

Where it is found that the joint presence of the husband and another woman is not a mere farce staged for the purpose of allowing the wife to constitute divorce proceedings, but is an incident in the course of a liaison, adultery on the part of the husband may be held as proved. *Farnham v. So far as decrees for the dissolution of marriage granted in India, the parties to which were domiciled in England or Scotland but resident in India, are concerned, they are for all purposes to be regarded as valid [P 661 C 2]

(c) Divorce Act (1839), S. 7—S. 7 deals with procedure

Section 7 cannot be read as interfering with or extending the grounds of dissolution of marriage, as set forth in S. 10, the section can only have reference to matters of machinery and questions of procedure and the amount of proof required in matters of this kind. [P 662 C 1, 2]

The words of Prov. (a), S. 1 (1), are intended to mean that the grounds on which a decree for the dissolution of marriage of a British subject domiciled in England may be granted by a High Court in India shall be those on which such a decree might be granted by the Divorce Court in England according to the law for the time being in force in England, i. e., according to the law laid down in S. 176 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act of 1925, and therefore it is sufficient for a wife petitioner domiciled in England to establish to the satisfaction of the Court in India the adultery of a respondent husband: A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 871, Held wrongly decided and A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 874, Doubtful. [P 666 C 1]

Judgment.—This is a petition by Margaret Barnard 'praying for a dissolution of her marriage with the respondent George Henry Barnard on the ground of his adultery with a woman unknown on 17th November 1927. The petitioner was married to the respondent on 18th October 1917 according to the rights of the Christian Church at the Wesleyan Church at Jhansi. At the time of the marriage the respondent was domiciled in England and before her marriage the petitioner was also domiciled in England and after the marriage they retained their English domicile. It was duly averred in the petition that the respondent at the time of the presentation of the petition was domiciled in England. It may therefore be taken that when this petition was filed both the parties to the marriage were domiciled in England. Both the parties to the marriage profess the Christian religion. It appears from the evidence of the petitioner that after her marriage she and the respondent lived and cohabited together first of all at Jhansi and afterwards at No. 5, Carnac Street, Calcutta and finally at No. 9 Rawdon Street in Calcutta, and therefore the place where the parties last resided together was within the jurisdiction of this Court.

The suit was brought under the Statute 16 and 17, Geo. V, Ch. 40, which is the Indian and Colonial Divorce (Jurisdiction) Act, 1926, and accordingly the petition was in the form required by the rules made under that Act which form is similar to that of the petition for dissolution of marriage in use in England. The petitioner as required by Prov. (a), S. 1, sub-S. (1) of the Statute (16 and 17 Geo. V, Ch. 40) stated in para. 9 of her petition that in the interest of justice it is desirable that this suit should be determined in India inasmuch as the petitioner for want of sufficient means was prevented from taking proceedings in the Courts in England and the witnesses to the charge of adultery are in Calcutta.

So far as the facts of the case are concerned the petitioner has established to my satisfaction all the necessary formal averments in her petition and she has proved before me that the respondent has been guilty of adultery as alleged in para. 8 of the petition.

At the end of the first day's hearing I was somewhat dubious as to whether or not adultery on the part of the respondent has been sufficiently established. At that stage of the case the evidence merely came to this: that the respondent on the evening of 17th November 1927 had come to the Continental Hotel in Calcutta and had there entered in the Registration Book the names "Mr. and Mrs. Barnard" and the evidence of a clerk from the hotel indicated that the respondent stayed for the night at that hotel with a lady who was not the petitioner. The khansama from the hotel in question was called to say that on the next morning, somewhere about 9-30, he was summoned to room No. 77 (which was the number of the room set against the names of Mr and Mrs. Barnard) and that there he found the respondent and a lady seated in the bed-room; both of them were however fully dressed. The khansama further stated that in pursuance of an order given to him by the respondent he served breakfast to the respondent and the lady in the bed-room in question.

Counsel for the petitioner invited me to infer from those facts alone that the respondent had in fact committed adultery, but I was inclined to take the view that had the case stopped at that point the matter would have fallen within the decision of Lord Merivale in the case of Farnham v. Farnham (1). There the learned President said:

It was impossible to make a decree on the case as first presented to me. It came before the Court as if a married man who wished to be divorced had only to go to an hotel with a woman to achieve that end, and that, if he did so, the Court was of necessity obliged to grant a decree. If the Court were so to hold it would be the greatest possible encouragement to collusive proceedings. Divorce by consent is not part of the law in England.

In that case the learned President gave an opportunity to the petitioner in the case to call further evidence and following that precedent I allowed the petitioner in the present suit to be recalled on the second day's hearing in order to give additional evidence, and having heard that evidence of the petitioner I came to the same sort of conclusion as Lord Merivale finally arrived at in Farnham v. Farnham (1), and I was then fully satisfied that the joint presence of the respondent and the woman at the hotel was an incident in the course of a liaison and not a mere farce played for the purpose of obtaining the divorce.

I came to that conclusion because the petitioner produced and proved before me two letters written to her by the respondent whilst she was away in England from which it seemed quite clear that the respondent had committed adultery with a certain woman and that that woman had had a child by him. The further evidence of the petitioner put an entirely different complexion upon the case from that which it bore after the first day's hearing and her evidence showed that the real facts were as follows: The petitioner had proceeded to England in the year 1923 expecting the respondent to follow her shortly afterwards which, however, he failed to do and thereafter owing apparently to financial stringency the petitioner was unable to return to India at the time she had intended but was obliged to remain on in England. It appears that letters from her husband as time went on became less and less frequent and he soon ceased to afford her any financial assistance whatever. Thereafter she received the first of the two letters to which I have already referred (dated 4th June 1925) in which her husband made definite confession of adultery and subsequently she received the second letter (which was dated 2nd September 1925) in which her husband informed her that the woman with whom he had been associating had given birth to a child. Apparently the petitioner made up her mind that it would be easier to prosecute divorce proceedings in India rather than in England, and accordingly she returned to this country in the latter part of the year 1926. For a time she stayed with her brother somewhere upcountry and then in the early part of 1927 she came down to Calcutta and instead of there and then commencing divorce proceedings against her husband she managed to effect a reconciliation with him and in fact not only forgave him for the misconduct which he had admitted but also in law condoned the adultery which had taken place by resuming cohabitation with her husband and living with him for some months at the address which I have already mentioned namely 9, Rawdon Street. Subsequently, however, she discovered that her husband was still associating and carrying on a correspondence with the woman with whom he had committed adultery and consequently the petitioner left the respondent and went to reside once more with her brother upcountry. Towards the latter part of 1927 the petitioner came down to Calcutta, apparently because another brother of hers was ill, and she thereupon or soon after discovered that the respondent had stayed at the Continental Hotel with a woman on the night of 17th November as I have already described. It was clear to me from the evidence of the Hotel clerk that the lady with whom the respondent stayed on the night of the 17th was the same person with whom he had previously confessed to having committed adultery. It was manifest, therefore, as I have already stated, that the joint presence of the respondent and the lady at the Continental Hotel was part of an association of long standing and not a mere sporadic incident merely staged for the purpose of allowing the petitioner to institute divorce proceedings. Accordingly, so far as the facts of this case are concerned, no difficulty arises. I find as a fact that the respondent did commit adultery as set forth in the petition. I am also satisfied from the evidence of the petitioner that in the words of proviso (d), sub-Cl. 1, S. 1 of the Act of 1926 there was sufficient cause which prevented the petitioner from taking proceedings in the Court of the country in which she is domiciled, i. e., England, and I am satisfied that in the interest of justice that it is desirable that this suit should be determined in India.

The real question, however, which I have to determine in this case is whether or not on the proper construction of the statute (16 and 17 Geo. V. C. 40) read in conjunction with the existing law with regard to dissolution of marriage in India the petitioner is entitled to a decree for the dissolution of her marriage upon the ground of the respondent's adultery alone. No other ground was alleged in the petition and as far as the evidence goes it appears that the petitioner is not in a position to make a charge of any matrimonial offence against the respondent other than that of adultery. The whole question, therefore, is whether or not under the existing law it is sufficient for a wife petitioner domiciled in England to establish to the satisfaction of the Court in India the adultery of a respondent husband.

This question which I have to decide is of some public importance because apparently this is the first suit arising under the provisions of the 'Indian and Colonial Divorce (Jurisdiction) Act of 1926. The point for decision is a matter which may affect the matrimonial rights of all British subjects resident in India but domiciled in England or in Scotland. It is, therefore, to be regretted that a point of such far reaching effect should have arisen for decision in an undefended suit. Having regard to the importance of the matter I indicated that in my view the Advocate-General, as the authority appointed to give instructions to the Proctor under the provisions of the Act, ought to be represented at the hearing of this suit. Accordingly at the adjourned hearing Mr. R. C. Bannerjee appeared to represent the Advocate-General of Bengal in order that the other side of the case might be fully put before the Court. I have derived great assistance from Mr. Bannerjee as well as from Mr. Charles Bagram who appeared for the petitioner.

Now, in order to ascertain what the present legal position is, it is perhaps desirable to consider for a moment the matter in its historical aspect. By the Divorce Act of 1869 (which is Act 4 of 1869), passed by the Indian Legislature on 26th February 1869, for the purpose of conferring on certain Courts jurisdiction in matters matrimonial, it was enacted that that Act should extend to the whole of British India and also to British subjects in dominions mentioned in the Act, that is, certain Dominions of Princes and States in India in alliance with the British Crown, but nothing in that Act contained authorized any Court to grant any relief under the Act except in the cases where the petitioner professes the Christian religion and resides in India at the time of presenting the petition, or to make decrees of dissolution of a marriage except in the following cases:

(a) Where the marriage shall have been solemnized in India; and

(b) where the adultery, rape or unnatural crime complained of shall have been committed in India; or

(c) where the husband has since the solemnization of the marriage exchanged his profession of Christianity for the profession of some other form of religion, or to make decrees of nullity of marriage except in cases where the marriage has been solemnized in India.

Accordingly under that Act the power to grant relief other than divorce was limited to cases where the petitioner professed the Christian religion and resided in India, and in cases of dissolution of marriage it was necessary that a marriage should have been solemnized in India or the matrimonial offence committed in India or that the husband should have exchanged Christianity for some other form of religion.

It is to be observed, therefore, that the basis of the jurisdiction conferred by the Act of 1869 was the residence of the petitioner at the time of presenting the petition, and upon that footing for a space of something like 50 or 60 years, apparently, decrees for dissolution of marriage were from time to time granted by the various High Courts in India. The validity of such decrees was, however, challenged in 1921 in the case of Keyes v. Keyes and Gray (2) and it was there decided by Sir Henry Duke, President of the Divorce Court in England, that the Courts in India had in fact no jurisdiction to make decrees for dissolution of marriage in the case of parties not domiciled in India, even though the marriage was celebrated in India and the parties were resident in India, and the acts of adultery relied on were committed within the jurisdiction of the Indian Courts. The learned President in the course of his judgment pointed out that Lord Westbury in the case of Shand v. Gould (3) stated it to be one of the rules generally observed by Christians and civilized states that questions of personal status depend on the law of the actual domicile of the party concerned, and the learned President came to the conclusion that the Indian Councils Act of 1861, which was then the statute empowering the Governor-General in Council in India to make laws and regulations, does not warrant the making of a law to empower Courts in India to decree dissolution of the marriage of persons not domiciled within their jurisdiction. In other words, the effect of the decision in Keyes v. Keyes and Gray (2) is that the power to decree a dissolution of marriage even in India must be based upon the domicile of the parties and not upon the question of residence only. The effect of Keyes v. Keyes and Gray (2) was to invalidate a very large number of decrees for dissolution of marriage which had been made by the Indian Courts upon the footing of the residence of the parties. Accordingly it became necessary that an Act of Parliament should be passed in order to validate such decrees. Such an Act was passed in the year 1921 under the title of the Indian Divorce Act whereby it was enacted that any decree granted under the Act of the Indian Legislature known as the Indian Divorce Act of 1869 was confirmed and made absolute under the provisions of that Act for dissolution of marriage, the parties to which at the time of the commencement of the proceedings were domiciled in the United Kingdom, and any order made by the Court in relation to any such decree was to be valid and to be deemed always to have been valid in all respects as though the parties to the marriage had been domiciled in India.

The case of Keyes v. Keyes and Gray (2) also in effect decided that if and in so far as it purported to confer jurisdiction to grant decrees for dissolution of marriage based on residence only the Divorce Act of 1869 was ultra vires the Indian Legislature under the powers conferred upon it by the Indian Councils Act of 1861. The Indian Divorce Validating Act of 1921 remedied that defect so far as decrees already made were concerned. Dispite the decision of Keyes v. Keyes and Gray (2) various Courts in India continued to make decrees for dissolution of marriage in the case of persons who were resident in India, but not domiciled in India, and to my mind there is no doubt that such decrees had no legal effect on the status of the parties at any rate outside India. One of such cases was that of Miller v. Miller (4) which was decided by Mr. Justice Pearson in 1924. The head note of that case is as follows :

On a petition by the wife for dissolution of marriage it appearing that the husband was a subject of the United States of America and domiciled in that ; and that the marriage was celebrated and both parties resided in India up to January 1923, until which time the married life lasted (when the husband had left for America where he since remained) proof was given of adultery and cruelty committed within the jurisdiction of the Court sufficient to entitle the petitioner to a decree nisi :

Held : that the Court had jurisdiction to pass the decree. Semle : The result may be that the decree will hold good in India, but that everywhere else the parties will remain still legally married.

Mr. Justice Pearson in the course of his judgment said this :

Upon the question of jurisdiction, my attention has been drawn to the judgment of Sir Henry Duke in Keyes v. Keyes (2) which decided that the Courts administering the divorce law in India have no jurisdiction to decree dissolution of a marriage between parties not domiciled in India; it also decided that the East India Councils Act of 1861 does not warrant the making of a law to empower Courts in India to decree dissolution of the marriage of persons not domiciled within their jurisdiction.

That decision has since met with discussion in two reported cases in India, namely, Wilkinson v. Wilkinson (5) and Lee v. Lee (6). It has been pointed out that it would have been enough for the decision in Keyes v. Keyes (2) to say that since LeMesurier's case (7) or at any rate since Bater v. Bater (8) the jurisdiction to decree dissolution of marriage depended according to English law upon the domicile of the parties and that as the domicile in Keyes v. Keyes (2) was English, the English Courts would not recognise as valid in England a decree pronounced by a Court in India whose jurisdiction was based on a principle—that of the residence of the parties at the time—not accepted according to English Law as conferring jurisdiction. That this is so appears, I think, from the language used in an early part of the judgment, where the learned President says (at p. 211): "The petitioner has brought this suit to determine the validity, at any rate in England, of the decree made at his instance in India." It was, therefore, as it appears to me, the extra-territorial invalidity of the Indian decree that was in question in the suit, and that question was sufficiently and completely answered by the decision above set out, so that it was not necessary to go further to the extent of enquiring whether the powers conferred by the East India Councils Act, 1861, had been exceeded in the enactment of the Indian Divorce Act, 1869.

Then Mr. Justice Pearson continues:

But if that enquiry is to be made, then I think it is of great importance to recognize that in the case of Niboyet v. Niboyet (9) in 1878 the Court of appeal did accept residence and not domicile to found the jurisdiction, and that that decision remained good at any rate until LeMesurier's case.

It may well be that the decision of Pearson, J., is right in so far as he says that the result may be that the decree will hold good in India, but that everywhere else the parties will remain still legally married.

With all respect to my learned brother I think there may be some doubt as to whether Miller v. Miller (4) was rightly decided, but whether that was so or not is now quite immaterial, having regard to the provisions of S. 3 of the Statute 16 and 17 George V, Ch. 40, which provides that any decree granted under the Act of the Indian Legislature known as the Indian Divorce Act of 1869 and confirmed or made absolute under the provisions of that Act for the dissolution of a marriage, the parties to which were at the time of the commencement of the proceedings domiciled in England or in Scotland, and any order made by the Court under any such decree which, if the proceedings were commenced before the commencement of this Act, shall be valid and deemed always to have been as valid in all respects as though the parties to the marriage had been domiciled in India. It is, therefore, quite clear that so far as decrees for the dissolution of marriage, the parties to which were domiciled in England or Scotland are concerned they are for all purposes to be regarded as valid.

It is, however, to be observed that the validating clause in the Act of 1926, only applies to decrees for the dissolution of marriage between persons domiciled in England and Scotland and therefore even at the present time, assuming the decision in Keyes v. Keyes to have been correct (and apparently it was accepted as correct by the Imperial Legislature, seeing that it thought fit to pass the Validating Act of 1921) decrees for the dissolution of marriage pronounced by the Courts in India in regard to the marriage of persons who are not domiciled and resident in India or who are not domiciled in England or Scotland and resident in India as for example the parties in the case which has been referred to as the Cooch Behar case, would still not be valid. That case is reported in Isharani Nirupoma v. Victor Niten-dra Narayan (10) where Gregory, J., did not follow the decision in Keyes v. Keyes (2). In my view, and with all possible respect to the learned Judge who decided that case, the decision was not in accordance with the law as it then stood or now stands. The next stage was this: having regard to the decision of Keyes v. Keyes (2), the Indian Legislature in 1926 passed an Act (being Act 25 of 1926) bringing the law in India, so far as jurisdiction in matrimonial suits is concerned, into line with that decision and by that Act, which is called the Indian Divorce (Amendment) Act of 1926, it is provided in S. 2:

For paras. 2, 3 and 4, S. 2, Divorce Act the following shall be substituted namely: 'Nothing hereinafter contained shall authorize any Court to grant any relief under this Act except where the petitioner or respondent professes the Christian religion or to make decrees of dissolution of marriage except where the parties to the marriage are domiciled in India at the time when the petition is presented, or to make decrees of nullity of marriage except where the marriage has been solemnized in India and the petitioner is resident in India at the time of presenting the petition, or to grant any relief under this Act, other than a decree of dissolution of marriage or of nullity of marriage, except where the petitioner resides in India at the time of presenting the petition.'

It is, therefore, abundantly clear that under the Indian Divorce (Amendment) Act of 1926, in order to found jurisdiction to grant relief, the parties must be domiciled in India at the time when the petition is presented, and in order to determine in which Court the proceedings should be taken, they must also be resident in India by reason of the provisions of S. 3 of the Act of 1869.

The Act with which we are concerned in the present suit, however, extends the jurisdiction of the Courts in India in that it confers upon them by S. 1, sub-S. (1), jurisdiction to make a decree for dissolution of marriage (and as incident thereto make any order as to damages, alimony or maintenance, custody of children, and costs) in cases where the parties to the marriage are British subjects domiciled in England or in Scotland, in any case where a Court in India would have such jurisdiction if the parties to the marriage were domiciled in India. With regard to the latter part of that section the Courts in India, as I have already stated, will have such jurisdiction where the parties to the marriage are domiciled in India and resident within the jurisdiction of one or other of the Courts in India as set forth in S. 3 of the Act of 1869. Now it has from time to time been argued that S. 7 of the Act of 1869 is sufficiently wide in its scope to enable the Courts in India to grant relief and even to make decrees for the dissolution of marriage upon any ground which from time to time would be sufficient in England. The marginal note of that section is "the Court to act on principles of English Divorce Court." In my view, however, S. 7 has no real application in a matter of this kind in that it cannot be read as interfering with or extending the grounds for dissolution of marriage as set forth in S. 10 of the Act of 1869 and I am of opinion that S. 7, which says that subject to the provisions contained in this Act, the High Courts shall in all suits and proceedings hereunder act and give relief on principles and rules which in the opinion of the said Courts are as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England for the time being acts and gives relief can only have reference to matters of machinery and questions of procedure and the amount of proof required in matters of this kind. That is apparently the view taken by Pearson, J., in the case to which I have already referred Miller v. Miller (4) where at p. 572, of 52 Cal. the learned Judge says; it is unnecessary perhaps to discuss the question whether in any event the principles and rules referred to in S. 7 would include the question of residence as a basis of jurisdiction or whether that section is not designed rather as a residuary section to provide for matters that may not be otherwise specially mentioned in the Act.

A similar view was taken by Crump, J., in Wilkinson v. Wilkinson (5). There is moreover the opinion of Sir Lawrence Jenkins, Barley v. Barley (11), as an authority for saying that the language of S. 7 of the Act of 1869 points rather to the rules and principles on which the Court should deal with matrimonial causes in the way requiring a certain degree of evidence and other cognate matters. Pearson, J., referred also to Ramsay v. Boyle (12). My own view of the matter is that S. 7 has no sort of application to the present suit. In my opinion it cannot be said that there is anything like sufficient virtue in Cl. 7 of the Act of 1869 to import into Indian Divorce Jurisprudence any fresh ground for relief other than those set forth in S. 10. It is quite clear to my mind that under the Indian Act of 1869 (and the extending Act of 1872) the only grounds on which marriage may be dissolved are those set forth in S. 10 of the Act of 1869. If the petitioner therefore in the present suit is entitled to the relief which she seeks solely on the ground of her husband's adultery her right to such relief must in my opinion be derived entirely from the provisions of the Indian Colonial and Divorce Jurisdiction Act of 1926 itself. That Act has to a large degree introduced a new principle into the administration of law in that it has conferred a jurisdiction on the Courts of one country that is to say, India, to grant a decree for dissolution of marriage in the case of persons who are domiciled in another country or rather in either one of two countries England or Scotland. I have no doubt that the word "jurisdiction" as used in the main part of sub-S.1, S. 1 of the Act refers solely to the question of the High Courts in India having authority and the right to entertain and to try suits between British subjects in certain circumstances. The main part of the section does not in fact affect the question one way or the other as to what are the grounds upon which relief can be granted. If the first part of S. 1, sub-S. 1, stood alone and no proviso had been added the only grounds of relief would have been those set forth in S. 10 of the Act of 1869 unless it could be successfully argued that by virtue of S. 7 of the Act of 1869 other grounds might be added I have already dealt with that aspect of the matter and I am clearly and definitely of opinion that S. 7 does not affect this question one way or the other. That section, as I have already stated, is concerned in matters of procedure only and not substantive law at all provided that (a) the grounds on which a decree for the dissolution of such a marriage may be granted by any such Court shall be those on which such a decree might be granted by High Court in England according to the law for the time being in force in England.

Now the law for the time being in force in England with regard to dissolution of marriage is contained in S. 176 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation)-Act of 1925. That section really re-enacts the material provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 and the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1923 which latter Act for the first time conferred upon a woman the right to obtain a dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery alone. S. 176 of the Act of 1925 reads as follows :

A petition for divorce may be presented to the High Court (in this part of this Act referred to as the Court) by a husband on the ground that his wife has since the celebration of the marriage been guilty of adultery and (b) by a wife on the ground of her husband has since the celebration of the marriage been guilty of rape, or of sodomy or bestiality or that he has since the celebration of the marriage and since the seventh day of July nineteen hundred and twenty three been guilty of adultery ; provided that nothing in this Act shall affect the right of a wife to present a petition for divorce on any ground on which she might, if the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1923, had not passed, have presented such a petition.

If therefore there is no adultery available or provable as having been committed since 17th July 1923 a wife can still petition for divorce on the ground of adultery coupled with cruelty or desertion just as she could have done if the Act of 1923 had not been passed. That section (S. 176) as I have said sets out what the law is at the present time in force in England with regard to the grounds on which a decree for dissolution of marriage may be granted. It was argued and argued very cogently by Mr. Bagram that the whole scheme of the Act, the Indian and Colonial Jurisdiction Act of 1926, is to assimilate the law in India with that of England so far as regards British subjects resident in India but not domiciled there but domiciled in England or Scotland and therefore seeing that divorce jurisdiction has been conferred on the High Courts in India where the parties are domiciled in England or Scotland it is only reasonable to suppose that the Imperial Legislature intended that that jurisdiction should be exercised on exactly the same grounds as the jurisdiction of the High Court in England would be exercised in similar circumstances. In support of that view of the matter Mr. Bagram pointed out that by S. 1, sub-S. 4 of the Act of 1926 it is provided that the proceedings before a High Court in India in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by this Act shall be conducted in accordance with rules made by the Secretary of State in Council of India with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor and those rules shall provide for certain matters as set forth in that subsection. The Indian and Colonial Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1926 was passed on 15th December 1926, and rules under that Act (as provided for in S. 1, sub-

S. 4) were published in the Gazette of India on 20th August 1927. Amongst the matters provided for in the rules as required by sub-S. 4, S.1, are these: (a) for petitions being heard before a Judge or one of the two or more Judges of the Court nominated for the purpose by the Chief Justice of the Court with the approval of the Lord Chancellor of England; (b) for the decree or order made by such a Judge being subject to appeal to two Judges of the Court similarly nominated without prejudice, however, to any right or ultimate appeal to His Majesty in Council; (c) for prohibiting or restricting the exercise of the jurisdiction where proceedings for the dissolution of the marriage have also been instituted in England or Scotland; and then (g) for conferring on such official as may be appointed for the purpose within the jurisdiction of each High Court the like right of showing cause why a decree should not be made absolute as is exercisable in England by the King's Proctor. Suits of this character, i. e., suits for dissolution of marriage brought by a British subject who is not domiciled in India are to be tried by a Judge nominated for that purpose by the Chief Justice and approved by the Lord-Chancellor in England.

The Lord Chancellor is to have some say with regard to the Judge who shall exercise jurisdiction under this Act personally by reason of the fact that it was intended that a portion of the jurisdiction of the High Court in England with regard to matrimonial causes should be transferred to or at any rate exercised in India. Further it is clearly an innovation that machinery should be instituted in this Court for setting up the office of a (King's) Proctor's department in order to ensure that some sort of scrutiny will take place after a decree has been obtained. I mention these matters solely by way of illustration as showing that no doubt the whole scheme of this Act is to assimilate the position of British subjects in India to that of British subjects in England or Scotland. I think Mr. Bagram rightly says that the Act was designed to place British subjects in India for all purposes in the same position as they would be as if they were bringing suits for divorce in England. That view is strengthened by Prov. (c), sub-S. 4, S. 1, which provides:

for prohibiting or restricting the exercise of the jurisdiction where proceedings for the dissolution of the marriage have also been instituted in England or Scotland.

Further there is this aspect of the matter. It would seem on the face of it somewhat unlikely that the Imperial Legislature intended one law to apply and, the wife petitioner to be clothed with one set of rights so long as she is in England and yet to lose a portion of those rights as soon as she came back to resume residence in India. Looking at the matter broadly therefore I think Mr Bagram is right in his contention that this Act was designed and intended to put British subjects on the same footing in India as they would be if they were actually resident as well as domiciled in England. The only doubt which is cast upon the matter arises from the fact that under the provisions of S. 1, sub-S 1, British subjects domiciled in Scotland and resident in India would or might be in a different position from British subjects resident in India and domiciled in England. I have not had before me any evidence as to what the law with regard to divorce in Scotland is or with regard to the grounds upon which dissolution of marriage can be obtained in that country. I do not feel that I am entitled to take any judicial notice of or to use my own knowledge as to the law of Scotland with regard to the dissolution of marriage. But I may put the matter in this way that upon the assumption that there are in Scotland grounds for divorce different from those obtaining in India it follows that under S. 1, sub-S. 1, a Scotch woman resident in India but domiciled in Scotland may have entirely different rights from an English woman resident in India but domiciled in England, because it is clear that British subjects proceeding under this statute and bringing suits under the terms of sub-S. 1 of S. 1 of the Act if they have any rights other than those conferred by S 10, Divorce Act 1869, can only have such rights as existing according to the law for the time being in force in England.

I have already stated by reference to S. 176, Judicature Act 1925, what the law is at the present time in England. What I have to decide is whether or not that law is imported into India and made available to the petitioner in the present suit by reason of the provisions of S. 1

(i) of the Act of 1926, and in particular by reason of the provisions, or rather the terms of the various provisos therein set forth. It is to be observed that by proviso (c) no such Court (that is, no High Court in India) shall grant any relief under this Act except in the cases where the petitioner resides in India at the time of presenting the petition and the place where the parties married, or resided together was in India, or make any decree of dissolution of marriage except where either the marriage was solemnized in India or adultery or crime complained of was committed in India. The petitioner in the present suit fulfils all the requirements of that proviso because, as I have already stated, she was residing in India at the time of presenting the petition, the place where the parties (i e., where the petitioner and her husband (the respondent) last resided together) was in Calcutta, the marriage was solemnised, as I have said, at Jhansi, and the adultery complained of was committed in Calcutta, so that the petitioner in this suit is within the terms of the provisos.

Mr. Bannerjee in a very able and full argument upon this matter pointed out to me that it is unlikely that the Imperial Legislature should have introduced what in effect is a new cause of suit—a new ground for obtaining a decree for dissolution of marriage—into the law in India without making a definite and perfectly clear and express provision to that effect. He argued, and in my view there is considerable degree of force in the argument, that it is improbable that the Imperial Legislature which apparently for the first time in history, confers a direct jurisdiction upon the Courts in India with regard to a particular matter, would have extended the grounds upon which decrees for dissolution can be obtained simply by means of a number of provisos to a sub-section, and Mr. Bannerjee put forward for the consideration of the Court the contention that the proviso contained in Cl. A was inserted merely for the purpose of excluding the petitioner who is a British subject not domiciled in India from obtaining a decree on a ground which would not be sufficient for obtaining a decree in England as for example, the ground set out in para. 2, S. 10 of the Act of 1869, which provides that any wife may present a petition to the District Court or to the High Court praying that her marriage may be dissolved on the ground that since the solemnization thereof the husband has exchanged his profession of Christianity for the profession of some other religion and gone through a form of marriage with another woman.

It seems obvious that seeing that the provisions of the Act of 1869 were applicable only to British subjects professing the Christian religion, that provision was intended to safeguard a Christian wife from finding herself in the unfortunate and invidious position of having a husband who changed his religion merely for the purpose possibly of adopting some other religion which permits or countenances polygamy, which recognized polygamy so as to enable him to take to himself a second wife, and thereby act in derogation of the original wife's position. As I have already stated, Mr. Bannerjee argued that the proviso in (a) of S. 1 (i) of the Act of 1926 is solely designed to shut out that ground for a dissolution of marriage. I think that argument would have had more force had the word "only" appeared after the word "shall" in the third line of the proviso, which would have made the proviso read as follows:

The grounds on which a decree for dissolution of such a marriage may be granted by any such Court shall only be those on which such a decree might be granted by the High Court in India according to the law for the time being in force in England; and even so, I am not at all sure that it would have seriously affected the contention put forward by Mr. Bagram on behalf of the petitioner.

Looking at the whole scheme of this Act having regard, as I have already said, to the fact that it provides that rules should be made thereunder containing the provisions to which I have already referred and having regard to the fact that such rules have already been made on the same lines as the English rules which are The Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, I think I ought to come to the conclusion that the contention of the petitioner is well founded, and that it was the intention of the Imperial Legislature to put as far as possible a British subject, domiciled in England or Scotland resident in India, upon the same footing for the purpose of obtaining a dissolution of marriage as he or she would be if they were bringing such suit not in

A. I. R. 1928 Calcutta 666

MITTER, J.

India, but in England or Scotland as the case might be. One is fortified in that view by the terms of Prov. (d) of (1) which seems to imply, or rather more than imply, that it is in no sense a question of the ground of relief which is to determine the form in which the suit is brought, but the question of whether or not the petitioner can reasonably bring the suit in England, and whether it is in the interests of justice that the matter should be determined in India. It seems to me it would work great hardship to a wife petitioner if the Courts were bound to say:

It is true that there is a sufficient cause for preventing you from taking proceedings in the Courts of the country in which you are domiciled, and it is in the interests of justice, desirable, that the suit should be determined in India, but despite all that because the suit is to be determined in India, you have less rights in the way of obtaining dissolution of your marriage than if you had started instituting the suit in the country of your domicile.

Having heard the very full and able argument of both counsel in this matter, and having considered the question very carefully, I have come to the conclusion that the words in Prov (a) of S. 1 (1) are intended to mean that the grounds on which a decree for the dissolution of marriage of a British subject domiciled in England may be granted by a High Court in India shall be those on which such a decree might be granted by the Divorce Court in England, according to the law for the time being in force in England, i. e., at the present time, according to the law laid down in S. 176, Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act of 1925. That being the case the petitioner in this suit having established to the satisfaction of the Court the adultery of the respondent, and the Court being satisfied as to the other matters referred to in Prov. C and D of S. 1 (1) the petitioner is entitled to the relief which she claims in this suit.

I accordingly pronounce a decree for dissolution of marriage of the petitioner and respondent. There will be the usual decree nisi with costs against the respondent and also an order that the respondent shall pay to the petitioner alimony at the rate of Rs. 250 per mensem pending further order.

Benami Transaction—Setting aside a benami transaction not contravening the provisions of the law—Courts are bound to give effect to it — A benamidar can maintain a suit for recovery of possession against a trespasser.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Dinajpur dated 29th July 1926 which affirmed a decision of the Munsif of the same district dated 28th November 1924. The plaintiff instituted the suit for a declaration of her title to and recovery of possession of the suit lands on the allegation that on 25th Baisakh 1319 B. S. the plaintiff purchased from her mother the suit lands for a sum of Rs. 299. Plaintiff further stated that her husband Amir and proforma defendant 2, Aswini, are step-brothers and that Aswini mortgaged the suit properties with defendant 1 who got a decree on the mortgage bond and took possession of the disputed lands through Court and afterwards reaped the paddy grown by the plaintiff on the disputed lands in the month of Agrahayan prior to the institution of the suit. Plaintiff stated that this gives rise to the cause of action for this suit.

The defence of the defendant 1 in substance was that the plaintiff's mother had sold the suit lands to one Esam Ali and that later on Aswini, defendant 2, paid the consideration money to Esum Ali and took a reconveyance in the name of plaintiff's mother (the reconveyance was for himself and his brother Amir) and that in order to keep their title safe, Aswini had the deed of sale executed in the name of the plaintiff, and, although the plaintiff was the benamidar, the purchase was really for the benefit of himself and his step-brother Amir.

The Court of first instance held that the defence had established a case that the purchase in plaintiff's name was really for both Amir and Aswini and as in the mortgage suit which was instituted in 1916 there was decree against both Amir and Aswini and as defendant 1 purchased the disputed lands at a sale in execution of the mortgage decree, the plaintiff had no title to oust defendant 1 from the disputed lands. The Munsif accordingly dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

The lower appellate Court affirmed the judgment of the Munsif but came to somewhat different conclusions with regard to certain matters in controversy. The lower appellate Court found in disagreement with the Munsif that although the mortgage suit was filed against both Amir and Aswini, Amir contested the suit and the mortgage suit was dismissed as against him and what was sold in execution of the mortgage decree was the interest of Aswini alone. The lower appellate Court further found that the plaintiff was the benamidar of Amir and Aswini in the matter of her purchase from her mother in the year 1319 B. S. It also found that as the plaintiff was the benamidar of these two step-brothers, she had no title to the lands in suit and could not evict defendant 1 who had bought the interest of Aswini in execution of his mortgage decree.

Against the decision of the Subordinate Judge, a second appeal has been taken to this Court and the only point taken by the learned vakil for the appellant is that on the findings of the lower appellate Court, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree in respect of the half share of the lands in dispute and is entitled to recover joint possession in respect of the same with defendant 1. It is argued that on the findings of the lower appellate Court the plaintiff was not the beneficial owner in respect of the disputed lands but she was the benamidar both for Amir and Aswini and as there is nothing to prevent a benamidar to successfully sue for recovery of possession from a trespasser although the beneficial owner is not a party to the suit, the lower appellate Court should have decreed the suit in respect of the share of Amir and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary it must be held that Amir and Aswini were interested in the property in equal shares and, therefore, there ought to have been a decree for joint possession in respect of Amir's half share. I think this contention of the learned vakil for the appellant is well founded and must prevail. It is now firmly established that so long as a benami transaction does not contravene the provisions of the law, the Courts are bound to give it effect. The benamidar has no beneficial interest in the property or business that stands in his name; he represents the real owner and so far as their relative legal position is concerned, he is a mere trustee for him. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee say in the case of Gur Narayan v. Sheo Lal Singh (1), that they find it difficult to understand why an action cannot be maintained in the name of the benamidar in respect of the property although the beneficial owner is no party to it. Their Lordships point out that the bulk of judicial opinion in India is in favour of the proposition that in a proceeding by or against the benamidar, the person beneficially entitled is fully affected by the rules of res judicata and with this view of the Indian Courts their Lordships of the Judicial Committee concurred.

I think, therefore, that it was competent to the benamidar who is the plaintiff in the present case to maintain a suit for recovery of possession of the disputed property against the trespasser. She was the benamidar for Amir and Aswini; Aswini's interest passed by the mortgage sale and defendant 1 is certainly entitled to retain possession of his interest but there is nothing to justify defendant 1 to retain possession of the other half share of Amir, although what passed by the mortgage sale appears from the decree in that suit was the interest of Aswini alone and that is also the finding of the lower appellate Court.

It is argued by the learned vakil for the respondent that as this question was not specifically raised in the Court of first instance and as there is no evidence with regard to the extent of the shares of Amir and Aswini, the case ought to be sent back with an issue as to the extent of their shares. I asked Mr Guha if there was any suggestion on the record anywhere that the shares of these two brothers were unequal or that they did not possess it in equal shares. In the absence of any such evidence, the ordinary presumption is that these two brothers possessed the disputed land in equal shares.

The result is that the decrees of the Courts below dismissing the suit are set aside and the plaintiff's suit decreed to the extent of half share in the disputed lands, and it is ordered that she do recover joint possession of the same with defendant 1. There will be no order as to costs.

Appeal No. 36 of 1927, Decided on 16th March 1928, from original order of 3rd Sub-Judge, Hooghly, D/- 4th October 1926.

Civil P. C., S. 48 — Solenama instalment decree passed in a mortgage suit in 1909 authorizing decree-holder to realize whole amount in case of default—Final decree passed in 1911 — Personal decree passed under O. 34, R. 6 in 1920—Execution application in 1925 — Application was held to be time barred and personal decree not necessary.

The mortgaged property had been sold in the execution of a rent decree. A compromise decree was passed in the mortgage suit, whereby the decretal amount was payable in instalments and in default of two successive kists the whole could be realized at once and the properties under the solenama were to remain under mortgage. On default the final decree was passed in 1911 and the property under the solenama was sold. In 1920 a decree under O. 34, R. 6, was obtained against the person of the judgment-debtor. An application for execution was made in 1925.

Held: that the application was barred having been made more than 12 years after the date of the solenama decree of 1909. O. 34, R. 6 does not apply in the case of solenama decree.

Under the solenama decree the decree-holder was entitled to execute the decree on default and there was no necessity of obtaining the personal decree: A. I. R. 1917 P. C. 85, Rel. on. [P 669 C 1]

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the decree-holder against an order dismissing his application for execution of a decree on the ground that it was barred by limitation under the provisions of S. 48, Civil P. C. The decree-holder brought a suit on a mortgage. That suit was compromised between the parties. The mortgaged properties had actually been sold before the date of compromise in execution of a rent decree. By the compromise a certain sum was decreed in favour of the plaintiff-decree-holder which was payable in instalments, and it was provided that if two successive kists were not paid all the instalments would be considered as defaulted and the whole amount would at once be realized by means of execution of the decree with interest at 12 annas per cent per mensem. At the end of the decree it was stated that the mortgaged properties in suit being sold in auction for arrears of rent in rent execution case No. 46 of 1908 the properties mentioned in the solenama will remain under mortgage.

There was default and the decree-holder obtained what he called a final decree on that solenama on 23rd January 1911. The properties which were under mortgage on the terms of the solenama were then sold and on 11th February 1920 the decree-holder purported to obtain a decree under O. 34, R. 6, Civil P. C. against the person of the judgment-debtor. The present application was made on 23rd November 1925. The learned Subordinate Judge held that this application having been made more than 12 years after the date of the solenama decree dated 11th May 1909 the application is barred.

It is contended by the learned Advocate for the decree-holder that the Subordinate Judge is wrong because the personal decree was a fresh decree obtained in February 1920 and the 12 years prescribed under S. 48, Civil P. C., should be counted from that date. There seems to be an obvious fallacy in the contention; because under the solenama decree the decree-holder was entitled to execute his decree if there was default in payment of two successive kists and there was no necessity for him to obtain a decree under O 34, R. 6; nor does O. 34, R. 6 apply to a case like this where a decree was passed upon the terms of a solenama. The real question is that the decree passed on the basis of the solenama should be construed in order to find what the rights of the parties were. The Subordinate Judge in my opinion rightly held that a compromise decree was passed according to the solenama in 1909 and therefore on the strength of the case, Khulna Loan Co., Ltd. v. Jnanendra Nath Bose (1), this application is barred by limitation.

The appeal is therefore dismissed with costs. The hearing-fee is assessed at five gold mohurs.

Mallik, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the landlord to recover possession of a non-transferable occupancy holding on the allegation of an abandonment thereof by the tenant. It appears that the tenant mortgaged the entire holding in favour of defendant 1, the appellant before us, in the year 1907. In 1911 the plaintiff landlord brought a suit for arrears of rent against the tenant and obtained a decree and in execution thereof he himself purchased the holding on 8th July 1913. After this purchase plaintiff settled the land with the pro forma defendant but the pro forma defendant, on failing to obtain possession of the land from defendant 1, surrendered the holding to the plaintiff. This was in 1918. Before 1918 defendant 1 had brought a suit on his mortgage in the year 1915 and obtained a decree in the same year and in execution of his mortgage decree put up the mortgaged property to sale and purchased it on 13th November 1916. Plaintiff's claim to recover possession of the raiyati holding was resisted by defendant 1 on the allegation that defendant 1 having purchased the raiyati holding in execution of his mortgage decree could not be ousted by the plaintiff. This defence found favour with the trial Judge and the trial Judge dismissed the plaintiff's suit. On appeal, the lower appellate Court reversed the decision of the trial Judge and gave a decree to the plaintiff for khas possession of the lands in suit. Defendant 1 has appealed to this Court.

As observed before, the plaintiff's claim for possession was based on an abandonment by the tenant. The question is whether the circumstances in the case were sufficient to make out a case of abandonment. We are of the opinion that they were. It is true that so long as the mortgage in favour of defendant 1 subsisted, there could not be an abandonment because even after the mortgage the tenant retained in himself some interest in the property, namely, the right of redemption. But when the defendant 1 obtained a mortgage-decree and in execution of that mortgage-decree purchased the holding, there, after his purchase, remained no interest left in the tenant. The learned advocate for the appellant drew our attention to the cases in Pran Krishna Pal v. Atul Krishna (1) and Sital Chandra v. Parbati Charan (2). But in both these cases the mortgage was not in respect of the entire property but in respect of a portion only and so, even after the sale in execution of the mortgage decree on the basis of a mortgage of a portion of the property only, the tenant could not be said to have parted with the whole of his interest therein. We are, therefore, of opinion that the facts established in the case were sufficient to make out a case of abandonment, and if there was an abandonment the plaintiff landlord was entitled to a decree for khas possession.

We are, therefore, unable to interfere with the decree which the learned District Judge has made in the case. The appeal is, accordingly, dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—The controversy in this case relates to a dispute among certain members of the Tagore family over the right to administer the trusts of the will of one Kiranmali Mukerjee.

The suit arises in this way : Bonomali Mukerji founded and dedicated to two deities a temple in Monoharpukur Road, Ballygunge. He died in 1892, leaving him surviving Kiranmali Mukerjee and a daughter Mahapрова Debi. The daughter had two sons Aurabindo and Rabindra, and they are the plaintiffs. On 9th November 1903 Kiran died, having made a will of which he appointed one Pundarikakshya the executor and trustee. In his will, Kiran stated that he died possessed of no moveable or immovable properties, and that he had made provision for his wife Mayabini Debi ; and he directed the executor and trustee to pay his debts, and to celebrate the pujah of the two deities at the temple in Ballygunge in the same manner that he had done in his lifetime. He further directed inter alia that a sum of Rs 10,000 the subject-matter of a life policy should be collected, and that out of the proceeds certain legacies should be paid, and the balance of Rs. 8,000 invested in 3½ per cent Government securities. Out of the income accruing from the Rs. 8,000 twelve Brahmins were to be fed on the occasion of the anniversary of the sraddh of his father and mother and the expenses of the pujahs were to be defrayed, and he directed that the balance (if any) of the income should be spent on the construction and repairs of the temple.

Whether Pundari on Kiran's death became the sebaite of the deities, with such consequences as would follow therefrom, I do not propose to decide in this case, not because such matters are not relevant, but because in the plaint it is specifically requested that matters connected with the sebaite should be excluded from the scope of the suit, and, in my opinion, having regard to the nature of the claim, I am in a position otherwise to dispose of it.

Now Pundari was not a beneficiary under Kiran's will, but was a bare trustee of the funds which were charged for debutter purposes. From the death of Kiran until the death of Pundari on 23rd October 1910 Pundari faithfully and duly carried out the trusts of Kiran's will. After Pundari's death, however, it was ascertained that under his will he had left all his property to his wife, who was the younger sister of the wife of Bonomali, and a daughter of the late Maharaja Tagore. He appointed his wife the executrix of the will, and further provided that the aforesaid executrix of mine, her heirs or he whom she may appoint, shall continue to spend in connexion with the sheba of the God and Goddess at Ballygunge, in the same manner which I have been spending, the income derived from the Government promissory notes to the value of Rs. 8,000 which are with you, and which belonged to the estate of Kiran.

By his will, therefore, Pundari purported to appoint the defendant, his wife, the trustee of the property that had passed to him as trustee under the will of Kiran. That in my opinion, he was not entitled by law to do, and it is the common case of both parties that after the death of Pundari, the defendant did not become entitled to act as the trustee of the will of Kiran or to have the possession or management of the trust property. Who, then was entitled to act as the trustee? It is the common case of both parties, and for the purposes of this suit I will assume, without deciding, that the persons entitled to the possession and management of the trust property under Kiran's will were Kiran's heirs. Again, it is common ground that the heir of Kiran was his widow Mayabini, and that the reversionary heirs were the plaintiffs. Assuming, therefore, that Mayabini was entitled to possession of the trust property, and to carry out the trusts created under the will of Kiran, it is conceded that she never took possession of the trust property, or exercised her rights as trustee under Kiran's will. From the death of Pundari in 1910 until the present time I hold that the defendant has been in exclusive possession of the trust property, and that the trusts of Kiran's will throughout this period have been faithfully carried out by the defendant openly, and as of right, and without asking or obtaining Mayabini's permission in that behalf. The defendant was examined on commission. I refer to certain questions, and the answers that she made :

Q. 35. How did your husband entrust you with the charge of the idol? By his will, and I have carried on the sheba in the same manner in which my husband had been doing.

Q. 36. Did Mayabini know that your husband had entrusted you by his will with the sheba? Yes.

Q. 37. Generally were the facts that Kiran and your husband by their will made provision for the sheba well-known in the family, or were they kept secret? Nothing was kept secret. Everybody knew about it.

Q. Did Mayabini ever make any claim against either you or your husband in respect of the sheba? Never.

Q. Did your husband or you ever take Mayabini's permission or consent in the matter of the Thakur and the sheba? Never.

As thefts had occurred at the temple the defendant was asked:

Question 138.—Did you send information to Mayabini of these thefts? Where was she at the time?—Well, one thing I remember is that she was alive, but why should I inform her when the thakur was mine?

I hold upon the evidence that from the death of Pundari in 1910 until the present time the defendant openly, and as of right, to the knowledge and without obtaining the permission of Mayabini or the plaintiffs or anybody else, in fact, has been in possession of the trust property, and duly has carried out the trusts of Kiran's will in respect of this debutter estate. I hold further that in the circumstances her acts and possession were adverse to the rights of Mayabini, and if, and in so far as Mayabini as the heir of Kiran was entitled to the possession and management of the trust property, it is conceded by the plaintiffs and I hold that her rights and title were barred by limitation.

But that does not dispose of the plaintiffs' claim for learned counsel contended that the plaintiffs as reversioners could not be prejudiced by any act or omission on the part of Mayabini, and, although Mayabini through her negligence or otherwise had lost her rights as the heir of Kiran by adverse possession, the rights of the plaintiffs as Kiran's reversioners were thereby not affected, for they claimed through Kiran and not through Mayabini, his widow. In support of his contention M. A. N. Choudhury cited Ranchordas Vandravandas v. Parbhatibhai (1). I confess that if the matter were res integra, or if the meaning and effect of the decision in Ranchordas' case (1) had not been explained by the Judicial Committee in Vaithalinga Mudaliar v. Sriranguth Anni (2) I should have thought that the view which the plaintiffs urged upon the Court was correct, as being in consonance with the conception of the widow's estate in Hindu law. And the reason is this: that a Hindu reversioner has no right or interest in praesenti in the property which a female owner holds for her life, until it vests in him on her death, should he survive her, he has nothing to assign or to relinquish, or even to transmit to his heirs. His right becomes concrete only on her demise, until then it is a mere spes successionis per Syed Ameer Ali in Amrit Narayan v. Gaya Singh (3). No doubt, if by reason of the widow's acts or omissions there is danger that the corpus of the estate may be wasted appropriate steps may be taken by the reversioners to prevent the wastage taking place, but I doubt whether it is in accordance with the principles of the Hindu law of inheritance that the reversionary heirs, who during the subsistence of the widow's estate have no present right or interest in the property, and who do not in any sense trace their title through the widow, should lose their rights as reversioners merely because the widow has suffered her title and interest in the estate to be destroyed by adverse possession. I have ventured to indicate my opinion on this subject because in Vaithalinga's case (2) the Judicial Committee did not think it necessary for the purposes of that case to "make any formal pronouncement upon this point" (ibid p. 893), although in the present state of the authorities I am clearly of opinion that the contention of the plaintiff's cannot prevail, and that the plaintiff's claim as the reversioners of Kiran is barred by limitation.

The law stands in this way: In 1852, before the enactment of the Limitation Act (14 of 1859), Peel, C. J. observed that:

it has been invariably considered for many years that the widow fully represented the estate, and it is also settled law that adverse possession which bars her bars the heir after her which would not be the case if she were a mere tenant for life as known to the English law: Golackman's Debt v. Digumbar De (4).

Again, in 1863, in Katama Natchiar v. Raja of Shivagunga (5) the Judicial Committee laid down that the whole estate would for the time be vested in her, absolutely for some purposes, though in some respects for a qualified interest and until her death it could not be ascertained who would be entitled to succeed. The same principle which has prevailed in the Courts in this country as to tenants-in-tail representing the inheritance would seem to apply to the case of a Hindu widow and it is obvious that there would be the greatest possible inconvenience in holding that the succeeding heirs were not bound by a decree fairly and properly obtained against the widow.

Now it is settled beyond doubt or controversy that a decree fairly obtained against a Hindu widow in respect of a transaction in which the 'represents the estate is binding upon the reversioners: Shivagunga's case (5) supra; Jugal Kishore v. Jotendra Mohan (6), Harinath Chatterjee v. Mathur Mohan (7), Vaithalinga's case (2) supra, and on principle I can find no ground upon which to differentiate between the loss of the reversioner's rights by adverse possession against a widow, and the loss of such rights by an adverse decree against her. In Nobin Chandra Chakraborty v. Issur Chunder Chuckerbutty (8) Peacock, C. J., observed that:

It is said that the reversionary heirs could not sue (for possession) during the lifetime of the widow, and that, therefore they ought not to be barred by any adverse holding against the widow at a time where they could not sue. But when we look at the widow as a representative, and see that the reversionary heirs are bound by decrees relating to her husband's estate which are obtained against her without fraud or collusion, we are of opinion that they are also bound by limitation, by which she without fraud or collusion is barred.

I respectfully agree with the view expressed by Jackson, J., in the same case when his Lordship observed that it has been distinctly held by the Privy Council in the Shivagunga case (5) that a decision fairly arrived at without fraud or collusion in the presence of a Hindu widow in possession of the estate will bind reversionary heirs, that being so decided it appears to me impossible to escape the conclusion that an adverse possession which barred the widow will also bar the heirs (ibid p. 510; see also per Macpherson, J.

in Harinath Chakrabutty v. Mathur Mohan (7).

Now, it must be taken as settled that the law thus stated is the common law of the Hindu community, and when applied to the facts of the present case it is fatal to the plaintiffs' claim.

But has not the law been altered by legislation since these judgments were delivered? That is a question which has occasioned much discussion and given rise to a serious difference of opinion among the Courts in India.

Under the Limitation Act (14 of 1859, Ss. 12 and 16) the limitation for suits to recover immovable and moveable property was 12 and 6 years respectively "from the time the cause of action arose." But under the Limitation Act (9 of 1871, Sch. 2, Art. 142) a suit by a Hindu reversioner entitled to the possession of immovable property on the death of a Hindu widow must be brought within 12 years of the time "when the widow dies", and under the Limitation Act (15 of 1877, Sch. 2, Art. 141 a) like suit by a Hindu or Mahomedan entitled to the possession of immovable property on the death of a Hindu or Mahomedan female must be brought within 12 years of the time "when the female dies" Art. 141, Sch. 2, to the present Limitation Act (9 of 1908) is in the same terms. With respect to moveable property, however, there has been no change in substance, for in the later Acts the period of limitation is six years from the time "when the right to sue accrues" Art. 118 (1871), Art. 120 (1877 and 1908).

Now, in Srinath Kur v. Prosonna Kumar Ghose (9), a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court held that the Limitation Acts of 1871 and 1877 had effected a change in the law, and that the rule which was laid down under the Limitation Act of 1859 is no longer the law under the Acts of 1871 and 1877. A reversioner who succeeds to immovable property has now 12 years to bring the suit from the time when the estate falls into possession: per Garth, C. J., ibid at p. 937.

The same view was taken by the Allahabad High Court in Ramkali v. Kedarnath (10), and by the Bombay High Court in Vundravandas v. Cursondas (11), in which case Farran, C. J., observed that it (i. e., the legislature) has designedly altered the law which formerly prevailed upon this subject as laid down in Nobin Chandra v. Issur Chunder (8), and approved by the Privy Council in Amrito Lal v. Rajoni Kant (12) is obvious, (ibid at p. 669).

In 1899 Vundravandas' case (11) was heard on appeal by the Privy Council under the name of Runchordas v. Parbatibhai (1), and the decision of Farran, C. J., and Tyabji, J., in substance, was affirmed, their Lordships, however, further holding that even in respect of moveables to which Art. 141 did not apply the reversioners' "right to this property, if any, accrued at the death of" the widow.

I shall not presume, indeed, it would be of no avail to express my own opinion as to what was decided in Runchordas' case (1), for in Vaithialinga v. Srinanath (2), the Judicial Committee explained what was the meaning and effect of that decision, and the interpretation which their Lordships put upon that case is binding upon all the Courts of India. The Judicial Committee, as I apprehend the judgment in Vaithialinga's case (2), were of opinion that Sir Richard Couch, who had delivered the judgment of the Board both in Runchordas's case (1) and in Harinath Chuckerbutty v. Mathur Mohan (7) did not intend in Runchordas's case (1) in any way to discredit the rule laid down in Shivagunga's case (5) which had expressly been approved and applied in Harinath Chatterjee v. Mathur Mohan (7), and that in Runchordas v. Parvatibhai (1), in the circumstances obtaining in that case, there was no room for the application of the rule in Shivagunga's case (5). What, then, was decided in Harinath Chatterjee v. Mathur Mohan (7)? In that case the question that fell for determination was whether the rule in Shivagunga's case (5), namely, that an adverse decree against a Hindu widow bound the reversioner, was applicable to the case where a daughter (by name Sampurna) had succeeded to the widow's estate. Sir Richard Couch delivered the judgment of the Board, and in reference to a contention that the plaintiff as reversioner had by the terms of Art. 141 a period of 12 years from her (i. e., Sampurna's) death to bring his suit, observed that their Lordships see no ground for this contention. The words "entitled to the possession of immovable property" refer to the existing law. Under that law the plaintiff, being bound by the decree against Sampurna, would not be entitled to bring a suit for possession. The intention of the law of limitation is not to give a right when there is not one, but to interpose a bar after a certain period to a suit to enforce an existing right. The purpose of Sch. 2 in each of the Acts is only to prescribe the period of limitation for the suit. That appears from S. 4 of each Act. The prescribed periods are to be applied to suits founded on the existing law, and Art. 141 cannot be construed, as altering the law respecting the effect of a decree.

In Sardar Sundari v. Dayamayi Dasya (13), Jackson, and Tottenham, JJ., had taken the same view, holding that the person entitled to the possession of immovable property on the death of a Hindu widow means a person who succeeds to a certain right which is in being on the death of the Hindu widow, and that if the title which would have enabled that widow to hold the estate as a widow had become barred before her death the reversioner who would be the next taker is not to be entitled to possession of the property on the death of the widow.

Now, in Vaithilinga's case (2), although it became unnecessary for the Judicial Committee "to make any formal pronouncement upon" the question whether adverse possession obtained against a Hindu widow binds the reversioners, inasmuch as in that case it was held that the reversioner's claim was barred under Art. 129, Sch. 2, Act 9, 1871; nevertheless, as the issue had been raised and canvassed both in the Indian Courts and in the Privy Council their Lordships proceeded to examine the case-law as to the effect upon the rights of the reversioners of a title gained by adverse possession against a Hindu widow. It may be that the observations of the Board upon that matter were obiter, but merely upon that ground I should not be entitled to disregard them, and the less so as their Lordships indicated clearly how in their opinion the law upon the subject stands. After analyzing the material cases and expressing approval of the law as laid down in the earlier authorities, Sir John Edge observed that the result of the cases to which their Lordships have referred shows, in their opinion, that the Board has invariably applied the rules of the Shivagunga's case (5) as sound Hindu law where that rule was applicable.

In these circumstances, therefore, I hold that the common law of the Hindu community which is to be collected from Goluckmani Dasi v. Digambar De (4), Shivagunga's case (5), and Nabin Chunder Chuckerbutty v. Issur Chunder Chuckerbutty (8), is still the law of the land and has been neither abrogated nor varied by any legislative enactment.

Now, the trust property in suit is moveable property to which Art. 141 is not applicable, but whether the appropriate article of the Limitation Act is Art. 49 or Art. 120 in either case, and notwithstanding Runchordas v. Parvati-bhai (1), I hold that the plaintiffs' claim to recover possession of such property from the defendant fails as it is barred by limitation.

That disposes of all the questions raised in this case with respect to the trust property, for it is to be observed that the plaintiffs have not brought this suit as the trustees, but as the heirs of Kiran. Mr. Chowdhuri in his reply expressly stated that the plaintiffs did not sue in a representative capacity as trustees, and it is obvious, having regard to the frame of the suit and the form of the pleadings, that S. 10, Lim. Act, does not apply. The defendant did not purport to hold the property in a manner adverse to the trust, and the plaintiffs did not purport to bring this suit either as beneficiaries under the trust, or on behalf of the trust, but for their own personal right to manage or in some way to control the management of the endowment. The consequence is that the case does not fall within S. 10, Lim. Act: Balwant Rao Bishwant Chandra Chor v. Puranmal Chobey (14).

In substance and in fact the plaintiffs are suing in their personal capacity as the heirs of Kiran to recover possession of such part of the estate of Kiran as came into the defendant's possession as the executrix of Pundari. But I hold upon the facts that the plaintiffs have not proved that the defendant as the executrix of Pundari or otherwise obtained possession of any property that belonged to Kiran other than the trust property. The defendant has been examined and cross-examined, and her evidence supports the conclusion at which I have arrived. The statement in Kiran's will that he had no moveable or immovable property further strengthens that view, and, in my opinion, an examination of the affidavit of assets filed in connexion with Kiran's will places the matter beyond doubt or controversy. I find, therefore, upon the evidence that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the defendant has been in possession, or is in possession of any part of Kiran's estate exclusive of the debutter property. The plaintiffs' claim contains other forms of relief, but these are ancillary to the main claim for possession.

For these reasons the suit must be dismissed with costs on scale No. 2 including the cost of the commission.

RANKIN, C. J., AND CHOTZNER, J.

Satya Narain Mohata—Accused—Appellant.

v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Appeal No 1 of 1927, Decided on 2nd December 1927, from order of Costello, J., D/- 21st June 1927.

(a) Criminal trial—Facts material to constitute an offence must be stated in a charge—Allegations not essential though stated can be omitted without detriment to the accused as surplusage—Whether charge is good or bad is to be judged not after proof of facts but is to be seen at the beginning of the trial.

In order to convict a man of an offence, all the material facts which constitute the offence, and which are necessary to enable the parties to avail themselves of the verdict and judgment, should the same charge be again brought forward, must be stated upon the indictment, and all these requisite allegations must be satisfied in evidence, and proved as laid. But allegations not essential to such purpose which might be entirely omitted without affecting the charge against the person and without detriment to the indictment are considered as mere surplusage and may be disregarded in evidence. The indictment may be good or bad, but it cannot depend upon the facts which will ultimately be found by the jury and it must be good or bad at the beginning of the trial: A. I. R. 1922 Cal. 107, Rel. on. [P 676 C 2, P 677 C 1]

An accused was tried jointly with another on (1) a charge of conspiracy to cheat a certain company. He was also singly tried at the same time (2) for cheating the same company in respect of certain certified report of daily work, and (3) for dishonestly using as genuine the document stated above. The charges on (2) and (3) contained the following words: "in pursuance of the conspiracy in the first charge mentioned." The jury found the accused not guilty on the charge of conspiracy but found him guilty of the other two charges. It was contended that in view of the verdict of not guilty on the charge of conspiracy the conviction on the other charges would not stand.

Held: that the only function of the words "in pursuance of the conspiracy in the first charge mentioned" was to make it plain that counts (2) and (3) had no reference to independent offences or to a different subject-matter than the first count and there was no objection to the jury convicting under counts (2) and (3) although they acquitted on the first.

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 342—Accused jointly tried—One giving one explanation—Judge can take another statement from the co-accused.

Where two persons are jointly tried for an offence and one of them has given an explanation upon certain matter in the case, the Judge can take in his discretion another statement from his co-accused under S. 342. [P 677 C 2]

(c) Calcutta High Court Original Side Rules, Ch. 2, Rr. 1 and 4—Criminal appeal from original side—Question whether a vakil can act is not concluded by Criminal Procedure Code but by the rules of the High Court—Criminal P. C., Ss. 340 and 449.

The question whether a vakil can act for a party in a criminal appeal from the Original side of a High Court depends upon the rules of that Court and is not concluded by anything in the Criminal P. C. [P 678 C 1]

(d) Calcutta High Court Original Side Rules, Ch. 2, R. 1 and 4—Criminal appeal from original side—A vakil cannot act unless a question of Hindu or Mahomedan law is involved.

A vakil cannot act in an appeal from a trial held on the original side before a Judge and a jury at the High Court Sessions, unless in such appeal a question of Hindu or Mahomedan law or usage should arise. [P 681 C 1]

N. Sircar and Satindra Nath Mukerji—for Appellant

A K Basu, Miss Sorabji and Sachindra Nath Banerjee—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the appellant Satya Narain Mohata was put upon his trial jointly with one Nandalal Banerjee at the High Court Sessions before Costello, J., and a jury. The facts out of which the case arose were alleged to be that Messrs. Bird and Company had a contract to supply labour to Messrs Kilburn and Company in connexion with the managing agency of the latter firm for the India General Steam Navigation Company Limited. It appears that there was an office at a certain ghat. It appears that Messrs. Bird and Company gave a sub-contract for the supply of this labour to the appellant. The appellant was to be paid at a flat rate based upon the number of maunds actually handled or transhipped by the coolies whom he supplied. The rate was not quite the same for all articles but it was a system of payment which depended upon the number of maunds that had been handled. The first accused, Nandalal Banerjee was a clerk or servant of Messrs. Bird and Company and the system as regards payment was alleged to have been that certain vouchers were prepared by accused 1 and that accused 1 to a large extent looked after the business of the present appellant and assisted him in various matters connected with the supply of labour and obtained payment from Messrs Bird and Company. In these circumstances it was said that after certain records giving the weights of the different goods handled had been checked and passed on behalf of Messrs. Kilburn and Company these records were falsified and bills were presented on behalf of the present appellant to Messrs. Bird and Company for a larger sum than was justly due. To give a particular illustration which is referred to in one of the counts at the trial it is said that figure "36" maunds was changed into "4036".

In these circumstances the accused were put upon their trial jointly and the charges against them were as follows : The first charge alleged that between February and August 1926 they were parties to a criminal conspiracy to cheat Messrs. Bird and Company. The second count was against the present appellant alone and accused him of cheating Messrs. Bird and Company in respect of a certain certified report being the daily report of work done on the 7th July 1926. The third count was against Nandalal Banerjee alone and accused him of abetting the offence of cheating described in the second count. The fourth count was also against Nandalal Banerjee alone and accused him of committing forgery in respect of the same document as is mentioned in the second count, namely a certified daily report of work done on the 7th July 1926, and the fifth count was against the present appellant charging him with having dishonestly used as genuine the document referred to in the previous Court.

Now, the jury found the two accused not guilty on the first count of conspiracy but they found the present appellant guilty on the second count of the crime of cheating and they found Nandalal Banerjee guilty of abetting that. They also found Banerjee guilty of the charge of forgery and the present appellant guilty of dishonestly using as genuine the forged document.

In these circumstances Mr. Sircar on behalf of the present appellant calls attention to the fact that in the second and the fifth counts on which this man has been convicted and sentenced the charge is that "he" in pursuance of the conspiracy in the first charge mentioned "cheated Messrs. Bird and Company and that "in pursuance of the conspiracy in the first charge mentioned" he dishonestly used a forged document as genuine and the first question which arises is this : If the jury have negatived the conspiracy can a conviction on these two counts stand ?

Now it appears to me, to deal with that question first, that the conviction on those two counts is quite in order, the reason being that the words "in pursuance of the conspiracy in the first charge mentioned" find their place in these charges not because they are any element of the offence alleged in the second or the fifth count but because they are proper words to show as the truth and substance of the matter was, that the accused were being (rightly or wrongly) charged with offences all having reference to the same subject-matter or series of transactions and properly brought together in one indictment.

In this connexion it may be desirable to point out that there has always been an important branch of the law as regards indictments which is referred to sometimes as the doctrine of surplusage. A very elaborate treatment of this may be found in Russel on Crimes, Book 6, Ch. 2, S. 3, and from this I will take the following statement of the law :

In order to convict a man of an offence all the material facts which constitute the offence, and which are necessary to enable the parties to avail themselves of the verdict and judgment, should the same charge be again brought forward must be stated upon the indictment, and all these requisite allegations must be satisfied in evidence and proved as laid. But allegations not essential to such purpose which might be entirely omitted without affecting the charge against the prisoner and without detriment to the indictment are considered as mere surplusage and may be disregarded in evidence.

In illustration and in support of that statement I will refer to two cases only. The first is the case of Rex v. Hunt (1), where Lord Ellenborough said :

If an indictment charges that the defendant did and caused to be done a particular act it is enough to prove either. The distinction runs through the whole criminal law, and it is invariably enough to prove so much of the indictment as shows that the defendant has committed a substantive crime therein specified.

(1) [1811] 2 Campbell 553.

The Court of King's Bench in the well-known case of The King v. Hollingberry (2), had before them a charge of conspiring falsely to indict one A B for keeping a gaming-house for the purpose of extorting money from the said A B. The jury found the defendants guilty of conspiring to indict A B for the purpose of extorting money but not to indict him falsely and upon that the conviction was upheld with these observations :

In criminal cases it is sufficient for the prosecutor to prove so much of the charge as constitutes an offence punishable by law. This was an indictment for conspiring falsely to indict a person for the purpose of extorting money. The jury found the defendants guilty of conspiring to prefer an indictment for the purpose of extorting money and that is a misdemeanour whether the charge be or be not false.

It is said, however, that the words in the second and the fifth counts "in pursuance of the conspiracy in the first charge mentioned" cannot be omitted without detriment to this indictment because it is said that if they are omitted there will be nothing to show that the specific offences alleged in those counts arise out of the same subject-matter as the alleged offence under the first count. Upon that question it appears to me that the appellant's appeal cannot succeed. The indictment may be good or bad but it cannot depend upon the facts which will ultimately be found by the jury and it must be good or bad at the beginning of the trial. If the only function of those words is to make it plain that the second and the fifth counts have no reference to independent offences or to a different subject-matter than the first count then it seems to me that there is no objection at all to the jury convicting under the second and the fifth counts although they acquitted upon the first. This matter was considered by a Division Bench consisting of Newbould and Suhrawardy, JJ, in the case of Abdul Salim v. Emperor (3). The particular passage which deals with this matter is at p 596. In my judgment there is no validity in the objection that has been taken. It would have been quite possible to rearrange these counts differently, to have begun with what was in fact the second count and to have added the charge of 'conspiracy last, provided only that suitable words were used in each count to show that they related to the same series of transactions. So far as the counts other than the first count are concerned they all have reference to cheating accomplished by means of forgery of the daily report of the 7th July 1926 and it is quite clear, therefore, that they merely specify the various sections of the Indian Penal Code which the course of conduct of the accused offends against.

It remains, therefore, only to consider the question whether the direction of the learned Judge was correct and sufficient. In our opinion, the learned Judge's summing up is unexceptionable. It is very elaborate upon each point that arose for decision. It was quite open to the jury to find Nandalal Banerjee guilty of abetment although they did not find a conspiracy, because conspiracy is only one of the possible ways of abetment by the definition given in the Indian Penal Code.

It was suggested by Mr. Sircar that the learned Judge in certain passages put too strongly to the jury the view that the appellant was the only person interested in getting over payments; but if the charge be taken as a whole that matter was very fully dealt with. It would appear that as between these two accused their defences were at variance upon that very point.

Mr. Sircar complains that after the appellant had given an explanation upon this matter the Judge ought not to have taken another statement from his co-accused under S. 342, Criminal P. C. In my judgment that was entirely in the discretion of the learned Judge and he has not used his discretion unfairly.

The view taken by the jury as they were careful to explain was this : that the appellant was the principal and that Nandalal Banerjee who seems to have been a clerk on a small pay and an old man was a mere tool of the appellant. That may very well explain why the jury took a merciful view and acquitted both on the charge of conspiracy. We are not concerned with the question whether the jury's verdict was completely logical upon such a matter. It is sufficient that the jury have convicted this appellant upon the charge of cheating and the charge of using dishonestly a forged document knowing it to be forged.

In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed. The appellant must surrender to his bail and serve out the remainder of his sentence.

I pass now to a question of practice which was argued in connexion with this case. This appeal is brought under a new provision—S. 449, Criminal P. C., as amended in 1923. It is an appeal from a trial held on the original side before a Judge and a jury at the High Court Sessions. It was represented to us that this appellant desired that a vakil of this Court should act for him in the matter of this appeal. In order that his case might not fail to be presented he also employed an attorney so as to put himself in order if the Court should think that the vakil was not entitled to act in a criminal appeal from the original side under the new section. I mention that because a point which is not raised in this case is the question whether it could possibly be right to appear by both a vakil and an attorney. I confine myself to the question whether in such a case as this it is open to a vakil to act for an appellant.

Now, we were referred to the rules of this Court and to certain sections of the Criminal Procedure Code by Mr. N. K. Basu who was good enough to argue this matter on behalf of the vakils and by the learned Advocate-General who argued it in the interest of the attorneys. In my judgment the question depends upon the rules of this Court and is not concluded by anything in the Criminal Procedure Code. Mr. Basu did not contend that it was outside the powers of the Court by rules to regulate this matter, but he drew our attention to the terms of S. 419 and to the definition of "pleader" in S. 4 of the Code. Now for the present purpose it matters nothing whether the true view be that the joint effect of these sections is to give the right to the vakils subject to any restrictions which the High Court by rules may have imposed or whether the true view be that the effect of these sections is to give the right in question to those practitioners who by the rules of the High Court are authorized to exercise it. It might be said that the definition of "pleader" in S. 4 of the Code means that unless there is a rule to the contrary any advocate, any attorney or any vakil can file a memorandum of appeal under S. 419. If so, that might be inconvenient from the point of view of the vakils as much as of the attorneys, because it is quite clear that if that be the true view then a rule would have to be shown preventing an advocate from filing a memorandum of appeal in such a case as this or preventing an attorney from filing a memorandum of appeal in an ordinary criminal appeal from a mofussil Court. The point, however, when the actual rules of the High Court are considered does not fall to be decided by a mere choice between the two views I have mentioned.

I come now to set out the rules of this Court which bear upon the matter and their history in so far as this is necessary to explain them. The rules upon which the question depends are Rr. 1 and 4, Ch. 2 of the original side rules. Rule 1 is :

Advocate of this Court may appear and plead for parties on either side of the Court, but on the original side or in appeals from the original side, not unless instructed by an attorney.

Rule 4 as it stands now is as follows :

Vakils shall not appear, plead, or act for any suitor in this Court in any matter on the original side or in any matter of appeal from any case from the original side unless in such appeal a question of Hindu or Mahomedan law or usage shall arise, and the Court or a Judge thereof shall think fit to admit a vakil or vakils to plead for any suitor or suitors in that case. In such case the vakil or vakils so admitted may plead accordingly.

On that rule it is necessary to ascertain whether this reference to a "suitor" or "suitors" points to the provision being intended for civil appeals only so as to cut down the generality of the expression "in any matter of appeal from any case from the original side." If not, then there is an express prohibition because on that view by the terms of the rule vakils shall not appear, plead or act in any matter of appeal from any case from the original side. It is for this reason that I thought it necessary to observe that it did not matter which interpretation was put upon the definition of "pleader" in S. 4, Criminal P. C.

I come now to see whether in the history of this rule there is any light to be obtained upon its real intention. The word "suitors" comes in this connexion from Cl. 11 of the original Charter of 1774. It is repeated in Cls. 7

8 and 9 of the Letters Patent, 1862 which deal with the same subject-matter, and it is repeated again in Cl. 9 of the Letters Patent 1865. In Cl. 11 from which subsequent clauses all derive their language we find this :

And we do hereby further authorize and empower the said Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal, to approve, admit, and enrol such and so many advocates and attorneys-at-law, as to the said Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal shall seem meet who shall be attorneys of record, and shall be and are hereby authorized to appear plead and act for the suitors of the said Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal.

Whether the idea underlying the word "suitor" is that of a person who owes suit and service or that of a person who is seeking or demanding something from a Court there can be no doubt that in Cl. 11 of 1774, the term is used in the very broadest sense for any client, i. e., for any person who may happen to require to employ a member of the legal profession to do his business for him.

In the Letters Patent of 1862 the clause reads as follows : Cl. 7 :

We do hereby authorize and empower the said High Court of Judicature at Fort William to approve, admit and enrol such and so many advocates as to the said High Court shall seem meet who shall be and are hereby authorized to appear and plead for the suitors of the said High Court subject to the rules and directions of such Court.

It seems to be quite clear that the ordinary case of an advocate defending a prisoner in a criminal trial is governed by that clause. The same phrase is used in Cl. 8 with reference to vakils :

We do hereby authorize and empower the said High Court of Judicature at Fort William to approve, admit and enrol such and so many vakils as to the said High Court shall seem meet who shall be and are hereby authorized to appear plead and act for the suitors of the said High Court subject to the rules and directions of such Court.

It seems quite clear that that language is intended to be read in the same wide general way as in Cl. 11 of 1774. When the Letters Patent of 1862 was amended in 1865, Cls 7, 8 and 9 were rolled into one and a certain change was made because no longer were the advocates or vakils or attorneys authorized to do something by the Letters Patent subject to a power in the High Court to restrict the authority, but the terms of the Letters Patent of 1865 gave to the High Court a power to give such authority to each branch of the profession as it would think fit to do ; and Cl. 9, Letters Patent of 1865 went on to say not merely the High Court had power to approve, admit and enrol so many advocates, attorneys and vakils as to the High Court should seem meet, but that such advocates, vakils and attorneys shall be and are hereby authorized to appear for the suitors of the said High Court and to plead or act or to plead and act, for the said suitors, according as the said High Court may by its rules and directions determine, and subject to such rules and directions.

The position, therefore, after 1865 was that the rights of each branch of the profession were to be the rights given to them by the rules.

I come now on this question to the rules that were made under the Letters Patent of 1862 and 1865. As it is not easy now owing to the lapse of time to obtain the exact words of those rules I propose to set them out in this judgment. The rules of the High Court under the first Letters Patent of 1862 were as follows : R 6 :

Advocates of this Court may appear and plead for suitors in any branch of the Court civil or criminal.

Vakils shall not appear, plead or act for any suitor in this Court in any matter of ordinary original jurisdiction civil or criminal or in any matter of appeal from any case of ordinary original civil jurisdiction unless upon appeal from judgment in a case of such civil jurisdiction a question of Hindu or Mahomedan law or a question of usage shall arise and the Court or Judge thereof shall think fit to admit a vakil or vakils to plead for any suitor or suitors in that case.

Now, so far as appeals are concerned it will be noticed that R 7 of 1862 confines the prohibition of vakils from appearing to cases of appeals from ordinary original civil jurisdiction. The reason for that is manifest because if one goes to the clause which corresponds to Cl 15 of the present Letters Patent one finds that that is Cl. 14 of 1862 and Cl. 14 of 1862 was in these terms :

And we do further ordain that an appeal shall lie to the said High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal from the judgment in all cases of original civil jurisdiction of one or more Judges of the said High Court and so on : so that there was no Letters Patent right of appeal in 1862 except in a civil case. That, however, was altered by the terms used Cl 15 of 1865 and the terms used by that clause were these that an appeal shall lie to the said High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal from the judgment not being a sentence or order passed or made in any criminal trial, so that if it was possible to have an appeal in a criminal case which was an appeal from a judgment, but not from a judgment which was a sentence or order passed or made in a criminal trial, then for the first time it became theoretically possible to have an appeal in a criminal case from the original side. At first it does not appear that the consequences of that change were appreciated. When the High Court came in 1865 to revise its rules because of the new Letters Patent it left the rule about advocates (as I have set it out—Rule 6) without amendment. The only amendment it made in the rule about vakils was this: that instead of saying that vakils shall not appear, plead or act for any suitor in this Court in any matter of ordinary original jurisdiction civil or criminal

and so forth it says that

vakils may appear, act or plead for suitors in this Court, provided that they shall not appear, plead or act for any suitor in any matter of ordinary original jurisdiction civil or criminal or in any matter of appeal from any case of ordinary original civil jurisdiction, so that in effect the rule which confined the execution in case of appeals to cases of civil jurisdiction was repeated after 1865.

It does not appear that the change effected by Cl. 15 of 1865 Letters Patent claimed the attention of this Court until the very well-known case of Ameer Khan, In the matter of (4) in 1870, where it will be remembered, Norman, J., refused an application for a writ of habeas corpus. That decision was taken on appeal and the question was debated whether or not you could have in a criminal matter an appeal from the original side under the Letters Patent of 1865. The point discussed chiefly was whether a refusal of a writ of habeas corpus was a "judgment" within the meaning of Cl. 15. The point, however, was not decided because both the learned Judges who heard the appeal were clearly of opinion that the writ had been rightly refused on the merits and that case, although it brought the question up for the first time, resulted in no decision. In 1889 a case arose in Bombay. In the matter of Narrondas Dhanji (5), where an order in the nature of habeas corpus applied for under S 491, Criminal P. C., was refused by a Judge on the original side and the question was argued whether or not any appeal lay from that refusal. The point which was argued there again was whether a mere refusal to make such an order was a judgment—was really a determination of the rights of the parties—and it was held that an appeal did lie on the ground that the refusal of the order was a judgment and therefore the case came within Cl. 15, Letters Patent. But it was not until 1902, in the case of In the matter of Horace Lyall (6), that the question was authoritatively determined in this Court and there it was held that an appeal did lie from a refusal to grant an order under S. 491, Criminal P. C., on the ground that although it was a criminal matter, it was not a sentence or order passed or made in a criminal trial and from that date—and so far as I can judge, not before—it has been settled law in this Court that there can be an appeal from the original side in a criminal matter.

Now, the rules of this Court were subjected after 1910 to an extensive and general revision. The process of revision apparently took a long time, but ultimately the revised rules were passed by the full Court on 19th August 1913 to come into force on 15th April 1914 and in those revised rules we find that the old rules as to vakils and as to advocates and their authority have been altered. The alterations are very significant. At the same time we find incorporated in our rules a series of rules beginning with R. 14, Ch. 38, dealing with appeals under S. 491, Criminal P. C. We have therefore, to look back to Rr. 1 and 4, Ch. 2 to our present rules, with a view to see what is the alteration as compared with the rules of 1865 and what is the meaning of it.

Now, as the first rule stands, instead of the words :

Advocates of this Court may appear and plead for suitors in any branch of the Court civil or criminal,

we get the present R. 1.

Advocates of this Court may appear and plead for parties on either side of the Court, but on the original side or in appeals from the original side, not unless instructed by an attorney.

I cannot doubt that the intention of that rule was to cover criminal as well as civil appeals. Nobody supposes that an advocate of this Court is to be restricted

(4) [1870] 6 B. L. R. 459.

(5) [1890] 14 Bom. 555.

(6) [1902] 29 Cal. 286=5 C.W.N. 254 (F.B.).

When we come to R. 4 we find there that, instead of the prohibition against vakils appearing in appeals from the original side being expressly confined to civil cases only as had been the practice ever since the Letters Patent of 1862, the following words are employed :

Vakils shall not appear, plead or act for any suitor in this Court in any matter on the original side or in any matter of appeal from any case from the original side unless in such appeal a question of Hindu or Mahomedan law or usage shall arise, and so on. In my judgment it is reasonably clear that the revision of the rule which came into effect in 1914 took a broad line of division according as the case was on, or was an appeal from, the original side of this Court ; and whatever might have been the position had these rules not been revised the rules themselves are capable of but one interpretation. In my judgment the proper and the only permissible course in cases under the new S. 449, where a new right of appeal is given by the Code to the subject is for this right to be exercised so long as the present rules remain unchanged in the way laid down by these rules, namely on the footing that it is part of the business of the Court from which, as the rules stand, vakils are excluded. This disposes of the question of practice and I have only to thank Mr. Advocate-General and Mr. Basu for their assistance in enabling the Court to come to a decision in this matter. It may be noticed that so far as appeals from applications under S. 491 of the Code are concerned the Letters Patent of 1865 was amended in 1919 so as to prohibit any Letters Patent appeal in a case of criminal jurisdiction, and since 1923 S. 491 itself has been elastically altered. It may well be that these legislative changes make it necessary for the Court to bring these rules up to date. I desire to make it quite clear that nothing that I have said touches in any way upon any question as to what rules should be made. I am concerned only with the correct interpretation of the rules as they are.

Lease—Assignment—The test to determine whether a certain transaction amounts to an assignment is whether the whole interest of the lessee has been granted.

As a general rule, an assurance for a period less than the whole term is an under-lease and not an assignment. While if a term for years makes a lease for the residue of the term or for a time exceeding his interest, it operates as an absolute assignment. The test in such cases is whether the whole interest of the lessee has been granted. [P 683 C 1]

Plaintiff executed an indenture of lease in favour of a defendant for 61 years by which the lessee was allowed to sublet the leased property. Cl. 6 of the lease provided: "The said lessees shall have no power save amongst themselves to assign, transfer or in any way to alienate their right, title and interest upon the demised land." The defendant mortgaged the leasehold interest in the premises by way of sub-demise to a third person, whereupon the plaintiff determined the lease on the ground that a breach of covenant in the lease had occurred. The defendant contended that having regard to the act that under-letting even for the residue of the term was permitted, the circumstance that along with the under-letting there was a mortgage by way of sub-demise could not possibly amount to a breach of the covenant.

Held : that the transaction complained of did not amount to a mere under-letting or an under-lease but it amounted to an alienation and therefore, as such, was hit by Cl. 6 of the indenture of lease. [P 683 C 2]

C. C. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal against a decision of my learned brother Page, J., passed on 14th April 1927. The facts, shortly stated, are as follows : On 23rd August 1900, one Bolai Lal Seal who was the predecessor-in-interest of the present plaintiffs let out the premises in suit then known as No. 7/1, Halliday Street, to the predecessor of defendants 1 and 2 for a term of 61 years on certain terms and conditions specified in the indenture of lease. On 7th May 1923 defendants 1 and 2 mortgaged the leasehold interest in the said premises by way of sub-demise to the defendant 3.

On 20th August 1923 the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendants that they regarded the lease of 23rd August 1900 as having been determined by reason of the mortgage of 7th May 1923, which, according to them, operated as a breach by the lessees of a covenant in the lease.

The present suit was filed on 25th January 1924, in which the plaintiffs prayed for a declaration that the indenture of lease dated 23rd August 1900 stood determined and for possession of the premises in question, and also for mesne profits. On 30th June 1925, defendants 1 and 2 were adjudicated insolvents in Karachi and subsequently the Official Assignee of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Sind was added as a party defendant in their places. The principal defendant, namely, defendant 3, pleaded in his written statement that the mortgage in his favour was not an assignment of the lease in breach of any of the terms of the said document and denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to any relief whatsoever in the suit.

It is alleged that the plaintiffs came to know of the said mortgage in favour of defendant 3 shortly before 20th August 1923. The rents in respect of the premises had been paid to the plaintiffs up to the month of June 1923. In para. 9 of the written statement of defendants 1 and 2 it was stated that, although they had always been ready and willing to pay the rent reserved to the plaintiffs the plaintiffs, as a matter of fact, had not received any rent subsequent to the month of June 1923. When the suit came on for hearing before Page, J., in April 1927, it was suggested that the plaintiffs had accepted rent after they had become aware of the mortgage and that the forfeiture, if any, had been waived. It may be stated at once that, as far as one can make out from the pleadings, they do not raise any issue as to whether or not, after the forfeiture had occurred, the same was waived by the plaintiffs by acceptance of rent. Page, J., held that, on a true construction of the said indenture of lease and the mortgage, there had been no forfeiture of the lease and he accordingly dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

For the purposes of the determination of this appeal, it is necessary to consider the effect of two clauses of the said indenture of lease, namely, Cls. 5 and 6 and of Cl. 3 of the mortgage. Cls. 5 and 6 of the said Indenture are as follows :

(5) That the said lessees shall be at liberty or shall have the full power and authority without having recourse to previously securing to that effect the consent of the said lessor written or verbal to under-let the said demised land and the buildings, structures, sheds, godowns, stables or any portion thereof to be so erected and built by them as aforesaid.

(6) The said lessees shall have no power save amongst themselves as hereinafter mentioned to assign, transfer or in any way to alienate their right, title and interest upon the demised land and the buildings so to be erected by them thereon as aforesaid created by virtue of these presents provided nevertheless that neither of the said lessees shall be entitled to exercise the right of transfer or assignment among themselves as is hereinafter reserved until a competent Engineer to be approved by the lessor, certifies that the construction of the buildings so to be erected on the demised lands as aforesaid is completed at a cost of not less than ten thousand rupees as is hereinafter provided.

Clause 3 of the mortgage is as follows:

In further pursuance of the said agreement and for the consideration aforesaid, the mortgagors do hereby demise and sub-let unto the mortgagee all the hereditaments and premises comprised in and demised by the said lease and more fully described in Sch. A hereunder written which is valued at Rs. 10,000 and covenant to hold the same unto the mortgagee for the unexpired residue of the term of 61 years granted by the said lease subject to the proviso that this sub-lease shall terminate forthwith as and when the amount of money advanced by the mortgagee shall be repaid with interest hereinbefore mentioned and all costs as between attorney and clients and all dues for the time being as hereinbefore and hereinafter mentioned either by the mortgagors personally or by realization of rents and profits by the mortgagee himself and from the tenants now occupying or those who will occupy in future less the expenses and costs of realization and all other payments to be incurred and paid in connexion therewith the said hereditaments and premises comprised in and demised by the said lease.

It is argued on behalf of the appellants that, having regard to the three clauses set out above, the mortgage of the leasehold in this case operated as an absolute assignment of the residue of the term of the lease and that it is hit by Cl. 6 of the said indenture of lease. On the other hand it is argued on behalf of defendant 3, first, that having regard to the fact that under-letting even for the residue of the term is permitted by Cl. 5 of the said Indenture of lease, the circumstance that along with the under-letting there is a mortgage by way of sub-demise cannot possibly amount to a breach of the sixth covenant of the said indenture and, secondly, that, having regard to the terms of the mortgage, there is, as a matter of fact, no conveyance of the lessee's interest to the mortgagee but that there is merely a charge in favour of the mortgagee as is apparent from the terms employed in the mortgage itself in respect of the two classes of properties referred to in the mortgage, namely, the properties mentioned in Schs. B and A respectively. In other words, it is argued that, if the document amounts to a mortgage at all, it is a class of mortgages which is not hit by Cl. 5 of the said indenture and that an under-lease being permitted the fact of the creation of the mortgage by way of sub-demise, does not extend it into something which is precluded by the terms of the said clause.

I am of opinion that the contentions argued before us on behalf of defendant 3 must fail. As a general rule, an assurance for a period less than the whole term is an under-lease and not an assignment: per A. L. Smith L. J. in Bryant v. Hancock (1), while if a termor for years makes a lease for the residue of the term or for a time exceeding his interest, it operates as an absolute assignment, Parmenter v. Webber (2), Beardman v. Wilson (3), Hicks v. Downing (4). The test in such cases is whether the whole interest of the lessee has been granted—it is immaterial whether it is called a lease or an under-lease or a derivative lease—and if the whole interest has been granted it will operate as an assignment: see Pluck v. Digges (5).

This being the general rule it is necessary to find out whether in the present instance there has been such an absolute assignment of the lease as has been urged on behalf of the appellants. Under the Transfer of Property Act (See S 108, Cl. J.) in the absence of a contract to the contrary, the lessee may transfer absolutely or by way of mortgage or sub-lease the whole or any part of his interest in the property and any transferee of such interest or part may again transfer it. The lessee shall not, however, by reason only of such transfer cease to be subject to any of the liabilities attaching to the lease. In this case we have, however to determine for ourselves what the contract between the parties was. As pointed out in the case of The Bengal National Bank Ltd. v. Janaki Nath Roy (6), the reasoning of Dallas, C. J. in Williams v. Bosanquet (7), in such a case as this, is still valid in India. It is laid down there that the assignment of a lease for the whole term whether absolute or subject to a proviso for re-assignment in a certain event is as far as concerns the interest to be transferred precisely the same. So completely does the interest pass from the one and vest in the other that there is a covenant to re-assign when the money shall be repaid. The whole interest is therefore assigned and the whole is to be re-assigned. It vests there absolutely till such re-assignment in the party who is to re-assign and is not less absolute because by agreement between the immediate parties to which the lessor is no party the assignor may in an event which may or may not happen entitle himself to a reconveyance by the money being repaid.

In my opinion having regard to these considerations there cannot be any doubt that the assignment in the present case by way of mortgage of the residue of the term is an absolute one and that there is no substance in the contention that there is a distinction discernible between the words employed when mortgaging the properties set out in Sch. B and when mortgaging the residue of the term referred to in Sch. A by way of sub-demise. The distinction, if any, is because of the nature of the properties set out in the two schedules; it may be noted further that the draftsman of the said mortgage has used sufficient and apt words to indicate that it was to be an assignment of all the remaining interest in the term. Mortgages of leaseholds by assignment before 1926 were made in England by assignment of the whole unexpired residue of the term and similarly in the case of mortgages of leaseholds by sub-demise they were made by demising the property to the mortgagee reserving the last day or the last few days of the original term. The mortgage in this case is, as indicated above, of the residue of the term. Further, the mortgage of the residue of the term in this case is really in the nature of a usufructuary mortgage and there would seem to be great force in the contention put forward on behalf of the appellants that it does amount to an alienation within the meaning of Cl. 6 of the indenture of lease. I am unable to hold that there was anything reserved by the lessee when he executed the mortgage in the manner in which he did and I am of opinion that no comfort can be derived by defendant 3 from the words used in Cl. 3 of the mortgage. In my judgment the transaction complained of in this case does not amount to a mere under-letting or an under-lease but it amounts to an alienation and, therefore, as such, is hit by Cl. 6 of the Indenture of lease. In my opinion, it operates as a forfeiture.

For the reasons given, the appeal should be allowed with costs in both Courts. The plaintiffs will be entitled to a decree in terms of prayers (1), (2) and (3) in the plaint mesne profits being calculated at the rate of Rs 205 monthly from 1st July 1923 until possession is made over.

Buckland, J.—As we are differing from my learned brother Page, J, I feel I should say a few words though it is not possible to add to the judgment of my learned brother.

Since it has been conceded that an under-lease of the residue of a term amounts to an assignment the only question is whether by the mortgage of 7th May 1923 a breach of the covenant against assignment contained in the lease was committed. The answer to this question depends upon the construction to be placed upon the instrument of 7th May 1923.

It is not necessary that I should consider this point in detail for in my opinion it is covered by the decision in Bengal National Bank, Ltd. v. Janaki Nath Roy (6), to which I was a party and in which I fully stated my reasons for the view taken. Though, notwithstanding that case it has been argued that the mortgagor retained some interest in the leasehold premises the terms of the instrument in my opinion are inconsistent with such a view.

The only other question which arises and as to which it was submitted that there might have to be a remand is that of waiver. Apart from any question of fact such as when the last payment was made, there is no allegation in the written statement of a waiver on the part of the plaintiffs. That was the occasion when, if the defendants desired to allege waiver it should have been done by making the necessary allegations. It does at times occur that waiver is allowed to be raised as an issue though not in the pleadings. That is where the defendant alleges that the plaintiff left undone certain things which he ought to have done and consequently he is not entitled to the relief claimed. In those cases, inasmuch as the practice Court does not admit of a reply, the plaintiff only has the opportunity when the case comes on for hearing of stating that there was a waiver by the defendant. But nothing of the sort could have happened in the present case as the plea is one which should have been raised by the defendants in the first instance. In my judgment, not only should this appeal be allowed on the grounds stated but I am also of opinion that it was not open to the defendants to raise an issue of waiver.

Appeal No. 649 of 1925, Decided on 16th February 1928, from the appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Zillah Midnapur, D/- 10th December 1924.

Civil P. C. O. 2, R. 2 — Proceedings under S. 146, Ben. Ten. Act, for enhancement of rent pending—Decree obtained for rent at old rate—Subsequent suit, after decision of S. 105 proceedings allowing enhancement, for difference is not barred.

After the final publication of the Record-of-Rights, the plaintiff instituted proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, for assessment of fair rents. The Settlement Officer enhanced the rents to the amounts stated in the present suit, but on appeal by the defendants the Special Judge reversed that decision. The plaintiff preferred a second appeal and the case was as a result thereof remanded for a fresh decision. While this litigation was pending and after the decision of the Special Judge dismissing the plaintiff's claim for enhancement, the plaintiff instituted a suit for rent at the old rate and obtained a decree. The proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act eventually ended in a decision in plaintiff's favour. The plaintiff thereafter instituted the present suit for the difference.

Held: that O. 2, R. 2, did not operate as a bar to the plaintiff's claim as it can hardly be said that the plaintiff was entitled to make the claim or that he had intentionally relinquished it within the meaning of O. 2, R. 2: 15 B. Mukherji, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiff for recovery of rent from the defendants, representing the difference between the rents as they stood before enhancement and the amounts at which they stood after enhancement.

After the final publication of the Record-of-Rights the plaintiff instituted proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act for assessment of fair rents. The Settlement Officer enhanced the rents to the amounts stated in the present suit, but on appeal by the defendants the Special Judge reversed that decision. The plaintiff preferred a second appeal and the case was as a result thereof remanded for a fresh decision. While this litigation was pending and after the decision of the Special Judge dismissing the plaintiff's claim for enhancement, the plaintiff instituted a suit for rent at the old rate, for the years 1326 to 1329 B. S. and obtained a decree. The proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act eventually ended in a decision in plaintiff's favour, enhancement being allowed at the amounts stated in plaintiff and the said enhancement was to operate from 1923 B. S. The plaintiff thereafter instituted the present suit for the difference, for the said period, namely 1326 to 1329 B. S. The trial Court dismissed the suit, but the lower appellate Court on plaintiff's appeal has decreed the same. The defendants have then preferred the present appeal.

The contention that has been urged on behalf of the appellants is that O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C., operates as a bar to the plaintiff's claim. In my opinion this contention cannot succeed and for two reasons :

The argument is that the claim for rent at the enhanced rate should have been included in the former suit in which only rent at the old rate was asked for. To include that claim in the former suit it would have been necessary for the plaintiff to ask in the first place for enhancement of rent and then for a decree for the amount to which it may be enhanced, and in the alternative for rent at the old rate. Where a plaintiff has not framed his suit as one for enhancement of rent, but merely as a suit claiming arrears of rent at an enhanced rate, he is not entitled to a decree, as it is well settled that, though he can claim back rent for additional area, he cannot claim back rent at enhanced rate until the rent has been enhanced in a suit appropriately framed for the purpose: Ejel Mullick v Felar Mullick (1). In view of the facts as they stood at the date of the plaintiff's former suit, this claim would have involved a matter which was and had already been the subject of proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act. Section 109 of that Act would have operated as a bar to the entertainment of a suit involving the said claim. In these circumstances it can hardly be said that the plaintiff was "entitled to make" the claim or that he had "intentionally relinquished" it within the meaning of O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C.

Then again the relation of the two claims, namely, one for enhancement of rent and the other for recovery of arrears at the old rate, was considered by the Privy Council in the case of Soora Sundary Devi v. Golam Ally (2), and in the Full Bench decision of this Court in the case of Sudduruddin Ahmed v. Beni Madhab Rai (3) it was pointed out that the causes of action of the two claims are different. Those cases, no doubt, in one sense, may be regarded as converse to the present one, because in those cases the first suit was one for rent at an enhanced rate and the second one for rent at the old rate and the question arose under S. 43, Civil P. C. 1882. The principle enunciated in those cases, however, is quite clear and applies fully to the present case. The two causes of action may no doubt be joined in one suit, but still they are separate (Gudar Tewari v. Brijanandan Pershad (4)). O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C., therefore, cannot be a bar.

The case of Manmatha Nath Pal v. Surendra Nath (5), upon which reliance has been placed on behalf of the appellant is wholly distinguishable, there having been in that case no proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, and the claim for enhancement incorporated in the first suit having already been decided

v.

Chidambaran Chetty and others—Respondents.

Appeal No. 54 of 1927, Decided on 18th July 1927, from original order, D/- 18th March 1912.

Limitation Act, Art. 183—To constitute "revivor" there must be a determination that decree-holder has a subsisting right to execute the decree.

To constitute a revivor of a decree there must be expressly or by implication a determination that a decree is still capable of execution and the decree-holder is entitled to enforce it.

An ex-parte decree was obtained on the original side on 18th March 1912 against a firm of which one S was a partner. An application for execution was made on 21st March 1924. S appeared through his solicitor and obtained an adjournment for moving to set aside the decree. No affidavit or any written objection as contemplated by O. 21, R. 16, was filed. On 13th June 1923, S obtained a rule on motion calling upon the decree-holder to show cause why the decree should not be set aside. It was ordered that an issue be tried as to whether S was partner in the defendant's firm and that all further proceedings in execution of the decree should be stayed until the trial of the issue. The issue was determined against S on 29th May 1924. An execution application was filed on 3rd September 1926. It was contended that the order of 29th May 1924 was by implication a determination that the decree was still capable of execution.

Held: that no question of right to execute the decree was before the Court. The order was confined to the simple question whether S was a partner. Such an order could not be regarded as an order determining the question whether decree-holder had a subsisting right to execute the decree and did not constitute a revivor. [P 687 C 2]

ex-parte decree passed by this Court on the original side on 18th March 1912 is barred by Art. 183, Sch. 1, Lim. Act, 1908. The period of limitation is 12 years and when the decree has been "revived" the 12 years have to be computed from the date of revivor. The present application for execution was made on 3rd September 1926 and it was not contended by the learned Advocate-General before us, though it is suggested in the memorandum of appeal, that the application of that date can be regarded as a mere renewal of an earlier application. Taking this as the relevant date the appellant contends that the decree was revived by an order dated 29th May 1924 so far as the original judgment-debtor, Subramania Chetty, is concerned.

The relevant facts when disentangled are really there. On 21st March 1923 an application for execution was made by the present appellant as assignee of the decree. Whether this was validly or invalidly served upon Subramania does not matter for, on 21st May 1923, he appeared through his solicitor and obtained adjournments. It appears that he did not file any affidavit or give any written statement of any objections such as are contemplated by R. 16, O. 21, but that the solicitor obtained the adjournments on mentioning that he wanted to move to set aside the decree and have the execution stayed. On 13th June 1923 he obtained a rule on motion calling upon the appellant to show cause why the decree should not be set aside and execution stayed. On 17th August 1923 it was ordered that an issue be tried as to whether Subramania was a partner in the defendant firm and that all further proceedings in execution of the decree should be stayed until the trial of the said issue.

Apparently the validity of the decree depended on this issue which was determined against him by an order of Thornhill, J., dated 29th May 1924. Twelve years had meanwhile expired, on 17th March 1924, since the date of the decree, and it is this order of 29th May 1924 that it is said to operate as a "revivor." The terms of the order merely declare that Subramania is a partner of the firm in question and that his application to set aside the decree is dismissed. As the interim stay granted on 17th August was expressed to be "until the trial of the said issue" it came to an end of itself and without further order.

What followed has no bearing upon the present question, but to make the matter clear it may be mentioned that on 9th April 1925 the appellant applied for renewal of his application of 21st March 1923 and fresh notices were ordered. The judgment-debtors were not properly served and did not appear. In their absence the appellant on 18th May 1925 obtained an order giving him leave to execute the decree, which order was afterwards set aside.

It is contended for the appellant that the order of 29th May 1924 was by implication a determination that the decree was still capable of execution and that the decree-holder was entitled to enforce it. Reliance is placed on Kamini Devi v. Aghore Nath Mukerjee (1). That was a case of an application to execute a decree. The judgment-debtors before the Court were obliged to put forward all their objections. They put forward and pressed one only—a plea of limitation. This plea was overruled but no actual order, e. g., of attachment was made. It was held that the Court had impliedly decided that the decree-holder was entitled to have execution.

The facts of the present case are different in an essential point. There is no evidence that Subramania had ever stated his objections if any under R 16, O. 21. He took a prior point and obtained adjournments to litigate it—not under the summons or in chambers but by a rule and issue tried in Court. It is not shown that he at any time disclaimed all other defences to the summons or that he was required to state his defences before being given an adjournment. The learned Judge who tried the issue was in no way hearing the summons. He was under no obligation to know—and in all probability neither knew nor cared—what answer to the summons Subramania might have. He had to decide whether the decree had ever been a good decree. If it was then the Judge in chambers could proceed to decide the execution matter in the ordinary way. It is said that in the circumstances of this case it is clear that Subramania could have no defence of payment and no defence of limitation, and that the order of 29th May 1924 really concluded the matter and was therefore a decision by implication that the appellant was entitled to enforce the decree. This was the main argument of the learned Advocate-General, but I think it is an illegitimate extension of the principle applied in Kamini Devi's case. The decision in that case proceeded on the objections which the judgment-debtor in fact took in the execution case, and on the fact that the question before the Court was whether the decree could be executed. The judgment-debtor took only one defence and that was overruled. The decision as to revivor did not proceed upon a consideration of the defences which the judgment-debtor had in the sense of good defences. The judgment-debtor had been called upon for his whole defence and he had failed to establish any. I see no proof that this was what happened in the present case. We are dealing with an order made by Thornhill, J., when the execution matter was not before him for decision. Its implication cannot for this purpose be carried beyond what was involved in the issue framed on 17th August 1923 and the rule of 13th June 1923. It seems clear enough that if the application of 21st March 1923 had been properly restored Subramania would have had the right to contest it by stating what defences, if any, he had. All that had been found against him was that the decree when passed was a good decree. One defence was gone—a defence that he could not take upon the summons. Any that he could take upon the summons were open to him.

Whether it be true or not that there can be no revivor without an order for execution, as the learned Judge has said, I think that no revivor has been shown in this case. I think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Mitter, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of my learned brother C. C. Ghose, J., dated 14th April 1927, dismissing an application of the appellant for execution on the ground that the said application is barred by the statute of limitation.

The facts which are material for the purposes of the appeal may be briefly stated as follows :

On 18th March 1912 a decree was passed by the High Court in its original jurisdiction for a certain sum of money in favour of Sujan Chand Daga and

(1) [1910] 11 C. L. J. 91=4 I. C. 402=14 C. W. N. 357.

Champalal Binani (plaintiffs) and against a firm whose proprietors were Kanappa Chetty, Subramania Chetty and Ramanandan Chetty (defendants). The said three Chetties were members of a joint Mitakshara family and were carrying on business in co-partnership under the name and style of Shuna Vena Kannappa Chetty at No. 67, Canning Street, in the town of Calcutta. No appeal was preferred from the said decree nor was any adjustment of the matter in dispute made subsequent to the said decree nor was any writ issued before or after adjustment. Sugan Chand Daga died after decree and Kedar Nath Daga, the only son, heir and legal representative of the said Sugan Chand Daga and Champalal Binani assigned in favour of Muthiar Chettiar, the appellant before us, their right, title and interest under the decree by an indenture of assignment dated 9th November 1922. On 29th November 1922 the appellant as such assignee applied to the High Court for leave to execute the said decree and a notice under O. 21, R. 16, Civil P. C. was directed to the original decree-holders and the defendants. Before the said application was made Kanappa Chetty one of the judgment-debtors, had died leaving behind Chidambaran Chetty as his only son heir and legal representative. The notice which was issued on Kanappa Chetty in ignorance of his death consequently became infructuous.

On 21st March 1923 the appellant made another application for leave to execute the said decree against Subramania Chetty. Ramanandan Chetty and Chidambaran Chetty applied for an order that the certified copy of the decree be transmitted to the Court of the Sub-Judge of Shivaganga in Ramnad in the Madras Presidency for execution. Notice was issued upon the assignors of the decree and also upon the Chetties to show cause why the decree should not be executed by the said transferee against the three Chetties. On 21st May 1923 Subramania appeared through his solicitor and got the application of the appellant adjourned till 23rd May 1923 when again the said Subramania applied for a further adjournment on the ground that he wanted to have the decree set aside and the execution thereof stayed. On 13th June 1923 Subramania applied to the High Court to set aside the decree of 18th March 1912 and for the stay of the execution of the said decree on the ground that he was never a partner in the defendants' firm and that the writ of summons in the suit was not at all served on him. A rule was issued by the High Court upon the assignors of the said decree and on the present appellant to show cause why the said decree should not be set aside and the execution thereof stayed. The rule came on for hearing on 17th August 1923 and it was ordered that the suit be placed on the list of motions for the trial of the issue as to whether the defendant Subramania Chetty was a partner of the firm of Shuna Vena Kannappa Chetty at the time of the institution of the suit in which the ex-parte decree dated 18th March 1912 aforesaid was passed and it was further ordered that all further proceedings in execution of the said decree be stayed until the trial of the said issue.

On 29th May 1924 Thornhill, J., tried the issue and held that Subramania was a partner of the defendants' firm at the time of the institution of the suit viz., 9th January 1912 and that he was unable to show that his interest in that business subsequently ceased. Thornhill, J., observed:

The result is that the application by Subramania Chetty to set aside the decree is dismissed with costs including costs of commission and the costs of the trial of issue as of a hearing.

On 9th April 1925 a second application for execution was made and the notice under O. 21, R. 16, Civil P. C., was issued and the house of the defendant Subramania Chetty at Senalkudi (Madras) was attached. The attachment was raised by an order dated 13th January 1926. The appellant preferred an appeal against the said order which was dismissed on 20th August 1926. On 3rd September 1926 the present application for execution was made and the defendant Subramania put in an affidavit in opposition in which he stated amongst other things that the application for execution of the decree was barred by the law of limitation and that the application should be dismissed with costs. The application was heard by C. C. Ghose, J., with the result that the learned Judge gave effect to the plea of limitation raised by Subramania and dismissed the application with costs.

Against that decision the present appeal has been preferred by Muthiar Chettiar, the assignee of the original decree-holder and it is contended by the learned Advocate-General who appeared on his behalf that the decision of the learned Judge is wrong inasmuch as he should have held that the decision of Thornhill, J., dated 21st May 1924 operated as a revivor within the meaning of Art. 183, Sch. 1, Lim. Act. It is contended that the said order by implication decided that the decree of 18th March 1912 was still capable of execution and it is said that Thornhill, J., when he held in May 1924, that the application of Subramania Chetty to set aside the decree should be dismissed laid down in effect that the decree was still capable of execution. On the other hand it is contended by Mr. S. N. Banerjee for the respondent that in order to constitute a revivor there must be an adjudication on an application for execution by the decree-holder that the decree is capable of execution and reliance has been placed on several decisions of this Court. In particular reference has been made to Ashootosh Dutt v. Doorga Churn Chatterjee (2); Kamini Devi v. Aghore Nath Mukherjee (1); Chuttipat Singh v. Sait Sumari (3) and Amulya Ratn Banerjee v. Banku Behari Chatterjee (4).

It is not necessary to decide for the purposes of the present appeal whether in order to constitute a revivor an order must be made on an application for execution by the decree-holder. For I think in the present case the order of Thornhill, J., can in no sense be regarded as a determination by implication that the decree was capable of execution and that the decree-holder had a right to execute the decree. The question as to whether the decree-holder of the assignee had a right to execute the decree was not present to the mind of Thornhill, J., and it is conceded by the learned Advocate-General that no question of the right of the decree-holder to execute the decree by reason of lapse of time was raised before Thornhill, J., nor could it be so raised for having regard to the order staying execution of the decree the execution would not be barred on that date as under S. 15, Lim. Act, the decree-holder would be entitled to get a deduction of the time between 17th August 1923 and 29th May 1924 in computing the period of limitation. The true rule in cases of this kind has been laid down in the case of Kamini Devi v. Aghore Nath Mukherjee (1), where it is observed that the essence of the matter is that to constitute a revivor of a decree, there must be expressly or by implication a determination that a decree is still capable of execution and the decree-holder is entitled to enforce it. An order for execution operates as a revivor because it necessarily implies such a determination. No question of execution was before Thornhill, J. He was only trying the issue as to whether Subramania was partner in the firm of the defendants and as such liable under the decree against the firm. No question of right to execute the decree was before the learned Judge. One of the defendants applies to set aside the decree on the ground that he was not a partner of the firm against whom the decree has been made and the learned Judge's decision was confined to the single question as to whether he was a partner or not. Such an order cannot be regarded as an order determining the question whether the decree-holder has a subsisting right to execute the decree. Such an order does not fall within the definition of "revivor" which, as Woodroffe, J., pointed out in Chuttipat v. Sait Sumari Muli (3), means a decision holding that the decree was still capable of execution. The decree in the present case being dated 18th March 1912 and the application for execution having been made on 3rd September 1926 beyond twelve years of the decree the decree-holder has lost his right to have execution.

In this view I agree with my Lord the Chief Justice in dismissing the appeal.

The conclusion I have arrived at in this case is one that I somewhat regret, but I feel constrained to arrive at it. It is not a case in which there are on the part of the respondent Subramania any merits which could predispose one to arrive at a conclusion in his favour.

Criminal Appeal No. 847 of 1927, Decided on 18th April 1928, from judgment of Sess Judge, Pabna.

(a) Criminal P. C., S. 297—Trial by jury—The only witness relied on by prosecution turning hostile—No evidence remaining to go to jury—Failure of Judge to so direct is a misdirection.

In a trial by jury under S. 325, Penal Code, prosecution relied upon the evidence of a certain witness who was the only witness in the case and who could testify as to what had occurred. His evidence was considered hostile in some respects and the prosecution sought to discredit him. Judge did not direct the jury that there was no evidence.

Held: that this was a serious misdirection as there remained no evidence to go to the jury, the witness having been discredited and the trial was vitiated. [P 691 C 1]

(b) Evidence Act, S. 154 — Witness cross-examined as hostile—He cannot be relied on as to part only.

A party cannot be allowed to say that his witness is a truthful witness so far as part of his evidence is concerned but an untruthful witness so far as some other portion is concerned. Once a party cross-examines his own witness he must be held to no longer rely on him: A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 139 and A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 463, Rel. on. [P 691 C 1]

B. M. Sen—for the Crown.

Judgment.—The appellant Mokbul Khan was found guilty under S. 325 by a unanimous verdict of the Jury and the learned Sessions Judge of Pabna agreeing with this verdict has sentenced the appellant to two years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 200. The facts briefly are these: The appellant and his brother Mansur had an altercation with the complainant about an exchange of labour. One Prodhan Babu Khan came to arbitrate. Mokbul and Mansur began to beat complainant. Foiz Bepari protested. Mokbul struck him on the head with a lathi and Mansur on the side. He fell down and shortly expired. Defence was that the case was entirely false. In order to understand Mr. Chowdhury's point a few more facts are necessary. The occurrence took place at night. The only witness as to what happened is the complainant Mahajan and the case of the prosecution depends on the belief or disbelief of his evidence and also of the witnesses to whom it is alleged he stated what had occurred immediately or shortly after the occurrence. After Mahajan had been examined the Public Prosecutor apparently considered his evidence in some respect hostile and with the leave of the Court proceeded under S. 154 to cross-examine him apparently with the view of getting rid of some part of his evidence which was unfavourable to the prosecution. That this was done has not been challenged by the Crown. Mr. Chowdhury argues that it is not open to the Crown to cross-examine its own witness merely for the purpose of discrediting him so far as a portion of his evidence is concerned. The effect of discrediting a witness as to a part of his evidence is to discredit him as regards the whole. Therefore the Crown had by seeking to discredit their own witness said that he was not a witness on whom they relied. As he was the only witness on whom the prosecution relied to ask the Court to convict the accused it was the duty of the Judge to have directed the jury that there was no evidence and that they should return a verdict of not guilty. As to the position of a witness who has been declared hostile and the party calling him allowed to cross-examine him we have been referred to two cases. The first case is the case of Satyendra v. Emperor (1). In that case it was held that where a party was allowed to cross-examine his own witness the effect of that cross-examination must be to discredit the witness altogether and not merely to get rid of part of his testimony and that hence the witness's evidence must be excluded altogether. I presume that this means so far as it supports the case for the prosecution for, obviously, the defence would I think be entitled to rely on so much of his evidence as supported their case. Otherwise a party who found that his witness had given evidence which supported his adversary's case could get rid of this evidence by declaring him hostile.

The other case to which we have been referred is Khijiruddin Sonar v. Emperor (2) a decision to which I was myself a party. There it was also held following the dictum of Lord Campbell in Faulkner v. Brine (3) that the result of allowing a party to cross-examine his own witness was to discredit him altogether. In other words a party cannot be allowed to say that his witness is a truthful witness so far as part of his evidence is concerned but an untruthful witness so far as some other portion is concerned. Therefore it seems that once a party cross-examines his own witness he must be held to no longer rely on him.

Mr. Chowdhury argues therefore that the position is thus: the prosecution have discredited or sought to discredit their own witness. He is the sole witness to prove their case.

It is the duty of the Judge to determine whether any evidence has been given on which the jury could properly find the question for the party on whom the onus lay. Emperor v. Upendra Nath Das (4).

Mr. Chowdhury argues that the prosecution has cross-examined their own witness. In other words they seek to discredit him and do not rely on him. They cannot ask the jury to find for the prosecution on the testimony of a witness whom they have themselves discredited. Hence the Judge should have told the jury that there was no evidence on which they could find the accused guilty and directed them to find a verdict of not guilty. Not having done so the Judge has misdirected the jury.

This contention in the circumstances seems to me to be well founded.

In view of the prosecution treatment of their own witness there was no evidence on which the accused could have been found guilty and therefore no evidence to go to the jury and the Judge should have directed them accordingly. There has been a serious misdirection therefore and we are obliged to set aside the verdict of the jury and the sentence passed by the Judge agreeing with the jury's verdict. In the circumstances of the case it would obviously be useless to re-try the accused and we order he be acquitted.

Rabindra Nath Das—Appellant.

Jogendra Chandra Deb—Respondent.

Appeal No. 722 of 1926, Decided on 10th July 1928, from appellate decree of 2nd Sub-Judge, Sylhet, D/- 16th December 1928.

 (a) Malicious Prosecution*—"Prosecution" includes such civil actions as may be the subject of a suit for malicious prosecution—Application under S. 195, Criminal P. C., to grant sanction to prosecute rejected—Such application was held to be prosecution giving rise to a claim for damages for malicious prosecution.

The definition of 'prosecution' is not confined to prosecution before a Magistrate or a criminal Court. If a Judicial Tribunal is moved which has the power to take criminal action against the person charged the requirement of the law is satisfied and a claim for damages for malicious prosecution will arise. The word "prosecution" includes such civil actions as may be the subject of a suit for malicious prosecution: (Case-law Discussed) [P 693 C 2]

An application was made to a Munsif for sanction under S. 195. The application was rejected. Thereupon plaintiff sued defendant for malicious prosecution. The defendant contended that a mere application for sanction to prosecute was not a prosecution.

Held: that the defendant was liable, as proceedings for sanction to prosecute before a Munsif, even if regarded as civil proceedings, can sustain an action for malicious prosecution: A. I. R. 1922 Cal. 145, Rel. on. [P 694 C 1]

(b) Malicious Prosecution—Prosecution not mala fide in the beginning—Its continuance after knowledge that the facts upon which it was based were not true may give rise to a claim for damages.

A prosecution may not be mala fide in the beginning; but the continuance of such prosecution after it was discovered that the facts upon which it was based were not true may give rise to a claim for damages for malicious prosecution: Fitzjohn v. Maskinder, (1861) 30 L.J. C. P. 257; 30 Bom. 37; 30 All. 525 and 12 C. L. J. 410, Rel. on. [P 694 C 2]

Gopal Chandra Das, Jogneswar Majumdar and Upendra Chandra Roy—for Appellant.

Birendra Kumar De—for Respondent

Suhrawardy, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for damages for malicious prosecution upon the following facts. In a previous suit in which one Bola Nath was defendant the plaintiff who is a pleader practising in Habiganj in the district of Sylhet filed a written statement accompanied by a vakalatnama on 16th February 1923 purported to have been signed by Bhola Nath and some other defendants. The vakalatnama showed that it was accepted by the plaintiff on the 7th February 1923 which was the date of the vakalatnama. On 28th February 1923 the plaintiff reported to the Court that his client Bhola Nath had died. In May 1923 the defendant applied to the Munsif for sanction under S. 195, Criminal P. C., to prosecute the plaintiff, his clerk and defendants 30 and 33 on the allegation that the signatures of Bhola Nath on the written statement and the vakalatnama were forgeries since he had died on 3rd February 1923. The application was registered as a miscellaneous case and the plaintiff was directed to show cause. On 9th June 1923, the date of the hearing of the case, the plaintiff filed certain papers from the criminal Court to show that Bhola Nath was alive on 7th February 1923. On the next date of the hearing, that is, 30th June 1923, the defendant applied for time to summon his witnesses. On 21st July 1923 he again applied for time to file certified copy of the death register; and again on 4th August he applied for time for the same purpose, but his application was rejected and the case dismissed. Thereafter the plaintiff instituted the present suit for recovery of damages for malicious prosecution and defamation. One of the points of law raised by the defence was that the suit for damages for defamation was not maintainable. A preliminary issue was framed and the Munsif, who heard it decided that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages for defamation. The case was again finally heard by the same Munsif and the plaintiff's suit was decreed for Rs 250 with costs. On appeal by the defendant the learned Subordinate Judge confirmed the decree and hence this second appeal by the defendant.

The first point raised by the learned advocate on behalf of the appellant is that there was no prosecution within the meaning of the law such as to give rise to the plaintiff's claim for damages for malicious prosecution. It is argued that a mere application for sanction to prosecute is not a prosecution. No authority has been cited in support of this proposition. But several cases have been placed before us in which it has been held that a mere filing of a petition in a criminal Court for necessary action on which no action was taken or which was dismissed is not prosecution giving rise to the plaintiff's claim for damages. The view expressed in the reported cases is not consistent on this point and so far as this Court is concerned it was authoritatively laid down by Jenkins, C. J. in Golapjan v. Bhola Nath (1) that dismissal of a complaint under S. 203, Criminal P. C. does not give rise to a right to claim compensation for malicious prosecution. This view is supported by the opinion expressed by Fletcher, J. in De Rozario v. Gulab Chand Anandaji (2) and by the English authorities and by most of the text writers on the law of Torts. In Yates v. The Queen (3) on which reliance has been placed by a decision of this Court upon this point, Brett, M. R. observed, apparently by way of an obiter, at p. 657 :

For my own part I consider that laying the information before a Magistrate would not be the commencement of the prosecution because the Magistrate might refuse to grant a summons, and if no summons, how could it be said that a prosecution against any one ever commenced.

Cotton, L. J. in the same case expressed his opinion thus :

It cannot be said that prosecution commences before a person is summoned to answer a complaint.

The law has thus been laid down in Clerk and Lindsell on Tort, 7th Edn. at p. 637 where the dictum of Brett, M. R. in Yates v. The Queen (3) has been approved and quoted :

A Justice of the peace can only take action on an information laid before him. If he thinks that it discloses ground for believing that an offence has been committed, he either issues a warrant for the arrest of the incriminated party or a summons commanding his attendance. But until he issues such summons or warrant the prosecution cannot be said to begin. The gist of the action for malicious prosecution is that the defendant set the Magistrate in motion.

The same view has been taken in Madras in the case of Nurse v. Kustamji Dorabji (4). In C. H. Croudy v. O' Reilly (5) and Bishnu Pergash v. Phulman Singh (6) it is expressly laid down that a prosecution for the purpose of a suit for damages for malicious prosecution begins as soon as information is laid before the Magistrate. The same view has been expressed in Ahmedibhai v. Framji Edulji (7). It is not necessary to pursue this matter further as the question raised in those cases does not affect that which presents itself for determination in the present case. It is accordingly necessary to determine the meaning of "prosecution." In Halsbury's Laws of England Vol. 19, p. 670 "prosecution" is thus defined :

A prosecution exists where a criminal charge is made before a Judicial Officer or Tribunal, and any person who makes or is actively instrumental in the making or prosecuting of such a charge is deemed to prosecute it and is called the prosecutor.

The expression "criminal charge" has been used in view of the decision in Raysan v. South London Tramways Co (8). In that case the question was whether proceedings taken against any person for having travelled in a carriage or in tramways avoiding or attempting to avoid payment of fare thus rendering himself liable to a penalty not exceeding 40 shillings are proceedings in respect of a criminal offence so that a suit for damages for malicious prosecution could lie against the accuser. Lord Esher M. R. decided that the proceedings were in respect of a criminal offence so that an action for criminal prosecution would lie. The learned Master of the Rolls however, cautiously observed :

Now there can be no doubt that if what was done to her was to take criminal proceedings against her and if the criminal process was carried on without reasonable and probable cause and maliciously then her action would lie. I am not prepared to say that, if the proceedings taken against her in this case were not criminal proceedings, the action would not lie if those proceedings were taken without reasonable and probable cause and maliciously.

In Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (9) "criminal charge" has been defined as including all indictments involving reputation or possible loss of property to the person. In Balbhadra

Singh v. Budri Shah (10) Viscount Dunedin in pronouncing the judgment of the Judicial Committee observed:

In any country where, as in India, prosecution is not private, an action for malicious prosecution in the most literal sense of the word could not be raised against any private individual. But giving information to the authorities which naturally leads to prosecution is just the same thing. And if that is done and trouble caused the action will lie.

The definition of prosecution is not confined to prosecution before a Magistrate or a criminal Court. If a judicial tribunal is moved which has the power to take criminal action against the person charged the requirement of law is satisfied and a claim for damages for malicious prosecution will arise. In Clerk and Lindsell on Torts, at p. 637, there will be found the following passage:

To prosecute is to set the law in motion and the law is only set in motion by an appeal to some person clothed with judicial authority in regard to the matter in question.

In the present case the application was made to the Munsif for sanction under S. 195, Criminal P. C. The Court was moved to grant sanction to prosecute the plaintiff in this case and if the application were granted the plaintiff would have been liable to prosecution. Some difficulty in applying the law as laid down arises in this case owing to the fact that after obtaining such sanction the defendant might or might not have gone to the criminal Court and prosecuted the plaintiff. But the proceedings relating to the granting of the sanction, though they may not lead to imposition of fine or imprisonment, render the person charged liable to fine or imprisonment and therefore come within the meaning of the term. It is with diffidence that I venture to take this view and if the matter were res integra I am not sure what opinion I might form upon this point; but the question was raised and decided in a very recent case of this Court in Narendra Nath De v. Jyotis Chandra Pal (11). In that case the defendant had impugned the genuineness of the copy of the will filed by the plaintiff and applied for sanction to prosecute. It was said, following the dictum of Mookerjee, J., in Crowdy v. O'Reilly (5) that the maintainability of a suit for malicious prosecution does not depend on there having been a prosecution in the sense in which the term is used in the Code of Criminal Procedure. It was further observed:

We hold that in the present case the allegations in the plaint that the defendant maliciously and without just, reasonable and probable cause instituted proceedings for sanction and that the plaintiff was obliged to defend the case are sufficient to disclose a cause of action.

Even if the proceedings for sanction to prosecute before the Munsif are regarded as civil proceedings they may sustain an action for malicious prosecution as involving false imputations touching the plaintiff's business reputation as a professional man: Quartz Hill Mining Co. v. Eyre (9), per Bowen, L. J., at p. 691:

The word "prosecution" includes such civil actions as may be the subject of a suit for malicious prosecution: Bigelow on Torts, p. 204.

The first objection of the appellant must therefore be overruled.

The next ground on which the appeal is based is that it has been found in the first judgment by the Munsif that the defendant had no ground for believing to be false the information he had received that Bhola Nath died on 3rd February 1923. It is contended that there was on this assumption no ground for holding that the action taken by the defendant was without reasonable and probable cause. There is no doubt that that observation was made in the judgment of the Munsif when he was trying the issue relating to the plaintiff's claim for damages for defamation. But when the same officer came to try the suit for damages for malicious prosecution he came to the conclusion that the defendant was not actuated by honest belief in making the application for sanction and the reason given by him apparently supports his opinion. The learned Munsif, after discussing the evidence, enters another finding that the conduct of the defendant even if it was honest amounted to a continuance of the prosecution maliciously after he became aware of the real state of things. The learned Subordinate Judge on appeal had endorsed that finding in these words:

It appears to me to be clear in this case that the defendant rushed to Court with the false accusation, never believing that there was any truth in the same; and even when there was unimpeachable evidence on the record to show the nature of his indictment he persisted in pressing the charge.

These findings are on the face of them findings of fact and we cannot say in second appeal that they are not supported by the facts found by the Courts below. It is well established that a prosecution may not be entirely mala fide; but the continuance of such prosecution, after it was discovered that the facts upon which it was based are not true, may give rise to a claim for damages for malicious prosecution. This doctrine is based upon the dictum of Coburn, C. J., in Fitzjohn v. Mackinder (12), where he says:

A prosecution though in the outset not malicious, as having been undertaken at the dictation of a Judge or Magistrate or if spontaneous from having been commenced under a bonafide belief in the guilt of the accused, may nevertheless become malicious in any of the stages through which it has to pass if the prosecutor having acquired positive knowledge of the innocence of the accused perseveres malo animo in the prosecution, with the intention of procuring per nefas a conviction of the accused.

This view has been adopted in the Town Municipality of Jambusar v. Gireja Sankar Nasiram (13) and by the Judicial Committee in Gajaprosad v. Bhakat Singh (14) and also by this Court in Shama Bibi v. Chairman of Baranagore Municipality (15). It has been found by both the Courts below that the papers of the criminal Court were produced by the plaintiff in the sanction matter on 9th June 1923 which clearly showed that Bhola Nath, who was the defendant, was alive on 7th February 1923 on which date the written statement and the vakalatnama were purported to have been signed. In spite of those documents the defendant applied for time, on 30th June 1923, for summoning his witnesses thereby giving a clear indication that he meant to press his application for sanction. On two subsequent days he wanted time to file a certified copy of the death register presumably for the purpose of proving that Bhola Nath was not alive on the 7th February. In this case, however, the defendant has not attempted to prove that his case in the sanction matter was correct. In his deposition he says that he had no idea that the pleader and his clerk were in the conspiracy and also if Bhola Nath was not known to them they might have been deceived by anyone falsely personating Bhola Nath before them. He admits that he came to know from the papers of the criminal case that the information that Bhola Nath was dead was not true. His subsequent conduct therefore amounted to continuing the prosecution maliciously though it might have been originally started under a bona fide mistake. With regard to the finding of malice and want of probable and reasonable cause, the findings of the Court below are clear and supported by the evidence in this case. Whatever ground of suspicion the defendant might have had against the other persons against whom he applied for sanction he could have no ground for asking for sanction to prosecute the plaintiff who is a respectable pleader as observed by the Munsif and who is not expected to have personal knowledge of matters relating to the identity of clients. The endorsement on the back of the vakalatnama showed that he had received it through another person. There cannot therefore be any reasonable or probable cause for asking permission to prosecute the pleader. As regards malice the finding of the Courts below is that at the time when he made the application, and after it, the defendant went about bragging that he had caught the pleader in a trap. One must not forget that in the original title suit the defendant was a plaintiff and for some purpose or other he thought it to be to his advantage to implicate the pleader.

Considering all the facts and circumstances of this case I think that the Courts below have taken a correct view of the matter and the appeal is therefore dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of an application for revocation of a grant of letters of administration which was made under S. 50 of the Probate and Administration Act now replaced by S. 263, Succession Act of 1925. The letters of administration were granted with the will annexed of the testator who died in the year 1883. By his will he gave his property to his two grandsons Satis and Sris and he made provisions for payment of annuities to his daughter Bama Sundari and his daughter-in-law Sakhi Sundari. Letters of administration were granted to Bama Sundari in 1901 and she was administering the estate till her death on 21st June 1923. After the death of Bama Sundari the present opposite party Sris applied for grant of Letters of Administration for the unadministered portion of the estate. The present petitioner for revocation objected to it, but letters were granted to the objector Sris on 19th June 1924. The other annuitant Sakhi Sundari died some time in October 1924. The present application was made by the widow of Satis for revocation of the letters of administration on 21st March 1925. The grounds stated for revocation were two :

(1) That the estate having been fully administered, the grant has become useless and inoperative through circumstances ; and

(2) the opposite party to whom the grant was made has wilfully and without reasonable cause omitted to exhibit an inventory or account as ordered by the Court granting administration.

It has been found by the learned Judge below that the second ground has not been substantiated. As a matter of fact the administrator has rendered accounts. He has, however, made the order for revocation of the grant on the ground that the estate has been fully administered. There is some confusion of ideas when it is stated that the estate has been fully administered. Because, if the estate has been fully administered, there is no occasion for an application for revocation of the grant of the letters of administration. What the applicant for revocation must have meant is—and that seems to be the idea of the learned Judge,—that nothing further has to be done by the administrator except to make over the legacies to the legatees. So long as the legacies are not paid, it cannot be said that the estate has been fully administered. The question, however, is whether the application comes within any of the provisions of S. 263 of the Act. It is now well settled that the Courts in India can revoke a grant of letters of administration only according to the provisions of the section which previously was S 10, Probate and Administration Act: see the cases of Annoda Prosad v. Kali Krishna (1), Official Trustee of Bengal v. Kumudini Das (2). It is observed by the learned Judge that the present application comes within Cl. (d) of the explanation of "just cause" in S 263 of the Act and upon that ground he has made an order for revocation of the grant. The administrator appeals against that order and it is contended on his behalf that the present question does not come within that clause while it is contended, on the other side, that it does. Under that clause it is provided that a "just cause" shall be deemed to exist where "the grant has become useless and inoperative through circumstances." It seems to me that it would be straining the meaning of the expression "useless and inoperative" if it is said that a grant becomes useless when the administrator has nothing more to do than to distribute the legacies to the several legatees. The illustration as to how a grant becomes useless and inoperative is given in illustration (viii), S. 263. It seems to me that the clause contemplates that there is an administrator who, however, under certain circumstances, is incapable of acting so that the estate is practically without an administrator; and it does not mean that there is an administrator but he is wilfully withholding the legacies payable under the will. That would be maladministration by the administrator, but it has been held that maladministration by an administrator is not a just cause for revocation of the grant: see the case of Annoda Prosad v. Kali Krishna (1). The grant does not become useless or inoperative if an administrator is acting under the grant and is capable of doing so. Further, it would appear to be extremely inconvenient if the grant is revoked on the ground that the administrator has no further work to do and he ought to distribute the legacies at once. If that were done, difficulties and complications would arise, and notwithstanding the saving provisions of S. 297, as to what would happen when the grant of letters of administration is revoked, it would be difficult for the administrator who has acted under such revoked grant to reimburse himself in respect of any payments made by him under the grant. The remedy of a legatee to obtain the legacy from the hands of the administrator is either by a suit for obtaining the legacy or for administration of the estate: see the case of Ohoy Coomar v. Koylash Chunder (3). It seems that the order of revocation made by the learned Judge does not fall within the provisions of the law and is, therefore, wrongly made.

It may be added that the learned vakils on either side could not point out any authority with regard to the question before us. It is well known that in England the right to revoke a grant is not limited, as here, by statutory provisions. No authority has been pointed out to us that in England a grant of probate or letters of administration was ever revoked on the ground that the administrator has nothing further to do but simply to distribute the legacies and it seems to us that the power of the Courts in India should not be exercised with regard to the revocation of a grant deliberately and intentionally and not by accident or inadvertence, but so, that the mind of the person who does the act goes with it : A. I. R. 1928 P. C. 24, Foll. [P 699 C 2]

The appeal is, accordingly, decreed : the judgment and order of the Court below must be set aside and the application dismissed. Having regard to the fact that there is no reason why the administrator should not distribute the legacies and it seems to us that he is in possession of the properties without any just reason, we make no order as to costs either in this Court or in the Court below.

Bankim Chandra Mukherjee and Apurba Charan Mukherjee for Charu Chandra Ganguly—for Appellant.

Amarendra Nath Bose and Ambica Pada Chaudhury—for Respondents.

Mukherji, J. — The suit which has given rise to the appeal was for recovery of damages for non-delivery of a package of cotton piecegoods which, together with ten such packages, formed a consignment which was dispatched to the plaintiffs at Raniganj, a station on the E. I. Ry., from Aserva, a station on the G. I. P. Ry. The two railway administrations were made defendants in the suit. The Munsif decreed the suit against the E. I. Ry., only, but on appeal preferred by the said defendant the Subordinate Judge reversed that decision and dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs have preferred this second appeal.

The Subordinate Judge held that though the consignment was covered by a Risk-note in form B the railway was not absolved as the case came within the exception mentioned in the Risk-note, that the loss was due to theft by railway servants or by outsiders, and that if it was due to theft by outsiders there was wilful neglect of the Railway Administration or the railway servants. He held, however, that the notice of claim that was served under S. 77, Railways Act, was not valid and so he dismissed the suit.

The appellants' contention is that the learned Subordinate Judge has erred in law in holding against the validity of the notice, and that if this contention be accepted the appellants, on the other findings of the learned Subordinate Judge, would be entitled to a decree.

Now as regards the validity of the notice, what has been found is this : In the said notice every particular was correctly stated except the name of the station from which the consignment was dispatched, instead of Aserva which was the correct name, Ahmedabad was mentioned. The Subordinate Judge has expressed the view that S. 77 of the Act requires that the notice must be such as would enable the Administration to see at once the identity of the consignment without further enquiry at other station or stations.

The section, however, prescribes no such thing, and it is always a question of fact to be determined in view of the circumstances of each particular case whether the notice is sufficient or not. The defendants never raised this question in their pleadings and contented themselves with a denial of the service of the notice. In these circumstances it is not possible to say that the notice was not adequate and in view of the pleadings the question of its adequacy can hardly arise. The finding of the Subordinate Judge in respect of this matter must accordingly be reversed. As already stated the appellants' contention is that with the reversal of this finding he would be entitled to a decree. With this contention I do not agree, for several other questions will now arise which will have to be considered and discussed.

The respondents have argued that the case does not come within the exception mentioned in the Risk-note as there was no loss of a complete package, the gunny covering of the package not having been stolen. They rely upon several decisions most of which relate to cases of loss of ghee or oil contained in cans or tins, in which there was wholesale abstraction of the contents, but the receptacles were delivered. Of them may be mentioned the cases of Moheswar Das v. Carter (1), E. I. Ry. v. Shri Prosad Bhakat (2), E. I. Ry. Co. v. Nilkanta Roy (3), Toonya Ram v. E. I. Ry. Co. (4), Kali Das v. E. I. Ry. Co. (5), B. B. & C. I. Ry. v. Ambalal Sewaklal (6), Mulji v. S. M. Ry. Co. (7). It is not profitable to discuss these cases individually as the argument so far as this matter is concerned is based upon a misconception. What was found by the learned Subordinate Judge was that on one particular date the chaukidar who was in charge of the goods yard and who first noticed the loss saw that the contents of the package were gone and only the gunny covering was left, but there is nothing to show that even that gunny covering was delivered to the plaintiffs or tendered for delivery. There was therefore loss of one complete package so far as the plaintiffs are concerned. Perhaps, the true view to be taken of the matter is what Fletcher, J., said at the conclusion of his judgment in the case of E. I. Ry. Co. v. Nilkant Roy (3), namely that it is impossible to say that there was loss of complete packages when such material portions of the packages as the tins were delivered to the consignee.

The view that there is no loss, whatever happens to the contents, if the character of the package as such is unaffected by damage sustained by its outward envelope alone, did not find favour with the learned Judges of the Madras High Court in the case of M. & S. M. Ry. Co. v. Subba Row (8). Referring to the Bombay and Calcutta decisions on which the respondents rely Seshagiri Ayyar, J., said in that case :

The Bombay and Calcutta cases do not discuss the matter and it seems to me that they have put too narrow a construction upon the expression "loss." I am inclined to the view that the term "loss" should be construed as including cases where the article consigned is lost to the consignor as such article.

As at present advised this view is one that commends itself to me. But as already stated the question does not arise and I shall not discuss it any further, nor express any definite opinion.

Then as regards the merits the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge is worded thus :

The circumstantial evidence proves that the loss was due to theft of railway servants or in case of theft by outsiders such theft was the effect of wilful neglect of the Railway Administration or railway servants.

This finding is defective as well as bad and for the reasons to be presently mentioned. All that need be said of the facts is that the consignment came to Jhajha station on the E. I. Ry. on the morning of 18th December 1921 from which date to 2nd January 1922 there was a general strike of the menials on the railway and the bale in question was stolen by somebody during this period. For the case to fall within the exception one of two things will have to be proved; either that the loss was due to theft by servants of the Railway Administration or that the loss was due to wilful neglect on the part of the Railway Administration or its servants. The words in the risk-note are:

Except for the loss, etc. . . . due either to wilful neglect of the Railway Administration or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants etc.

In the risk-note, properly read, theft by outsiders has no place except as loss due to wilful neglect on the part of the Railway Administration or of its servants. The onus of bringing the case within the exception, and of establishing wilful neglect is on the plaintiffs [H. C. Smith v. G. W. Ry. (9), Sheohar Ram v. B. N. W. Ry. Co. (10), E. I. Ry. v. Kanak Behari (11), E. I. Ry. v. Jagpat Singh (12), E. I. Ry. v. Nathunall Behari Lal (13) E. I. Ry. Co. v. Sriram Mahadeo (14)] On the materials that are on the record the Subordinate Judge has not been able to find affirmatively that the loss was due to theft by railway servants. He has only found that the theft was either by railway servants or by outsiders. This finding will help the plaintiff in bringing the case within the exception if only he can show that the theft was due to wilful neglect on the part of the Railway Administration or of its servants. Dealing with the question of wilful neglect the Subordinate Judge has said a good deal to which it will be necessary to refer presently but there is one clear finding of fact which he has recorded in his connexion and which in my opinion is sufficient to establish neglect. That finding is to the effect that the wagon was not padlocked. Whether padlocking would have been a sufficient preventive for theft in view of the circumstances of the case is a somewhat difficult question, but that this omission facilitated the theft is scarcely to be doubted and it is therefore clear that there was neglect and the loss is, partly at any rate, due to such neglect. The question, however, is whether this neglect was "wilful." The Judicial Committee has in a very recent case explained the expression "wilful neglect" in accordance with the meaning given to it by Lord Russell, in R. v. Senior (15) as meaning that the act is done deliberately and intentionally and not by accident or inadvertence, but so that the mind of the person who does the act goes with it: Ardeshir Bhucaji v. Agent G. I. P. Ry. Co. (16).

The question then is whether this neglect or any neglect that may have been proved was "wilful" within the aforesaid meaning. The other findings of fact from which the Subordinate Judge has concluded that there was "wilful neglect" and to which reference will presently be made in another connexion do not help us in answering this question.

If on a consideration of the materials on the record and the circumstance of the case it is possible to arrive at the conclusion that there was "wilful neglect" on the part of the Railway Administration or of its servants the case will come within the exception. But a further question will then arise, namely, as regards the measure of responsibility of the Railway Company for the loss that has taken place. That measure is laid down in S. 72, Railways Act. Whether the loss was due to theft by railway servants or by outsiders, the Administration is not responsible if they have fulfilled the requirements of S. 151, Contract Act. The finding of the Subordinate Judge, however, suggests that in the case of theft by railway servants the Administration is ipso facto liable. This view is not tenable. To establish the position that the standard of care required by S. 151, Contract Act, was not adhered to reliance has been placed on certain findings of the Judge on the question of "wilful" neglect." The learned Subordinate Judge has said in his judgment:

There is no evidence to show that the strike was an unexpected one. The defence does not mention the strike in its written statement. A strike was refusal of the servants of the Railway Administration to work when they were still servants of the Administration and legally bound to be taken to task for such conduct without notice and without terminating service lawfully those menials were liable for damages. Any refusal of such menials to guard the wagon amounted to wilful neglect of the servants of the East Indian Railway Company. There is nothing to show that the strike was not the result of unfair or tactless attitude of the Railway Administration. Mostly injustice or want of tact drives poor menials to strike in India.

If this finding of "wilful neglect" is to have any bearing on the question whether the requirements of S. 151, Contract Act, have been complied with or not, it is clear to my mind that it is vitiated as it has proceeded upon a confusion of ideas which is the result of mixing up how the Administration should have behaved towards its servants with how the Administration should have dealt with the goods. As far as I can make out these findings were not meant to refer to S. 151, Contract Act, at all. A proper finding as regards that section will, therefore, have to be arrived at.

The result is that the appeal will succeed and the decree of the Subordinate Judge being set aside, the case will be sent down to his Court so that he will in the first place come to a finding on the question whether the loss was due to wilful neglect on the part of the Railway Administration or its servants.

If he answers this question in the affirmative the defendants will not be protected by the risk-note and it will be necessary for him to decide a further question that will arise and which in the words of S. 151, Contract Act, may be formulated thus :

Whether the Railway Administration took as much care of the lost package as a person of ordinary prudence would under similar circumstances take of similar goods of his own.

In determining this question he will not take it that we are in any way approving of the suggestion to be found in the judgment under appeal and which is to the effect that the strike was not an unexpected one, but should hold that the strike was an unforeseen event unless he finds evidence on the record for coming to a contrary conclusion.

Costs will abide the result.

As regards the Bombay Baroda and Central India Railway Company the appeal is dismissed ; and the said respondents will be entitled to their costs in the appeal.

Santosh Kumar Pal—for the Crown.

Cuming, J.—This is an appeal by three persons Ajgar Shaikh, Soleman Shaikh and Ekabbar Shaikh. They were tried by the learned Sessions Judge of Khulna with the aid of a jury. The jury found Ajgar and Soleman guilty under S. 326 and also under S. 447, I. P. C. The learned Judge sentenced Ajgar to one year's rigorous imprisonment under S. 326 and Soleman to six months' rigorous imprisonment under S. 326. The jury also found Ekabbar guilty under Ss 323 and 447, I. P. C. The learned Judge sentenced him to six weeks rigorous imprisonment under S. 323. The learned Judge sentenced all the three appellants to one month's rigorous imprisonment under S. 447, I. P. C. The sentences under S. 447 in the case of all the accused persons were to run concurrently with the sentence under Ss. 326 and 323, I. P. C.

The facts very briefly are these: There are three brothers Bahadur, Sadeq and Kabiladdi, who live in the same or adjacent homestead. Bahadur is the father of the three appellants now before the Court. In the yard of Kabiladdi there is a certain plum tree which is apparently the cause of the present trouble. On the day of occurrence Maminaddi, the son-in-law of Kabiladdi, cut a branch of the plum tree. Bahadur objected to the tree being cut. Maminaddi apparently then went away. When Kabiladdi returned from a market to which he had gone he was told what had happened. On this a quarrel arose between Kabiladdi on one side and Bahadur on the other. Apparently the quarrel took place from their respective houses. Then Bahadur and the three present appellants rushed up to the plum tree, Ekabbar and Bahadur carrying lathis and Soleman and Ajgar carrying axes. Apparently they had an idea of cutting down the plum tree by force. Ajgar hit the tree several times with his axe. Kabiladdi then came up to the tree when Ekabbar hit him on the head with a lathi. Kimuddi, the son of Kabiladdi, then ran to the help of his father Kabiladdi. He was also beaten on the head with a lathi by Ekabbar. Soleman hit him on the elbow with an axe and Ajgar hit him on the back and the waist with an axe. Hearing the row Sadeq came to the scene. He was also beaten on the head with a lathi by Ekabbar. Soleman then hit him on the back with an axe. Ajgar also hit him on the back with an axe. Bahadur and Ekabbar beat Sadeq with lathis. This is shortly the case for the prosecution.

The defence admits to some extent the incident of the afternoon. With regard to the fight in the evening Ajgar says he was not at home at the time, Bahadur says he was lying ill at home. Soleman admits some sort of occurrence but his version being that the plum tree belongs to Bahadur, that there was an altercation over it between their mother on one side and Kabiladdi on the other, that their mother protested when Kabiladdi proceeded to cut the tree, that Kabiladdi thereupon was about to assault their mother who fell down on the ground, that they ran to her assistance on which Maminaddi hit Ekabbar with a spear and that Soleman also received some injuries from the axe in the hand of Kabiladdi, whether intentionally inflicted or not he could not say.

The pleader who appears for them as is usual in such cases raises a question of right of private defence. I may at once point out that it was not the case of the accused that they inflicted these injuries on the other party in the exercise of the right of private defence. On the contrary their case was that they did not inflict them at all. Merely to state that the other party wounded them is not the same as to say that they struck the opposite party in the exercise of the right of private defence. In order to establish the exercise of right of private defence it is absolutely necessary to detail the exact circumstances which led them to strike the blow in question. Obviously such a defence can seldom if ever successfully be made out when the accused's case is that they did not strike the blow at all.

The first point raised by the learned vakil for the appellant is that the learned Judge has tried the accused for two distinct offences which have been included in one single charge. He contends that it is illegal to do so. He contends that under S. 233, Criminal P. C., for every distinct offence a separate charge is necessary and that the omission to draw up a separate charge for each distinct offence is an illegality which vitiates the whole trial. On this point the learned vakil has referred us to a large number of cases in which apparently different views have been taken as to whether inclusion of two distinct offences in one charge is or is not illegal. In the case of Asgar Ali Biswas v. Emperor (1) it was no doubt held that a single charge relating to several distinct offences is illegal. Since that decision, however, we have the case of Ram Suba Singh v. Emperor (2) where it has been distinctly held that joinder of two distinct offences in a single charge amounts to an irregularity only cured by S. 537.

(1) [1913] 40 Cal. 846=17 C. W. N. 827=20 I. C. 609=14 Cr. L. J. 449.

(2) [1915] 19 C. W. N. 972=30 I. C. 465=16 Cr. L. J. 641.

Criminal P. C., and not an illegality. As far as I can see this decision has never been dissented from. We are referred to the case of Radha Nath Karmakar v. Emperor (3) for an authority that joinder of several distinct offences in a single charge is an illegality and is not curable by S. 537, Criminal P. C. I have read the judgment with considerable care and I admit I cannot find this principle propounded in that case. As far as I can see the learned Judges there seem to have been of opinion that a charge which relates to more than one distinct offence is a bad charge. But the learned Chief Justice in disposing of that case went on to say:

But when he (the learned vakil) went further and argued that because that particular charge was in contravention of S. 233 the whole trial was vitiated I... am unable to agree with him.

As far as I can see the learned Judges in that case never really decided whether such a joinder of offences in one charge, was or was not an irregularity or illegality. The learned Chief Justice remarks at p. 99 that strictly speaking there should have been separate charges in respect of these distinct offences. Consequently, in my judgment, we shall be on the safe side in setting aside the convictions under S. 149 read with Ss. 325 and 328.

That will be a very long way from saying that inclusion of distinct offences in a single charge is an illegality. As far as I can see the learned Judges avoided deciding that point.

The next case to which we have been referred is the case of Alimuddin Naskar v. Emperor (4). This case, far from supporting the view which the learned vakil has asked us to take on this point is distinctly against him. Walmsley, J., in dealing with the case remarks that it is merely a technical defect that the seven inmates of Momraj's hut are all named in one charge of murder instead of a separate charge of murder being drawn up in regard to each. To that I attach no importance.

The next decision to which we have been referred is the case of Azimddy v. Emperor (5). I have read this decision also very carefully; and as far as I can see the learned Judges did not decide the particular point with which we are now concerned. In this particular decision we have been referred to that portion of the decision which appears at p. 248 of the report. A perusal of this judgment clearly shows that the learned Judges did not decide whether such joinder of offences in a single charge was or was not an illegality. They no doubt remark:

It is clear that the proper way would be to have had three separate heads of charges.

I am quite clear in my mind that joinder of two offences in a single charge is an irregularity and not an illegality and the only question is whether the appellants have been prejudiced by this. It has not been suggested to us that they have.

The next point, if I understand the learned vakil for the appellants correctly, is that the learned Judge has not put to the jury the case of the accused as to the right of private defence. The simple answer to this contention is that it was never the case of the accused that they acted in the exercise of the right of private defence. Their case was that they never struck the opposite party at all. Obviously if they do not admit striking the opposite party they can hardly be heard to urge that they struck the opposite party in the exercise of the right of private defence; for, as I have already remarked, unless you make out the exact circumstances in which you struck the blow it is not quite possible to say whether such a blow was struck in the exercise of the right of private defence. The accused possibly may plead that they were not there and at the same time plead that they acted in the right of private defence. If there is evidence either from the evidence of the prosecution witnesses or defence witnesses that they did so then of course the Judge must put the case of private defence to the jury. But I cannot discover in the present case that there is any evidence to show that they did so and therefore there is no case of the right of private defence to be put to the jury. It is not the duty of the Judge to put to the jury hypothetical cases unsupported by any evidence.

The learned vakil has next argued that the learned Judge has misdirected the jury about the boundaries. In view of the fact that the accused did not set up the right of private defence nor is there any evidence that they were acting in the exercise of the right of private defence the question of boundaries has nothing to do with the case and is entirely irrelevant.

This disposes of all the objections raised by the learned vakil for the appellants.

The appeal therefore stands dismissed. The accused if on bail must surrender to serve out their sentences.

Criminal Revn. No 1334 of 1927, Decided on 2nd March 1928.

Criminal P. C., S. 146—No evidence on record—Order attaching property under S. 146 cannot be made.

Section 146 presupposes an enquiry by the Magistrate on the evidence recorded and the object of S. 146 is to give the Magistrate jurisdiction to attach property if, upon the evidence so recorded, he is unable to come to a finding as to who was in possession on the date on which the order under S. 145 was drawn up, and where there is no evidence of any kind on record order attaching property under S. 146 is without jurisdiction. [P 703 C 1, 2]

Suresh Chandra Taluqdar—for Petitioner.

Judgment.—This rule was granted to show cause why the order of the Magistrate attaching certain property under S. 146, Criminal P. C., should not be vacated on the ground that the case was called on for hearing before 11 a. m. which was the time fixed by the Court for its sitting and, therefore, the parties were unable to attend the Court. The learned Additional District Magistrate in his explanation says :

There is nothing on the record to show that the case was called on for hearing before 11 a. m. The Court generally sits at 11 a. m. or after but not before 11 a. m. It was also not stated before me that the case was taken up by the trying Magistrate before 11 a. m.

Prima facie, therefore, this ground has little weight. But it appears to us, on a perusal of the record, that the order complained of cannot be maintained on another ground. S. 146, Criminal P. C., presupposes an enquiry by the Magistrate on the evidence recorded and the object of S. 146 is to give the Magistrate jurisdiction to attach property if, upon the evidence so recorded, he is unable to come to a finding as to who was in possession on the date on which the order under S. 145 of the Code was drawn up. In this case apparently there was no evidence of any kind. Therefore we cannot but hold that the order attaching the property under S. 146, Criminal P. C. was without jurisdiction. The order has the effect of debarring the lawful owner from enjoying the property until such time as he recovers a decree in the civil Court and of putting him in the embarrassing position of being the plaintiff in the civil Court. We think, therefore, that on this ground the rule must be made absolute and the order set aside. It is always open to the Magistrate in the case of a further apprehension of a breach of the peace arising to take such steps as he may think necessary to prevent it.

Appeal No. 2710 of 1926, Decided on 30th April 1928, from appellate decree of Second Sub-Judge, Pabna, D/- 10th July 1926.

Evidence Act, S. 13—Mortgage deed stating rent payable to superior landlord—Mortgage debt paid off—Superior interest purchased by mortgagee—Suit for recovery of rent at an enhanced rate—No proof of enhanced rent—Mortgage bond is admissible to prove the rent.

Defendant mortgaged the rent land to the plaintiff in 1899. The mortgage deed stated the rent in respect of that holding payable to the superior landlord as Rs. 18. In 1904 the mortgage debt was paid off, the plaintiff purchased the superior interest and claimed rent at the rate of Rs. 24, although there was no proof of such enhancement.

Held : that the question as to what the amount of rental was, was one of the essential terms of the mortgage bond. That the document was admissible in evidence as it was a transaction by which the right of the defendant to the land was asserted and for the definition of that right, the amount of rent had to be stated : A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 1, Dist. [P 401 C 2]

Jatish Chandra Guha—for Appellants.

Krishna Kamal Moitra—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This is plaintiffs landlords' appeal and arises out of a suit for rent. Plaintiffs claimed rent at the rate of Rs. 24-20. The defence of the defendant was that the rent was payable at the rate of Rs. 18 per annum. Plaintiffs purchased the superior interest in the year 1914. In the year 1899 the defendant mortgaged the rent-land to the plaintiff and borrowed a certain sum of money. In that mortgage-deed it was stated by the defendant that the rent in respect of this holding payable to the superior landlord was Rs. 18. In 1904 the mortgage debt was paid off and as I have already stated ten years after, in 1914, plaintiff purchased the superior interest. The Court of first instance held that the collection papers on which the plaintiffs relied were not genuine and should not be relied on, and that the plaintiffs had failed to establish that Rs. 24-20 was the rental payable in respect of the holding. The Court of first instance further relied on the mortgage bond and held that the defendant's case that the rent was Rs. 18 and odd and not Rs. 24-20 was established by the statement in the mortgage bond. An appeal was taken to the Subordinate Judge of Pabna and the learned Subordinate Judge affirmed the decision of the Munsif.

A second appeal has been taken to this Court and the main point taken here is that the Courts below should not have relied on the statement in the mortgage bond having regard to the provisions of S. 21, Evidence Act. It is said that at the time when the mortgage bond was executed plaintiffs did not acquire the superior interest in respect of holding in suit and that any statement made in the mortgage-deed was the statement of the defendant and could not be used in his favour. It is to be noticed, however, that both the mortgagor and the mortgagee are now dead. It is conceded that the mortgage bond could be admissible in evidence, if the matter fell within S. 32, Cl. 7, Evidence Act. The question, therefore, turns on this, as to whether this mortgage bond could be regarded as a transaction within the meaning of S. 13, Evidence Act. By the mortgage bond it was asserted by the defendant that he had a right in the leasehold interest which carried a rental of Rs. 18 which was payable to the superior landlord whose interest has now devolved on the present plaintiffs. There was a further assertion in that deed that that interest was being mortgaged in favour of the plaintiffs' predecessor-in-title. In these circumstances it is difficult to say that by the deed in question the right to the leasehold interest which carried a rental of Rs. 18 and odd payable to the superior landlord was not asserted. The question as to what the amount of rental was, was one of the essential terms of the mortgage bond. It was one of the essential elements which was necessary to be stated in order to determine the rights of the defendant-mortgagor in the holding which he was mortgaging in favour of the plaintiff's predecessor or ancestor. The present case is, therefore, distinguishable from the case cited at the Bar by the learned vakil for the appellant. Reference has been made to the case of Brojendra Kishore Roy v. Mohini Chandra Bhattacharya (1). It will appear, however, that the facts of the case are distinguishable and the learned Judges in that case did not express any opinion on the question now in controversy. For the reason which I have stated I think this document is admissible in evidence it is a transaction by which the right of the defendant to the land was asserted, and for the definition of that right, the amount of rent had to be stated. I think the mortgage bond was admissible in evidence. Apart from the question as to whether the mortgage bond was rightly admitted in evidence, it appears that other findings are conclusive in second appeal. The lower appellate Court states that a closer examination of the papers goes to show that these papers were rather clever fabrications. The effect of the judgment of the lower appellate Court is that it was established satisfactorily that the original rent was Rs. 18. Whether the document is admissible or not, the judgment was based on an independent conclusion with regard to the nature of the plaintiffs' papers. It is conceded that the burden was on the plaintiffs and that the papers were disbelieved by both the Courts below. In this view the Courts below were right in coming to the conclusion that the rate of rental was Rs. 18 and odd payable by the defendant and not Rs. 24-20 as claimed by the plaintiffs.

The appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs.

B. Surendra Nath Ghosal and Jyotish Chandra Sarkar—for Appellants

Urukramdas Chakravarti—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The suit which has given rise to this appeal was for partition. The Courts below have concurrently decreed the suit. Some of the defendants have then preferred this appeal. Shortly put, the plaintiffs are the descendants of one Mathura who happened to be one of the sons of Mangala Devi, daughter of one Lakhi Kanta Tapadar, the original owner. The defendants are the descendants of Ram Bishnu, another son of Mangala. The plaintiffs claimed an 8-annas share of the properties which had originally belonged to Lakhi Kanta and had descended to them through Mathura from Mangala. The Courts below held that Mathura predeceased Mangala and that therefore the plaintiffs failed to prove the title which they had set up in the plaint. The said Courts, however, proceeded on the basis of a hissanama which was a document dated 1269 B S and which purported to record the fact that the predecessors of the plaintiffs, namely the three sons of Mathura, had an 8-annas share in the property. Two arguments have been advanced before us on behalf of the appellants. It has been argued in the first place that the document was inadmissible in evidence inasmuch as it was not stamped and registered as it should have been. This argument in our opinion is not sound, because the document is neither a deed of partition nor a deed of gift, being merely a memorandum in which Ram Bishnu purported to acknowledge the fact that he was taking away an 8 annas share, of the property, the remaining share belonging to Umesh and others. It was, therefore, a document which did not require to be stamped, nor need it have been registered. It was merely a record of the family arrangement, which, as has been found by the Courts below, was also given effect to subsequently on the death of Mangala. Then it is said that the document was executed at a time when Mangala was alive; and for that reason it has been urged that Ram Bishnu could not have entered into any arrangement with regard to the property as he had merely a chance of succession at that point of time. As regards that matter it may be said that there was no difficulty on the part of Ram Bishnu in acknowledging the fact that he himself had so much share in the property. Regarded as a document reciting the facts as they stood at the time, the document is entirely unobjectionable. The findings of the Subordinate Judge are that after the death of Mangala the arrangement recorded in this hissanama was also given effect to and that since then for a period of 60 years or more the plaintiffs had been enjoying the usufruct of the land getting a share of the paddy and being in possession of the homestead.

The next contention that has been urged is that in as much as the plaintiffs had failed to prove their case because it was found that Mathura had predeceased Mangala, the Courts below were in error in giving to them a decree on the footing of a new and inconsistent case. It is true that the specific case of title as to the property having descended to them from Mangala through Mathura failed. But still what was relied upon by the Courts below was that inasmuch as the plaintiffs and their predecessors had been in possession for a very long period, at least since 1269 B. S., the hissanama having spoken of the half-share belonging to them, that possession was referable to a legal origin; and the learned Munsif distinctly held:

On the basis of the hissanama which speaks of half-share, I find that Dinesh and Kirti have 8-annas title to the disputed property.

Whatever may be the origin of the title, on the face of the hissanama that title had a legal origin, and that in our opinion was sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to an allotment in respect of an 8-annas share in the properties.

For these reasons we are opinion that the appeal should fail. We accordingly dismiss it with costs.

Appeals Nos. 1881 to 1906 of 1925 Decided on 27th April 1928, from appellate decrees of District Judge, Zillah Midnapur, D/- 30th April 1925.

Bengal Tenancy Act, Ss. 109-A, 105-A—(Per Page, J.)—Application under S. 105-A—Custom of suspension of rent held not to exist—Decision not having been appealed against by tenant operates as res judicata in subsequent rent suit between the parties (Cuming, J., contra.).

Per Page, J.—When the incidents of a tenancy to which the Bengal Tenancy Act applies had been canvassed and determined in a proceeding under Ss. 105 and 105-A, the decision of the revenue officer should be final, and should not be challenged except in an appeal as provided in the Act. Notwithstanding the dismissal of the landlord's application for enhancement of rent under S. 105-A it is open to tenants to appeal to the Special Judge under S. 109-A against the decision of the revenue officer that a custom giving them a right of suspension of rent did not exist in the locality, and if they do not elect to take that course, the issue relating to that custom becomes res judicata in a subsequent rent suit between the parties: (Cuming, J., dissenting.) 11 Cal. 301, (P. Cuming, J.—These are a number of appeals which arise out of a number of rent suits which were tried together.

The main contention of the defendants with which we are now concerned is that there is a custom of suspension of rent when the crops have been destroyed by flood or drought. The trial Court gave effect to the contention and dealt with the cases on this footing dismissing the claim for rents for the year 1329 Amli. The landlord appealed. The lower appellate Court found with regard to the holdings within the touji No. 274 that the defendants had failed to prove the existence of any such custom. This disposed of appeals Nos. 173, 174, 178, 182, 187, 188, 190, 191, 194, 195 and 197 of the lower appellate Court. With regard to the appeals with regard to tenancies within touji No. 275 he held that the question was res judicata because in certain proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, it had been held that no such custom existed. He therefore decided these appeals in favour of the zamindar.

With regard to appeal No. 186, which he dealt with separately, he found no evidence of any such custom. He was clearly influenced in coming to this finding by the fact that it had been found in the S. 105 proceedings that no such custom existed in the neighbouring estate. With regard to the appeals relating to the holdings falling within touji No. 274 the lower appellate Court has come to a finding of fact on the evidence which we cannot interfere within second appeal. With regard to the holdings falling within touji No. 274 all these holdings except appeal No. 186 (of the lower Court) formed the subject-matter of a proceedings under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act. In these proceedings the zamindar prayed for an assessment of fair and equitable rent. The tenants in those proceedings raised the same question of the existence of the custom. The Assistant Settlement Officer decided the question against the tenants. But the proceedings under S. 105 were for some reason or other dismissed.

In such circumstances can the decision of the revenue officer make the matter res judicata between these parties? No doubt the revenue officer had the power to decide the question and he decided it against the tenants. But against this decision the tenant could not appeal, for the case was decided in the tenant's favour and he could not appeal against the decision of an issue which had been decided against him when the final order on the whole proceedings was in his favour.

It is the decision of the revenue officer in the proceedings which has the effect of a civil Court decree and his decision in these proceedings was that the application be dismissed. Neither so far as the decision of the proceedings was concerned was it necessary to decide the question regarding the custom. Obviously not ; for although the decision of the issue was against the tenants the final decision was in his favour.

I do not think that S. 109-A contemplates that where the final decision is in a party's favour he may appeal against the decision of an issue which has been decided against him, which decision was not necessary for the purposes of finally determining the matter. The learned Judge was therefore wrong in holding that the question whether there existed any such custom as alleged by the tenant was res judicata between the parties. It is quite clear that he decided these appeals on this point only and did not consider any other evidence there might or might not be. The decree of the learned Judge should therefore in my opinion be set aside and the case remanded to him to rehear and determine these appeals bearing in mind the above observation.

I have lien to consider appeal No. 186. The Judge then seems to consider that the fact that no custom has been established with regard to other land of the estate is itself strong proof of the absence of the custom. This holding lies within touji No. 275 and so apparently the Judge in coming to his finding was largely influenced by the fact that such a custom had not been proved for the other holding in touji No. 275. But that finding depended on an erroneous decision on the question of res judicata. It may be found, after considering the evidence, that such a custom does exist. The right course would seem to me to be to set aside the decree in this appeal also and let the Judge deal with it after he has decided the connected appeals in touji No. 275.

My learned brother, however, is of opinion that the appeal should also be dismissed. The result is under S. 98 that the appeal also stood dismissed with costs.

Page, J.—In my opinion these appeals should be dismissed. The issue that falls to be determined is whether a custom of haja exists in the locality in which the two touzis Nos. 274 and 275 are situate. That is an issue of fact, and the onus of proving the existence of the custom lay upon the tenant-appellants.

With respect to the appeals by the tenants of lands within touzi No. 274 I agree that the tenants have failed to prove that any such custom exists, and those appeals fail.

All the lands in respect of which the remaining appeals are preferred were held by the lower appellate Court to fall within touzi No. 275.

Now, before the present suits to recover arrear of rent were brought the jamas within touzi No. 275 (except the jama in appeal 186) were the subject-matter of applications for enhancement of rent under S. 105, Ben Ten Act, by the respondent landlords against the appellant-tenants or their predecessors-in-title. In those proceedings under S. 105-A an issue was raised, contested, and decided at the instance of the tenants with respect to the existence of the alleged custom of haja in the locality. The revenue officer found that inundations were prevalent in the district, but expressly held that no custom of haja was proved. Taking that circumstance into consideration the revenue officer came to the conclusion that it would be a hardship on the tenants to allow any enhancement, and that the existing rents were fair and equitable. The applications for enhancement, therefore, were dismissed.

In my opinion the fact that in the proceedings under Ss. 105 and 105-A, the revenue officer found that the alleged custom did not exist was admissible and cogent evidence in the present suits to disprove the existence of the custom as against all the tenants of lands within touzi No. 275. The learned District Judge, however, went further, and (except in appeal 186) treated the question whether the alleged custom of haja existed in the locality as res judicata against the tenants in touzi No. 275.

In my opinion the decision of the learned District Judge was correct, and that it was not open to the tenants of lands within touzi No. 275 (except in appeal 186) to re-assert the existence of the alleged custom in the present suits. The finding that the custom of haja did not exist was the basis of the decision of the revenue officer that an enhancement of rent ought not to be allowed, and that the prevailing rate of rent was fair and equitable. To hold now that the custom existed would involve a fundamental alteration of the decision that the prevailing rent was fair and equitable. No appeal was preferred against that decision, and so long as the decision that the prevailing rent was fair and equitable remains in force and is to be treated as having the effect of a decree under S. 107, in my opinion, the finding that the custom did not exist in the locality is conclusive against the tenants who are bound by the proceedings under S. 105. Rajah Run Bahadur v. Mt. Lachoo Koer (1); Dharani Mohan Roy v. Asutosh Mookerjee (2); Sajjal Ahmad v. Trailakhya Nath (3).

The appellants, however, contended that inasmuch as the landlord's application in the proceedings under S. 105 was dismissed the tenants could not appeal and, therefore, the findings and decisions of the revenue officer in those proceedings could not be res judicata against them.

Now, the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act are beset with difficulties and pitfalls, but it appears to me that S. 105-A, which was inserted in the Act by S. 26, Act 1, 1907, was enacted to meet circumstances such as those which obtain in the present case. By S. 105-A it is provided that :

Where in any proceedings for the settlement of rents under this part any of the following issues arise . . . (f) Whether the special condition and incidents of the tenancy or any right of way or other easement attaching to the land have not, or has not, been recorded, or have, or has been wrongly recorded, the revenue officer shall try and decide such issue, and settle the rent under S. 105 accordingly. By S. 107 it is provided that the decision of the revenue officer in every proceeding under S. 105, S. 105-A and S. 106, shall have the force and effect of a decree of a civil Court in a suit between the parties and subject to the provisions of S. 108 and 109A shall be final and under S. 109 A an appeal shall lie to the Special Judge from the decisions of a revenue officer under Ss. 105 to 108A (both inclusive).

As I apprehend the matter the legislature intended and provided that when the incidents of a tenancy to which the Bengal Tenancy Act applied had been canvassed and determined in a proceeding under Ss 105 and 105-A, the decision of the revenue officer should be final, and should not be challenged except in an appeal as provided in the Act. In my opinion, notwithstanding the dismissal of the landlords' application for enhancement of rent it was open to the tenants to appeal to the Special Judge under S. 109-A against the decision of the revenue officer that the custom of haja did not exist in the locality, and, as they did not elect to take that course for this reason also the issue relating to the custom of haja is now res judicata.

There is a further ground upon which I think that the appeals should be dismissed. The decision of the Revenue Officer on the issue of custom, even assuming that it did not amount to res judicata, was cogent evidence against all the tenants of land within touzi No. 275 (including the tenant in appeal 186) that the custom did not exist :

and it certainly creates a paramount duty on the appellants to displace the finding, a duty which they have not been able to perform : per Lord Dunedin in Midnapur Zemindary Co. v. Nares Narayan Rai (4).

As I understand the judgment of the learned District Judge the issue of fact whether the alleged custom of haja existed was raised and contested, not only by the tenant in appeal 186, but by all the tenants who held lands within touzis No. 274 and 275, and although the learned District Judge decided that the issue of custom was res judicata in respect of the tenants who were bound by the proceedings under Ss. 105 and 105-A, in considering appeal 186, the learned District Judge also decided and intended to decide that no such custom was proved to exist in the locality in which all the lands within touzi No. 275 were situate. Indeed it was inevitable that he should do so, for there could be no custom confined to the tenancy in appeal 186. It is clear, I think, that the learned District Judge disposed of the appeals in this manner because in considering whether the onus of proving the custom had been discharged he refers to the evidence that had been adduced on behalf of all the tenants in support of the alleged custom. He states that "there are close on 700 tenancies within the estate," that is, touzi No. 275, and then discusses the evidence relating to the custom of haja that had been adduced to prove its existence in the locality generally. Indeed, the hisab of 1251 upon which the tenants relied did not relate in any way to the jama in appeal 186, but was tendered to prove that the custom had prevailed in the locality for many years. In these circumstances I think that there is no reasonable ground for granting a remand in this case, or for disturbing the decree of the lower appellate Court and, in my opinion, all the appeals should be dismissed with costs.

Cuming, J.—The facts of the suit out of which this appeal has arisen are these:

The plaintiff sued the defendant for what he described as dasturat. He stated that the defendant's predecessors were in possession of mouza Maisagote with Mehal Padima, by right of purchase from the plaintiff's predecessor. That he and his predecessor had been realizing amicably and by suit in an annual sum of Rs. 28-12-6 as dasturat and cesses from the predecessors of the defendants and the defendants in respect of the said mauza. The defendants had not paid the amount and hence the suit.

The defendants admitted that they were in possession by purchase and that they never agreed to pay for ever any dasturat to the plaintiff. This dasturat forming a separate amount was realized from the tenants in addition to the rent they had to pay. That amount was paid to Sashimukhi during her lifetime and her successors had no right to get the same, nothing now being realized from these tenants and that as the defendants cannot realize the amount from the tenants, the plaintiffs are not entitled to get it. The first Court decreed the plaintiffs' suit on 18th August 1921.

The defendants appealed. This appeal was heard ex parte and was decreed. There was then an application under O. 41, R. 19, for re-admission of the appeal. This was rejected. Under O 43, R 1 (t), the plaintiffs appealed to this Court and the appeal was allowed and the appeal ordered to be reheard. It was heard by the District Judge of Midnapur and decided on 2nd December 1924, when that learned Judge allowed the appeal in part and modified the decree. Against the decree the defendants have appealed. A preliminary objection has been raised that no appeal lies, an appeal being barred by the provision of S. 102, Civil P. C.

Against this the following arguments have been adduced: (1) that the plaintiffs-respondents described the suit as a suit for rent and hence they are now estopped from arguing that it is a suit for money and so no appeal lies. The simple answer to the contention is that it is quite immaterial whether the plaintiffs are or are not estopped. The Court cannot entertain an appeal which is barred by an express provision of the law. The parties cannot by their conduct give the Court a jurisdiction which it does not possess.

(2) The next contention is that the appeal against the District Judge's order was once entertained by a Bench of the Court (Greaves and Graham, JJ.) and so the question whether an appeal does or does not lie has already been determined. This contention is based on an obvious misunderstanding of the facts. The first appeal to this Court which was determined by Greaves and Graham, JJ., was not an appeal against the decree in the suit, but against the order of the District Judge refusing to re-admit the appeal under O. 41, R. 19, an order against which an appeal lies in every case under O. 43, R. 1 (t).

It has been argued that if there was no appeal against the decree there could be no appeal against an order refusing to rehear the appeal. That the appeal against the order is quite independent of whether there is or is not an appeal against the decree is clear from a comparison of O. 43, R. 1 (c), (d), (u). I now pass on to a consideration of the question whether S. 102 is a bar. The appellant contends it is a suit for rent or in all events that Art. 13, Sch. 2, is a bar.

To deal with the first contention that it is a suit for rent and hence Art 13, Sch 2, is a bar. A definition of rent will be found in S. 105, T. P. Act, and S. 3 (5), Bengal Tenancy Act. Both definitions presuppose the relationships of lessor and lessee or landlord and tenants between the parties. In the present case no doubt the plaint is headed: Plaint under S. 148, Ben. Ten. Act. But a consideration of the statement of facts both in the plaint and in the written statement makes it quite clear that the relationship of landlord and tenant does not exist between the parties. The plaintiff's own case is that the property was sold to the defendants. A sale implies a complete transfer of ownership.

Neither is there in the plaint any suggestion that the relationship of landlord and tenant exists. The amount is, therefore, not rent. It is then contended that the suit falls within Art. 13 of the Schedule. Art. 13 deals with a suit to enforce the payment of the allowance or fees respectively called malikhana or haqq or cesses or other dues when the cesses or dues are payable to a person by reason of the interest in immovable property or in a hereditary office or in a shrine or other religious endowment.

It does not seem on the facts that the dasturat and cesses are paid by reason of the plaintiff's interest in any immovable property. The plaintiff, on his own statement, has no interest in the defendant's property. The property has been sold to the defendant and by the sale all the interest that the plaintiff had in the property passed to defendant. For whatever reason the money might be due to the plaintiff, if due, it is not on account of any interest in immovable property. The suit does not fall within Art. 13. It is not contended that it falls under any other article of the schedule. It follows, therefore, that it is a suit of the nature cognizable by a Small Cause Court and being under the value of Rs 500 no second appeal lies. That being so, in my opinion, the appeal should stand dismissed with costs. The result is that the appeal stands dismissed with costs.

Mukherji, J.—I am sorry I do not agree.

The appeal arises out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiffs for recovery of dasturat, cesses and damages. The trial Court decreed the suit. The defendant appealed and the appeal was allowed ex parte the plaintiffs' suit being dismissed. The plaintiffs then applied for having the ex parte decree set aside and for the re-hearing of the appeal, but this application was rejected. They then appealed to this Court which set aside the said ex parte decree and ordered the appeal to be reheard. That was done by the lower appellate Court. That Court modified the decree of the trial Court by awarding the plaintiffs a decree for dasturat for three years only. The defendants have now preferred this second appeal.

The plaintiffs-respondents have taken a preliminary objection that the appeal is not maintainable, being barred by S. 102, Civil P. C. They have clutched at a passage in the judgment under appeal which says dasturat is not rent. This was said for restricting the decree to a period of three years from four, which was the period for which the plaintiffs laid their claim and obtained a decree from the trial Court. From this the respondents argue that the suit was suit for money—a suit of a nature cognizable by a Court of Small Causes—and that therefore, a second appeal is barred. To answer this preliminary objection the appellants have relied upon a variety of matters, to all of which I do not propose to refer. In my opinion the preliminary objection is of no substance.

What dasturat exactly means is a question on which, notwithstanding repeated enquiries, I have failed to elicit any satisfactory answer from either of the parties. As far as I can understand the word is a plural of the word "dastur" which is a Persian word meaning "dues." The plaintiffs in the plaint merely stated: That the predecessors of the defendants having obtained the mauza under purchase from the predecessor of the plaintiffs the defendants have been exercising their rights and possession therein (para. 1); that the plaintiffs' predecessor was all along getting from the defendants' predecessors and also from the defendants Rs. 28 odd as dasturat and annas 14 odd as cesses every year amicably or by suit (para. 2); that the plaintiffs have inherited the right from their predecessor (para. 3). This is all the information that the plaintiffs have chosen to give us of this dasturat in their plaint. They have headed the plaint as a "plaint in a suit under S. 148, Ben. Ten. Act." They have described their claim in this plaint as "zemindari dasturat." They laid their claim in the plaint for a period of four years. Their claim is for dasturat and for cesses. They also claimed damages at the rate of 25 per cent. If the character of the suit is to be judged from the plaint alone, as in the first instance it must be, the suit must be taken as having been commenced by the plaintiffs as a suit for rent. To these should be added a few more facts. In the written statement the defendants alleged that the tenants of the mauza used to pay in addition to the rent a cess on account of dasturat and that is what the plaintiffs' predecessor used to get from the defendants and their predecessors: but (1) that the plaintiffs as heirs of their predecessor are not entitled to get it; (2) that dasturat is an illegal cess which can no longer be realized from the tenants and so the plaintiffs cannot get it, and (3) that the plaintiffs are not entitled to get it as they have not got it recorded as a jama fit to be realized. The written statement, therefore, proceeds on the assumption that it is some sort of dues arising out of land, which if realizable at all are realizable only because of the fact that the mauza at one time belonged to the plaintiff's 'predecessor. Again, when the suit was decreed by the trial Court and the defendants preferred an appeal in one of their grounds of appeal they said:

The Court below was wrong in decreeing the suit for damages and for cesses. The plaintiffs are not entitled to get any decree for cesses or damages. The defendants are the maliks of the mauza and there is no relationship of landlord and tenant between the plaintiffs and defendants and, therefore, the plaintiffs are not entitled to a decree for dasturat rent or for any rent at all.

The Court below should have dismissed the plaintiffs' suit holding that the defendants are not liable therefor. Next we have it that the parties fought the case in all the Courts 'up till now on the footing that dasturat is some sort of rent. The Munsif has referred to the suit as "a suit for recovery of dasturat rent," and on that basis he gave the plaintiffs a decree for four years. He noted in his judgment that the amount was claimed "on account of use and occupation of land by the defendants" and that therefore it should be treated as "rent". When the matter came up before this Court the learned Judges (Greaves and Graham, JJ), were given to understand that "the suit was commenced by the plaintiffs against their tenants for the recovery of rent." All these leave not the faintest shadow of a doubt that whatever may be the exact character of the defendant's liability to pay dasturat and cesses to the plaintiff, it is founded on some sort of conception that notwithstanding the sale of the mauza by the plaintiffs' predecessors to the defendants' predecessors some sort of interest in the mauza was retained by the former which entitled them to realize the amount every year from the latter; and that the transaction created in the latter some sort of obligation to pay rent to the former; or in other words that the transfer that was made had not the effect of substituting the defendants' predecessors entirely in the place of the plaintiffs' predecessors but gave them all the rights of absolute owners of the mauza subject to the reservation of their liability to pay the said amount. To judge of the effect of this transfer by the definition of "sale" as given in the Transfer of Property Act, is in my opinion an anachronism and a fallacy; and to apply to the transaction the juridical conception of an out-and-out sale is not permissible. I am fully conscious of the principle that no amount of estoppel to which the respondent may be subject, even if any question of estoppel really arose in the case, would give this Court jurisdiction to entertain an appeal which it has not under the law; but I am not prepared to assume against the appellants that it was merely a contract wholly independent of the transfer, upon which their liability must rest, a contention that has never been urged by the plaintiffs at any stage of the proceedings. The course of the proceedings in the suit to which I have already referred unmistakably suggests that the plaintiffs were insisting on their right to realize dasturat and cesses by virtue of their superior title and the defendants were resisting the claim and repudiating the assertion that they had but a subordinate title. The suit, therefore, in my opinion, is in essence a suit for rent and so excepted from the cognizance of a Court of Small Causes by Art. 8, Sch. 2, Provincial Small Cause Courts Act.

Assuming but not conceding that the suit cannot be put so high as to bring it within Art. 8, I do not see how it can be taken out of the purview of Art. 13. That article, so much of it as is relevant, is thus worded:

A suit to enforce payment of . . . cesses or other dues when the cesses or other dues are payable to a person by reason of his interest in immovable property.

To my mind whatever may be the legal or juridical relation between the parties the dues and cesses are being claimed in the suit only by reason of the interest in immovable property which the plaintiffs, notwithstanding the sale, claim to have retained in the mauza and which in their view is still continuing in their favour. The words "by reason of his interest in immovable property" have been interpreted as contemplating payments which a person is entitled to as representing his interest in immovable property and not because he possesses some interest in such property: see Maharaja of Vizianagram v. Kota

Veeramma (1), Jairam v. Doma (2) I agree in this view and hold that Art. 13 in any event covers the suit. The preliminary objection, therefore, in my opinion should be overruled.

On the merits I do not think I am called upon to go into detail as my learned brother is of opinion that no appeal lies and the result of this difference will be to affirm the decree of the trial Court. For myself I am decidedly of opinion that nothing has been established in the case which can legally form the foundation of a decree against the defendants. The fact that between predecessors of the present plaintiffs and the present defendants decrees for dasturat rent were passed for certain years, as the Munsif has found, and the fact that the manager of the defendants' estate, when the estate was under the Court of Wards, admitted liability for the rent for a certain other year, are hardly sufficient to dispose of the grounds upon which the defendants have sought to resist the claim in the present suit. The District Judge has said that the admission shows that the rent is still payable and the mere fact of non-payment does not put an end to the defendants' liability. I fail to see how the question of the defendants' liability can be legally disposed of in this way. The appellants have conceded that so far as the amount and period in suit are concerned they do not object to the decree standing against them, but as the issue decided in the suit goes the length of determining the validity and legality of the demand for all times to come, a reservation should be made to the effect that the decision is not to be taken as binding between the parties in respect of any future claim. As there is no legal basis for this determination, left to myself I should have dismissed the appeal, but should have made the reservation prayed for in their favour, because in my opinion, there is nothing on which a decision of this general issue can possibly rest.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the defendants against a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Jessore, dated 3rd May 1927, which affirmed a decision of the Munsif of Bongaon, dated 14th September 1925. The suit in which this appeal arises was brought by the plaintiff for recovery of possession of two plots on the allegation that the plaintiff brought a suit for recovery of rent with respect to plot No 1 in the year 1921 against defendant 1 who according to the plaintiff's case was holding the disputed lands as the utbondi tenant from the time when plaintiff's vendor was in possession. Defendant 1 denied the title of the plaintiff in that rent suit with the result that that suit was dismissed on 28th March 1923.
It is said that the present suit had to be instituted due to the denial of plaintiff's title in the previous suit there has been a forfeiture and the plaintiff is entitled to get khas possession of the lands of plot 1.
With regard to plot 2 the case of the plaintiff is that these are lands which are possessed by all the three defendants 1, 2 and 3 as utbondi tenants and that there has been a denial of the title of the plaintiff by defendant 1 alone and that as defendants 2 and 3 did not admit the title of the plaintiff, plaintiff is entitled to a decree for ejectment as against all. The Munsif found that the plaintiff has a niskar title to the property in suit, i. e., both in plots 1 and 2. He further found that as defendants 1 and 2 did not claim any right in tenancy under the plaintiff, whatever title they had as tenants had been extinguished by the denial of the title of the plaintiff in the rent suit or by the execution of the deed of surrender in 1327. The Munsif further held that there was a denial of the title of the plaintiff in respect of both the plots in the rent suit and further that by the istifanama the tenancy was repudiated in respect of both the plots. The Munsif accordingly decreed the plaintiff's suit declaring his niskar title to both the plots and held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession by evicting defendants 1—3 from both the plots.

There was also a decree for mesne profits. Against this decision an appeal was taken to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Jessore with the result that the decision of the Munsif was affirmed

A second appeal has been taken to this Court and on behalf of the appellant it has been argued that the decree in so far as it grants khas possession to the plaintiff in respect of plot 2 cannot be sustained. It is to be observed that the learned vakil for the appellant does not challenge the findings of both the Courts that the plaintiff has established his niskar title to the disputed property. So far as plot 1 is concerned it appears that defendant 1 was the utbondi tenant and as he denied the title of the plaintiff in the rent suit the decree granting the relief with regard to khas possession in respect of plot 1 seems to be correct. So far as plot 2 is concerned it appears that the denial was by defendant 1 alone and in such circumstances as the denial cannot be held to bind the other two defendants 2 and 3 such denial cannot work as a forfeiture. The disclaimer by defendant 1 of the title of the plaintiff cannot operate as a forfeiture of the tenancy in so far as defendants 2 and 3 are concerned and as there cannot be a forfeiture of the tenancy in part the result is that the tenancy still subsists and the suit for ejectment, so far as plot 2 is concerned, must fail. But there must be no reason why the plaintiff should not realize rent

from all the defendants on the footing that the tenancy still continues. If any authority is needed, reference may be made to the case of Birendra Kishore Manikya v. Bhubaneswari (1). The plaintiff prayed in the alternative for rent as will appear from para. 8 of the plaint. It remains to notice the argument of the respondents that as there has been a denial in this suit of the title of the plaintiff and defendants 1—3 did not claim to be his tenants, a decree in ejectment should follow with regard to plot 2. It is to be observed with regard to this argument that in order to work as a forfeiture a denial must precede the institution of the suit. Consequently the denial in the present suit cannot entitle the plaintiff to a relief for ejectment.

The result is that the decrees of the Courts below are affirmed in so far as they award khas possession with regard to plot 1. The decrees of the Courts below are set aside in so far as they award khas possession to the plaintiff in respect of plot 2. The case will, therefore, be remitted to the Court of first instance in order that it may determine what is the fair and equitable rent payable to the plaintiff in respect of plot 2 including the arrears of rent which have not been realized. There will be no order as to costs.

Madhu Sudan Giri—Plaintiff—Respondent.

Appeal No 24 of 1926, Decided on 8th June 1928, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Zillah Midnapore, D/- 9th June 1925.

Limitation Act, Art. 143—Forfeiture by remarriage—Remarriage must be valid.

To succeed under Art. 143 on plea of forfeiture by remarriage it must be established that there was a valid remarriage, a marriage recognized by custom amongst the people of the caste to which the widow and her second husband belonged. [P 715 C 2]

Panchanon Ghose and Bhupendra Narain Bera—for Appellant.

Gopendra Nath Das—for Respondent.

Mukherji, J—The plaintiff instituted this suit to establish his title to certain properties and to recover possession of some of them and to have his possession confirmed in respect of the rest. The plaintiff's case was that he is the reversioner to one Kamal Giri, who died leaving a widow named Gayamani, and that the latter having died he has become entitled to the properties as such reversioner. His case further was that the defendant Tilottama Dasi who is really an illegitimate daughter of Gayamani had got certain erroneous entries made during the settlement operations in respect of the properties and had dispossessed him from some of the properties and was disturbing his possession in the others. The defence, on the merits, was that the defendant is the legitimate daughter of Kamal Giri and as such is entitled to and is in lawful possession of the lands in suit. As regards a part of the lands, namely a plot of two kattas of land, the plaintiff's title was admitted, it being said that the plaintiff had made a purchase of this plot from the defendant. The Munsif held that the defendant was the legitimate daughter of Kamal and so dismissed the suit, except as regards the two kattas in respect of which the plaintiff's title was admitted. The District Judge, on appeal by the plaintiff from that decision, has decreed the suit in its entirety. He has held that a document in the nature of a deed of gift which Gayamani had executed in favour of the defendant and in which there was a recital to the effect that the defendant was the daughter of Kamal and it was also recounted that Gayamani herself had contracted a Sanga marriage after she had become a widow and had thus forfeited her rights to the properties left by Kamal, was a collusive document executed for the purpose of creating a title for the defendant by means of false recitals. He was not inclined to accept the defendant's story that the plaintiff had purchased the two kattas of land from her—a fact, which if true, would indicate a recognition of the defendant's title on the part of the plaintiff. He has held that the defendant is an illegitimate daughter of Gayamani. The defendant has then preferred this appeal.

The only ground upon which the appeal is pressed is the question of limitation. It is said that as Gayamani remarried as a widow she forfeited her rights to the property left by Kamal and so plaintiff had, under Art. 143 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act, 12 years from the forfeiture. In Mr. Starling's Limitation Act there is an observation to the effect that when a Hindu widow remarries and forfeits her rights to her husband's estate under S. 2, Act 15, 1856 the reversionary heir must bring his suit for possession within the time allowed by this article; and it is on this observation that the appellant chiefly relies. The appellant has also argued on the lines of the decision in the case of Nathun v. Nai Babu (1), a case of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Nagpur that it is Art. 143 that should govern the case, but if Art. 141 applies the plaintiff is also out of time as the remarriage of Gayamoni amounted to her civil death and she being on account of the marriage dead in the eye of law, the plaintiff had 12 years from the remarriage to institute a suit.

Now, as at present advised, I should be extremely reluctant to agree in the contention either that the remarriage of a Hindu widow amounts to her civil death or that "death" in Art. 141 includes a remarriage which entails a forfeiture, or again that Art. 143 was intended to apply to a forfeiture of this kind. If the latter article applies—I am not saying that it does—a further question may arise, namely, whether the plaintiff had the option to waive such a forfeiture. I do not, however, desire to decide these questions as in my opinion they fall outside the pleadings in the present suit. If it had been necessary to decide them, it would perhaps have been necessary in the first instance to get a clear finding from the lower appellate Court as to whether a Sanga marriage had, in fact, been contracted by Gayamoni. The Munsif found that Gayamoni had contracted such a marriage, but the District Judge has not recorded any finding on the point though what he has said in his judgment strongly indicates that he was not inclined to believe that such a marriage had taken place.

The allegations in the plaint constitute a simple case coming under Art. 141. The defendant's allegations in the written statement were to the effect that she herself was in adverse possession as Gayamoni has lost her rights on remarriage. The allegations of the defendant may raise either a case under Art. 144 or under Art. 143. A case under Art. 144 would ordinarily be untenable, for adverse possession against the widow will not, in the absence of special circumstances, bar the reversioner. To succeed under Art. 143 the defendant will have to establish that there was a valid remarriage, that is to say that the Sanga marriage was a marriage recognized, by custom amongst the people of the caste to which Gayamoni and her supposed second husband belonged. The defendant has made no endeavour in that direction. Beyond a very general statement by some of the witnesses, that there was such a marriage, contracted by an equally general statement by others that there was not, there is nothing else on the record. There is no evidence to show the incidents which would establish the validity of this marriage, if in fact it had taken place. To allow the case to be reopened and permit the question of the validity or otherwise of the alleged marriage to be agitated at such a late stage and especially at the instance of defendant 1 who has been found to have no title to Kamal's properties, in my judgment, will not be right.

I would accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

(1) [1915] 11 N. L. R. 86=29 I. C. 612.

B. B. Ghose, J—This is an appeal on behalf of the judgment-debtor No 2. The matter in controversy in this appeal arises in this way : There was a decree for partition in which the plaintiff was allotted certain lands and the defendant got certain lands. When the commissioner went to the locality for delivery of possession of the allotments made defendant 2 said that there had been an adjustment of the decree between himself and the plaintiff by which the plaintiff gave up his claim to have possession of certain plots of land in lieu of other plots and as a consideration for this concession on the part of the plaintiff he had been paid defendant 2 a sum of Rs. 85. The result of this agreement, if given effect to would be that the plaintiff would get 282 acres of land instead of 4.36 acres of land to which he was entitled under the decree. The plaintiff denied this adjustment. The Munsif believed the story of defendant 2 and made an order purporting to have been made under S. 47, Civil P. C., in favour of defendant 2. The plaintiff appealed against that order. The learned Subordinate Judge, while throwing some doubt on the merits of the case, stated that he need not decide the question as regards the merits of the application as he held that the application could not be given effect to as being time barred. What he held was that this judgment alleged by the judgment-debtor No 2 falls within the provisions of O 21, R. 2, Civil P. C., and the adjustment ought to have been certified by the Court. As no application was made by the judgment-debtor No 2 within the period provided by Art. 174, Lim. Act, the judgment-debtor cannot ask the Court to take cognizance of the adjustment. The period for making the application by the judgment-debtor had expired before he presented the application and on that ground the Subordinate Judge set aside the order of the Munsif and directed that the possession delivered by the amin should be affirmed.

From that decision the judgment-debtor No. 2 appeals to this Court and the contention on his behalf is that the Subordinate Judge is wrong in holding that the application of the appellant before the Munsif fell within the provisions of Art. 174, Limitation Act, or, in other words that it was not an adjustment referred to in O. 21, R. 2, Civil P. C., and it was not necessary to have a certificate as provided in that rule in order to enable the Court to give effect to the adjustment. It is broadly contended that R. 2, O. 21, Civil P. C., applies only to decrees for money. It is next urged that even if it does not apply solely to decrees for money there must be a decree for money even if there be other reliefs allowed under the decree, and special stress is laid upon the commencing words of R. 2 (i). It is provided there :

where any money payable under a decree of any kind is paid out of Court.

and so forth, and it is urged that if there is no money payable under a decree of any kind that rule has no application. Again, it is urged that the words or the decree is otherwise adjusted in whole or in part must refer to the class of decree meant in the preceding clause, that is to say, the decree must be a decree where money is payable.

In support of this contention the case of Narayanasami Naidu v. Rangasami Naidu (1), is cited. There has been a difference of opinion between this Court and the Madras High Court as regards the interpretation of S. 258, Civil P. C. of 1882. It was held by this Court in the case of Baba Mohamed v Webb (2), that S. 258 of the Code of 1882 applied to any decree. It was said in the course of the judgment delivered by Morris, J. :

It is urged on behalf of the judgment-debtor that S. 258 has reference only to money decrees, and that this is apparent from its position in Ch. 19 of the Code in connexion with this particular section relating to money decrees alone. But a consideration of the terms of the section leads us to a different conclusion. That section corresponds in all material respects, and carries with it the same meaning as S. 206, of the former Procedure Code (Act 8 of 1859) which manifestly deals with adjustment of any decree.

That decision of 1881 stands unquestioned so far as this Court is concerned. S. 258 has been replaced by O. 21, R. 2 and the difference between the two provisions is that after the word "decree" in the first sentence of sub-R. (i), R. 2, the words "of any kind" have been added, and in my judgment this addition shows that the legislature wanted to make it clear that the rule applies not only to money decrees but also to other decrees. The learned Judges in the case of Narayanasami Naidu, above referred to, observed at p. 723 that the addition of the words "of any kind" after the word "decree" in the second line of O. 21, R. 2 were intended to set at rest the difference of view between the Madras High Court and Calcutta High Court and the conflicting views as regards the meaning of S. 253 of the Code of 1882. By the addition of the words "of any kind" it cannot be said that the legislature intended that the adjustment of any decree, whatever may be the relief claimed, should be certified to the Court.

(1) A.I.R. 1925 Mad. 749=19 Mad. 71c.

I respectfully dissent from the expression of opinion by the learned Judges. In my judgment the addition of the words "of any kind" goes to show that the legislature intended to approve of the rule adhered to by the Calcutta High Court. It has been held by the Bombay High Court in the case of Ellis Enas Pavlo Gharry v Kutter Philip Gowrya (3), that the provisions of O 21, R 2, Civil P. C., are not confined to money decrees but refer to any decree. It seems to me that it stands to reason that the provisions of that rule should apply to every kind of decree, as Macleod, C. J., has observed in the Bombay case, that the provisions of O 21, R. 2 would be entirely defeated if it was permitted that an uncertified adjustment of decree should be discussed in execution proceedings. The object of this rule is that any adjustment out of Court should be brought to the notice of the Court by the judgment-debtor and decided in the presence of the decree-holder within a short period of time. To hold that this rule has no application to decrees other than decrees for payment of money would be to leave disputes with regard to adjustment of other decrees open for discussion, say, for three years after the passing of the decree and it may be for a longer period after any application for execution is made by the decree-holder. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the rule in question is applicable to every kind of decree and the judgment-debtor cannot ask the Court executing the decrees to recognize any adjustment which has not been certified or recorded under the provisions of that rule.

This appeal must therefore stand dismissed with costs. The hearing-fee is assessed at three gold mohurs.

Biraj Mohan Majumdar—for Deputy Registrar.

Suhrawardy, J—These appeals arise out of suits for rent for the year 1326 to 1329 B. S. The defendants held a jama under the miras ijara of the plaintiffs. The Government thereafter claimed a portion of the land included in the jama as accretion and started dearah proceedings under Act 31 of 1858 in respect of it. In those proceedings the dearah officer purported to settle separate rent in respect of that portion of the land which he found to have been alluvial accretion. In 1917 the plaintiffs brought suits for rent as settled by the dearah officer. One Asmat Ali, one of the defendants in those suits and who is also a defendant in the present suits and who seems to be the most prominent figure in this fight, appeared and contested the suits on the ground that the dearah officer had no authority under the law to split the jama and assess rents thereupon. In spite of the contest the suits were decreed by the Munsif. Shortly after the decrees were passed, a petition was filed on behalf of the plaintiffs and Asmat Ali in which he admitted the jama as decreed and agreed to pay rent to the plaintiffs at the rate decreed. In 1919 the plaintiffs again brought suits for rent and Asmat Ali contested them on the grounds taken by him in the previous suits. Those suits were also decreed according to the claim of the plaintiffs. The present suits were brought in 1923 claiming rent at the rate claimed in the previous suits. The same defence was raised not on behalf of Asmat this time, but on behalf of the appellant a parda-nashin lady. The trial Court upheld the defence and decreed the suits in a modified form. The appellate Court on appeal by the plaintiffs has decreed the suits according to the rent claimed by the plaintiffs. These appeals are by one of the defendants and several points have been raised before us by the learned vakil appearing in support of them.

It is contended in the first place that the findings arrived at in the lower appellate Court with reference to the decrees of 1917 and 1919 are inconsistent and that the Court having held that the decrees in the previous suits did not operate as res judicata in the present suits he should have further held that rents assessed by the dearah officer are not recoverable in the present suits. The learned Subordinate Judge has held that the decisions in the suits of 1917 and 1919 are not res judicata because they were erroneous decisions on a question of law. He considered the attitude of the appellants in the previous suits and relying upon the petition filed by Asmat above referred to and the circumstances in the cases including the previous decisions against the defendants he decreed the plaintiff's suits in full. I must admit that the reasoning of the learned Subordinate Judge is not very consistent and clear. But the learned advocate for the respondents has attempted to defend the decree of the lower appellate Court on a ground on which the Subordinate Judge took a different view. His contention is that the decrees in the previous suits ought to operate as res judicata in the present suits. In the circumstances of the present case it seems to me that this contention is well founded. In the suits of 1917, in spite of the contest by one of the defendants who had appeared, the Court held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover rent as settled by the dearah officer. It is said that it is a wrong decision on a pure question of law and therefore cannot operate as res judicata. Now, the question whether a decision on a question of law ought to operate as res judicata or not is a question on which it is difficult to find any uniformity in the decisions in the various reports. The principle which ought to govern decisions of this question has been lucidly laid down in Aghore Nath v. Kamini Devi (1) which has been followed in a number of cases which it is not necessary to examine as they are based on the principle laid down in that case. A weighty pronouncement on this subject has been made by the Bombay High Court in the Full Bench case of Sitaram Sakharam v. Lakshaman Vishnu (2), where Shah, J., observed :

It seems to me that the plea of res judicata is not dependent upon the merits of the reasons given for a particular conclusion. The conclusion, whether right or wrong, is binding upon the party. . . . Its binding character does not depend upon the correctness of the reasons for the conclusions . . . The Sec. (11, Civil P. C.), does not make any distinction between an issue of law and other issues ; it refers generally to questions directly and substantially in issue and heard and finally decided, and I do not think that the distinction can be accepted without restricting the scope of the section in a manner not justified by the words of the section. It would involve the reading of words in the section which are not there.

The result of all the decisions upon this point is that a decision, however, erroneous it may be on a question of law, may not operate as res judicata only in cases where the causes of action are different ; but in all other cases it must operate as res judicata between the parties. The view that an erroneous decision on a question of law should not constitute res judicata is based on the consideration that otherwise an error of law would be perpetuated by Courts of justice for all time to come. But it is settled that an erroneous decision based upon a mixed question of law and fact will operate as res judicata though the decision on the question of law involved is erroneous Ramlal Malikand v. Deodhari Rai (3) and Hublal v. Gulzarilal (4). In the latter case a view has been broadly stated that an erroneous decision on the question of law will be as much res judicata between the parties as upon any other questions. This unqualified expression of opinion may not be consistent with what which has prevailed for a long time in other Courts, but it is not wholly unjustifiable. Reliance has been placed on behalf of the appellant, in support of his submission that the decision in the suits of 1917 and 1919 were erroneous in law and therefore cannot operate as res judicata in the present suits, upon the decision in Alimunnissa Chaudhurani v. Shama Charan Roy (5). In that case the previous decree was given on a certain view taken on the question of law as then understood. Subsequent to that decision the Judicial Committee laid down the law what it should be. After the decision of the Judicial Committee a subsequent suit was brought and it was contended that the decision in the previous suit was res judicata. The learned Judges held that a change in the law as affected by the decision of the Judicial Committee will have the same effect if it was effected by a statute and therefore the decision of the question of law in the previous suit was not res judicata in a subsequent suit. In the concluding portion of the judgment Maclean, C. J., remarked :

(1) [1910] 11 Q.L.J. 461=6 I.C. 554.

I do not desire to be understood as saying that a point of law can never constitute res judicata.

This decision was upheld on similar facts in Nabin Chandra v. Dudu Meah (6). These cases, therefore, do not support the contention that an erroneous decision on a question of law does not constitute res judicata between the parties to the suit.

Now, let us examine the particular facts on which the plea of res judicata is based. In the suits in 1919 the Court held that the issue involved in the suit of 1917 was not restricted to that suit but was of general application and therefore, the decision on the question of the amount of rent payable by the defendant would operate as res judicata. But it went on to observe that apart from the question of res judicata, there were other circumstances on which the defendants must be made liable to pay rent according to the plaintiffs' claim and one such circumstance referred to was the agreement entered into by the defendant Asmat in the previous suit by which he admitted the jama as claimed by the plaintiff. The learned vakil for the appellant argues that his client is not bound by the act of Asmat or by any admission made by him. The learned Subordinate Judge, in the Court below, has held upon some authorities that an admission by a defendant is receivable in evidence against other defendants. But apart from that consideration the decision of the Munsif in 1919 upon this question was at most erroneous on a question of fact and there can be no doubt that a decision on a question of fact, however erroneous it may be, constitutes res judicata between parties to the previous suits. According to the judgment of the Munsif in the suits of 1919 the defendants (meaning all the defendants to the suits) waived the ground taken by them in those suits and they could not come forward again to challenge the decision in the previous suits. Whatever may be the decision with regard to a decree in the suit in 1917 there does not seem to be any doubt that the decree in 1919 must be binding on the defendants.

There is another aspect of this question from which it may be viewed. The erroneous decision on a question of law in the suits of 1917 was upheld by the Court in the suits in 1919 by following it or treating it as res judicata. This latter decision should be conclusive between the parties; otherwise there can be no finality in any judgment unless it is right in law. In support of this view reference may be made to the decision in Mohendra Nath Biswas v. Shyam Sunnessar Khatun (7). There, in the previous suit it was wrongly held that a decision in the suit before that was not res judicata. Their Lordships held that the latter decision even if it was erroneous became conclusive between the parties and that it was not open to any one of them to plead that the former decision still operated as res judicata.

There is another consideration which has induced us to hold that the decision in the previous suit ought to operate as res judicata. In the suits of 1919 one of the issues that were placed before the Court for decision was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to claim rent for the dearah land as alleged, if so, at what rate?

This issue was not restricted to the period in suit in those cases; but was an issue directed to the general right of the plaintiff to recover rent at a certain rate in respect of that land. The appellant was the defendant in those suits and she did not choose to appear in them. The decisions in those suits are as much binding upon her as on the defendants who appeared and contested them, (Gnanada Govinda v Nalinibala Devi (8) and Sarojini Debya v. Lakhipriya Guha (9)).

Though the learned Subordinate Judge in these cases has held that the previous decision ought not to be treated as res judicata he has referred to other circumstances in support of his decision that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover rent at the rate claimed by them from the defendant. He holds that these cases were really conducted by Asmat Ali who is behind this pardanashin lady and is carrying on this litigation in her name. He also relies upon the petition filed by Asmat in 1917 as constituting an admission by the defendants represented by Asmat of the rate of rent and he also observes that under the decrees in the previous suits the decretal amounts were realized. Relying upon all these circumstances he has held that the plaintiffs are entitled to decrees against the defendants. We cannot say that this finding is based upon an erroneous view of the law.

As a result of the above considerations these appeals fail and are dismissed with costs, to the respondents represented by Mr Gunada Charan Sen and Babu Jyotish Chandra Guha.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This appeal arises from an order refusing to set aside an ex-parte decree passed in a suit on a mortgage brought on 20th December 1924. After the suit had been pending for some time, an application was made by the defendants on 4th November 1925 for further time. The application was ostensibly on the ground of illness of witnesses and so forth. That application was rejected. The plaintiff also filed an application which was also rejected. Upon that the defendants' pleader alleged that he had no further instructions and retired from the case. The plaintiff proceeded to prove his case ex-parte and obtained a decree. The present application was made on 2nd December 1925 for setting aside the ex-parte decree. The Subordinate Judge has stated his grounds for rejecting the application. From that order, the present appeal has been presented.

(8) A I R. 1926 Cal. 650.

(9) A.I.R., 1925 Cal. 427.

A preliminary objection has been taken that no appeal lies. The ground is that the application under O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C., was dismissed on 19th May 1926. The final decree in the mortgage suit was made on 23th June 1926. It is contended on the authority of the case Jogendra Narayan Das v. Satyendra Chandra Ghose (1) that the appeal is incompetent because of the passing of the final decree in the mortgage suit. With great respect I am unable to agree with the reasons of the judgment. An appeal is allowed against an order under O. 9, R. 13 Civil P. C., by O. 43. There is no provision in the Code which debars an appeal from such an order unless there is an appeal from the ex-parte decree itself, and surely there is no basis for the argument that an appeal from the order is incompetent if there is no appeal from the final decree. The reported case appears to be based on certain cases in this Court where it has been held that an appeal against the preliminary decree is not incompetent, if before the appeal is filed, the final decree in the case has been made and there is no appeal from the final decree. In my opinion, those decisions based upon the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 cannot be sustained upon proper grounds. The Code of 1882 allowed a preliminary decree to be questioned in an appeal from the final decree and the basis of the decisions under the Code of 1882 was that after the final decree is passed, the preliminary decree ceases to exist and is absorbed in the final decree. The preliminary decree having no separate existence, an appeal from such a decree was held to be infructuous when the final decree was made. Under the present Code, the two decrees are independent and separate. One cannot now question the validity of the preliminary decree by an appeal from the final decree.

Under S. 97 if a person aggrieved by a preliminary decree does not appeal from it he is precluded from disputing its correctness by his appeal from the final decree. In my opinion therefore where a preliminary decree has an independent existence and a person aggrieved by it is bound to appeal from it, that right cannot be taken away by a final decree being passed either before or after the person appeals from the preliminary decree. If a proper case had arisen before us, we would have referred this question to the Full Bench for the point being settled once for all, as we think that the view taken by the Madras and Allahabad High Courts is the correct view to take under the present Code and that the view taken in a series of cases in our Court can not be sustained upon principle. But this is not such a case in which a reference may be made.

In the present case the question is with regard to an appeal from an order refusing to set aside an ex-parte decree. In deciding this matter the question of the merits of the case does not arise for consideration; and what does it matter whether a final decree has been made in such a case or not? If the order refusing to set aside an ex-parte decree is reversed by this Court on appeal, the preliminary decree, as well as the final decree being all dependent decrees, must all fall to the ground. This principle follows from what was observed by Lord Justice Turner in the Privy Council case, Shama Purshad Roy v. Hurro Purshad (2). This would be a question of dependent decrees. We need not differ from the actual decision in the case in Jogendra Narayan Das v. Satyendra Chandra (1) because there the appeal was against an order dismissing an application for setting aside an ex-parte decree for default, and also an application for setting aside the dismissal for default was made which was again dismissed. It might very well reasonably be held in that case that the appeal from those two orders was not at all sustainable. We, therefore, think that the preliminary objection taken in this case is not sound.

But coming to the merits, however, we find that the appellants have got no case. The grounds which the appellants stated for having the ex-parte decree set aside were not believed by the Subordinate Judge, and in the petition which they presented they stated that the moharir of their pleader assured them that there would be an adjournment. No person is entitled to act upon the assurance of his pleader's moharir that a particular case should not be taken up on the date fixed. The other reason given by the appellants does not also commend itself to us.

(2) [1863-66] 10 M. I. A. 203=3 W. R. 25 (P. C.).

(1) A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 790.

They said that they called for certain records which did not arrive on the date fixed. But they did not file certified copies of the records which would have proved what they wanted to prove by the order sheet of the case, that the defendant was in hujot on a particular date. It seems to us that the defendants were only trying to delay matters and were not desirous to have the case tried. On these grounds we dismiss the appeal with costs, the hearing-fee being assessed at three gold mohurs.

Notices under S. 7 are only for the purpose of forbidding the tenants from paying their rent to the defaulting proprietor. If such notice is not served and the tenants pay the rent due to the defaulting proprietor, then it would be a question whether the auction-purchaser would again be entitled to recover that rent. It is not a question between the defaulting proprietor and the Collector as to whether notice under S. 7 was served or not. It is neither an irregularity nor an illegality which can vitiate a sale if notices under S. 7 are not served. [P 725 C 1]

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by defendant 1 against the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge, Second Court Pabna, setting aside a revenue sale. The facts are these: There was an estate touzi 10. Defendants 2 to 11 who are the respondents in this Court opened a separate account No. 10/6. They mortgaged their interest in this separate account along with some other property to the plaintiff company who are respondents along with the other defendant. It is not necessary to state in detail the provisions of the mortgage-deed. A suit was brought on the mortgage by the plaintiff company which was Suit No. 125 of 1918. They obtain a decree and a sale proclamation was issued in execution of their mortgage decree by the Subordinate Judge on 2nd October 1923. The property was sold and purchased by the plaintiff company on 19th November 1923. Eight applications were made by the several judgment-debtors for setting aside the sale. There was default in payment of the revenue of the estate in the separate account No. 10/6. The 12th January 1924 was the last date of payment and the amount due on that date was Rs. 35-2-0. On that date however the general account of estate No. 10 showed that there was an excess credited to the account of the estate to the extent of seven annas. Therefore nothing could be done as to the sale of the separate account for arrears of revenue on account of that default. The next date for payment of revenue for the subsequent quarter was 28th March 1924. On 27th March 1924, that is, on the previous date, the proprietors of the separate account No. 10/6 paid the amount due for that kist for that separate estate which was Rs. 20-13-0. On 28th March, however, there was arrear of revenue due in general account of the estate No. 10 to the extent of six annas and five pies, so there was an arrear of revenue due on account of the estate No. 10 for which the estate was liable to be sold. On 22nd May 1924 the Collector issued a notification for sale of the separate estate No. 10/6 for arrears due to the extent of Rs. 35-2 0 the amount due on it for the January kist and the separate estate was sold on 26th June 1924, and purchased by defendant 1 for Rs. 2,050. There was an application under S. 25 of the revenue sale law to the Commissioner by the plaintiff company. That was rejected. The sale was confirmed and the sale certificate was issued in favour of defendant 1 on 10th December 1924. In the meantime the applications that were made by the judgment-debtors in the mortgage suit for setting aside the sale of their properties in execution of the mortgage decree of the plaintiff was settled on compromise on 16th June 1924. It is not necessary for the present purpose to state the terms of the compromise in detail. It is sufficient to say that the sale was set aside with regard to some of the properties. It was confirmed with regard to some and certain stipulations were entered into between the parties for the debt to be considered to have been paid off in certain circumstances.

The present suit was brought on 10th July 1925. The defaulting proprietors were made defendants, but they take no interest in the litigation. The only contending parties are the plaintiff company and defendant 1. The Subordinate Judge has decreed the suit on several grounds. They are as follows:

(1) That there was no arrear due for the March kist of 1924 for this separate account No. 10/6. The sale was, however, effected for the March kist as shown by the Rubakari and the notification of the Collector. Therefore the sale was without jurisdiction;

(2) As the plaintiff had obtained a decree on their mortgage a notice was necessary under the provisions of S. 5, Act 11, 1859: see paragraph commencing as thirdly, and as no such notice was served there was a serious irregularity;

(3) Notice under S. 6 was not served before 30 days of the sale as required by S. 6, Act 11, 1859. That the name of the proprietor was wrongly given as Rai Sahib Girish Chandra Braghi, whereas it was known at the Collector's office, that he was not the proprietor. This misled the plaintiffs and, therefore, payment was not made. It was also held that service was not effected on the properties;

(4) Notices under S. 7 of the Act were not served. These irregularities caused substantial injury to the plaintiff as the property was sold at an inadequate price.

There was another prayer in the plaint that a declaration might be made if the sale is not set aside that defendant 1 has purchased the property subject to the mortgage lien of the plaintiffs. This was an alternative prayer and the Subordinate Judge held that if he had not set aside the sale he would have granted the alternative prayer in respect of the properties of which the sale has been set aside by the compromise dated 16th June 1926.

I propose to deal with the points separately. The learned advocate for the appellant has contended that the Subordinate Judge is wrong in his conclusion with regard to every one of the questions. His contention is that with regard to many of the questions under the third head decided by the Subordinate Judge the plaintiffs did not specifically raise the objections in their petition of appeal before the Commissioner; for instance they never urged as a ground before the Commissioner in their appeal that the name of the petitioner has been wrongly given; nor did they allege that notices had not been served on the various properties. What the plaintiffs said in ground No. 4 in their grounds of appeal was that the sale was held less than 30 clear days from the date of affixing the notification under Ss. 6 and 13 of the Act in the office of the Collector, but no other point was taken. There seems to be a good deal of substance in the contention. But apart from this, there is nothing to show that as a matter of fact notices were not served according to law. There is no evidence in support of the allegation of the plaintiffs. On the other hand it will appear from Ex F and Ex. R, that notices were served on 23rd May 1924. The person who served the process was called by the plaintiffs to prove service of process in the mortgage suit. But no question was put to him as to whether he had actually served the notices in question or not. It was suggested in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge that it was the duty of defendant 1 to get this fact from the peon. I do not think that the Subordinate Judge was right in so holding. When there was an affidavit of the peon of proper service of notice, the party who impugns the fact ought to have proved that there was no service. The plaintiffs fought shy of the question for the obvious reason that there was no substance in their plea. Therefore it must be taken as a fact that there was service as proved by the various returns Ex. F, Ex. R, Ex 4 (f) and Ex H, and therefore this objection on the part of the plaintiff is untenable. There is one matter in this connexion which I think I ought to state here. In Ex. 4 (e), which is a copy of the Rubakari of the Collector ordering service of notification for sale of the property in question on 26th June 1924, there are some entries at the top showing certain demands on the property for cesses and so forth. These demands were made under the Public Demands Recovery Act for which a certificate was filed on 2nd June 1924. This appears from Ex 9 (b) and Ex 11 (a).

The Subordinate Judge argues from this fact that the notification must have been issued subsequent to the 2nd June 1924 and therefore the whole story of service in May must be entirely false. It does not appear, however, from the evidence as to who made the entries on the top of the Rubakari Ex. 4 (e) and when. It cannot be conceived for a moment that these entries were made by the Collector who signed the Rubakari on 22nd May 1924, or the Deputy Collector who asked for an order for the notification on 20th May 1924. Who then made the entries and when? The Subordinate Judge assumes that these entries must have been made before the notice was made over to the peon for service. A person was called from the collectorate. No question was put to him about this. The defendant made a prayer to the Subordinate Judge to recall the witness so that questions might be put to him as regards this matter. That was refused. The entries appear in the certified copy. Whether they were made by some person after the certificate was lodged for the purpose of calculating as to how much was due from that particular estate so that the money might be realized from the surplus sale proceeds or for any other purposes, these questions are left wholly uninvestigated, and I cannot agree with the opinion of the Subordinate Judge that purely because there are these entries made on the top of the Rubakari the whole story of due service of process must be disbelieved. So much for the third point as regards service of notice under S. 6. My conclusion is that it has been satisfactorily proved that the notices were properly served and there was no contravention of the provisions of S. 6 of the Act.

The fact that the name of the proprietor of this separate estate was given as Rai Saheb Girish Chandra Bagchi appears in Ex. G, the notification for sale. The Subordinate Judge says that the people in the collectorate knew that the interest of Rai Saheb Girish Chandra Bagchi in the property ceased some time in August 1923 and therefore it was a grave irregularity on the part of the Collector to insert the name of the Rai Saheb as the proprietor of the property in the sale notification. It appears from Ex. 10 that a certificate was filed by public demands with regard to this property, and apparently the Rai Saheb was said to be the certificate debtor (which was contracted into C. D., but wrongly elaborated as Collector's Department). It appears from Order 10, dated 16th April 1924, that the certificate-debtor had transferred his interest to Joy Durga Devi on 14th August 1923. The Subordinate Judge next says that the certificate was issued on 2nd June 1924 in the name of Joy Durga Devi, that is, Ex. 9 (b), and therefore it was wrong on the part of the clerk in the Collectorate to insert the name of the Rai Saheb in the notification for sale Ex. G. But it appears that the name of Rai Saheb is registered in Register D of the Collector. This appears from the evidence of witness No. 3 for the defendant, and also in the evidence of defendant's witness No. 1 Atul Chandra Bhattacharjee, who were cross-examined on the question on behalf of the plaintiff. The Collector in giving the name of the owner of an estate which is sought to be sold was quite right in giving the name which was in the D register, and it was not an irregularity to put in his name; nor does it appear that the plaintiffs made any grievance of the fact that on that ground they were unable to pay the arrears due. Besides, it seems to me that this irregularity, if there is any, has not been shown to have caused any substantial injury to the plaintiff. This disposes of point No. 3.

With regard to the 4th point, assuming that notices under S. 7 of the Act were not served, I do not think that the sale can be vitiated on that account. Notices under S. 7 are only for the purpose of forbidding the tenants from paying their rent to the defaulting proprietor. If such notice is not served and the tenants pay the rent due to the defaulting proprietor, then it would be a question whether the auction-purchaser would again be entitled to recover that rent. It is not a question between the defaulting proprietor and the Collector as to whether notice under S. 7 was served or not. It is unnecessary to elaborate the point as in my opinion it is neither an irregularity nor an illegality which can vitiate a sale if notices under S. 7, Act 11, 1859 are not served.

The next question which I take up is question No. 2 as to service of notice under S. 5 of the Act. S. 5 of the Act requires that a notification should be made specifying the amount of the arrear or demand of certain descriptions and the latest date on which payment thereof shall be received for a period not less than 15 clear days preceding the date fixed for payment according to S. 3 of the Act, in certain places and paragraph "thirdly" specifies arrears of estates under attachment by order of any judicial authority or managed by the Collector in accordance with such order.

The learned counsel on both sides admit that there was no date fixed for payment of the arrears according to S. 3 of this Act in this case. What was admitted by both parties before us is this: that the arrears fell due and were payable on 12th January and on 28th March, and if not paid by sunset of those dates the property would be liable to be sold. If that be so I do not see how any notification can be affixed as required by the first part of S. 5 of the Act. In that view it seems to me that that section would not be applicable to the particular facts of this case; and the learned advocate for the respondent was unable to explain to us how upon his own statement that there was no date fixed for payment under S. 3 of the Act it was possible for the Collector to affix any notification as directed by S. 5 in this case. Then again as this point has been argued before us by both sides, I think I ought to record my opinion as to the proper interpretation of the paragraph beginning as "thirdly" of that section. It refers to arrears of estates under attachment by order of any judicial authority. The Subordinate Judge has referred to Note 4 under that section in the Board's Manual which runs thus:

In mortgage decrees when the decree contains a direction to sell, such decrees have the force of an attachment and hence formal attachments are unnecessary; but the revenue Courts get notice of such decrees when the sale proclamations are issued under S. 289, Civil P. C., (O. 30, R. 67 of the Code of 1908), and should then consider the estate as being under attachment by judicial authority and issue notices prescribed by this section.

The reference is Board's Miscellaneous proceedings of 11th May 1895. It is argued by the learned counsel for the appellant that the words of the Act are "under attachment by order of any judicial authority". An order for sale or sale proclamation issued under a mortgage-decree is not an order for attachment under judicial authority", and it is wrong to say that an order for sale has the effect of such attachment, and therefore this paragraph of S. 5 of the Act has no application to a sale proclamation. True, it seems to be somewhat anomalous that a mere attaching creditor would be entitled to have notice served under S. 5, but not a mortgagee who has got a contractual lien on the property. Attachment is only a judicial lien and does not confer any interest on the property; whereas a mortgage creates an interest in the property itself. As I have already said the position seems to be anomalous. But one cannot extend the meaning of the words "under attachment by order of any judicial authority" as meaning an order for sale in execution of a decree on a mortgage. It may be expedient to serve notice under S. 5 when a mortgage has been found to be a good one by judicial decision, and very rightly the Board has directed the revenue authorities to serve notices as prescribed by that section. But it cannot be said that if such notices are not issued, where there is no order of attachment by any judicial authority, the law has been contravened. On this point I am unable to agree with the decision of the Subordinate Judge.

Now there remains the first point which to me seems to be the most important of all, and to my mind it is not free from difficulty. The question must be answered with reference to S. 13 of the Revenue Sale Law. That section runs as follows:

Whenever the Collector shall have ordered a separate account or accounts to be kept for one or more shares, if the estate shall become liable to sale for arrears of revenue, the Collector or other officer as aforesaid in the first place shall put up to sale only that share or those shares of the estate from which, according to the separate accounts, an arrear of revenue may be due.

The learned Subordinate Judge has upon the facts which I have already stated found that there was no arrear due on account of the March kist for this separate account. Therefore the sale for the March kist which the Collector ordered was without jurisdiction there being no arrears left. The learned Subordinate Judge took some trouble in finding that the sale was held for arrears of March kist, and he found that the March kist having been paid by the defaulting proprietor of the separate account No. 10/6 there was no arrear due. There was some argument before us on behalf of the appellant as to whether the sale could be said to have been held on account of the March kist. Reference was made to the sale notification in which it is not stated for which kist the property was going to be sold. That notification was in accordance with the form sanctioned by the Government, and no kist for which the sale is to be held is mentioned in that form. The Subordinate Judge, however, refers to the Rubakari Ex. 4 (e) and Ex. 8. It is entered there that the sale is to be for the March kist of 1924, and that is also to be found in Ex. F which is described as hukumnama, order of the Collector on the Nazir dated 23rd May 1924. On these documents the Subordinate Judge based his conclusion that the sale was for an arrear of revenue for the March kist of 1924, and as there was no arrear of revenue for the March kist of 1924 the sale was without jurisdiction.

The question is whether under the circumstances of this case the separate account No. 10/6 could be sold for arrears of revenue which was undoubtedly unpaid on 12th January 1924 for this separate account. As I have already pointed out the property could not have been sold for the arrears in January, because the estate was not liable to be sold on that date there having been an excess payment of 7 annas on account of the estate, although this particular separate account was in default. On the expiry of 28th March 1924, the estate was liable to be sold because there was an arrear of 6 annas 5 pies for the estate. Now when the Collector found that there was an arrear due for the estate and the estate was liable to be sold, what was he next to do? He had to find, when there are separate accounts, which separate account or which number of them were in arrears. The Collector had to see the shares of the estate from which arrear of revenue was due. Now turning to his books he would find that no arrear was due for March from estate No. 10/6. The question then is: Was he entitled to go back and find that this separate account or any other separate account was in arrear on any previous date in the course of the year? The learned counsel for the appellant argues that he was so entitled, while the respondent contends that he was not. This seems to be the crucial point in the case, and it seems to me that the respondent's contention should be given effect to. Suppose there were two or more separate accounts, as in this case there are several. No. 10/6 was not in arrears in March. But suppose No. 10/1 was in arrear in March and 10/6 was in arrear in January. Which of the two properties should be sold, or should both be sold? and then, going a step further, could the Collector go beyond that date and find if in September some other separate share was in arrear? To my mind that would lead to confusion.

The simple construction, therefore, should be that when an estate is in arrear the Collector should look to his books to find which of the separate shares or which number of them was in arrear for that kist. If no separate share is in arrear for that kist the entire estate is liable to be sold, but no separate share can be sold for an arrear of a previous kist. It is further contended on behalf of the respondent that the default in payment of revenue of the share of 10/6 in January was not an arrear of revenue' because the estate was not in arrear. If the estate was not in arrear, then the separate account could not be sold on account of the default of the proprietor of the separate account 10'6 for the January kist under S. 13. This has also been explained in R 90 at p. 281 of the Manual of Revenue and the Patni Sale Laws published under the authority of the Board of Revenue in 1928. Reference has been made on behalf of the respondent to the case of Mahomed Jan v. Ganga Bishun Singh (1). That case has some bearing upon the present case, in which it was held that if no arrear was due for the kist for which an estate was sold, the sale was without jurisdiction. I am of opinion that the disputed share could not be sold for the arrear of the estate for the March kist.

Under these circumstances it must be held that on the first ground this appeal fails and should be dismissed. I should add that with reference to the alternative prayer of the plaintiffs that it is not maintainable. If the plaintiffs had any right as mortgagees they might bring a suit for enforcing their right and ask for any consequential relief in a properly framed suit. Their prayer for the declaration they have asked for cannot be maintained, and if I hold that the sale was a good one their prayer for the alternative relief would have been refused. In the result this appeal is dismissed. There will be no costs either in this Court or in the lower Court to either of the parties, as the plaintiffs had unnecessarily prolonged the hearing by raising untenable grounds on the facts.

Bisweswar Das Mondal—Plaintiff—Appellant.

Guru Charan Das—Defendant—Respondent.

Appeal No. 1598 of 1926, Decided on 27th July 1928, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Mymensingh, D/- 12th April 1926.

Contract Act, Ss. 215, 216—Agent arranging for loan for the principal—Agent lending his own money representing that the loan was from a third person—Mortgage executed on terms settled by agent—The transaction is voidable at the option of the principal.

Where an agent arranges for a loan on behalf of his principal, it is his duty to get that loan on the best terms possible. He cannot put himself in a position in which his interests conflict with his duty and, without full disclosure to his principal, he cannot validly lend his own money to his principal upon terms which he has adjusted. Such a transaction is exactly like the transaction of an agent for sale buying the property for himself or like the transaction of a stockbroker who sells his own shares instead of the shares of a third person. The effect of the breach of this fiduciary relationship which is inherent in all agencies is that the principal is entitled to regard the transaction as a voidable transaction and to have it set aside in the usual way. The consequence is not that the transaction in a case of this sort is void altogether, but it is voidable and equity will avoid it in all cases where the parties can be remitted to their former position.

An agent arranged for a loan on behalf of principal, in fact lending his own money, but representing that the loan was from one S. Mortgage was executed in favour of S. on terms adjusted by the agent, as the mortgage could not have been executed in favour of the agent without finding out how much of the money of the principal was in his hand, he having not accounted for certain sums received on his behalf. A suit was brought by S on the basis of the mortgage:

Held: that the mortgage should be set aside and that an account must be taken of the sums due from the agent to the principal on all accounts, entitling the mortgagee to a charge upon the property comprised in the mortgage at a reasonable rate of interest.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case, the plaintiff one Bisweswar brings his suit for the enforcement of a simple mortgage bond for a sum of Rs. 500 with interest. The defendant is one Guru Charan who is the nephew of one Ram Durlav, the plaintiff's father. The facts found by the learned District Judge are, in substance, these: Guru Charan bought certain land and, as regards that land, Ram Durlav was his bargadar. This land appears to have been let out to tenants and the management of the land and the receipt of the part of the produce which belonged to Guru Charan were committed to Ram Durlav who was his uncle. In these circumstances Guru Charan, at the time of the mortgage in question having got into litigation, had been in need to raise a loan and commissioned Ram Durlav to arrange a loan for him. Ram Durlav represented that he had arranged the loan from one Satish Kabiraj, but in truth and fact, the money that was being lent was being lent not by Satish Kabiraj at all but by Ram Durlav himself, the plaintiff Bisweswar being a mere benamdar for Ram Durlav and not as Guru Charan was told benamdar for Satis Kabiraj. Now, on these facts, the equitable principle is reasonably clear that, if A is B's agent for arrangement for a loan, it is his duty to get that loan on the best terms possible. He cannot put himself in a position in which his interests conflict with his duty and, without full disclosure to his principal he cannot validly lend his own money to his principal upon terms which he has adjusted. Such a transaction is exactly like the transaction of an agent for sale buying the property for himself or like the transaction of a stockbroker who sells his own shares instead of the shares of a third person. The effect of the breach of this fiduciary relationship which is inherent in all agencies is that the principal is entitled to regard the transaction as a voidable transaction and to have it set aside in the usual way. The consequence is not that the mortgage in a case of this sort is void altogether but it is voidable and equity will avoid it in all cases where the parties can be remitted to their former position.

It is quite clear, therefore, that when Guru Charan was sued upon the mortgage in question in this case he was entitled to take the equitable defence that this mortgage was voidable and to say :

So far as I am concerned here is your money back with interest at a reasonable rate and the mortgage must be set aside.

The question is whether, in these circumstances the right of Guru Charan is not something further. The learned Judge has held that Ram Durlav, acting as an agent for the management of Guru Charan's land, had received the produce and dealt with it and had not accounted to Guru Charan at the time of the mortgage. He has further found that the reason why the name of Satish Kabiraj was put forward was that it was impossible to suppose that at that time Guru Charan would execute a mortgage in favour of Ram Durlav without finding out how much of his own money Ram Durlav had in his hand. In these circumstances, it seems to me that it is only right that the amount advanced upon this mortgage with interest should not be ordered to be brought into Court by Guru Charan and handed over to Ram Durlav without Ram Durlav first accounting for the various sums of money that he had received on behalf of Guru Charan. In my judgment the equity in this case is that the mortgage is liable to be set aside and that the mortgagee can only be given a charge upon the mortgaged subject for the net balance that is now due to him from Guru Charan account being taken of all moneys of Guru Charan in Ram Durlav's hand.

In my opinion, the learned Judge was wrong in dismissing the suit. It will be necessary to allow this appeal and to make an order declaring that, in the opinion of this Court, the mortgage sued upon should be set aside and that an account must be taken of the sums due from Ram Durlav to Guru Charan on all accounts and also that that account must include on the other side the sum of Rs. 500 which was lent and a proper rate of interest thereon not necessarily the contractual rate and that Ram Durlav is entitled to a charge upon the land comprised in the mortgage for the ultimate balance due to him if that sum be less than Rs. 500 plus interest. The suit will be remitted to the trial Court for taking the account and making the proper decree.

I think, however, on consideration, on the question of costs that, as the whole matter has been, on these findings, brought about by the conduct of Ram Durlav, it would be only right that Guru Charan should have his costs in the trial Court, before the District Judge and in this Court. Ram Durlav cannot in any event have a charge for more than Rs. 500 plus reasonable interest.

Vernon Milward Bason—In the matter of.

Decided on 22nd December 1927.

 Income-tax Act (1922), S. 16—Assessee a share holder in a company—Company keeping aside for some years a certain sum to be distributed as bonus to the directors — Assessee objecting to such payment — Matters compromised after some years and the assessee paid a lump sum as his share in the amount reserved—The amount is part of his income in the year of receipt and does not represent assessee's profits for the previous years.*

The assessee was a shareholder in three private companies limited by shares who pooled their profits. On 6th November 1917 a resolution was passed by the directors of one of the companies that after a certain dividend had been paid out of the net pooled profits a particular fraction of the balance remaining of the net pooled profits should be applied to the distribution of a bonus between the working directors. In the company's books entries were made on the basis of the resolution but the assessee having brought a suit the special bonus proposed was not in fact handed over to the directors. The matter was ultimately compromised and the assessee was given one lakh of rupees as his share of the bonus claimed by him to 31st December 1923. This sum of one lakh was included in computing his total income under S. 16 and the assessee was assessed to super-tax in respect of this total income.

Held: that no part of this sum was due or payable to the assessee until the company declared it as dividend or otherwise and dealt with it by making a payment thereof to the assessee, and the amount was part of his income in the year of receipt. It cannot be regarded as representing the assessee's profits for the previous years. [P 730 C 1]

H. D. Bose—for Assessee.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the assessee, Mr. V. M. Bason, is a shareholder in three private companies limited by shares. In 1917 and after, it would appear that these companies had some arrangement for pooling their profits. The three companies were Samuel Fitze & Co., Ltd., Murray & Co., Ltd., and Devereux & Co., Ltd.

On 6th November 1917 a resolution was passed by the directors of Samuel Fitze & Co. Ltd. to the effect that after a dividend of not less than 10 per cent. had been paid out of the net pooled profits of the three companies on any year's working, a sum equal to one-third of the balance remaining of the said net pooled profits should be applied to the distribution of a bonus between the working directors, in India. The assessee, as a substantial shareholder in each of these three companies, objected to this proposal and claimed that the resolution was ultra vires and illegal. It would appear that in the companies' books entries were made on the basis of the resolution, but the assessee having brought a suit and obtained an injunction, the special bonus proposed to be given to the working directors out of the companies' profits was not in fact handed over to the directors. The sums in dispute appear to have been held in suspense by the companies concerned pending a decision as to the validity of the resolution. In the end the matter was compromised as appears from a resolution passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of Samuel Fitze & Co., Ltd., held on the 16th December 1924 which shows that the bonus scheme was ultimately confirmed upon certain terms as regards the assessee of which the following is the chief :

The company with the consent of the directors will pay Mr. Bason one lakh of rupees which shall be accepted by him upon the basis that it represents the share of the bonus claimed by him to 31st December 1923, which has been set aside for the directors in terms of the resolution of 6th November 1917 which Mr. Bason has objected to and in respect of which these suits have been filed.

The present question has reference to this payment of one lakh of rupees. As the companies have in each year paid income-tax, together with the companies' super-tax upon their profits, the assessee has not been required by the assessment now in dispute to pay income-tax upon this figure. But this figure has been included in computing his total income under S. 16, Income-tax Act of 1922 and he has been assessed to super-tax in respect of this total income.

The assessee's real grievance is that if the resolution of 6th November 1917, which he regards as illegal, had not been passed and acted upon, he would in each of the years between 1917 and 1923, have received a larger dividend upon his share, a dividend upon which income-tax would not have been payable by him and which would not have been in amount sufficient in any year to expose him to super-tax.

The Commissioner of Income-tax has stated for the opinion of the Court two questions, namely :

(1) Whether under the circumstances of the present case the lakh of rupees could be said to be the income of the petitioner for 1924-25 as dividends or otherwise, and whether the whole or any portion of it is assessable under the Income-tax Act.

(2) Whether their liability to assessment attached to each of the directors, as he received each year for several years his share of the bonus either by actual withdrawal or by credit to his private account with the companies, and whether this liability was in any way modified or in any way transferred to the petitioner by the subsequent payment to him of a lump sum on 26th July 1924, as recorded in the terms of settlement in the High Court suit of 1920.

The only question which really requires to be answered is the first. The Commissioner of Income-tax has in my opinion correctly held that the sum in question was income assessable in 1925-26. No part of this sum was due or payable to the assessee until the companies declared it as dividend or otherwise dealt with it by making a payment thereof to Mr. Bason and the amount was part of his income in the year of receipt. It cannot be regarded, as the assessee has claimed, as representing the assessee's profits, for previous years.

The second question stated to us, as framed by the assessee, appears to be altogether misconceived. The directors in fact did not receive the money and it never was taxed or taxable in their hands. The claim to assess the assessee upon this sum does not in any way rest upon any theory that the directors' liability to income-tax has been transferred to the assessee. The Commissioner of Income-tax has rightly held that the correct answer to this question is that it does not arise.

In my opinion the assessment is in order; the questions referred to us should be answered in the sense which I have indicated and the assessee should pay the cost of this reference.

Gopendra Nath Das—for Appellants.

Miss Cornelia Sorabji and Ramani Mohan Banerji—for Respondents.

Mukherji, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit instituted by the plaintiffs for recovery of khas possession of certain lands from the defendants on the allegation that the tenant thereof had abandoned the tenancy and made a transfer of the same in favour of the defendants. It was alleged that the tenancy in suit was a non-transferable occupancy holding. The suit was resisted on the ground that the tenancy in question was a mokurari one and further that, when in execution of a decree for rent which had previously been obtained by the plaintiffs as against the then tenant the holding was put up to sale, the defendants made a deposit under the provisions of S 170, Cl. (3), Ben. Ten. Act and the landlords, that is to say, the plaintiffs, withdrew the same. The suit was decreed by the trial Court but, on an appeal being preferred by the defendants, the learned District Judge has dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs have thereupon preferred this second appeal.

Now, the facts upon which the learned District Judge has held that the plaintiffs are estopped from questioning the validity of the transfer that was made by the previous tenant in favour of the defendants are these: The decree that had been previously obtained by the plaintiffs as against the previous tenant was put into execution and, after the attachment and the sale proclamation were issued, the defendants applied for permission to deposit the decretal amount under S 170, Ben. Ten Act, alleging that they had purchased the holding, and, in support of the application that they made on that occasion, they filed an affidavit and the kobala under which they alleged they had made the purchase. The Munsif, in whose Court the execution case was pending, permitted the defendants to make the deposit, but did not issue any notice on the plaintiffs and eventually passed the following order:

Challan received. Money deposited. Decree-holders are directed to withdraw the money. Case disposed of on full satisfaction.

This order was passed on 20th December 1917 and thereafter, on 17th January 1918, an application being made on behalf of the plaintiffs, a payment order was made in their favour and the amount deposited as aforesaid was withdrawn by the plaintiffs. What is contended before us on behalf of the plaintiffs-appellants is that, inasmuch as the order allowing the deposit to be made was passed without notice to the plaintiffs and the money was withdrawn by the plaintiffs' pleader under circumstances which would not definitely show that, in point of fact, the plaintiffs had knowledge of the fact that the money had been deposited by a person who had claimed to have a right in the holding, the plaintiffs are not estopped from questioning the validity of the purchase. The learned vakil for the appellants has sought to distinguish some of the decisions upon which the judgment of the learned District Judge on this point is based. It is true that the facts of some of the cases on which the learned District Judge has relied are distinguishable from those of the present case but, after all, it seems to be perfectly clear that when the plaintiffs withdrew the money that had been deposited, they were bound to make enquiries as to the circumstances under which it came to be deposited in Court and, inasmuch as they did, in point of fact, withdraw the money, it is to be presumed that they did so with knowledge of those circumstances. It does not very much matter that no notice was given to the plaintiffs before any order was passed allowing the deposit to be made. As has been pointed out by this Court in the case of Gadadhar v. Midnapur Zemindary Co. Ltd. (1), in which case also it was not clear upon the materials on the record whether any notice was given to the decree-holder of the fact that an application had been made for permission to make the deposit when the decree-holders found that the money had been deposited by one who asserted a title by purchase, they should have made enquiries and, if they had done so, they would have discovered everything. In that case, the decree-holders without adopting that course withdrew the amount and, upon that it was held by this Court that, in those circumstances, they could not be permitted to urge that the transfer was inoperative. The circumstances of that case are very similar to those of the case before us and I am of opinion that, in view of those circumstances, it must be held in the present case that the plaintiffs are no longer competent to question the validity of the transfer. There is one case of this Court to which, our attention has been specially drawn namely, the case of Suck Chand Das v. Girdhari Das (2). In the judgment of Suhrawardy, J., in that case, there are certain observations, which apparently support some of the contentions that have been urged on behalf of the appellants in this appeal. But when the facts of that case are examined closely it would appear that the money that was withdrawn by the landlord was deposited by certain persons who were found to have acquired no interest in the tenancy at all and were strangers to the holding. The observations, therefore, that are to be found in that case must be taken to be limited to the particular circumstances of that case.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the view taken by the learned District Judge is correct and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

* (a) Criminal P.C., S. 307, Cl. (3)—Between the opinions of Judge and jury weight should be given to the Judge.

The Code does not put the opinion of the jury on any higher plane than the opinion of the Judge; both should be given due weight. There is no suggestion that more weight should be given to the opinion of the jury than to that of the Judge. As a general rule, more weight should be given to the opinion of the Sessions Judge. He equally with the jury hears the witnesses and is able to observe their demeanour. He is trained to weigh and appreciate evidence and further he must give reasons for his opinion. The jury are a body of laymen unaccustomed to weigh or appreciate evidence, who give no reasons for their opinion. An opinion supported by reasons carries more weight than an opinion entirely unsupported by reasons.

Tarakeswar Pal Chaudhury—for the Crown

N. K. Bose and Pashupati Ghose—for Accused.

Cuming, J.—This is the case of three persons, Ram Chandra Roy, Kala Chand Roy and Maniruddin Mondal, which has been referred to us under S. 307 by the learned Sessions Judge of Murshidabad. These three persons were tried on three charges: one under S. 395, I. P. C., one under S. 147, I. P. C., and one under S. 342, I. P. C. The jury unanimously found them not guilty under all the three sections. The learned Sessions Judge accepted the verdict of the jury so far as S. 395, I. P. C., was concerned. He, however, disagreed with the jury so far as their verdict under Ss. 147 and 342, I. P. C., was concerned. He was of opinion that all the three accused persons were guilty under S. 147, I. P. C., of rioting and that one of them, Ram Chandra Roy, was guilty under S. 342, I. P. C., of unlawful confinement. The facts of the case are briefly these: One Shashi Bhusan Chowdhury who was the proprietor of the Nadha estate died some time in 1918 leaving as his heirs two minor sons, Ahi Bhusan and Bibhuti Bhusan, under the guardianship of their mother Shailabala Chowdhurani and a grandson Phani Bhusan, the son of a predeceased son of his. This boy who was also a minor was under the guardianship of his mother Harimati Chowdhurani. The usual disputes appear to have arisen between these two ladies or more correctly between persons looking after their interests and on 28th April 1925 Sreemati Harimati Chowdhurani, the mother of Phani Bhusan, applied to the District Judge on behalf of her minor son for the appointment of a common manager under S. 93, Ben. Ten. Act.

At the time of making this application she asked that an ad interim receiver might be appointed for certain reasons which are not necessary to state here. This prayer for the appointment of an ad interim receiver was granted ex parte on the day that the application was filed and one Babu Juanendra Chandra Chowdhury, a pleader of the District Judge's Court, was duly appointed as the ad interim receiver. This gentleman furnished the necessary security and received his letter of appointment on 9th May 1925 and on the following day left Rajshahi and reached Nadhai on 11th May 1925. He then proceeded to take over charge of the estate. On 15th May 1925, at about midnight when the receiver was sleeping in the toshakhana room which he apparently used as his bed-room, a number of persons, some seven or eight in number including the three accused persons, came to the house and called upon the zemindari officials to turn the receiver out. The receiver informed them that he was there under the orders of the District Judge. This only apparently served to further exasperate the accused persons. They came into the house, entered the receiver's room and pulled him out and took him to the Dewankhana where they surrounded him. He was there made to produce the keys which he had received from one of the zemindari officials and also any papers what he might have with him. He was then taken by these persons back to the toshakhana and the door of the room was bolted from outside so that he was unable to leave the room. The next morning he was escorted to the railway station by the accused persons and a number of others. He came back to Rajshahi and reported the matter to the District Judge. Under the learned Judge's order he went to Nawabganj and there laid a formal complaint before the police. An enquiry was instituted. After considerable delay, due to the fact that this Court was moved and the case was transferred to the Court of the Sessions Judge of Murshidabad, the case was heard with the result that I have already noted.

The plea of the accused persons was a simple plea of not guilty. They neither denied nor did they admit their presence at the time of the occurrence; neither, as far as I can see, do they admit or deny that any occurrence took place. Ram Chandra filed a written statement in the Magistrate's Court in which he seemed to have alleged that the receiver had no right or authority to go and take possession and suggested that the receiver's father owed the estate some money. What was really urged on behalf of the defence or what exactly was their case in the Sessions Judge's Court or what was the case made for them in the Sessions Court, it is somewhat difficult to say, though it might appear from the cross-examination of the prosecution witnesses that Ram Chandra and Kala Chand would admit their presence at Nadhai at the time when the receiver was there. It was suggested to the prosecution witnesses that they were actually taking tea with the receiver. In this Court, as far as I can understand, the case would seem to be that the story of the receiver is false and that in any way the facts alleged, even if found to be correct, are not sufficient to support a case of rioting or unlawful confinement so far as the present three accused persons are concerned.

Mr. Bose, who has appeared for the three accused persons, has first argued that before we can interfere with the jury's verdict, we must be convinced that this verdict is perverse or patently wrong and that we should not interfere with the jury's verdict unless it is manifestly or patently wrong. The point of view from which reference under S 307 should be considered by the High Court has been the subject of numerous judicial decisions. They seemed to vary from the extreme view that the High Court should be very reluctant to interfere with a verdict of a jury to the view that the High Court in dealing with these references is to be guided by the plain words of the Code. Speaking for myself, I have always thought that I am upon far firmer ground if I adhere to the strict words of the Code and do not attempt to interpret the Code in the light of the practice in other countries where law and conditions are different. Here the Code is clearly explicit. The High Court shall, after considering the entire evidence and after giving due weight to the opinions of the Sessions Judge and of the jury, acquit or convict the accused. The Code would not seem to put the opinion of the jury on any higher plane than the opinion of the Judge; both should be given due weight. There is no suggestion that more weight should be given to the opinion of the jury than to that of the Judge. Speaking for myself, I should, as a general rule, be inclined to attach more weight to the opinion of the learned Sessions Judge. He equally with the jury has heard the witnesses and has been able to observe their demeanour. He has been trained to weigh and appreciate evidence and further he must give reasons for his opinion. The jury are a body of laymen unaccustomed to weigh or appreciate evidence who give no reasons for their opinion. Obviously, an opinion supported by reasons is likely to carry more weight than an opinion entirely unsupported by reasons.

The next point Mr. Bose has argued is that the charge does not set out that there were five or more persons engaged in the riot and hence there can be no case of rioting. It was not necessary in a charge of rioting to 'set out the allegation that there were five or more persons actuated by a common object. Rioting is an offence with a specific name and it is sufficient to describe the offence by that name and that name only. S. 221, Cl. (2), Criminal P. C., clearly contemplates a case of this description and was enacted to meet a case of this kind. Where a person is charged with rioting it means that prosecution alleges that all the necessary ingredients constituting the offence of rioting are present. It is not necessary for the prosecution to set out what these ingredients are.

Mr. Bose has next asked us to hold that the prosecution should have proved the report made by the receiver to the District Judge which admittedly he made on his return to Rajshahi and as they did not do so we should presume that this report would not, if put in evidence, support the prosecution story. Now the answer to this contention is that this report could have only been used by the prosecution to corroborate the witnesses, if it came within the provision of S. 157, Evidence Act. The report, however, was not made at or about the time of the occurrence but some 24 hours after. Neither does it come under the second part of the section for it was not made to a person who can legally investigate the fact. It was made to the District Judge who had no power to investigate the matter. Probably if any attempt had been made by the prosecution to use it, strong objection would have been taken to it. Obviously, it is open to the defence to have used it under S. 155, Evidence Act to impeach the credit of the receiver. No attempt was, however, made by the defence to do so.

I will now deal very shortly with the evidence in the case. The most important witness is the receiver, Babu Jnanendra Chandra Chowdhury. This witness is a member of the Rajshahi Bar of some 5 or 6 years' standing. He gives at great length and in great details an account of the occurrence of 19th May. As far as I can see no serious attempt was made in the cross-examination to challenge the correctness of these details. There is a suggestion in the cross-examination that this gentleman had tea with two of the accused persons. He himself denies this and the accused persons did not themselves suggest that they did so. But the suggestion would, I think, seem to show that the accused were admitting their presence at the time of the occurrence. This witness is a respectable gentleman, a pleader, as I have already stated, of 5 years' standing of Rajshahi Bar. No good reason whatever has been given why this gentleman should invent the story. Admittedly he was appointed a receiver of the estate by the District Judge and went to the place on 11th May under the orders of the District Judge; admittedly also he came back to Rajshahi on 16th May having been forced to leave Nadhai. His story explains why he was obliged to leave Nadhai and no attempt is made to put forward any other explanation as to why the receiver appointed by the District Judge was obliged to leave his charge. It has not been shown to our satisfaction that this gentleman had any reason whatever for inventing the story. It has not been suggested by the accused themselves that he had any enmity with any of them. A somewhat vague suggestion is put forward as is frequently done that the case has been engineered by one Lalit Mohan Chatterjee. No attempt, however, has been made to explain why the receiver should lend himself to support a false case for the benefit of Lalit Mohan, whoever this gentleman may be. The way in which the story was told and its details leave no doubt in my mind that it is a true story and represents faithfully the events of the night in question. The witness is corroborated by a number of other witnesses. I need not deal, in view of the opinion I have already expressed, in detail with the evidence of the witnesses who corroborate him; they are some 11 in number. No serious discrepancies have, as a matter of fact, been pointed out between their evidence.

Mr. Bose has then argued that even accepting the story as told by the receiver as true, it does not establish the charges against these three accused persons. He contends that it would not show that the three accused persons were actuated by any common object or that there were the necessary five persons to constitute an unlawful assembly actuated by the common object. So far as the charge under S. 147, I. P. C., is concerned it runs as follows:

That you, on or about 15th day of May 1925 at Nadhai, police-station Nawabganj, committed riot, the common object of your unlawful assembly being to forcibly dispossess the complainant receiver Jnanendra Chandra Chowdhury from the Nadhai estate or by criminal force or show of criminal force to compel the said receiver to discontinue his work as such.

What are the facts proved? The receiver was duly in charge of the estate. At about midnight the three accused persons with some others, in all about 8 or 9, came armed with guns, spears and swords. Ram Chandra, one of the accused, called upon the estate officials to turn the receiver out of the house. Ram Chandra was informed by the receiver that he was there under orders of the District Judge. On this Ram Chandra merely continued to abuse the receiver and also apparently the District Judge. The party then entered the house. The receiver was pulled out of the room and was taken to the Dewankhana surrounded by the three accused persons and a number of other persons. The door was locked up under Ram Chandra's orders. Maniruddin, one of the accused now before us, is described as being one of those who surrounded the receiver, with a lathi in his hand. Ram Chandra and Kala Chand then forced the receiver to give up the keys and papers and then Khokna and other persons took the receiver to the Toshakhana and locked him up during the night. Next day he was sent forth to the Dewankhana by Ram Chandra and Kala Chand and was finally escorted to the railway station by Ram Chandra, Kala Chand and Maniruddin together with a large number of other persons. What other inference is possible but that all these persons certainly more than 5 in number, were acting with the common object, namely, to force the receiver to give up possession of the estate and to discontinue his work as receiver. There were at least five persons so engaged, Dhiren, Khokna, Ram Chandra, Kala Chand and Maniruddin, and there were others each committing a different act or in some case the same act in furtherance of the common object. Certainly force was used, the receiver was pulled out of the room and he was afterwards locked up for the night; thus certainly criminal force was used and there was also a show of criminal force, for these men were armed with swords, guns and spears. The evidence, I think, shows beyond any doubt that these three accused persons Ram Chandra, Kala

Ram Chandra and Kala Chand certainly took the leading part while Maniruddin who is obviously merely a servant a somewhat more minor part. I find that Ram Chandra, Kala Chand and Maniruddin are all guilty under S. 147, I. P. C. As to the charge of dacoity, it has not been pressed, and the three accused persons stand acquitted of the charge of dacoity. As to the charge of unlawful confinement, it has been, I think, clearly brought home to one of the accused persons, Ram Chandra. It was under his orders that the receiver was shut up in the Toshakhana. I am satisfied from the evidence that the receiver was so confined and that he was unable to leave the room. Ram Chandra is, therefore, guilty also under S. 342, I. P. C. With regard to the two others Kala Chand and Maniruddin, I am not convinced that there is evidence necessary to implicate them in the charge under S. 342, I. P. C., of unlawful confinement. They are, therefore, acquitted of the charge under S. 342, I. P. C.

It is now necessary to deal with the question of sentence. The charges against the accused persons and the facts which have been proved disclose a very serious offence. Jnanendra Chandra Chowdhury was an officer appointed by the Court. Ram Chandra and Kala Chand knew that he had been so appointed; they did not suggest for one moment that they did not. The receiver tells us that he himself informed Ram Chandra of his appointment before he left for Nadhai. Whether the appointment of the receiver was subsequently set aside by the High Court and another person was appointed a receiver or not is absolutely immaterial. At the time when the occurrence took place, he was a person duly appointed by the District Judge to take charge of the estate. So far as Ram Chandra and Kala Chand are concerned they are educated persons. Ram Chandra has been managing the zemindari for some time—they must have been well aware that they could have their remedy in the Court itself or by way of appeal if they thought that they were aggrieved by the order. The riot on the night of 15th May was obviously not the work of a moment. They had known for some days that the receiver had been appointed by the Judge and had gone to take charge. Obviously, therefore, this attack upon the receiver was thought out and planned after due consideration. None of them were inexperienced persons—Ram Chandra is aged 44 years and Kala Chand is a man of 33 years. In view of the serious nature of the offence, we sentence them to undergo each one year's rigorous imprisonment under S. 147, I. P. C. No separate sentence is passed on Ram Chandra under S. 342, I. P. C. With regard to Manirundin, he is apparently a servant acting under the influence of the other two. In his case, we inflict a sentence of six months' rigorous imprisonment under S. 147, I. P. C. The accused must surrender to their bail to serve out the sentences.

Assam Bengal Ry. Co. Ltd.—Plaintiff—Respondent.

Appeal No. 101 of 1926, Decided on 10th July 1928, from decree of Dist. Judge, Chittagong, D/- 12th August 1925.

Specific Relief Act, S. 42—Declaration for the status as a voter in order to insert his name in the register of voters—Conditions not fulfilled entitling him to have his name inserted—Declaration cannot be claimed.

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was qualified to have his name inserted as a voter in the register, but he only sought that declaration for the purpose of obtaining an order upon the Chairman of the Municipality to insert his name in the register of voters. He did not comply with the conditions which were required to be fulfilled in order that he should be entitled, if otherwise qualified, to have his name inserted: Held, he is not entitled to a declaration that he has the status of a voter, which is merely ancillary to the main relief which he seeks, namely, that his name should be in the register. Judgment.—This suit was brought in order to enforce the plaintiff's right to be on the register of voters for the election of Commissioners of Chittagong to be held in March 1925. All these proceedings have become merely academic in the events that have happened, because there was a fresh election for the Commissioners of Chittagong in 1928, and for the purposes of and prior to that election the plaintiff's name was inserted in the register of voters. The learned Additional District Judge, from whose decree the present appeal is brought, found as a fact that the plaintiff-respondent had not complied with the rules which would entitle his name, if otherwise qualified, to be inserted in the register of voters. It is conceded by the respondent that that is a finding of fact which, in second appeal, we are not at liberty to reconsider. The learned Additional District Judge, having arrived at the finding of fact that the plaintiff had failed to fulfil the conditions precedent to having his name registered ought to have dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was qualified to have his name inserted as a voter in the register; but he only sought that declaration for the purpose of obtaining an order upon the Chairman of the Municipality to insert his name in the register of voters; as he had not complied with the conditions which must needs be fulfilled in order that he should be entitled, if otherwise qualified, to have his name inserted, he would be not entitled to a declaration that he had the status of a voter, which was merely ancillary to the main relief which he sought, namely, that his name should be in the register.

In these circumstances we are not disposed to consider the question as to whether the plaintiff was qualified to be a voter at the election of the Commissioners of Chittagong; and we express no opinion upon the question one way or the other. That is a matter which may arise for consideration if and when his qualification is challenged hereafter. It is sufficient for the disposal of this suit to hold that whether he was qualified to be a voter or not, he was not entitled in the events that happened to have his name inserted in the register of voters for the election of 1925.

The result is that the appeal is allowed and the plaintiff's suit dismissed. There will be no order as to costs.

March 1925.* (a) Lease—Construction — Rent agreed to be paid in paddy—Price of paddy mentioned—Tenant failing to deliver the paddy — He is

The material passages in the kabuliyat were as follows: "After settling a quantity of 1 bishi 5 aris of paddy, the price of which is Rs. 50 as annual gula rent (paddy rent), and Rs. 25 as selami, I execute this mourashi mokarrari kabuliyat to the following effect: I shall pay the rent, that is deliver the gula paddy according to the kists noted below, year after year, x x x. There shall not be any variation as regards the jama and area settled at any time. If I fail to deliver the gula paddy according to the kists, I shall be dealt with according to law x x x. I shall deliver the said paddy measuring it out with a five seer dou after drying and winnowing it and making it fit for being stored in a gola." Suhrawardy, J.—I agree with my learned brother in the construction he has put upon the contract in this case. I only wish to refer to certain vernacular expressions on which the parties have attempted to put different constructions.

The kabuliyat in suit is a mourashi mokararri kabuliyat. After describing the land leased under it, it recites: ukto jomir barshik gula ekbisa panch adi dhan jahar mulya panchas taka hoytechhe abdharitye. Translated literally the clause will stand thus: Of the aforesaid land the annual paddy rent, 1 bishi and 5 aris of paddy, the price of which is Rs. 50, having been fixed or settled. The word abdharitye according to the context refers to gula or paddy rent which was settled at 1 bishi and 5 aris. The learned vakil for the respondent has laid great stress upon the word abdharitye and suggests that it should go, not with the paddy rent, but with Rs. 50, the price of the paddy rent. He bases his argument on certain observations made by Banerjee, J., in the case of Dwarika Nath v. Dwijendra Nath (1). In that case there was cash rent and a portion of the rent was to be paid in kind, the value of the paddy in money was stated and the total amount of rent including the cash rent and the price of the paddy rent was also stated. Then followed the words ekune 89-10 jama abdharitye.

The learned Judge there interpreted the words jama abadharite as meaning the fixed jama which according to the context was Rs. 89-10-0. The words therefore were taken to mean the total amount of rent fixed. The word abadharitey has been used in this kabuliyat in quite a different context and has been placed in a different position. The jama has been fixed as paddy rent of 1 bishi 5 aris and the words jahar mulya 50 taka hoitechhey are parenthetical mentioning the price of the paddy rent fixed as the rent for the tenure. As my learned brother has observed, the word (hoitechhey) in the sentence jahar mulya 50 taka hoitechhey is significant. It makes the sentence mean "the price of which is Rs. 50" or "the price of which is at present Rs. 50." In my judgment there can be no doubt that the word abadharitey refers only to the gula rent fixed and not to the price of the paddy. This sentence is followed by another which is san san khajnar taka nimner kishti mato adai purbak orthat gular dhanya nimner kishti mato adai purbak jamir semana chau hadda bajay rukhiya, etc. Rendered in literal English it means: "Having paid every year the rent money according to the kist mentioned below, i e., the gula paddy according to the kist, and keeping the boundaries of the land intact, etc. The learned vakil for the respondent has laid stress on the words taka khajnar taka. The sentence clearly shows that the words khajnar taka are used in place of rent or rental without reference to the kind of rent to be paid inasmuch as the words khajnar taka have been explained as meaning the gula or paddy rent. Thereafter, as my learned brother has observed, come expressions about the payment of the paddy rent only and there is nowhere stipulated any mode of payment of the equivalent money rent. In the sentence that I have quoted above it is stated the khajnar taka will be paid according to the kist at foot. The schedule which we find in the document states that 1 bishi 5 aris of paddy must be paid in the month of Magh every year.

(1) [1897] 47 Cal. 139n=53 I. C. 103=30

There have been numerous cases dealing with contracts of this kind; but there can be no question that every case must depend upon its own particular facts and the particular terms of the contract which the Courts are called upon to interpret in that case. But it may be useful to refer to some of the cases to show how the contracts have been interpreted though differently worded. The cases may be divided into two groups: one in which it was held that though the contract spoke of paddy rent and in lieu thereof a money rent, the intention of the parties was that in the event of failure of payment of paddy rent the landlord would be entitled only to recover the money rent. Under this head may be mentioned the cases of Bipro Charan v. Suchand Roy (2), Afar Morole v. Surja Kumar Ghose (3), Nil Madhab v. Keshab Lal (4), Dwarika Nath v. Dwijendra Nath (1) and Asutosh Mukhopadhyaya v. Haran Chandra Mukherji (5).

It will be observed that in most of these cases there was a cash rent and also paddy rent. The equivalent of the paddy rent was mentioned in money and it was stated that the total amount of rent (the cash and the equivalent money rent together) was the rent of the tenure and was the amount recoverable on the failure of the tenant to pay the paddy rent. I have been relieved of the necessity of discussing every case in detail as almost all the cases on the point have been admirably analyzed and examined in the case of Gurudas Sen v. Gobinda Chandra Sinha (6). In that case too, on the particular wording of the kabuliyat, the learned Judges held that the landlord could only recover the equivalent money rent mentioned in the document. There is one point in that case which may be profitably referred to in construing the present contract. In that case there was an express contract that if the tenant did not deliver the paddy, the landlord would be entitled to realize by suit the equivalent amount mentioned therein as the price of the paddy. In the present case the kabuliyat says that if the tenant fails to deliver gula paddy according to the kist, he shall be dealt with according to law which I take to mean that the landlord will have the right to proceed in a Court of law and then claim damages for non-delivery of the stipulated quantity of paddy. If the intention of the parties was that on failure to deliver the paddy the landlord would be entitled only to recover Rs. 50 as the price thereof, nothing would have been easier than to mention the terms in plain language as it was mentioned in Gurudas's case.

The cases that have taken a different view and have interpreted the kabuliyats under consideration in those cases as meaning that the contract was for payment of paddy rent and not the equivalent hereof in money are the cases of Sohor Ali v. Abdool Ali (7), Akbar Ali v. Durga Kripa Sen (8), Isaf v. Gopal Chandar (9), Sarat Chandra v. Abbas Ali (10) and Hem Chandra Jelja v. Satya Kinkar Sen (11). A similar view was taken in Baneswar Mukherji v. Umesh Chandra (12). I mention this case last as it is an extreme case in support of the view that when paddy rent is mentioned the parties must be taken to mean that that rent should be paid in kind though the price of it in money is also given. The contract there was that the tenant should pay the annual rent of Rs. 12-14 0 in cash and 40 maunds of paddy of which the value was mentioned as Rs. 37, the total rent, Rs. 49-14-0 being settled in perpetuity. Jenkins, C. J., held, on the construction of the kabuliyat, that the landlord was entitled to recover 40 maunds of paddy and should not be compelled to recover annually on failure of payment of rent in kind the price mentioned in the kabuliyat. The view taken by the learned Chief Justice in that case is in conflict with that taken in the cases which I have mentioned above. But as the case before us does not go so far as the case of Baneswar Mukherji (12), it is not necessary for us to consider the matter further. The nearest case to the case before us is the case of Hem Chandra Jelia v. Satya Kinkar Sen (11). There the contract was almost in similar terms. It ran thus:

A jama of ten maps of sanja paddy measured . . . (the price whereof is Rs. 50) and ten pons of straw (the price whereof is Rs. 2) at a jama of the said sanja paddy . . . the total price being Rs. 52 per annum.

Then follow some other terms with respect to the delivery of paddy and straw and it is stated that in default of delivery of the paddy and straw the landlord will be entitled to claim bari or additional quantity of paddy.

It is not permissible to interpret one contract with the help of the wording of a different contract between different parties. I have no desire to quarrel with the decisions in the cases which have held that the landlord is entitled to recover only the money equivalent of the paddy rent fixed because on the contracts in those cases the decisions were probably justified.

I should like to say a word with reference to a remark made in the case of Afar Morole v. Prosonno Kumar Ghose (3). There an attempt was made to prove by evidence that the price of the paddy given in the kabuliyat therein was mentioned for the purpose of fixing the proper stamp or for registration of the document. Mookerjee, J., very rightly held that such evidence is inadmissible under S. 92, Evidence Act, as the learned Judge observed:

We feel no doubt whatever that the case before us indicates an attempt on the part of the plaintiff to supersede the clear unambiguous provisions of the lease No question of interpretation of the language of the document arises here.

So far I agree with the learned Judge, but he goes on to observe that in the case of Sohobut Ali v. Abdool Ali (7), Akbar Ali v. Durga Kripa Sen (8), and Shaikh Isaf v. Gopal Chunder Dey (9), S. 92, Evidence Act was not brought to the notice of the learned Judges and the suggestion therein made is that if the Court was invited to consider the effect of S. 92, Evidence Act, the result of those decisions might have been different. I cannot persuade myself that S. 92, Evidence Act, has any reference to the interpretation of the terms of a contract. Where, as Mookerji, J., has observed, the terms are unambiguous and clear, there can be no question that the evidence to prove that the terms of the contract were used in a different sense must be excluded under S. 92, Evidence Act; nor is the Court in such a case entitled to speculate as to the meaning of words in the contract. But where the wording of the contract is capable of different interpretations the Court is justified, and in my judgment it is its duty, to put a proper construction upon the terms of the contract and is justified in finding with what intention a particular expression was used as a matter of pure construction. Now in the present case the words "the price whereof is Rs. 50" were to my mind used for the purpose of stamp duty to be put upon the kabuliyat and might also be for the purpose of registration. In a kabuliyat, which even in the plainest language expresses that the rent is to be paid in paddy, it is necessary in order to complete the document to put a money value for the purpose of stamp, just as in the case of a simple gift where the value of the property given away is immaterial, it is necessary to mention some value, however fanciful, of the property dealt with under the document for the purposes of stamp and registration. Against putting such a construction upon the wording of a lease I do not think that S. 92, Evidence Act, presents a bar. After giving my careful consideration to the terms of the contract in the present case I agree with my learned brother that the intention of the parties was that rent should be paid in paddy. The penalty clause I understand to mean that on failure of the tenant to pay the stipulated quantity of paddy in a particular year the landlord is entitled to damages. It is not necessary for me to say that damages must be the market price of the paddy at the time when the contract is sought to be enforced, for there may be other considerations which are likely to influence the Court in assessing damages though ordinarily the market price is the measure of damages. I accordingly agree in allowing the appeal and making the order which my learned brother has made.

Graham, J. — This appeal by the plaintiff arises out of a suit to recover the price of paddy for the years 1326 to 1328 B. S. The father of the defendants had executed a kabuliyat in favour of the plaintiff's vendor, and the defendants contended that according to the terms thereof they were liable to pay Rs. 50 only per year, the price mentioned in the kabuliyat, and not the market value of the paddy prevailing during the years in question. The decision of the case turns upon the construction of the kabuliyat (Ex. 2) which was admitted by both parties. Suits of this nature have formed the subject-matter of numerous reported decisions and those decisions have been far from uniform. This much, however, emerges from a consideration of these cases that nothing in the nature of a general rule can be laid down for their determination, and that the decision in each instance must depend upon the particular facts proved, and in the main upon the terms of the particular kabuliyat under consideration. The material passages in the kabuliyat, which we are now called upon to construe, are to the following effect :

After settling a quantity of 1 bishi 5 aris of paddy, the price of which is Rs. 50, as annual gula rent (paddy rent), and Rs. 25 as selami. I execute this mourashi mokarrari kabuliyat to the following effect. "I shall pay the rent, that is, deliver the gula paddy according to the kists noted below, year after year, There shall not be any variation as regards the jama and area settled at any time. If I fail to deliver the gula paddy according to the kists, I shall be dealt with according to law I shall deliver the said paddy measuring it out with a five seer dou after drying and winnowing it and making it fit for being stored in a gola."

The schedule which is appended to the kabuliyat contains the following :

Instalment of rent—one bishi, five aris : of paddy in the month of Magh.

There can be no possible doubt, reading this document as a whole, that the primary intention of the parties was that the rent should be paid in kind. That much seems to be clear not only from the manner in which the promise to pay gula paddy is thrice reiterated, but also from the terms of the schedule.

The question then arises as to what is to happen in the event of the lessee failing for some reason whether from inability or otherwise, to deliver the paddy. In that eventuality is the plaintiff to be held to be entitled to recover the price of the paddy at the market rate, or is he only entitled to recover the sum of Rs. 50 as price thereof as contended by the defendants ?

The Courts below have taken the view that the intention of the parties was to fix Rs. 50 per annum as the money equivalent of the bhag paddy for all time, and that their object in so doing was to avoid future disputes. The lease being a mokarrari lease there is something to be said for this interpretation, and in somewhat similar reported cases this view has found favour. Speaking for myself I must admit that I was at first very much impressed with it, and I should certainly hesitate ordinarily to differ in opinion upon the construction of a vernacular document from two Indian Judges both of whom are well versed in their own language and therefore eminently competent to come to a right conclusion.

Upon careful consideration, however, I cannot persuade myself that that conclusion is correct. The point that first occurs to me is that nowhere in this document is any intention revealed, much less expressly stated, that the method of paying the rent should be an alternative at the option of the lessee ; in other words, that it was left open to him to pay either in kind, or in cash, as he pleased. On the contrary it is reiterated several times, as already mentioned above, that the rent is to be paid in paddy, and in order that there may be no possible doubt upon the point it is stated in the schedule that the paddy is to be delivered in one instalment annually in the month of Magh. Such contracts for the payment of bhag rent are very common, and the object in view, there can be little doubt, is to make sure of obtaining a certain quantity of paddy for the consumption of the family independent of, and unaffected by, fluctuations in the price. If the kabuliyat is construed as giving an option to pay in cash or in kind, and as fixing the price at Rs. 50 in perpetuity this object will be defeated since a rise in the price of paddy would result in less paddy being obtained for the family consumption. For the defendants great stress was laid on the words "the price (or value) of which is Rs. 50." It is to be observed, however, that the verb is used in the present tense which would seem merely to mean that the price or value at that time was Rs. 50. If the intention had been that the price should be Rs. 50 for all time that intention could easily have been expressed. But, as I have already said, there is nothing in this particular kabuliyat to suggest that it was ever contemplated that the payment should be other than in kind.

The position then is this : The parties mutually agree for payment in kind. The lessee, through inability or from wilful default, fails to deliver the paddy. The plaintiff then naturally asks to be put in the same position as he would have been if the default had not occurred ; in other words, that he should get such a price as will enable him to purchase the paddy in the market. To this the defendants reply that the plaintiff can in no circumstances recover more than the sum of Rs. 50 mentioned in the kabuliyat. It seems to me that it was never intended that this was to be regarded as the fixed price of the paddy. It is perhaps not permissible to speculate whether this figure was so inserted for the purpose of ascertaining the registration fee or fixing the stamp duty payable. This much, however, can be said that it does not in plain terms fix Rs. 50 as the price for all future time of the paddy. On the contrary the word "haitechhe" seems to preclude such a construction.

If we place upon the kabuliyat the construction which the defendant-respondents seek to put upon it, then it is obvious that in the easiest way possible the lessee can always defeat the original intention of the parties by the simple device of withholding delivery of the paddy and insisting on payment of the money equivalent of Rs. 50. But that was certainly never intended in this case as is clear inter alia from the emphasis laid in the document on the delivery of the paddy and the clause which says that in the event of failure to deliver the gula paddy the defendants would be dealt with according to law. The meaning of this clause, and of the document taken as a whole is, I think, this: that the rent was to be paid in paddy and not in cash, and, that, in the event of failure to deliver it, the plaintiff would be entitled to damages by recourse to the Court.

For these reasons I would allow the appeal, set aside the decrees of the Courts below, and send the case back to the trial Court for a determination of the amount due to the plaintiff as damages and for making a decree in accordance therewith. The appellant is entitled to his costs in all the Courts. The costs of the further hearing in the Court of first instance will be at the discretion of that Court.

Under O. 1, R. 8, the necessary conditions are that there should be numerous persons having the same interest in one suit and some of them should have obtained the permission of the Court to sue on their behalf. If some persons out of the numerous persons whose interest is common in the suit, subsequently side with the defendant the representative character of the plaintiff is not lost. [P 742 C 2]

Plaintiff was chosen by the members of a community to recover rent on their behalf in respect of their village deity. Plaintiff filed a suit under O. 1, R. 8 for recovery of rent against defendant who disputed the rate of rent. Some other members of the community were added as plaintiffs. No amendment was made in the plaint. Some of the added plaintiffs sided with the defendant on the point of rate of rent and also gave evidence in favour of defendant. The trial Court believed the plaintiff and decreed the suit. In appeal by the defendant some of the added plaintiffs filed a petition admitting defendant's case.

Judgment.—The two persons who are now the respondents before us brought a suit for recovery of rent from the defendants in respect of some lands which they hold and which belong to a village deity called Shib Thakur. The two original plaintiffs claimed to be collecting shebais of the Thakur and said that they were chosen as the persons who were entitled in the name of the village community to realize the rent payable to the Thakurs. The entire village community was the shebait of the Thakur and they had appointed these two plaintiffs for collecting rent due to the Thakur. The community included the present defendants also. The rent was claimed from the defendants at Rs. 25-8-0 a year. The defendants admitted it to be Rs. 14-4-0 a year. Both the Courts below have believed the plaintiffs' evidence and given a decree against the defendants. Some time after the institution of the suit 18 villagers applied to be added as plaintiffs, and they were so added. These added plaintiffs did not take any exception to any statement of the plaintiffs in the trial Court; but some of them gave evidence in support of the defendants. In the appellate Court they filed a petition admitting the defendants' case and the rate of rent mentioned by them.

It is argued in this appeal on behalf of the defendants that some of the plaintiffs having supported the defendants' case, the original plaintiffs have lost their representative character and are unable to maintain the suit under O 1, R. 8, Civil P. C.; and in support of this reliance has been placed on Harkisan Das v. Chhaganlal Narsi (1). In that case some persons of the case of Banias brought a suit against the defendants for accounts and for recovering from them the amount as might be found due. It was found that the meeting at which the plaintiffs said that they were authorized to institute the suit was irregularly convened. The plaintiffs attempted to prove subsequent acquiescence of the caste members of their proceeding with the suit. This evidence was regarded by the Court as valueless. On these facts the learned Judges held that the plaintiffs could not represent nor sue on behalf of those numerous members of the community on whose behalf they purported to have brought the suit as they were in diametrical opposition to them in the controversy. The facts of that case are not similar to those of the present one. There is no denial in this case that the plaintiffs were appointed collecting shebais by the village community. Their right to proceed with the suit was not as a matter of fact seriously challenged. After the suit was brought it was easy enough for any defendant to get some member of a large community whom the plaintiffs represent to side with him. But that does not take away the representative character of the plaintiffs at the institution of the suit. It is not necessary to consider the ratio of the Bombay case; but on a plain reading of R. 8, O. 1, it will appear that the necessary conditions are that there should be numerous persons having the same interest in one suit and some of them has obtained the permission of the Court to sue on their behalf. If the contention of the appellant be accepted, namely that when some persons out of the numerous persons whose interest is common in the suit subsequently side with the defendants (and it should be noticed that the defendants are also some members of the community) it will be almost impossible to continue any representative suit for it is never difficult for a party to win over on his side some of the members of the class on whose behalf the suit is brought. This objection is therefore overruled.

Then it is argued that as some of the plaintiffs have accepted the defendants' case no decree should have been passed in the suit. But the 18 added plaintiffs were added five months before the hearing of the suit; there was no amendment of the plaint and they did not take any action in the matter. Two of them only gave their evidence in the trial Court in favour of the defendants. But in the appellate Court they filed a petition supporting the defendants. We do not think that there was any change in the constitution of the suit.

The last point taken is with reference to a certain document which was executed by one of the defendants cosharers stating the rent as Rs. 14-4-0. One of the plaintiff's witnesses was a witness to that document. There is no question of law connected with this point as the Court of appeal below has refused to give much importance to this document.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 99 of 1927, Decided on 1st February 1928, from original decree in Civil Suit No. 134 of 1927, D/- 27th July 1927, reported in A. I. R. 1928 Cal. 542.

(a) Calcutta Municipal Act (1923), S. 538—Provisions are not applicable to a suit for payment of money of the Provident Fund—Provident Funds Act (9 of 1897), S. 5.

A suit against the Calcutta Corporation for payment of money in the account of the Provident Fund of the deceased by his legal representative is not one in respect of any act purporting to be done by the Corporation under the Calcutta Municipal Act, and so the provisions of S. 538 as to limitation do not apply to such a suit. *A. (c) Provident Funds Act (9 of 1897), S. 3, Cl. (b)—Cl. (b) takes effect in absence of any special rule of a particular Fund—Special rule providing payment to the legal representative—Payment to uncle as de facto guardian was held not to be valid discharge—Calcutta Corporation Provident Funds Rules, R. 19.

The provision in Cl. (b) that the manager may pay the money to any person entitled to receive it, is a provision intended not to defeat the rules of any Fund ; but to take effect only in those cases where the rules of a particular Fund do not tell the manager what person is the proper person to be paid. The intention of the Act was that particular funds might make simple and clear rules which they could easily administer and if the rules did not apply to any particular case, the officer or the manager should not necessarily at his peril find out the proper legal representative. But the intention of the Act has been defeated by the character of R. 19, itself which assumes the duty of finding out the proper legal representative. [P 745 C 1]

*Benode Mitter and N. C. Chatterji—*for Appellant.

*N. Sarkar and A. K. Roy—*for Respondent.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the plaintiff Asoke Kumar De sues the Corporation of Calcutta to recover a sum of money which is under Rs. 1,000. His case is that his father Brojo Lal De was an employee of the defendant Corporation, that he was a contributor to the Provident Fund managed by that Corporation and that he died on 27th November 1920, leaving the plaintiff his only son and heir. It appears that besides the plaintiff there were three unmarried daughters and the plaintiff's mother predeceased his father. At the time of the father's death his brother Kunja Lal De, was, according to the defendants, a person, in whose care the plaintiff and the unmarried sisters were living. In that state of things what happened was this : the plaintiff's uncle Kunja Lal De applied to the Corporation for payment of the sum of money standing in the plaintiff's father's credit in the account of the Provident Fund of the Corporation and they acting under R. 19 of their rules paid that sum of money to Kunja Lal De upon taking an Indemnity Bond from him with security. The plaintiff brings his suit in 1926 having attained majority and he requires the Corporation to pay to him over again the sum of money which was standing to the credit of his father's account. He says that by the payment made to Kunja Lal De, the Corporation has got no discharge against him. The defendants by their written statement set up the fact that at the time they paid to Kunja Lal De he produced a certificate from an Honorary Magistrate saying that Kunja Lal was the plaintiff's guardian. They say that on the strength of this certificate and on the fact that the mother was dead, they in good faith paid the money to Kunja Lal and they are protected by the provisions of the Provident Funds Act and the Corporation's Provident Fund Rules.

There is no dispute about the amount of the money. As there was a small amount of wages due to the plaintiff's father and a small amount contributed by him for the purchase of war bonds on the one hand, and as on the other it appears that the plaintiff's father had taken an advance from the Provident Fund, these matters had to be adjusted. But there is no dispute as to the amount that was due to the proper representative of the plaintiff's father or that it may be regarded as a case of compulsory deposit within the meaning of the Provident Insurance Societies Act, 1912 and the argument advanced before us on behalf of the Corporation proceeds on that assumption. At the hearing of the suit Mr. S. N. Banerjee for the Corporation raised two issues. The first is whether the suit was barred by limitation. That appears to have reference to the special provisions of S. 538, Calcutta Municipal Act. It says certain suits should be commenced within four months after the accrual of the cause of action. The learned Judge has rightly refused to entertain that argument because that section applies to suits against the Corporation in respect of an act purporting to be done under the Calcutta Municipal Act or under any rule or bye-law made thereunder. This is not a suit against the Corporation for any act which they justify or can justify under the powers conferred by the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1923.

This is not a suit for damages for having paid money to Kunja Lal. It is a suit against the Corporation asking them to pay a sum of money which the plaintiff says they owe to him. Issue 2 refers to S. 3, Provident Funds Act (9 of 1897), and that is the matter which has been chiefly in debate before us. If one looks at the provision made by S. 3 of that Act with regard to small sums of money, meaning thereby sums which do not exceed Rs. 2,000 standing to the credit of a depositor at the time of his death, one finds that it says that the officer or person whose duty it is to make payment of such sum may pay it to any person entitled to receive it according to the rules of the Fund. There is a little complication introduced in order to provide that unless the rules of the Fund prescribe to the contrary they shall be deemed to include a power to the depositor to nominate in writing somebody to receive the money. But if one puts aside that complication the first provision is that the officer may pay the money to any person entitled to receive it according to the rules of the Fund.

The next thing is this :

In any case not hereinbefore provided for, he may pay it to any person appearing to him to be entitled to receive it.

Now, in the present case the argument has reference to R. 19 of this fund which is in the following terms :

On the death of any subscriber the manager shall pay to his representatives, executors or administrators the amount standing to his credit in the account prepared in accordance with the provisions of R. 14.

As regards the meaning of the word "representative" some light is perhaps thrown by the fact that in another rule reference is made to heirs, representatives and also to the next of kin. But the meaning of that rule is not, I think, in doubt. The law in this country is well known to be that it is not necessary in all cases to take out probate or letters of administration in order to confer a title upon the persons who are generally called in this country by the word "heirs." In the case of Hindus even where the Probate and Administration Act is applicable it is not always true to say that an heir must take his title through a probate or through letters of administration. The meaning of this rule appears to me to be that the manager is to pay the money to the person entitled to receive it as a matter of testate or intestate succession. It is said that in the present case as there was no executor or administrator and as the heir was a minor son, the present case is not provided for by R. 19 and accordingly it is contended that Cl. (b) to S. 3, Provident Funds Act, can be resorted to, because as the minor was not entitled to receive it in the literal sense the case was one not provided for by Cl. (a) and that accordingly in this case the manager might pay the money to any person appearing to him to be entitled to receive it. In my judgment that argument cannot be accepted. The provision that in any case not provided for by Cl. (a) the manager may pay the money to any person entitled to receive it, is a provision intended not to defeat the rules of the Fund; but to take effect only in those cases, where the rules of the Fund do not tell the manager what person is the proper person to be paid. In my judgment the corporation, while they would be quite entitled by their rules to make a simple provision to the effect that on the death of a depositor the money should be paid to his eldest son or to his youngest son or to make any other provision they liked, have chosen to make a provision that it is to be paid to the man's representatives, executors or administrators and they have, therefore, taken upon themselves the duty of ascertaining who it is that complies with that description; and it does not seem to me that it is open to them under such a rule, merely because the representative happens to be a minor, to claim that they may pay the sum to anybody whom they think to be the proper person to receive the money on behalf of the minor. The intention of the Act was that these funds might make clear and simple rules which they could easily administer and that if these rules did not apply to any particular case, the officer or manager should not necessarily at his peril find out the proper legal representative. But that intention of the Act has been defeated by the character of the rule itself which assumes the duty of finding out the proper legal representatives and dealing with them in the ordinary way. It seems to me, therefore, that neither of these defences set up by the Corporation is a valid defence.

It is somewhat curious that at the end of the arguments in this case a defence much more simple and direct than any of these others was indicated, which seems a very satisfactory defence to the plaintiff's claim, namely, that the Corporation have already paid him: that is to say that in paying Kunja Lal De they paid it in such a way that the payment is a good discharge against the plaintiff on the ground that Kunja Lal De was a de facto guardian with power to give a discharge. I cannot help observing that that should have been the first defence. If a man is sued for money the first thing he would take for his defence is that he has already paid it. That was not suggested, so far as I can see, before the learned Judge and Sir Benode Mitter has to concede that it is not open to him to proceed upon any doctrine of natural guardianship. The defence he indicates in this direction is that the uncle may have been the de facto guardian. But it appears as he frankly admits that while certain powers are allowed to be exercised by persons who are managing a minor's property it is very necessary that any case of that sort should be based upon investigation of the facts.

Mr. Sircar for the plaintiff points out that no such case was pleaded. It is quite clear that the learned Judge was not asked to investigate such a case and we are informed that Mr. Sircar disputes the fact that the uncle was de facto manager of the infant's property. It seems to me that line of defence raised very late is not now open either on the pleadings or having regard to the issues and the conduct of the case in the lower Court. On the whole it seems to me that the Corporation have no answer to this claim.

I will only advert in conclusion to the suggestion that there might be some defence in the provisions of S 5, Provident Funds Act. That section runs thus:

No suit or other legal proceeding shall lie against any person in respect of anything done or in good faith intended to be done in pursuance of the provisions of this Act.

There again it seems to me that this is not such a suit. It is not a suit for damages. It is a suit to require the Corporation to make payment of a sum of money which is due to the plaintiff.

In my judgment this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Evidence Act, S. 144, Ill. (b) — Evidence of an approver sought to be corroborated with the evidence of confessing accused will not justify conviction of co-accused.

Where the evidence of an approver is principally on the question of conspiracy and where that evidence is sought to be corroborated by the evidence of the confessing accused, it amounts to this that one tainted piece of evidence is sought to be corroborated by another tainted piece of evidence and would not justify the conviction of co-accused. [P 747 C 2]

Mrtiyanjay Chattopadhyaya and Porimal Chandra Guha—for Appellants.

C. C. Ghose, J.—In this case there are four appellants before us. Appellant 1 Latafat Hossain Biswas has been convicted under S. 307 read with S. 34, I. P. C. and under S. 120-B I. P. C., appellant 2 Engraj Sekh has been convicted under S. 307 read with S. 34 and also under S. 120-B. I. P. C., appellant 3 Khedarali Sekh has been convicted under S. 307 read with S. 34 and appellant 4 Kaser Sekh has been convicted under S. 120-B I. P. C.

The facts involved in this appeal, shortly stated, are as follows : Saferuddin Biswas and the accused Latafat Hossain Biswas are step-brothers. Their father Naimuddin died in 1327 B. S. and they occupy his pucca house in village Gournagar, P. S. Meherpur. In 1332 B. S. they partitioned the house and property. Latafat occupied the north part of the house, Safer the south part. Since then they have been on bad terms. There were quarrels over the partition of the house and the partition of the property, particularly certain Post Office Cash Certificates left by the father. Also Latafat used to sing low songs insulting Safer's wife. While Safer retaliated by singing similarly insulting songs about Latafat's wife and daughters. About 13th August last Safer was singing some such songs and playing on a harmonium which he had acquired from a creditor when Latafat threatened to shoot him. Safer reported this at the thana. Latafat's hate against his stepbrother became so great that he decided to have him put out of the way altogether. So he called his halsana Engraj Abdul Gain and Alam Sardar and offered them Rs. 150 between them if they would assist him in murdering Safer. On the night of Sunday, 1st Aswin (18th September) Engraj, Kaser, Alam, Abdul Gain, Taherali met in Latafat's baitakhana and Latafat proposed that they should kill Safer that night. He asked the others to wait and went out to watch Safer's movements, his intention being to catch him on his way from his baitakhana into his inner house (andar-bati). Safer, however, went too quickly into his house and bolted the door so that the attack had to be abandoned for that night. Next night (Monday) Abdul Gain, Kaser, Engraj, Taherali, Alam met again at Latafat's baitakhana. Latafat told them that the work must be done that night positively and that if there were any troublesome consequences he would spend money and save them. He then went out to see what Safer was doing and coming back reported that Safer was having supper with Meghlal and Mansab and that they would not have long to wait. Presently Saferuddin, Mansab and Meghlal came out of Safer's house and sat in his baitakhana. After a little Meghlal got up and saying it was time for him to be going home to bed took his departure. Presently the watchers heard Safer say to Mansab that he (Mansab) might also turn in (at the baitakhana) as he (Safer) was also going off to bed.

Immediately Latafat, Kaser, Taherali, Engraj, Alam and Abdul Gain ran to the door of Safer's inner house. At the door, the approver Abdul Gain says, he saw another man standing but in the darkness he did not recognize him. Meantime Safer came out of the baitakhana with a lantern in one hand and an ink-well and some papers in the other. As soon as he had stepped inside the door of his inner compound and was approaching the screen wall which is just beyond it on the inside, Latafat and Khedarali came from inside and while Khedar ran past him and took his stand by the door Latafat seized him clapping one hand at the back of his head and the other over his mouth. Safer dropped the lantern, the ink-well and papers on the ground and as he struggled and shouted the others seized him and threw him down, two of them seizing him by the legs. Latafat cut him twice on the neck with a hasua. Safer seized the hasua getting his hands cut in the process but succeeded in wresting it from the grasp of his assailant. Possessed of this weapon he nacked at the two men who were holding him down and then another man hit him on the head with a lathi and he fell back, was assaulted again and became senseless. Before he threw the lantern down he had recognized by its light Latafat and Kedar among his assailants. Presently he came to as he lay with his head down on the ground and perceived that 'somebody was holding a hand over his nostrils; so he stopped breathing in order to make believe that there was no more life left in him. In the belief that he was dead his assailants left him there. Before that, while the attack was in progress, Mansab who was lying in the baitakhana heard Safer's cries and went up to the door of the andarbat. It was closed; so he pushed it open and just then some body hit him with a lathi on the arm and side. So he rushed off in fear and began raising an outcry to rouse the neighbours. Meantime the injured Safer picked himself up and went outside to the village road near by groaning and trying to call for assistance. There he was found by Mansab, Sabdal, Reastulla, Belat, the village Chowkidar Eadali and other neighbours who had been roused by Mansab's shouts. Belat was sent to fetch Dr Manmatha Nath Biswas from Dariapore about two miles off and first aid was rendered to Safer, some rags being clumsily tied round his bleeding wounds. He told them that he had just been attacked by some 5 or 6 men, that among them he had recognized his stepbrother Latafat and Kedar and that he had caught hold of a hasua and with it wounded two of his assailants. He was brought to the house of Mansab Biswas where presently the doctor arrived and dressed his wounds.

On behalf of the appellants two contentions have been put forward before us first that the confession of the appellant Engraj should not have been admitted in evidence under S. 30, Evidence Act, as it was not self-incriminatory; and, secondly that the evidence against the appellants is that of the approver Abdul Gain and the evidence of the approver, in the absence of independent evidence cannot be corroborated by the evidence of the confessing appellant Engraj.

We have had placed before us the confession of the appellant Engraj. In our opinion so far as the charge of conspiracy under S. 120-B I. P. C. is concerned, that confession was certainly self-incriminatory, and therefore it was admissible in evidence under S. 30 Evidence Act. But having regard to the circumstances of this case where the evidence of the approver is principally on the question of conspiracy and where that evidence is sought to be corroborated by the evidence of the confessing appellant Engraj it amounts to this that one tainted piece of evidence is sought to be corroborated by another tainted piece of evidence. That being so, the rule that has been laid down for observance in criminal trials, namely, that it would be unsafe to allow the conviction on a charge to remain where the circumstances are such as are indicated above must be followed in this case, and therefore the result is that the conviction of the appellants Latafat Hossain and Kaser Sekh, so far as S. 120-B is concerned, must be set aside. As regards Engraj, there is his own statement which, as indicated above, was admissible in evidence under S. 30, Evidence Act, and there is no reason why he should not be convicted under S. 120-B, I. P. C.

As regards the conviction under S. 307 read with S. 34, there is a large body of evidence, namely, the evidence of Saferuddin who received no less than 21 injuries and of Mansab, Yasin and the doctor Manmatha Nath Biswas. That evidence was placed before the jury in a very fair manner and nothing that has been said in the course of argument before us can induce us to interfere in any way with the conviction under S. 307 read with S. 34, I. P. C.

The result, therefore, is that the conviction under S. 120-B of the appellants Latafat Hossain and Kaser Sekh is set aside and the conviction of the appellants Latafat Hossain, Engraj and Khedarali under S. 307 read with S. 34 I. P. C. is maintained intact. The appellant Kaser Sekh whose conviction under S. 120-B is set aside must be forthwith released from custody.

Judgment.—In this case the Subordinate Judge has made an order of remand by setting aside the judgment of the trial Court. His order is not warranted by the law. If he was dissatisfied with the local investigation that was made by the commission and accepted by the trial Court he might have himself issued a commissioner or directed the lower Court to take evidence as provided by Rr 27, 28 and 29 of O. 41, Civil P. C. The order reversing the judgment of the Munsif and sending it back for re-trial is wrong. We are further informed that the observation made by the Subordinate Judge that the landlady or her successor-in-interest should also be made a party is inaccurate and unnecessary, because the landlord was already a party to the suit. Even if the landlord is not a party he would not be bound by the result of the litigation and at the appellate stage the Court ought not to have allowed any third person to be added as a party. The opinion that if necessary the public should be made a party again is unwarranted, whatever might be the result of the suit, the public would not be bound and it was not necessary for the Subordinate Judge to say that the public should be made a party.

With these directions we set aside the order of the Subordinate Judge and send back the case for trial of the appeal according to law.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 87—Sale of non-transferable holding—Part of it in tenants' possession—There is no abandonment and landlord has no right of re-entry.

A landlord can question the sale of a non-transferable occupancy holding only, if it has been followed by complete abandonment of the lands by the tenant. Where a tenant remains in possession of some of the lands, it follows that there has been no abandonment which entitles the landlord to re-enter on the lands in possession of the purchaser, as he has not taken possession of all the lands in the holding. Judgment.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a suit for recovery of possession of certain lands on declaration of his title. The lands in suit formed parts of two different occupancy holdings, one bearing a rental of Rs. 37-8-0 and the other bearing a rental of Rs. 9-4-0. Those two tenancies were brought to sale in execution of a money decree and they were purchased by the plaintiff, and the plaintiff took delivery of possession on 12th December 1921. He was subsequently dispossessed of some of the lands by defendant 1 in collusion with other defendants, including the landlords; and the plaintiff brought the suit in order to recover possession of the lands of which he had been dispossessed. The first Court decreed the suit so far it related to lands of the tenancy of Rs. 9-4-0 and dismissed it in respect of the lands of the other tenancy. Both parties appealed and the learned Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit entirely. As will appear from the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge, the plaintiff took care not to take possession through Court of the whole of the lands of the two tenancies, and the plaintiff is now in possession of some of the lands of these tenancies, and he claims to recover possession of only those other lands which were delivered to him, and of which he was subsequently dispossessed. The defendants set up a story that the tenant whose tenancies were sold in execution of the money decree had surrendered the holding to the landlords prior to the date of the execution sale, and that the landlords had held the lands khas for some time and had subsequently settled them with defendants 1 and 6. Therefore, even according to the case for the defence, defendant 6, the original tenant, is still in possession of some of the lands of the two tenancies.

As regards the story of the surrender, the learned Courts below have found that the story is false, and that it has been concocted with a view to cheat the plaintiff. The learned Subordinate Judge has however dismissed the plaintiff's suit, holding that because the plaintiff had purchased the entire holding at the execution sale, his purchase was of no effect as against the landlords; and the Subordinate Judge considered this argument sufficient for dismissing the plaintiff's suit. In this he was in error. So far as the tenant defendant 6 was concerned it was not open to him to question the sale. The landlords could only question the sale if it had been followed by complete abandonment of the lands by the tenant. As the findings of the Courts below are that the tenant is still in possession of some of the lands, it follows that there has been no abandonment which entitles the landlords to re-enter. The fact that the plaintiff did not take possession of all the lands is a material circumstance which the learned Subordinate Judge has failed to appreciate. It is this circumstance which puts the landlords out of the Court in the matter of re-entry. The plaintiff is in the position of a purchaser of a portion of a non-transferable occupancy holding as against whom no landlord has a right of re-entry.

The appeal therefore succeeds and the suit is decreed in its entirety with costs in all Courts.

Civil P. C., O. 41, Rr. 27, 28 and 29—Unsatisfactory investigation by the trial Court—Procedure to be adopted by the appellate Court laid down.

Where the appellate Court finds that the trial in the trial Court is misconceived, it cannot set aside the whole judgment simply because of the unsatisfactory way in which the trial Court dealt with the matter of local investigation. The proper procedure is to make an order for local investigation itself or direct the trial Court to appoint a Commissioner for making a local investigation and proceed under O. 41, Rr. 27, 28 and 29. After the local investigation is made and any evidence desired by the appellate Court to be taken is taken, the appellate Court should decide the appeal on all questions arising in the suit itself. [P 750 C 1]

Judgment.—On first reading the judgment it seemed that the Subordinate Judge passed his order under the inherent jurisdiction of the Court to make an order of remand when the trial in the first Court is altogether misconceived. The trial Court after rejecting the report of the commissioner ought to have in the circumstances stated by the Subordinate Judge issued a fresh commission for the purpose of local investigation. There is, however, one difficulty in maintaining the order as it has been made, and that is this, the Munsif decided all the issues including the question of limitation. The Subordinate Judge does not say anything with regard to the question of limitation. He set aside the whole judgment simply because of the unsatisfactory way in which the trial Court dealt with the matter of local investigation. It appears to us that he was wrong in setting aside the whole judgment including the finding with regard to the question of limitation upon that ground.

We, therefore, set aside the order of the Subordinate Judge remanding the case after setting aside the judgment of the Munsif and in lieu of the order made by the Subordinate Judge we direct that the appeal be sent back to him for decision. He may make an order for local investigation himself or direct the trial Court to appoint a commissioner for making a local investigation and he will proceed under Rr. 27, 28 and 29 of O. 41. After the local investigation is made and any evidence that the Subordinate Judge desires to be taken is taken the Subordinate Judge will decide the appeal on all the questions arising in the suit himself.

The costs will abide the final result. We assess the hearing fee at two gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 1229 of 1926, Decided on 26th March 1928, from appellate decree of 1st Sub-Judge, Pabna, D/- 26th January 1926.

Bengal Local Self-Government Act 3 (B. C.), (1885)—Election Rules 1 and 42—Civil Court has jurisdiction to set aside an election.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Pabna dated 26th January 1926 which affirmed the decision of the Munsif of Serajgunj, dated 9th May 1925. The suit in which this appeal arises was for setting aside the election of defendant 1 who was elected as a member of the Serajgunj Local Board and for an injunction restraining him from taking his seat as a member of the said Board. The main ground on which the plaintiff came to Court seems to be this, that one Tarak Chandra Banerji proposed the plaintiff as a candidate for election. Objection was taken by defendant 1 to Tarak's proposing the plaintiff as a candidate for the election, as it was said that Tarak was not a qualified voter. This objection of defendant 1 seems to have prevailed with the presiding officer. The plaintiff was also duly seconded by another qualified voter and that seconder also was held by the presiding officer not qualified to vote. The result was that the name of the plaintiff was removed from the list of nominated candidates. Both the Courts below concurrently found that the presiding officer did erroneously hold that Tarak and the seconder were not qualified voters and that the decision of the presiding officer was wrong. The Munsif, accordingly, declared that the plaintiff was duly proposed and seconded as a candidate for election as a member of the Serajgunj Local Board at the Sadiya Chandpur Centre and his name was wrongly removed from the list of candidates there, that the election of defendant 1 as a member of the said Board from the Chauhati thana be set aside as invalid and that he, the said defendant 1, be restrained by an injunction from sitting and acting as a member of the said Board for the said thana.

This decision was, as I have already stated, affirmed by the learned Subordinate Judge.

In second appeal, the only substantial ground which has been taken by Dr. Radha Benode Pal, who has appeared for the appellant, is that a suit of this description does not lie in a civil Court and that the civil Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the present suit. Reliance has been placed on the Election Rules under the Local Self-Government Act and special reference is made to R. 1-A. These rules were framed under S. 138 (a), Bengal Local Self-Government Act 3 (B. C.), 1885. It appears, however, that R. 1-A is of no assistance to the defendant-appellant, for it seems to us that the objections which were taken by the plaintiff were such objections as fell within R. 42, Election Rules. In order to determine as to whether Tarak was a qualified voter, it was necessary for the presiding officer to determine the objections to voters within the meaning of R. 42. R. 1-A provides that all disputes arising under these rules other than objections under Rr. 15 and 42 shall be decided by the Magistrate and his deci-ion shall be final. So according to this rule, any objection decided by the presiding officer under R. 42 is exempted from the rule which makes all other decisions of the Magistrate final and not liable to be challenged in a civil Court. Objections which were determined, as it appears clear from para. 5 of the plaint do come under R. 42 and are, therefore, cognizable by the civil Courts. We think in this view the decision of the lower Court is correct and that the appeal must, accordingly, be dismissed with costs.

*Panchanon Ghose and Ganendra Krishna Ghose—*for Appellants.

*Hira Lal Chakrabarti and Apurba Tharan Mukerji—*for Respondents.

Cuming, J.—In the suit out of which this appeal has arisen the plaintiffs sued for a declaration of their title and confirmation of possession and for a declaration that a certain entry in the record-of-rights was incorrect.

This entry in the record of rights refers to Dags Nos. 1053 and 1057. In the record-of-rights these dags are recorded as being held by the Gramya Thakurani through the shebait Madhab Chandra Mandal as a tenant under plaintiff 3 rent-free. Plaintiffs 1 and 2 are the widows and plaintiff 3 is the daughter of one Birkishore Manna. Their case was that the dags in dispute were in their khas possession. The case of the defence was that the lands in suit never belonged to the plaintiffs' alleged landlords and were never included in the plaintiffs' jote but that they belonged to the idols Sitala, Kali and Mahamaya who were the village goddesses of Mauza Golabari, that the plaintiffs were never in possession of the same but that defendant 2 possessed them on behalf of the deities as a shebait. Further that the suit was barred by limitation.

The trial Court found that the plaintiffs had title to the lands as claimed by them but held that the suit lands were held by the deity as a tenant under the plaintiffs without payment of any rent. On these findings the trial Court dismissed the plaintiffs' claim for confirmation of khas possession or recovery of khas possession.

The plaintiffs appealed to the District Court. The District Court found that the title was with the plaintiffs and further found that the plaintiffs were in khas possession and were, therefore, entitled to the confirmation of their khas possession.

The defendants have appealed to this Court and their contention is that the learned Judge has wrongly placed the onus on the defendants. It is contended that it is not for the defendants to show that the entry in the record-of-rights was right but it is for the plaintiffs who challenge the record-of-rights to show that it is wrong.

The learned Judge has dealt with this portion of the case in the last paragraph of p. 8 of the paper-book where he says:

As regards the second point I cannot support the lower Court's finding. The defendants must show that the presumption claimed by them under the record-of-rights, Ex. 11 (i), is based on sound basis.

He then proceeds to deal with the evidence that the defendants adduced and finally comes to the conclusion that the defendants have not proved their possession or that there is any village deity Mahamaya who holds the lands. He further finds that there is no evidence of the defendants' possession. The learned Judge has obviously approached the case from a wrong standpoint. It was for the plaintiffs to show that the entry in the record-of-rights was incorrect and not for the defendants to show that the entry in the record-of-rights which was in their favour was correct. See S. 103-B, Ben. Ten. Act. Cl. (3), S. 103-B, Ben. Ten. Act provides that:

Every entry in a record of rights so published shall be evidence of the matter referred to in such entry, and shall be presumed to be correct until it is proved by evidence to be incorrect.

In dealing with the defendants' evidence as regards possession the learned Judge has fallen into the same error. He remarks that:

As regards possession the defendants' evidence is not at all convincing. Plaintiffs have proved their possession both of Dags Nos. 1053 and 1057. Defendants' evidence of possession of the tank is almost nil.

He has entirely disregarded the fact that the entry in the record of rights is in favour of the defendants. It shows that the defendants are in possession.

The order of the learned District Judge is, therefore, set aside and the appeal sent back to him for a re-hearing bearing in mind the observations we have made.

With regard to the question of title it has already been decided in favour of the plaintiffs and has not been challenged by the defendants in this Court. That question will not be re-opened.

Costs of this appeal will abide the final result.

C. C. Ghose, J. — This appeal was argued at considerable length yesterday and also to-day. Various points have been urged before us with a view to show that there are serious misdirections in the learned Judge's charge to the jury. As a matter of fact, the learned Judge's charge to the jury has been subjected to very minute criticism; but on the fullest consideration we are unable to say that any portion of the charge can be assailed on the ground of misdirection.

There is, however, one point which requires consideration and it is this. It is said that as regards the appellant, Nawab Ali, who was charged under S 302 read with S. 109 I. P. C., among other sections, the learned Judge's explanation of S. 109 was defective in this that he used language from which it might be construed that the learned Judge was of opinion that if Nawab Ali ordered his men to beat and if the killing of Hamijuddin was committed in consequence of his order to beat, Nawab Ali was to be held guilty of abetment of the act of killing. The sentence in the charge referred to above, by itself, may be open to misconstruction; but we have got to read that sentence bearing in mind the facts of this case and the facts are as follows: According to the case for the prosecution, the complainant Ismail, who had mortgaged the land (plot No. 118) to Nawab Ali, retaken possession of the same as Nawab had not paid the rent due to the superior landlord. It is said that on the day of the occurrence Ismail was cutting paddy of that plot when the accused with a large number of men about 40 in number came in a boat armed with lejas, lathis and ramdaos and protested against Ismail's cutting of the paddy. A quarrel ensued in the course of which, under Nawab Ali's orders, Ismail's party was attacked and assaulted, as a result of which Hamijuddin and Abdul Majid were seriously wounded and as the result of the wounds they died. Now, if, as a matter of fact, the facts were, as indicated above, then if the learned Judge had said that upon Nawab Ali ordering his men to beat the opposite party and in consequence of which order the people who were opposed to Nawab Ali's party were beaten and as a result two men were killed, Nawab Ali would undoubtedly be held guilty of abetment of murder, then in the circumstances of this case there was and would have been nothing wrong. We are fortified in the view we take by the decision of the Patna High Court in the case of Ghanshyam Singh v. Emperor (1), the passage with which we are concerned occurring at p. 635. That being so, we see no reason whatsoever for interfering in this appeal with the order made by the learned Sessions Judge.

The result is that the appeal is dismissed.

Herambo Chandra Guha, Jnan Chandra Roy and Probhat Chandra Das—for Petitioner.

Byom Kesh Basu—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment—The question arising for decision in this rule is whether or not the Courts below have rightly refused to allow the plaintiff, who is the petitioner before this Court, to value his suit under the provisions of S. 7, para. (11), sub-Cl. (cc), Court-fees Act. The tenancy that had existed and had been held by the defendant had been terminated; and the suit was one for ejectment of the defendant as a trespasser. The plaintiff sought to value his suit under the clause referred to above on the assertion that for the purposes of the valuation of the suit the defendant was still a tenant. There is nothing in the wording of the sub-clause to lead to any such conclusion. That sub-clause reads as follows :

For the recovery of immoveable property from a tenant including a tenant holding over after the determination of the tenancy.

Once the tenancy had been determined the person who has been a tenant became a trespasser holding on, and he could only be a tenant holding over provided such holding over was with the consent, express or implied, of the landlord. It is possible that the legislature intended to reduce the Court-fee payable in suits such as the present. But that view may also be doubted considering that the legislature thought it necessary to add that the term "tenant" would include a tenant who held over. It seems as if there can be no room for holding that the legislature intended to include under the term "tenant" persons who had ceased to be tenants altogether. However, we can only act on the words to be found in the statute and as the defendant does not fall within the category of tenants or tenants holding over after the determination of the tenancy the Courts below were right in holding that the sub-clause referred to above does not apply, and the suit must be valued otherwise than under its provisions.

The rule is, accordingly, discharged with costs—hearing-fee, two gold mohurs. Let the record be sent down at once.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of application relating to delivery of possession in execution of a partition decree. The appellants before us are plaintiffs 1 to 3 or their heirs and the respondents-plaintiffs 4 to 6. The defendants in the suit have no interest in the proceedings. But in a partition suit every plaintiff may be in the position of a defendant. Therefore the question of the parties being ranged on the same side in the suit is of no moment in this particular case. The controversy between the contending parties to this appeal was with regard to delivery of possession in respect of four lags of the properties in suit, that is to say dags 134 and 135 on one side and lags 164 and 165 on the other. The dispute was that the respondents, the opposite parties before the trial Court, claimed that the final decree had been adjusted between the parties in this way, that the petitioners the appellants before us would get dags 164 and 165, while the opposite parties would get the other two dags. This was, however, in contravention of the final decree as made. The petitioners objected that there was no such adjustment of the decree and this objection arose when the commissioner went to deliver possession in terms of the final decree for partition. The Subordinate Judge allowed the petitioners' objection and made an order that possession should be delivered as in the final decree for partition. The opposite party appealed before the District Judge and the District Judge was of opinion that this matter did not arise under S. 47, Civil P. C., and the order of the Subordinate Judge was without jurisdiction as the decree had been finally satisfied.

Obviously the District Judge was in error. The authority that he cited in support of his opinion has no bearing on the present case. Here possession was asked to be delivered according to the final decree and such delivery of possession must be held to be in execution of the decree, and when the dispute arose with regard to such delivery of possession it was a dispute falling under S. 47, Civil P. C. The District Judge was also in error in holding that the decree had been fully satisfied, because it was not a fact that possession was fully delivered in accordance with the decree as the petitioners the appellants before us objected to the delivery of possession in terms of the alleged settlement between the parties.

The judgment and order of the District Judge are therefore set aside and the case sent back to the lower appellate Court for decision on the merits as to whether there was really an adjustment or not.

The costs will abide the final result. We assess the hearing-fee at three gold mohurs.

Hemendra Kumar Das—for Appellant

Garlick, J.—The plaintiff-appellant bought the suit land by two separate kobalas from Mt. Abari Defalani, defendant 2, of Suit No 739, and from Taran Dafla defendant 2, of Suit No 752 in April 1923. But defendant 1 prevented him from taking possession of the land saying that he had bought it from the Daflas some years earlier. So the plaintiff filed two suits for declaration of title and delivery of possession. His kobalas are registered kobalas although they did not require registration, the consideration being Rs 80 in the one and Rs 20 in the other.

Defendant 1 says that he bought the suit land in April 1918 from two vendors of the plaintiff and a third Dafla named Hari for Rs. 180. But the sale-deed is unregistered. He has, however, possessed the land and paid Government revenue for it ever since his purchase.

The Daflas left the village, at about the time of the sale to defendant 1. The Court of first instance found that defendant 1 was in possession by virtue of his purchase and that the plaintiff was aware of the sale to him and of his possession at the time when he bought the land. The plaintiff paid a very low price and registered the two kobalas unnecessarily because he knew of defendant 1's purchase and wanted to defraud him.

Both the Courts below have found that though the unregistered kobala of defendant 1 ought to have been registered it is admissible in evidence to prove the agreement to sell; and that that agreement having been part performed by defendant 1 is enforceable as if there had been a complete sale. The plaintiff's two suits have, therefore, been dismissed and he has filed these two appeals. The grounds of the appeals are first that an unregistered kobala with a consideration of Rs 180 was not admissible in evidence, second that without that document there was no foundation for the doctrine of part performance, and third that the doctrine of part performance does not apply because a suit for specific performance of the contract was time barred.

In the present case a suit for specific performance of the unregistered kobala was not time barred at the date of the plaintiff's suit for though the unregistered kobala was executed in April 1918 there is nothing to indicate that the defendants had refused to register it. The cause of action for a suit for specific performance of the contract for sale would date from the time when defendant 1 became aware that his vendors had sold the land to the plaintiff. The second sale was in April 1923 and this suit was instituted in 1924. A suit for specific performance of the defendants' kobala was not, therefore, time barred when the plaintiff instituted the present suit.

It is argued that S. 49, Registration Act, prevents an unregistered kobala, which ought to be registered from being received as evidence of any transaction affecting the land and that it cannot, therefore, be sued as a basis for the doctrine of part performance. The ruling reported in Sanjhi Chandra Sayal v Santosh Kumar Lahiri (1) was cited in support of this contention.

In the face of Ss 17 and 49, Registration Act, and the ruling just cited it is difficult to say that this unregistered document was rightly admitted in evidence. But it has often been held that a sale-deed which is not admissible as a proof of title to land is nevertheless admissible for some collateral purpose; and in some cases it has been held that such a document is admissible to prove the existence of an agreement for sale for the purpose of applying the doctrine of part performance. In the present case there is also parol evidence of an agreement for sale. And this evidence is reinforced by the fact that the defendants were in possession of the land and were paying Government revenue for it. Their possession of the land and payment of revenue can only be accounted for by the fact that they had bought the land. Therefore, even without using this unregistered document there is evidence which can be relied on to show that there was an agreement for sale and that they took possession of the land in consequence of that agreement. In a ruling reported in Puchha Lal v. Kunj Behari Lal (2) a similar unregistered document was admitted as evidence of the existence of an agreement for sale and was used as a foundation for the doctrine of part performance. We are of opinion, therefore, that the lower Courts committed no illegality in making use of this document.

It has been found that defendant 1 actually paid the consideration agreed upon and took possession of the land in consequence of that payment. His part of the contract was performed. And equity requires that the vendors' part of the contract should also be performed. By virtue of the doctrine of part performance the agreement to sell the land to the defendants coupled with the payment of consideration money and delivery of possession was equivalent to a completed sale. The plaintiff, therefore, acquired no title by his subsequent purchase from the same vendors. The lower Courts have held that he was not a bona fide purchaser without notice of the sale but that he was aware both of the sale and of the defendant's possession of the land and that he bought the land at a low price for that reason. Both the appeals are dismissed with costs.

Order.—This is an application to vary an order after it has been passed by the Registrar of this Court and entered. In a matter of this kind I think the practice in this country is the same as it is in England namely as laid down by Lord Justice Cotton in the case of In re : Swire Mellor v. Swire (1) at p. 242, where the learned Lord Justice says :

The regular course is this that when an order is settled any party who desired to object to the terms of it as settled should intimate to the Registrar that he intends to give a notice of motion to vary the order. He must state what variation he desires and then he must move the Court, at the risk of costs, to have that variation made. It is the duty of the Registrar at once to pass and enter the order when settled, unless some of the parties state that they intend to move to vary it. It would cause delay in the Registrar's office if any one, by simply saying "I object to that form of order" without giving notice to vary it, could prevent the Registrar from going on to pass and enter it.

Then the learned Lord Justice goes to say ;

but although that is the regular course, and it is only in special circumstances that the Court will interfere with an order which has been passed and entered, except in cases of a mere slip or verbal inaccuracy yet in my opinion the Court has jurisdiction over its own records, and if it finds that the order as passed and entered contains an adjudication upon that which the Court in fact has never adjudicated upon, then, in my opinion, it has jurisdiction which it will in a proper case exercise to correct its record, that it may be in accordance with the order really pronounced.

I entirely agree with the observations of the learned Lord Justice and as I have said I think that is the correct statement of the law as applicable in this Court as well as the Court in England. The whole question, therefore, which I have to determine is whether or not in the circumstances of this case I ought to interfere with the order which has been passed and entered, because it is clear and it is not disputed that in the present instance the ordinary course was followed and the Registrar sent to the solicitors of the parties the draft form of order and each of these solicitors returned these drafts to the Registrar with certain alterations and signed it as being approved by him subject to such alterations ; the notice of motion in the present case is to the effect that the defendant asks for an order that an order made by me on 12th December 1927, be amended by the deletion of the words "all account books, papers, memoranda and writings relating thereto." The notice also says that the defendant will ask for an order that he is entitled to the possession and delivery to him of all the books and documents whatsoever relating to his business. The draft forms of order which were sent to the parties contained the clause which is now objected to. It is as follows :

And it is further ordered that the plaintiff firm and all persons claiming under them do deliver up quiet possession of the said goods together with all account books, papers, memoranda and writings relating thereto to the said Receivers.

Neither of the solicitors to the parties objected to the presence of that clause in the draft order, but only made certain other alterations in the draft. Accordingly it may be said that they "settled" the order and it was passed by the Registrar and entered by him.

Now it is said on behalf of the defendant that I ought to order the deletion of the clause relating to account books and so on on the ground that the order as it stands does not really represent the intention and meaning of the order which I made on 12th December 1927, and to a large degree that is so, because so far as my recollection goes (and it is admitted on both sides to be correct) nothing whatever was said on that occasion with regard to the account books and papers and other writings relating to the goods in question in the suit. It is true that in his affidavit the defendant did explain at the time that the "financier" on or about the date mentioned seized my stock-books, bill-books, bill-registers, chalan-books and order books and that they still hold the same and refused to return them in spite of demands.

Now what happened on 12th December was that in a sense there was a consent order or rather an order by consent in that various terms were suggested to the parties and accepted by them as being the kind of order which ought to be made in the circumstances of the case in the effect of that order was that the "Barlook" type-writers which were seized by the plaintiff and also certain other goods which the defendant had in his possession for sale on commission—all those goods would be put into the hands of the Receivers to be sold by them and the sale proceeds retained by them pending the determination of the issues in the suit. It was conceded by the learned counsel for the plaintiff that certain furniture belonging to the defendant had also been seized by the plaintiff and in particular certain office articles and office furniture was seized and I came to the conclusion that in order that the defendant might properly be in a position to continue carrying on his business those articles ought to be held by the Receivers and made available for the use of the defendant in order that he should not be hampered in the continuance of his business. It may well be that had the question of the account books, papers and memoranda and writing relating to the goods been specifically mentioned I should have made a similar order with regard to them. However as I have pointed out nothing was said with regard to the destination of the documents in the case but on the other hand the order was drawn up in the manner which I have already described. On a subsequent occasion an application was made to me that the terms of that order might be complied with by the plaintiff in that they should be ordered to hand over to the Receivers the books of account and so on and in fact that has been done.

The position now is that these account books, papers, memoranda and other writings etc., are in the hands of the Receivers and in fact in the physical possession of one of the Receivers who happens to be the solicitor of the defendant. The second part of the order now asks for that the defendant himself should be put into the possession of all these books and other documents. I am, however, informed by the counsel for the plaintiff that the question of the ownership and title to these documents is one of the matters in dispute in the suit and the plaintiff also says that he takes the view that there might be a risk that the documents may be tampered with. Be that as it may, I think having regard to the fact that nothing whatsoever was said about the books of account at the time when the matter was originally before me and therefore there can be any real question of carrying the original intention and meaning of the order which I then made, it is not right that I should amend the order as drawn up and apparently settled and approved by the solicitors for the parties. It is desirable that nothing should be done to hamper but at the same time nothing should be done which might in any way injuriously affect the rights of the plaintiffs seeing therefore that the ownership and title to these documents in dispute. I think on the whole it is desirable that they should be in the hands of the Receivers. They should however give every possible facility to the defendant for making use of the books for the purpose of carrying on the business pending the trial of the action.

The suit is fixed to be tried on 19th February which is only a short time from this day. In all the circumstances of the case I do not think that the defendant can be seriously damaged if the documents remain in the custody of the Receivers. Looking at the matter as a whole and having regard to the consideration I have mentioned I do not think this is a case where I ought to interfere with the order as settled, passed and entered nor do I think that having regard to the question of title of these documents which has been raised that I ought to deal with the matter on an interlocutory application otherwise than to insure the preservation of the property in dispute and that both parties should have such access as is necessary for protecting their interests. It follows therefore that this application must be dismissed. Costs—costs in the cause.

Judgment—This is an appeal by defendants 1 and 2 in a suit for recovery of possession of certain lands on declaration of the plaintiffs title. The suit was instituted on 10th May 1922. It would appear that on 3rd June 1910 the plaintiff had instituted a suit against the defendants under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, and that that suit had been dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove that she had been in possession within six months of the date of the suit. The learned Munsif who tried the present suit held that the present suit was barred by limitation under the provisions of Art 142, Lim. Act. The learned Court of appeal below has reversed the decree of the Munsif, holding that the finding in the possessory suit that the plaintiff had not been in possession for at least six months before the date of that suit is not res judicata in the present suit. We are unable to agree with the view of the law taken by the learned Judge. Under the provisions of Expl. (2), S. 11, Civil P. C., the fact that no right of appeal exists against a decision does not in any way affect the operation of the rule of res judicata. The decision in the suit under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, was not subject to appeal; but that fact alone will not make the point decided in that case any the less res judicata in subsequent litigation between the parties. It was decided by the Munsif in the suit under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, that the plaintiff had not been in possession at least from 3rd December 1909; and the question covered by that finding cannot be reargued between the parties. It is not open to the plaintiff to reassert that she had been in possession at any time between 3rd December 1909 and 3rd June 1910. As that question was res judicata, it follows that the present suit was not within time.

The appeal is allowed. The judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court are set aside, and those of the Munsif restored with costs in this Court and in the Court of appeal below.

Appeal No. 160 of 1927, Decided on 23rd July 1928, from appellate order of Sub-Judge, Zillah Tippera, D/- 11th December 1926.

(a) Hindu law—Daughters inheriting the property of their father, dispossessed—Suit for recovery of possession and mesne profits decreed—Death of one of them during an appeal against the final decree for mesne profits—Decree for mesne profits is a part of the estate of the father unless the deceased treated her share as distinct from paternal estate.

Two sisters B and J, who had inherited the estate of their father, obtained a decree for recovery of possession and mesne profits against the persons who had dispossessed them. The two sisters sold the land thus recovered. Inter on, final decree ascertaining the mesne profits was made. The judgment-debtor unsuccessfully preferred appeals. During the pendency of those appeals, J died and her sons were brought on record in spite of B's application claiming herself as J's legal representative, which was the undecided. B then applied for recovery of entire amount by execution.

Held: that a decree for mesne profits should be considered as part of the estate of the father of the two sisters, since J had not treated her share of the decretal amount as distinct from the paternal estate. B was, therefore, entitled to realize the entire decree: 10 Cal. 324 (P.C.), Rel. on.; 22 Mad. 355, 28 Mad. 1; 10 Bom. 478; 41 All. 350; and 20 Cal. 433 (P.C.); Discussed.

Birendra Chandra Das—for Appellant.Upendra Kumar Ray—for Respondents.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the decree-holder against an order of the Subordinate Judge modifying the order of the Munsiff by which he directed that the decree-holder could only proceed to execute the decree for only one-half of the decretal amount.

The dispute between the parties arose in this way. There were two sisters Bharateswari and Jagneswari, of whom Bharateswari is now surviving and she is the appellant before us. It appears that they were dispossessed of a certain property and those two sisters obtained a decree for recovery of possession and mesne profits against the judgment-debtors on 23rd September 1916. On 19th October 1916 the land for which the decree for possession and mesne profits was obtained was sold to one Purna Chandra Das by the two sisters. The final decree ascertaining the mesne profits was made by the Court on 15th September 1919. Against that decree there was an appeal and a second appeal, both of which were dismissed. During the pendency of the appeal Jagneswari died and her sons were brought on the record at the instance of the judgment-debtors. Bharateswari presented a petition to the effect that she was the legal representative of her sister and had obtained her interest in the decree by survivorship. The question does not appear to have been decided by the Court. After the final dismissal of the appeal by the judgment-debtors against the part of the decree ascertaining mesne profits Bharateswari made an application for execution of the entire amount of the decree on 7th November 1924, and the present appeal arises out of that application.

The Munsiff allowed the application after rejecting the objection of the judgment-debtors. The objection of the judgment debtors appears to have been twofold, first that they have paid half of the decretal amount to the guardian of the minor sons of Jagneswari and that certificate of satisfaction had been made by the executing Court to that extent and therefore Bharateswari is not entitled to execute the entire decree. The second objection was that this money in the shape of mesne profits was the separate property of Jagneswari as her stridhan which after her death would go to her heir and would not follow the estate. It is necessary to mention that the two sisters had inherited the estate of their father with regard to which the decree for mesne profits was obtained. The Munsiff, as I have already said, held that Bharateswari was entitled to execute the entire decree. With regard to the question of satisfaction he seems to have held that there was no real satisfaction because the guardian of the minor sons of Jagneswari seems to have filed a petition of disclaimer as regards the receipt of money. In any case he held that that payment even if it had been made to the father of the minor sons of Jagneswari would not prevent Bharateswari from executing the decree. The learned advocate for the respondents contends that when there is that certificate of payment of half of the decretal amount the Court could not go behind that order or set aside the previous order of the executing Court. The short answer to that is that the judgment-debtors could not pay any amount as his share to a decree-holder on the record. The decree was never divided into two halves. The order admittedly was not acquiesced in by Bharateswari and it does not appear that she was given notice of this payment and certificate. That being so she is entitled to contest the certificate and the Munsiff was right in holding that she is not bound by it.

The order of the Munsiff was appealed against and on appeal the Subordinate Judge held that the mesne profits could not be a part of the corpus of the father's estate because the two sisters had sold the land for which the decree for mesne profits was obtained. His argument was that at the time when the decree for mesne profits was made in 1919 there was no corpus in the shape of paternal property to which this sum of money can be taken as an accretion as the property had been sold to a third person and there was no paternal estate in the hands of the two daughters. This argument is clearly fallacious and the learned advocate for the respondents does not base his argument upon that view. The property is not gone. The right which accrued to the decree holders was on account of their having been dispossessed of the property and their rights were certainly referable to the ownership of the land in question.

The whole question is whether this sum of money in the shape of mesne profits should be considered as the personal property of the lady Jagneswari or as the assets of her father's estate, and that question it must be admitted is one of considerable nicety. But having regard to the cases that have been cited before us in my opinion the decree for mesne profits should be considered as part of the estate of the father of the two sisters. If Jagneswari had by any manner or means expressed her intention to keep her share of the decretal amount apart from the paternal estate the money would have followed her directions, but not having done so must, according to the decisions as I understand them, follow the estate. The leading case on this point is the case of Isri Dut Koer v. Hansbutti Koerain (1). Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee observed in that case that the widow's savings from the income of her limited estate are not her stridhan and if she has made no attempt to dispose of them in her lifetime there is no dispute but that they follow the estate from which they arose. The learned Subordinate Judge thought that the present case is governed by the case of Saodamani Dasi v. Administrator General of Bengal (2). There their Lordships of the Privy Council found that the accumulated income from her husband's estate given to the widow was kept separate and their Lordships held that that being so it was to take a different course of succession from that of the estate of the husband.

It is next necessary to mention the cases which were referred to by the learned advocate for the respondents. The first case to which our attention is drawn is the case of Saminatha Pillai v. Manikkasami Pillai (3). There a Hindu widow obtained a decree for mesne profits, but she herself assigned the decree for mesne profits and subsequently died; the question was whether the assignees were entitled to execute the decree or her heirs. In such a case it could not be disputed that she had dealt with the property in her lifetime and so with reference to the case of Isri Dut Koer v. Hunsbutti Koerain (1) the assignee was entitled to execute the decree. That case, however, has no bearing on the present question. The case next cited is Subra Manian Chetti v. Arunachalam Chetti (4). There also the question was quite different. The Hindu widow was never in possession of her husband's estate. She used to get moneys under a decree for maintenance and out of this she had acquired certain other properties. It has never been held that when a widow gets money for her maintenance out of the estate of her husband that money if not spent by the widow herself follows the estate. It is not the income of the property that came into her possession, but she was allowed a certain sum out of the income for her own maintenance and there cannot be any question that it was her stridhan as it was held in that case. The next case cited is the case of Sitaram v. Dulam Kuar (5). That case, however, has only a superficial resemblance to the present case. In that case one of two sisters out of the income of her father's estate lent money to the sons of the other sister for the purpose of paying the revenue with regard to some other property; then she obtained a decree against her debtors, and the question was whether the right to execute the decree after her death was in her surviving sister or in the legal representatives of the decree-holder, that is the heirs of her stridhan. The learned judges referred to the case of Isri Dut Koer v. Hansbutti Koerain (1) above cited and held that the decree-holder intended in that case that the money which was lent to her sister's sons should not go to her sister after her death, that is, she wanted to treat the property separately. The last case cited was the case of L. W. J. Rivett-Carnac v. Jivihar (6). That case it seems to me has no bearing on the present question because it was held that there was nothing to show that the money was the saving or accretion of the estate of the widow's husband so as to give it to the heirs of the husband's estate.

On all these grounds in my opinion the present case is governed by the decision of the Privy Council in Isri Dut Koer v. Hansbutti Koerain (1) cited above. The judgment and order of the Subordinate Judge will therefore be set aside and those of the Munsiff restored with costs in all Courts.

S. C. Bose and Lalit Mohan Sanyal—for Respondents.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the President of the Tribunal under the Calcutta Improvement Act, 1911. The facts are these: The Collector under the Land Acquisition Act made a declaration dated 27th May 1921 published in the Calcutta Gazette of 1st June 1921 for the acquisition of certain lands. The owner of the premises with regard to which the declaration was made was one Banamali Mullick. The respondent company were the lessees under him. It appears that the respondents were in occupation as lessees under a lease which expired in 1911, and there was a renewal for another ten years and the renewed lease expired on 31st December 1920. Before the expiry of that lease the landlord gave notice to the respondent company that he was not prepared to grant any fresh lease to the respondents. Some offer was made on behalf of the respondents for granting a fresh lease to them, but the landlord was unwilling. The respondents, however, remained on the land and did not vacate it on the expiry of the lease on 31st December 1920.

The landlord brought a suit for ejectment and mesne profits on 20th April 1921. That was, it should be borne in mind, before the publication of the declaration. The suit, however, was not taken up for hearing for some time. On 2nd March 1922 the Collector issued notices for filing claims and one such notice was served upon the respondent company as persons interested. On 20th March 1922 the respondents preferred their claim to the Collector and they claimed altogether Rs. 55,000 or such sum as might be deemed to be a proper compensation for their loss and damages for removal as stated in the annexure to their petition. On 30th January 1923 the respondent company through their solicitors wrote a letter to their landlord that they were going to vacate the premises on 31st January 1923 and inviting the landlord to take possession on that day between 5 and 5-30 p.m. and as a matter of fact they vacated the premises on 31st January 1923. The Land Acquisition Collector acquired out of the entire premises, which is said by the witness for the respondent company to be about 2 bighas in area, 9 cottas, 9 chattaks and 30 sq. ft. only, and for this paid compensation to the landlord one lakh of rupees. He did not apportion any compensation to the respondent company. Thereupon the respondents asked for a reference to be made to the Tribunal, and the Tribunal on that reference passed an order allowing compensation to the respondents company of Rs. 10,000, the order purporting to have been made under S. 23 (1), Cl. 5, Land Acquisition Act 1894. From that decision the Secretary of State has preferred this appeal after obtaining the necessary certificate from the President of the Tribunal.

The first and the principal point in this case is whether the respondent company are entitled to the compensation awarded to them. The learned Government Pleader argues that the claimants were not compelled to change their place of business on account of the acquisition of the land and therefore they are not entitled to claim any compensation under the provisions of the section referred to above. His point is that the company were in occupation of the premises in question without any title whatsoever. The only claim which they made in reply to the demand of the landlord to vacate the premises after the expiry of their lease was that they were entitled to remain in possession under the provisions of the Calcutta Rent Act. The Calcutta Rent Act, as the learned President has observed in his judgment, was to expire in May 1923; and at the time when the company vacated the premises in question in January 1923 they knew that under no circumstance would they be entitled to the occupation of the premises beyond the expiry of the Calcutta Rent Act. The Act, however, was extended by an amendment which was introduced in the Legislative Council on 14th March 1923 and which passed into law on 4th April 1923, by which the Rent Act was extended to the end of March 1924. At the time when the company vacated the premises there was no reason to suppose that the Rent Act would be extended till March 1924. It is contended by the learned Government Pleader that as a matter of fact the premises were vacated by the company in order to avoid the trouble of litigation with the landlord knowing that at least even if they succeeded in resisting eviction they could only do so up to May 1923. It is further urged on behalf of the appellant that the removal of the place of business on account of the acquisition could not have taken place before possession was taken by the Collector or at any rate before the making of the award on 18th September 1923. It is argued that under S. 48 (1), Land Acquisition Act, the Government was at liberty to withdraw from the acquisition at any time if possession had not been taken. Similarly under S. 78, Calcutta Improvement Act the acquisition might be abandoned in certain circumstances stated in detail in that section. As a matter of fact acquisition was made of about nine cottas only of the land as I have stated above. It appears from the evidence of one Mr. Hay, a partner of the company, that the area in their occupation was approximately two bighas. The new premises to which they removed at 44, Free School Street, were barely one bigha and a half in area. So the acquisition of the small area could not have been a sufficient ground for their removal from their old premises to the new one.

These facts being taken into consideration it can hardly be said that the removal was on account of the acquisition of land giving rise to a right to compensation for change of the place of business.

under the Land Acquisition Act. The learned President has considered the question whether the removal should be on the taking of possession by the Collector or at any previous time. He states that the question is not free from difficulty. But he thought that it would be unreasonable to suppose that the legislature intended that, a person who was residing or carrying on business on land which is acquired would lose all right to compensation for the expenses of his removal unless he waits and stays on the land till the last moment when the Collector comes to take possession. There may be something in what he says. On the other hand it would be unreasonable to suppose that a party can ask for compensation for removal simply upon a declaration having been made if the property is not acquired in the end; or only such a small portion of the land is acquired which would not necessitate the removal of the place of business. In the present case, however, there does not appear to be any reasonable doubt that the premises were vacated not on the ground of its being acquired, but because the company's lease had expired and they were anxious to avoid the expense of carrying on the litigation with regard to ejectment when the company knew that they could not stay on the land beyond a few months only. This is clear from the fact that they did not give notice to the Collector that they were going to vacate the land, but notice was given to the landlord by the letter which I have mentioned before.

It may be mentioned here that the landlord in his plaint in the suit for ejectment stated clearly in para. 10 that he was trying to get the Improvement Trust to release that portion of the premises which was not actually required for the execution of the improvement scheme on receiving a betterment fee from him. The company had full notice of the fact before they vacated the premises that only a small portion of the premises was likely to be acquired and the rest released under the provisions of S. 78, Calcutta Improvement Act, and knowing all that they vacated the premises in January. The removal therefore was not on account of the acquisition. Under these circumstances it must be held that the company was not entitled to receive any compensation under S. 23, Land Acquisition Act for changing their place of business, as this change was not in consequence of the acquisition of the land. In that view it is not necessary to consider whether the respondents are entitled to the amount given or less.

The appeal must therefore be decreed and the order of the Tribunal reversed with costs in both Courts.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a rent suit in respect of some land in the Western Duars in the district of Jalpaiguri. The plaintiff is a jotedar and the defendant is a chukanidar under him. In 1918 the chukani was purchased by the plaintiff in execution of a decree. In Chaitra 1325 (1919) the plaintiff let out the chukani to one Lepta Uraon who executed a kabuliat agreeing to pay Rs. 115 as rent. In 1920 the defendant purchased the land from Lepta Uraon. The plaintiff has brought this suit for rent at the rate of Rs. 115 a year. The defendant has pleaded that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the rent at which he settled the land but at the rate of Rs. 104 odd which is the rent recorded in the settlement record. Both the Courts have accepted the defen-defendant's plea and decreed the suit at the rate admitted by him. There was also a plea of payment. The plaintiff appeals and it is argued on his behalf that the defendant is bound by the engagement entered into by Lepa Uraon (his vendor) and he cannot plead that he is not liable for the rent fixed in Lepa's kabuliati. For the defence it is argued that under the law as it obtains in that part of the country the plaintiff is not entitled to recover more than 50 per cent. of the rent which he himself pays to the Government.

In order to appreciate the value of the respective contentions of the parties it is necessary to trace the history of the Western Duars and of the law in force there. The territory known as the Western Duars was ceded by the Bhutan Government to the British Government in 1866. By Act 16, 1869 (the Bhutan Duars Act) the jurisdiction of the ordinary civil Courts taking cognizance of suits in respect of immovable property, revenue and rent in the territory was excluded and certain rules were framed by the Government which formed the schedule to the Act, which had the force of law there. It was, however, found that the Act of 1869 was defective in many respects and so it was repealed by Act 7, 1895. In 1875 the Scheduled Districts Act (14 of 1874) was declared to be in force in the Western Duars, and Act 23, 1863 (the Act to provide for the claims to waste land) was also extended to the territory. See the Gazette of India of the 24th September 1875. By the repeal of the Act of 1869 the Civil Procedure Code was held to be in force in the Duars : Brojo Kanto Das v. Tufun Das (1). But no substantive law was declared to be in force there except what would be extended under the Scheduled District Act. In 1895 the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal with the previous sanction of the Governor-General extended Act 10, 1859 and Act 5, 1867 (B. C.) to the Western Duars under the Scheduled Districts Act. By a notification dated 5th November 1898 the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal similarly extended under the Scheduled Districts Act the Bengal Tenancy Act to the Western Duars with some restrictions of which the following clause is relevant for our purpose.

Where there is anything in the said Bengal Tenancy Act which is inconsistent with any rights or obligations of a jotedar, chukanidar, dar chukanidar, Adhjar or other tenant of agricultural land as defined in settlement proceedings hereto-for approved by Government or with the terms of a lease hereto-for granted by Government to jotedar, chukanidar, adhjar or other tenant of agricultural land such rights, obligations or terms shall be enforceable notwithstanding anything contained in the said Act.

When the Duars became included in the late province of Eastern Bengal and Assam that Government by a notification dated 7th November 1908 extended under the Scheduled Districts Act the Bengal Tenancy Amendment Act, 1903 and the Eastern Bengal and Assam Tenancy Amendment Act of 1903 to the Duars with some restrictions one of which was the same as contained in the notification of the Bengal Government of 5th November 1898.

After the acquisition of the territory by the British Government there have been periodical settlements by the Government laying down rules to be in force during the settlements. The first settlement was in 1871, but no notice was taken in it of the interest of chukanidars. The second settlement was in 1880 by which the rents payable by chukanidars were fixed for the term of the settlement and the Settlement Officer was authorized to enhance the rents of chukanidars up to 50 per cent. of the revenue. The third settlement, commonly known as Sunder's settlement, was made in 1889 for a period of 15 years under which the rents of the chukanidars were fixed for the term of the settlement on the principle that they should ordinarily pay 50 per cent. above the jotedari rates. The rules laid down by this settlement with occasional modifications have been adopted in subsequent settlements. The Western Duars is governed by the Waste Lands Act and the Bengal Waste Lands Manual 1919 gives the rules under which leases of waste lands in the Western Duars are made. It prescribes the form of leases (which is Form D at p. 32 of the Manual) to be adopted in case of renewal of leases in the Western Duars. The conditions attached to the lease have from time to time been modified and the lease which was granted by the Government to the plaintiff in 1922 contains a clause being Cl. 8 that he shall not be entitled to enhance the rent of the chukanidar more than 50 per cent. of what he himself pays to the Government. The history of the various settlements in the Western Duars and the rules obtaining there will be found in Ch. 8 of the Eastern Bengal and Assam District Gazetteers by Gruning. It is noticeable that Cl. 2, part 1, Ch. 1 of the rules given in the Bengal Waste Lands Manual says that the rules are executive orders not ordinarily framed under any particular law; and one of the rules says that in order to avoid subinfeudation the under-tenants of the jotedars are prohibited to create subordinate tenures and that the civil Courts shall not take cognizance of cases between such parties. The Government thus assumes the right to make laws for the territory.

This being the state of the law in that part of the country, we have to see if the plaintiff is entitled to demand rent under the ordinary law of contract higher than 50 per cent. of his own rent. There can be no doubt that in view of the various enactments which have been passed and the rules framed relating to the Western Duars the Government in that temporarily settled estate has the power to frame rules which have the force of law. The right of the Government to make laws for temporarily settled estates has been reserved by the Bengal Tenancy Act by Ss. 191 and 192. The last clause S. 192 empowers the revenue officer to fix a fair and equitable rent notwithstanding anything contained in the contract between the parties. In such districts which are inhabited by aboriginals the Government has reserved to itself the right to make rules or laws by its executive orders as part of its administrative policy. But it is argued on behalf of the plaintiff that in spite of the restriction in the plaintiff's lease with regard to the amount at which he is entitled to sublet his holding, the defendant is bound by his contract rather the contract made by his vendor:—and in support of this contention reliance has been placed upon the cases of Gour Chandra Saha v Mani Mohan Sen (2), and Zahandar Baksh Mallik v Ram Lal Hazra (3). The above cases came from the districts of Nadia and Hooghly respectively which are permanently settled districts. In these cases the Government let out its Khasmahal and in the kabuliyat which tenants executed in favour of the Government they stipulated that they would not charge from their sub-tenants rents higher than what they paid and 50 per cent. more. The sub-tenants agreed to pay higher rents than what the Government tenants were entitled to claim. The learned Judges held that the contract between the parties was enforceable notwithstanding the clause in the lease which could only be enforced by the Government and not by a sub-tenant. These cases have no application to the present case as they relate to Government Khas mahal in which the position of the Government is that of a private zamindar; whereas in the temporarily settled estates the Government has the right to make rules governing the settlements and its settlement-holders. In a case like the present there is no question of a third party enforcing a contract between two other parties or that the lessee is bound by the terms of his lease, under which he holds the land under his landlord. The Government has settled this land under rules prohibiting subletting at a rate higher than that fixed by the temporary settlement. The question therefore is whether the plaintiff has the right to claim rent more than what he has agreed to receive from a sub-tenant by the terms of the settlement. The rules as they stand do not confer any such right to the plaintiff. The decision of the lower appellate Court is in our opinion correct and this appeal is dismissed with costs.

Mukherji, J.—These four appeals arise out of as many suits that were instituted by the plaintiffs for declaration of title and recovery of possession after demolition of certain huts which stand on the land. The Courts below have found in favour of the plaintiffs on the question of title but being of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to have their possession within 12 years before suit have dismissed the said suits.

The arguments that have been advanced before us on behalf of the plaintiffs who are the appellants in these appeals are directed against the finding of the Subordinate Judge to the effect that the plaintiffs have failed to prove their possession within 12 years and against the reasoning upon which that finding is based. Reading the judgment of the Subordinate Judge it would appear that he, after discussion of a very large number of decisions upon Art. 142 and Art. 141, Lim. Act, came to the conclusion that in the present suits it was Art. 142, that was applicable and that the plaintiffs were to prove their possession of the particular plots with which the suits were concerned within 12 years before the institution thereof. He then proceeds to take into consideration the evidence in the case and records two observations which I think it better to quote in his own words. He says thus :

It was argued that the defence evidence of possession for more than 12 years is quite unsatisfactory, but the weakness of defendant's evidence cannot go to make the plaintiff's evidence strong. It is true that the evidence regarding possession for more than 12 years is not very satisfactory.

He says also :

Even in spite of the unsatisfactory nature of defendant's evidence I must say that it is far better, than that of plaintiff's evidence and on comparison the defendant's evidence becomes acceptable.

As regards these two observations upon which the learned Subordinate Judge based his final conclusion to the effect that the plaintiffs had failed to prove their possession within 12 years before suit, what is said in substance on behalf of the appellants is that the Subordinate Judge omitted to keep in view two important principles that should be borne in mind in determining the question of possession in a case of this nature. These two principles are first, that where evidence of possession on either side is not satisfactory or not quite satisfactory the party who has succeeded in proving his title is entitled to rely upon the presumption that he was in possession and second, that in finding possession in favour of a trespasser the possession that is to be found in his favour is to be limited to the particular portion of the land in respect of which he has succeeded in proving his possession.

As regards the first of these propositions reliance is placed upon the decision in the case of John Clark v. G. H. D. Elphinstone, L. R. House of Lords (1), in which it has been laid down that, with regard to land lying within defined boundaries the rule to apply on the question of possession is to assume that the acts of possession done upon one part of the land should be taken as showing possession of the person doing such acts in respect of the whole land. There can possibly be no dispute whatsoever as regards the correctness of this proposition. But in a case in which the plaintiff alleged that the lands are capable of being possessed by the exercise of acts of possession and where, as here, it is also alleged that the possession that was exercised was by receiving rents from the tenants who were actually in occupation of the land, to such a case this presumption will hardly apply until and unless the plaintiff has succeeded in showing that he has been in possession by realization of rent from tenants who are actually in occupation of at least a part of the land. This is not a case in which it was alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs that the land was waste or incapable of being possessed or that it was khas patit land of the plaintiffs. The definite case that was set up was that there were tenants on the land from whom rents used to be realized, and both the Courts below have upon the evidence refused to accept that case as established. They have referred to the fact that the collection papers etc., have not been produced and have decreed that the evidence brought forward for the purpose of proving that the plaintiffs' tenants were in occupation of the land was not satisfactory. It would not, in our opinion, be right to proceed upon any presumption of the character mentioned above in a case where actual and not mere constructive possession was the case that was put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs. It has been argued in this connexion that the presumption that should be relied upon is that possession follows title. That undoubtedly is a maxim that has got sometimes to be applied. It should, however, be remembered that the maxim does not mean that because a person has title to some property therefore necessarily he is in possession of it. What it actually meant is that if at one time a man with title was in possession of property the law allows the presumption that possession continued. In this particular case as far as can be made out from the finding of the Courts below, it does not appear that the plaintiffs have succeeded in establishing that at any point of time they were in possession. Indeed, there was no statement in the plaint as to when the plaintiffs were dispossessed and no attempt was made in the evidence to show that at any particular time the plaintiffs were dispossessed. We are accordingly of opinion that the appellants are not entitled to rely upon the presumption of the description mentioned above and that the first of these contentions must necessarily fail.

As regards the question whether the possession of the trespasser should be taken as being possession of a particular plot of land in respect of which he has succeeded in proving that possession there can hardly be any dispute. But before the defendant can be called upon to show that he was in possession the plaintiff in a case under Art. 142, Lim. Act, will have to prove his possession within 12 years before suit. Upon the findings of the Courts below the plaintiffs have failed in this respect.

Turning now to the facts that have been found in the present case in disproof of the plaintiff's possession within 12 years before suit it is necessary to refer to the arguments that have been advanced before us on behalf of the appellants. It has been said that between Abdul Razak who is said to be the landlord under whom the defendants claim to hold these lands and the plaintiffs there was a previous litigation being Title Suit 71 of 1921 in which Abdul Razak was unsuccessful in recovery of possession from the plaintiffs in respect of a part of the plot of 3 bighas of land to which the bits of land involved in the present suits appertain. It is also said that some rent suit or rent suits instituted by Abdul Razak against some of the tenants occupying some lands out of the plot were either dismissed or withdrawn. It has been further brought to our notice that a portion of the land was some time in the year 1916 made over by one of the plaintiffs to the Municipality, and our attention has also been drawn to the fact that in the partition that took place between the plaintiffs themselves this plot of land was reserved as ejmali and was not partitioned, the object being that it would thereafter be used for the purpose of excavating a tank for the use of the public. These facts even if they have all been established though it must be said with regard to some of them that they have not been established in the opinion of the Courts below, specially as regards the land that had been made over to the Municipality being part of this land, all these facts would not be decisive of actual possession in respect of any part of the lands which form the subject matter of these suits. This a matter which the plaintiffs had to prove and which in the opinion of the Courts below they have failed to prove. The finding of both the Courts below as to why the land was not partitioned but was kept ejmali at the time of the partition is that none of the individual cosharers liked to get the land in respect of which the cosharers were really out of possession. That again is a finding of fact with which we cannot interfere in second appeal. There are other matters referred to in the judgment of the learned Munsif against the plaintiffs' case as to possession, e.g., evidence of the supervisor of the Garden Reach Municipality, the inference to be drawn from the non-examination of the Partition Commissioner, etc., and although they have not been repeated in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge we may take it that the Subordinate Judge intended to affirm those findings as his was a judgment of affirmance. We are of opinion that on the whole the finding on the question of plaintiff's possession at which the Courts below have arrived need not be disturbed in those appeals.

The appeals accordingly are dismissed with costs.

Judgment—This is an appeal by defendant 1 in a suit which was for a declaration of the plaintiff's title as an occupancy-raiyat to certain land and for recovery of possession. The superior interest of the occupancy holding is held at present by defendant 1 who acquired it from his wife some time in the month of May 1923. Defendant 2, the wife of defendant 1, purchased that interest from the previous holder, Hari Mohan, by a conveyance dated 23rd October 1922. One Kuti Molla was the raiyat in occupation of the land at the time of the purchase of the superior interest by defendant 2. Kuti Molla having defaulted in the payment of rent Hari Mohan had instituted against him a suit for arrears of rent and had obtained a decree. This decree was put into execution by Hari Mohan after the date of the sale of the superior interest to defendant 2 and in execution of the decree Hari Mohan had caused the tenancy to be brought to sale on the 25th April 1923. The plaintiff was the purchaser at that sale. When defendant 2 purchased Hari Mohan's interest her husband, defendant 1, dispossessed Kuti Molla and took khas possession of the land. The plaintiff, after his purchase, finding that he could not obtain possession brought the suit out of which this appeal arises. Both the Courts below have decreed the suit, and hence this appeal.

The question which arose was whether or not the sale at which the plaintiff purchased the land was one governed by the provisions of Ch. 14, Ben. Ten. Act. The learned lower appellate Court following the decision in the case of Manindra Nath Ghose v. Asutosh Ghose (1) held that, as Hari Mohan had been the landlord at the date of the decree, the fact that he was no longer the landlord at the date of the execution of that decree did not affect the application of the provisions of Ch. 14. This finding of the lower appellate Court has been assailed here. The law on the subject of the right of decree-holders to sell tenancies with all the privileges attached to sales under the provisions of Ch. 14, Ben. Ten. Act, is laid down in the ruling of the Judicial Committee in the case of Forbes v. Maharaj Bahadur Singh (2). Their Lordships have laid down there that in order to attract the provisions of that chapter it is necessary that the decree-holder should hold the position of a landlord not merely at the time of the decree but also at the time of the application for execution. This decision is binding upon us and it is not open to us to hold any other view with regard to the law on the subject. We must take it that the decision in the case of Manindra Nath Ghose v. Ashutosh Ghose (1) was on the particular facts of that particular case. The effect, therefore, according to our finding, of the sale by Hari Mohan of Kuti Molla's interest was to transfer not the tenancy as a tenancy but merely the right, title and interest which Kuti Molla had had. Such being the case, it would have been necessary for the plaintiff in order to succeed to establish that the right that Kuti Molla had held was transferable. No attempt having been made to prove this transferable right the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed.

The result is that the appeal is allowed, the decrees of the Courts below are set aside and the plaintiff's suit dismissed with costs in all Courts.

Criminal Appeal No. 390 of 1928, Decided on 3rd August 1928.

Criminal P. C., S. 297—Charge should be accurate and within the limits of the criminal trial.

It is essential that in the general observations which a Judge makes in the course of his charge to the jury he should be accurate and within the limits of what has always been allowed from time to time in criminal trials. The verdict of the jury should not be interfered with except where the charge taken as a whole cannot be supported [P 770 C 2, P 771 C 1]

The passage in the charge to the jury ran as follows: "As there is a presumption of innocence in favour of the accused, so there is a presumption of truthfulness in favour of the witnesses. The presumption is rebutted if it is shown that the witness has told an untruth. But that would not justify you in rejecting his evidence in toto. You will have to carefully scrutinize his evidence and should accept it only to the extent to which it is supported by the evidence of other trustworthy witnesses and circumstances and probabilities of the case."

Held: that the language of the learned Judge may lead to misconstruction and he should not have put together the presumption of innocence in favour of an accused and the presumption in favour of the veracity of testimony adduced in a Court of justice. The two presumptions are in their nature different and should not be classed together in the manner in which it has been done by the learned Judge in this instance.

Sures Chunder Talukdar and Surajit Chunder Lahuri—for Appellant.

Khundkar—for the Crown.

C. C. Ghose, J.—This case has been argued at considerable length by the learned advocate, Mr. Talukdar, but after giving our best consideration to the arguments which have been advanced on behalf of the appellant we are of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed and for the following reasons:

The case for the prosecution, shortly stated, was as follows: On the afternoon of 3rd October 1927, the deceased Kala Mia found two heads of cattle belonging to the accused Ambar Ali straying into his field just to the north of the bari of the accused and damaging his paddy crop. He took them into custody with the object of impounding them and refused to let them off at the request of the accused Ambar Ali. After some altercation the accused is said to have struck him on the head with a lathi. Almost simultaneously Ambar's nephew Abdul Aziz who is not an accused in this case gave a blow on his head with a dao, with the result that he fell down unconscious on the field. He was removed to an ail by some of the men who came to the spot on hearing the row and was ultimately taken to Feni in a bullock cart. He died shortly before sunrise when the cart reached Feni. His dead body was taken to the thana at Feni and the deceased's brother Mohamed Faiz made a statement before the Sub-Inspector of Feni as to the cause of death. The statement in question was sent to the Sub-Inspector, Chhagalnaya, for investigation, as the place of occurrence was stated to be within the jurisdiction of the last-mentioned thana. The post mortem examination was held by the Sub Assistant Surgeon of Feni and it was found that the cause of the death was a blow on the head by means of a blunt weapon such as a lathi. Investigation followed thereafter with the result that the accused Ambar Ali and two other men, Muja Mia and Nural Huq, were sent up for trial.

The accused Ambar Ali has been convicted by the jury under Part I, S. 304, I. P. C. The learned Judge was of opinion that the conviction should properly have been under the second part of S. 304; and taking that view he has sentenced the accused Ambar Ali to suffer rigorous imprisonment for a period of five years and to pay a fine of Rs. 200 or in default, to suffer rigorous imprisonment for one year more. He has also directed that out of the fine, if realized, a sum of Rs. 150 should be paid to the heirs of the deceased Kala Mia as compensation.

The learned Judge's charge to the jury has been assailed before us in one particular. The passage in the charge to which exception has been taken runs as follows;

As there is a presumption of innocence in favour of the accused, so there is a presumption of truthfulness in favour of the witnesses. The presumption is rebutted if it is shown that the witness has told an untruth. But that would not justify you in rejecting his evidence in toto. You will have to carefully scrutinize his evidence and should accept it only to the extent to which it is supported by the evidence of other trustworthy witnesses and circumstances and probabilities of the case.

The learned advocate starts off with the broad proposition that it is entirely incorrect to say that there is a presumption of truthfulness in favour of witnesses; in other words, he contends that there is no presumption whatsoever in favour of the veracity of testimony adduced in Court. So far as this contention is concerned, we have been at some pains to find out whether the contention has any substance or not. It appears that from very early times it has always been laid down in England that testimony given in a Court of justice is presumed to be true until the contrary appears. Reference may be made in this connexion to S. 352 of the well-known work of Best on Evidence. The passage in Best is reproduced by Woodroffe, J., in his edition of the Indian Evidence Act (Edn 8) at p. 795 with approval. It also appears that the view now sought to be put forward by the learned advocate was the subject of consideration in this Court in Criminal Appeal No. 607 of 1926, decided by Cuming, J., and Graham, J., on 21st February 1927. The learned

Judges in that case accepted the view enunciated in Best on Evidence; and they were of opinion that there was no authority which took a view contrary to what was laid down in Best on Evidence. Of course, the learned advocate is right in saying that the way in which the learned Judge in this case has put it is open to exception. The language of the learned Judge may lead to misconstruction and in our opinion he should not have put together the presumption of innocence in favour of an accused and the presumption in favour of the veracity of testimony adduced in a Court of justice. The two presumptions are in their nature different and should not be classed together in the manner in which it has been done by the learned Judge in this instance.

The learned advocate further contends that the learned Judge was in error in saying that the presumption, if any, in favour of the veracity of testimony adduced in a Court of justice can only be rebutted if it is shown that the witness in question has told an untruth and argues that the presumption can be rebutted in various other ways, e. g., by showing that the witness was a person who was not disinterested, that the witness' demeanour in Court was such as was not calculated to inspire confidence; that he was keeping back something which it was in his power to impart. One of the arts of the cross-examiner in a trial is to show that little credit can be attached to the testimony of a witness, and the cross-examiner, if he is skilful and accomplished, does that not only, if I may quote a common expression, by means of a direct attack but by means of eliciting from the witness' mouth answers calculated to show that the witness is not a person who has spoken the truth.

But the real question is whether the jury were prejudiced or misled by what the learned Judge said in this case in the course of his charge to the jury. We have examined the charge with care and we are bound to say that we can discover no traces whatsoever in this record of the jury having been misled in any way by what the learned Judge stated in the course of his charge to the jury. It is no doubt essential that in the general observations which a Judge makes in the course of his charge to the jury he should be accurate and within the limits of what has always been allowed from time to time in criminal trials. The learned Judge's charge to the jury can no doubt be criticized, but the verdict of the jury ought not to be interfered with except where the charge taken as a whole cannot be supported. In this view of the matter we think this appeal must fail.

Mr. Talukdar has, however, addressed to us an argument in mitigation of the sentence passed on the accused in this case. The sentence that the learned Judge passed in this case shows that he has taken into his full consideration everything that could legitimately be urged on behalf of the accused; and as that sentence does not err on the side of severity, we think we ought not to interfere in any way with the learned Judge's order in this case.

The result is that this appeal must stand dismissed.

Judgment.—In this case the facts involved shortly stated are as follows: On the night of 20th September last there was some altercation between the deceased

Anu and the accused Momin over the latter beating the deceased's brother Hamid in the course of the day. On the following morning when Anu was near his cowshed the altercation was renewed and it was alleged that Momin stabbed Anu on the side with a knife. People gathered at the scene of occurrence and Anu's brother Mayur hastened for the dafadar of the village. The dafadar took him to the Assistant Sub-Inspector Prafulla Mohan who was in the neighbourhood of Bashdi Bazar investigating into another case. Mayur, it is said, made a statement to Prafulla which Prafulla recorded. The Assistant Sub-Inspector came to the place with Mayur but found that Anu was already dead. It appears that before the Assistant Sub-Inspector arrived at the scene of occurrence another brother of the deceased had started for the thana to lodge a formal complaint of death. The information that was given to the Assistant Sub-Inspector Prafulla in the neighbourhood of the Bashdi Bazar has been tendered in evidence in this case and has been marked Ex. (1). The information lodged at the thana by the brother of the deceased had already been tendered in evidence and had been marked Ex. (A). Now it appears that the learned Judge in the course of his charge to the jury advised the jury that the statement of the brother of the deceased at the thana could not be regarded as the first information report or accepted in evidence because the information of the occurrence itself had already been given to the Assistant Sub-Inspector Prafulla in the neighbourhood of Bashdi Bazar and that the last mentioned information was to be treated as the first information.

Now the learned counsel who appears for the appellant has argued that the Judge was in error in telling the jury that Ex. (A) could not be treated as the first information report and accepted in evidence because of the fact that Ex. I was to be treated as the first information report. The learned counsel argued that if one looks at the terms of S. 154, Criminal P. C., it is abundantly clear that the information such as it was which was recorded in the mofussil by the Assistant Sub-Inspector Prafulla could not be treated as the first information report because he was not the officer-in-charge of the police station in fact or within the meaning of the expression as defined in S. 4, Criminal P. C. Therefore, it is argued that the information if any, which was recorded by Prafulla could not be treated at all as the first information report and there was no reason whatsoever in rejecting Ex. A as being the first information report duly lodged at the thana by the brother of the deceased.

Various other points were taken. But it is only necessary to notice one and that is that there is no reference whatsoever in the learned Judge's charge to the jury to the material portions of the evidence of Omar Talukdar, specially the cross-examination of Omar, P. W. 5. We think the learned counsel's first point is a sound one and must be given effect to. It is common ground that the Assistant Sub-Inspector was not the officer-in-charge of the police station at the time when he recorded the information which had been given to him and which information is marked as Ex. I in the case. It is also clear that he cannot be regarded as the officer-in-charge of the police station because there is no evidence to show that the officer-in-charge of the police station at the time with which we are concerned was unable to perform his duties as such. In other words Prafulla does not come within the meaning of the expression "officer-in-charge of the police station" as defined in S. 4, Criminal P. C. He had, therefore, no authority whatsoever to record the information which was given to him as the first information in the case. In the circumstances, there is no other alternative but to hold that the learned Judge was in error when he advised the jury to put aside Ex. A, it being a document later in point of time. But it was in fact the first information report lodged at the thana in accordance with the provisions of S. 154 of the Code. This was a serious misdirection and although we are not unmindful of the argument which was addressed to us by the learned Deputy Legal Remembrancer that no prejudice was caused to the accused by the way in which the jury was advised with reference to the competitive contents of the two documents, we are unable to hold that the error into which the Judge fell was of such an insignificant character that it should not induce us to interfere with the verdict of the jury. On the contrary we are of opinion that the error is a serious one and it is impossible to say that the jury was not misled. If one looks into the contents of the two documents, Ex. A and Ex. I one finds that in Ex. A there are mentioned the names of three witnesses and that in Exhibit I there are mentioned in addition to the name of Leakat who is mentioned in Ex. A the names of other witnesses specially of those who are described as the eyewitnesses of the occurrence. It is possible that the jury did come to the conclusion that the oral evidence in the case has received a certain amount of corroboration by reason of the fact of the mention of the names of the two persons who are described as the eyewitnesses in Ex. I itself. One does not know but it is possible that such a view might have been taken by the jury, and if such a view was really taken then it was a matter calculated to prejudice the interests of the accused. We think in all the circumstances of the case that it is safer that we should interfere with the verdict of the jury and direct a retrial.

The other circumstance to which reference has been made, namely, the non-mention of the material portions of the evidence of P. W. 5, specially what is elicited in his cross-examination is also a circumstance which should be taken into consideration. But if it stood by itself we should have hesitated to interfere with the verdict of the jury. But we think that on the first ground the appellant is entitled to ask us to interfere with the verdict.

We accordingly set aside the verdict of the jury and direct retrial by the Sessions Judge of Mymensingh.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 9—R. 13—Scope.

Court has discretion independently of O. 9, R. 13. [P 775 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C., O. 9, R. 13—Original Side—Negligence proved—Case can be restored.

Where there is even an element of negligence, the Court on the original side may restore the suit upon proper terms.

As a rule the case is not to be restored unless there be sufficient cause for the party not being ready to go on with the case when the case came before the Court. But on the original side at all events, the terms of R. 13 do not prevent the Court where there is an element of negligence from restoring the suit upon proper terms. [P 771 C 9]

J. N. Mazumdar—for Respondent

Rankin, C. J—This is an appeal from a judgment of Buckland, J. whereby he refused to restore a suit which was decreed ex parte. It appears that a newspaper of which defendant 1 was the editor and the present appellant defendant 2 was the printer published an article on 27th July 1926 referring to the plaintiff. The plaintiff says that the article is defamatory and, on 8th November 1926, he brought a suit for damages against the editor and the printer. On 6th December, summons was served upon the printer. It appears to have been established that the summons was not served upon the editor. The printer says that he handed over the summons to be attended to by the manager of the newspaper but that owing to the fact that the summons was not served on the editor or owing to some independent negligence, the manager took no steps, though he had promised to do so, to have the suit defended on the part of the printer. It is necessary that it should be understood what happened upon this default. Under the rules of the original side, a person served with a summons is required to enter an appearance in the office of the Court. That is an act which does not require his personal attendance and it does not involve his appearing before the Court himself with or without his witnesses. If he does not enter appearance within the time limited, the case will go into what is called the undefended list; and, when the case is on the undefended list, it is not possible for the defendant, without obtaining leave, to enter appearance. He has a limited right to cross-examine witnesses adduced on behalf of the plaintiff if he appears at the time when the undefended case is down for hearing; but his position is that of a man who for not entering appearance in time is precluded from defending the suit, whether he appears at the hearing or does not appear at the hearing. A similar form of procedure is applicable to a cause where a person has entered appearance but has made default in the filing of his written statement and again in the case of a person who has failed to obtain leave to defend in a suit on a negotiable instrument under O 37, Civil P. C. In the present case, no appearance was entered. The suit came on the undefended list on 3rd January 1927 and the minute shows what took place before the Court on that occasion. Learned counsel Mr J. B. Sen, when the plaintiff had given his evidence in part appeared and represented to the Court that the writ had not been served on defendant 1, the editor, and he asked that the case might stand over to enable defendant 1 to enter appearance. I should have explained that this case came on the undefended list on the footing that both these defendants had been served and both had made default in entering appearance. It was being heard, therefore, against both as an undefended suit. Mr. Sen stated in reply to the Court that he had not yet been instructed on behalf of defendant 1. Whether this means that Mr. Sen by that time was instructed on behalf of the present appellant is not quite clear.

The Court refused Mr. Sen's application for time holding that he had no locus standi. That, of course, was quite correct. A person who is not allowed to enter appearance cannot employ an attorney or counsel to appear on his behalf except possibly for a limited purpose specially provided for. Under these circumstances, a decree for Rs. 7500 for damages was passed against both the defendants. Then the editor applied to have the decree set aside as against him and he succeeded in his application—ostensibly on the ground that the writ of summons was not served on him. The printer applied on 18th January 1927 to have the decree set aside so far as he was concerned and the learned Judge has refused that application holding that, as he was served on 6th December, the negligence of the manager—his failure to provide for the defence of the suit—was not a "sufficient cause" within the meaning of O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C. He has held further that this case is not one within the concluding proviso to that rule. On that, the printer brings this appeal.

It would appear from the judgment of Buckland, J. that the plaintiff said that he did not oppose the application of the editor to have the suit restored as against him because that he wanted him to have an opportunity of putting in a plea of justification. The position, therefore, is that the plaintiff, according to him, is anxious to fight out this question with the editor but desires that the judgment against the printer should stand in any event. I have some difficulty in seeing that this course is either reasonable or heroic and in my opinion, it is necessary for us to consider whether this Court is bound either to affirm that there is "sufficient cause" within the meaning of O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C. or to refuse to set aside the decree.

In my judgment, O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C., is directed in terms to a different practice from that which obtains on the original side of the High Court and was followed in this case. It refers to the case which is the usual case in a mofussil Court where a summons has gone to a defendant informing him that on a given date the case will come on before the Court for hearing or for settlement of issues. The ordinary practice under O. 5 and the forms in the schedule to the Code sufficiently elucidate that. In the mofussil therefore the question arises in the form whether or not the defendant was prevented by "sufficient cause" from appearing when the suit was called on for hearing. In the High Court, the question is whether or not the defendant has entered an appearance in the office. If he has not entered an appearance within a certain time, then his right to enter appearance comes to an end upon the suit being sent to the undefended list in the absence of leave from a Judge. It does seem to me that there are many cases in the High Court where the mere fact that the plaintiff himself or the defendant himself was unable personally to attend on the day of the hearing would be no excuse at all because there are many cases in which the party is not a necessary witness and in which he was really intending to present his case by the assistance of a attorney and counsel. I am unable to hold that the exact words of R. 13, O. 9, are to be applied on the footing that they are directly applicable under the rules of the original side and that they are exhaustive. It has been the general practice on the original side to follow the analogy of R. 13, O. 9, on general principles of justice. As a rule the case will not be restored unless there be sufficient cause for the party not being ready to go on with the case when the case came before the Court. But on the original side at all events, the terms of R. 13, do not prevent the Court where there is an element of negligence from restoring the suit upon proper terms. My own view is that the main purpose of R. 13, O. 9, is to give a right to a party who could show sufficient cause to get a restoration on certain terms independently of having to make a plea to the mercy of the Court. The words are "the Court shall make an order setting aside the decree as against him upon such terms as to costs, payment into Court or otherwise as it thinks fit"; I am not prepared to hold that the Court is deprived by this rule of its discretion in a case like the present. If the matter is a question of discretion to be exercised on terms, I have a clear opinion that this would be a proper case in which to set aside the decree as against the printer.

It is quite clear that there is an absurdity if this judgment should go against the printer and the editor should be held not liable in respect of the same publication. Moreover, in the case of the printer of a newspaper, it does not seem to be reasonable that, in a question of this kind, he should go to the manager and request the manager to undertake the whole of the defence. It is true that when he does so, he is in some sense responsible as having entrusted the manager on his behalf to look after the case. But it may be a great hardship to a printer in a case of this kind who honestly relies upon the manager doing this duty as, indeed, he has promised to do, to find a judgment of Rs. 7,500 against him on the ground that this does not amount to "sufficient cause" and that the Court is powerless to rescind the decree. Nothing that I have said is to be regarded in any way as pronouncing an opinion to the effect that in cases coming from the mofussil from Courts to which R. 13, O. 9, Civil P. C., in its terms applies the 13th rule is not to be regarded as—exhaustive. Nor do I propose to define "sufficient cause". These questions may be left open for the purposes of the present case. Nor am I saying that what the learned Judge has said about S. 151, Civil P. C., is not well founded. It may be that, as a rule, S. 151 is wrongly invoked in cases which are covered by special legislation. I confine myself to the application of the principle of this rule to the very different practice that prevails on the original side of this High Court. I am not satisfied that the traditional view that the Court has a discretion independently of O. 9, R 13, is wrong, and, in my judgment, this is a case in which the appeal should be allowed. At the same time the reason of default is a reason which must be attributed to the appellant and, in my judgment, he ought to pay the costs both before Buckland, J., and before this Court.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Capital Sentence Case No. 15 of 1928 and Criminal Appeal No. 519 of 1928, Decided on 9th August 1928.

(a) Penal Code, S. 302—Usual practice is not to accept the plea of guilty and the Court may and should take evidence as if the accused is not guilty—Criminal trial.

The trial of an accused person does not necessarily end if he pleads guilty but evidence may and should be taken in cases of murder as if the plea had been one of not guilty and case decided upon the whole of the evidence including the accused's plea. It is not in accordance with the usual practice to accept a plea of guilty in a case where the natural sequence would be a sentence of death : 8 Bom. L. R. 240 ; 19 All. 119 ; and 19 Bom. L. R. 356 ; Ref. [P 776 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 271—Court has discretion to enter upon evidence or not where accused pleads guilty.

Section 271, though it directs that the plea shall be recorded, does not direct that the accused shall be convicted thereon, but only that he may be so convicted. It is left to the discretion of the presiding Judge in each particular case to determine whether in spite of the plea it is or is not desirable to enter upon the evidence. [P 776 C 1]

C. C. Ghose, J.—The accused in this case was committed to take his trial in the Sessions Court under two charges, one under S. 302, I. P. C., for having committed murder by causing the death of his wife, Ohati Bibi, and secondly, for having attempted to commit suicide by cutting his throat and thereby committing an offence under S. 309, I. P. C. In the committing Magistrate's Court there were no less than ten witnesses for the prosecution. It appears that when the charges were read and explained to the accused he pleaded guilty in the committing Magistrate's Court. The occurrence in question took place on 6th September 1927 ; the commitment was made on 2nd April 1928 and the trial in the Sessions Court took place on 18th June 1928. It appears that in the Sessions Court the charge under S. 309, I. P. C., was not pressed, but on the charge under S. 302, I. P. C., being read and explained to the accused, the latter pleaded guilty. The accused was thereupon convicted under S. 302 and sentenced to death, without the jury having been empanelled and evidence in support of the prosecution being placed before the jury. The learned Judge, Mr. D. Vaughan Stevens, in his judgment observes as follows :

The accused Basaruddin Mohammad stands charged under S. 302 ; I. P. C. with causing the death of his wife, Ohati, by cutting her throat.

He pleaded guilty in the lower Court and pleads guilty here. The charge was thoroughly explained to him and I am satisfied that he clearly understands it.

It is clear from the evidence of the doctor recorded in the lower Court that the accused intended to kill the woman. There was no eyewitness, but I see from the evidence given in the lower Court that he pointed to himself as the murderer when the witnesses appeared.

No motive is given in the evidence in which indeed it is said that the accused became mad and killed his wife. Accused's brother says accused had become mad before the occurrence, but this is not entirely borne out by the F. I. R. which says that for some time the accused had been threatening his wife saying that she had taken another man because the accused had become mad. Immediately after the occurrence the accused attempted to cut his own throat. There is nothing to show that the accused is not normal at the present time.

I cannot conclude from those materials that this accused was not at the time able to understand the nature of his act, or that it was wrong or contrary to law. In fact he seems to have realized it clearly. In those circumstances I can see no reason why the plea of guilty should not be accepted and I have no option but to pass the extreme sentence.

We desire to observe that we cannot too strongly impress upon the learned Sessions Judge that in cases under S. 302, I.P.C., it is undesirable to accept a plea of guilty and to bring the trial to an end thereon. The trial of an accused person does not necessarily end if he pleads guilty but evidence may and should be taken in cases of murder as if the plea had been one of not guilty and the case decided upon the whole of the evidence including the accused's plea. It is not in accordance with the usual practice to accept a plea of guilty in a case where the natural sequence would be a sentence of death: see in this connexion Emperor v. Chinia Bhika (1), Queen v. Bhadu (2), Laxmya Shiddppa v. Emperor (3). S. 271, Criminal P. C., though it directs that the plea shall be recorded does not direct that the accused shall be convicted thereon, but only that he may be so convicted, that is to say, it is left to the discretion of the presiding Judge in each particular case to determine whether in spite of the plea it is or is not desirable to enter upon the evidence. As was observed in the last mentioned case:

the question is, assuming that the appellant is guilty of the murder in question, whether the sentence of death should or should not be enforced. Now that is a question which could only be answered when the circumstances of the crime are known to us and the circumstances of this crime are not known to us.

In this case the First Report contains an allegation by the brother of the accused to the effect that the accused while in a state of insanity killed his wife and cut his own throat. There was therefore all the more reason why evidence should have been gone into and the case placed before a jury. We must therefore set aside the conviction and sentence and direct that the case must go back in order that there may be a proper trial of the accused in accordance with the provisions laid down in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Let the record be returned at once.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case, it appears that a certain sum of money was due under a mortgage decree for sale. The final decree had been passed and that decree, it now appears contrary to what the trial Court thought, did provide in the usual way for subsequent interest. Now, the sale was going to be held in February. In the previous December, it appears that the mortgagor went to his creditor and asked what amount was due. He was given a certain sum as due and he paid that sum. He then went some days afterwards to a pleader and asked the pleader to find out what, exactly was due and he came to the conclusion that he had overpaid by a sum of Rs. 195 or thereabout. The calculation made by the pleader seems not to have allowed any subsequent interest. It was probably based upon the amount stated in the sale proclamation. However that may be, the mortgagor brings his suit before the Munsif; that is, in another

Court than the Court in which the mortgage suit was being tried. He alleges amongst other things that the defendant had taken the excess sum from him by fraud and the word "cheating" is actually to be found in the plaint. If he had not done that, then he would have had just as good a cause of action and the present appeal would not have been maintainable. But, in view of the terms of Art. 35, Cl. (ii), Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, it appears to me that the case made in the plaint obliges us to entertain this appeal. I think that all the more because both the lower Courts, so far as I can see, have found that the defendant took this sum fraudulently. The language of the Munsif in this respect is this:

The defendants have failed to show that they were entitled to any sum in excess of Rs. 1,419-4-0 as in the sale proclamation. I accordingly find that a sum of Rs. 195-12-0 was fraudulently realized by the defendants in excess and so they did not mention the amount received in the receipt Ex. 1.

In the same way, the lower appellate Court states without giving any reason "the defendants obtained the excess money under false representation." But from the beginning to the end there appears to be no representation except that that was the amount due under the decree. In these circumstances, both the lower Courts having found fraud and fraud having been charged in the plaint, I am not prepared to say that this case does not come within the exception and I am, therefore, of opinion that we may entertain this appeal.

The next point is whether this suit brought in another Court was bad by reason of S. 47, Civil P. C. That section says that all questions relating to satisfaction, execution or discharge of a decree are to be dealt with by the executing Court. In my opinion, this is a question of that character; and, in two cases, Abdul Karim v. Islamunnisa Bibi (1) and Ganpat Rao v. Anand Rao (2), it seems to me that it has been so held. These were both cases where it was said that land or money had been taken in excess. In my judgment, S. 47 is not evaded merely by interlarding the application with epithets such as fraud, cheating &c. This was essentially a case where the plaintiff, if he had been properly advised, would have applied under S. 47, Civil P. C. to the Subordinate Judge's Court and asked for the refund of the money simply on the ground that he had over-paid that money, or that it was money paid in excess. It was entirely unnecessary on his part to make charges of cheating, fraud or anything of the kind.

That being so, it seems to me that this suit was altogether incompetent. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed and the suit dismissed with costs in all the Courts.

(a) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 153—'Amount claimed' includes not only statutory interest at 12½% and statutory damages but even 75% interest if agreed.

The amount claimed in the suit can be read so as to include interest at a high contractual rate such as 75 per cent. A claim for statutory interest at 12½ per cent. under S. 67, Bengal Tenancy Act, or a claim for statutory damages not exceeding 25 per cent. on the amount decreed as provided for by S. 63 of the Act, are ordinary incidents of a rent suit and must be taken into consideration in ascertaining for the purposes of S. 153 whether the amount claimed in the suit does not exceed Rs. 100. [P 778 C 2]

* (b) Civil P. C., S. 11—Matter directly and substantially in issue, where not an abstract question of law but a mixed question of fact and law, is res judicata.

Matter directly and substantially in issue in the former suit, namely whether one of the terms upon which a party held his ryoti is that he is liable to pay 75 per cent. per annum interest on arrears of rent, is res judicata, whether in deciding it, error was on a point of fact or on a point of law. Though, in order to decide whether the terms of the party's tenancy include a valid and binding term to the effect that he should pay interest on arrears of rent at 75 per cent. per annum in accordance with the kabuliati, the former Court had to consider questions of law as well as questions of fact, the matter is not an abstract question of law. [P 780 C 1, 2]

(c) Civil P. C., S. 11—Alteration of law by subsequent decisions—Different interpretation of law by judicial decision does not affect the principle of res judicata but legislature might affect it: 32 Cal. 749, Overruled.

Even where law has been since determined to be otherwise by judicial decision, the rights of parties decided upon prior law remain unaffected. The legislature by statute may alter the rights of parties and when it does so, it makes such provision as it thinks proper to prevent injustice. Courts of law are in no way authorized to alter the rights of parties since they profess, at all events, to ascertain the law. If the binding character of a decision upon a concrete question as to the terms of particular holding is to fluctuate with every alteration in the current of authority, the Courts will become an instrument for the unsettlement of rights rather than for the ascertainment thereof: 32 Cal. 749, Overruled: 10 Cal. 1087, Foll. [P 780 C 2; P 781 C 1]

 (d) Civil P. C., S. 11—Question of law—Res judicata does not depend on correctness of decision—Section does not deal with points or points of law—Decision is binding and not the reasoning.

The question whether decision is correct or erroneous has no bearing upon the question whether it operates or does not operate as res judicata. For this purpose, it is not true that a point of law is always open to a party. S. 11, Civil P. C., says nothing about causes of action, a phrase which always requires careful handling. Nor does the section say anything about points or points of law. or pure points of law. Questions of law are of all kinds and cannot be dealt with as though they were the same. Questions of procedure, questions affecting jurisdiction, question of limitation, may all be questions of law. In any case in which it is found that the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in the former suit and has been heard and finally decided by such Court, the principle of res judicata is not to be ignored merely on the ground that the reasoning, whether in law or otherwise of the previous decision, can be attacked on a particular point. What is made conclusive between the parties is the decision of the Court and the reasoning of the Court is not necessarily the same thing as its decision. The object of the doctrine of res judicata is not to fasten upon parties special principles of law as applicable to them inter se, but to ascertain their rights and the facts upon which these rights directly and substantially depend, and to prevent this ascertainment from becoming nugatory by precluding the parties from reopening or recontesting that which has been finally decided. Rankin, C. J.—The present reference to the Full Bench has been made by a Division Bench in a second appeal arising out of a rent suit. Two questions of law have been formulated for our opinion, but under R. 2, Ch. 7 of the appellate side rules, the whole case is submitted to us for final decision.

The first point taken before us was not taken at the hearing before the Division Bench, but as it goes to jurisdiction it must be entertained and decided.

The contention is that no second appeal lies in this case by reason of the provisions of S. 153, Ben Ten. Act. The claim in the suit was (1) for arrears of rent of four years 1327—1330 B. S. at Rs. 16 per annum, i. e., Rs. 64; (2) cess for four years at 8 annas per annum, i. e., Rs. 2; (3) interest on rent in arrear at 75 per cent. per annum, i. e., Rs. 108-2-0, making a total claim of Rs. 174-2-0. The tenant nevertheless contends that the case comes within Cl. (a), S. 153, in that "the amount claimed in the suit does not exceed Rs. 100." The terms of the section are well known:

An appeal shall not lie from any decree or order passed whether in the first instance or in appeal in any suit instituted by a landlord for the recovery of rent where (a) the decree or order is passed by a District Judge, Additional District Judge or Subordinate Judge and the amount claimed in the suit does not exceed Rs. 100 unless the decree or order has decided . . . a question of the amount of rent annually payable by a tenant.

The contention is that the section contemplates a suit "for the recovery of rent" and that "the amount claimed in the suit" cannot be read so as to include interest at a high contractual rate such as 75 per cent. It is conceded that a claim for statutory interest at 12½ per cent. under S. 67, Ben. Ten Act., or a claim for statutory damages not exceeding 25 per cent. on the amount decreed as provided for by S. 68 of the Act, are ordinary incidents of a rent suit and must be taken into consideration in ascertaining for the purposes of S. 153 whether the amount claimed in the suit does not exceed Rs. 100. But it is contended that a claim to interest at 75 per cent. made upon the basis of an agreement evidenced by a kabuliati is not within the contemplation of the section. Reliance is placed upon decisions which hold that the statutory restriction upon appeals cannot be evaded by adding a separate cause of action to the claim for rent.

In my opinion this objection fails. We are here concerned not with the words "a question of the amount of rent annually payable by a tenant" which occur in the clause of exception, but with the words "the amount claimed in the suit" which occur in Cl. (a). Such cases as Kripasindhu v. Jogendra (1) and Koylash Chandra De v. Tarak Nath Mondal (2) are, therefore, not in point. In Jamadar Singh v. Jagat Kishore (3), the plaintiff in addition to the ordinary claim for rent had added as claim for damages for breach of a contract to furnish certain documents. It was held that this claim for damages was not a claim of such a character that it could be added to the claim for rent in order to ascertain the amount claimed in the suit for the purposes of S. 153. The Court, however, was of opinion that "sums ancillary to rent, such as interest on rent in arrears or statutory damages" might require to be taken into consideration before it could be said of a suit for rent that the amount claimed in the suit does not exceed Rs. Rs. 100. In my opinion this is the only reasonable and correct view.

In the present case both rent and interest have been fixed by contract. The claim for interest, if it is to be made at all, must be made in the same suit as the claim for rent. If two separate suits had been brought, one for rent and one for interest, the tenant would not only have had a legitimate grievance but could, in my opinion, have taken advantage of the defence afforded by O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C. The preliminary objection, therefore, fails.

The question at issue before the Division Bench had reference to the claim for interest on arrears of rent at 75 per cent. per annum. This claim was made upon the basis of a kabuliati executed in 1880 by the then tenant, one Sitala Dasi in favour of the predecessor of the plaintiff. In 1898 the plaintiff's predecessor caused this ryoti holding to be sold in execution of a decree for rent and it was purchased at auction by the defendant's father. The plaintiff purchased the superior interest in 1920 and the present suit was brought in 1924 for rent due in respect of the years 1920—23.

In 1915 the plaintiff's predecessor brought a suit against the present defendant for rent and for interest thereon at the rate of 75 per cent. per annum on the basis of the kabuliati of 1880. That suit was contested, inter alia upon the ground that the kabuliati was not valid or binding upon the defendant. In support of this defence it was maintained that Sitala was an ignorant person and not in her right mind, that the contract as to interest was hard and unconscionable and in the nature of a penalty and that the defendant being an auction-purchaser was not bound by its terms, the plaintiff not having caused those terms to be stated in the sale proclamation. The judgment of the Munsif who tried the case discloses all these defences and that they were all overruled. He held that there was no evidence that Sitala Dasi was not in her right mind; he held that there was no obligation upon the landlord to specify in the sale proclamation the rate of interest stipulated for in the event of rent falling into arrear; he held further that as the kabuliati was executed before the passing of the Bengal Tenancy Act the parties were bound by the contract and accordingly that the plaintiff was entitled to get the interest claimed.

No appeal was taken from this decision and it is not contested that the Munsif who tried the suit in 1915 was competent to try the present suit of 1924 within the meaning of S. 11, Civil P. C.

Now, the tenant's only contention in the present case is that the plaintiff is not entitled to get interest at the kabuliati rate. The trial Court rejected this contention on the ground that this very question was concluded by the previous decision. The Additional District Judge reversed this finding and proceeded on the principle that 75 per cent. per annum was an exorbitant and unusual rate of interest and that the obligation to pay it would not pass with the tenancy unless it were publicly notified in the sale proclamation. For this view he regarded the case of Anandamoyi Deby v. Saudamini Debya (4), as an authority. He has brushed aside the contention that the matter is res judicata and has allowed only simple interest at 12½ per cent.

(4) A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 559.

The plaintiff contends in second appeal that the decision in the suit of 1915 as to the rate of interest is conclusive in the present suit.

In my opinion the plaintiff is clearly right. The matter which is "directly and substantially in issue" in this case is the very same that was directly and substantially in issue in the former suit, namely, whether one of the terms upon which this defendant holds his ryoti is that he is liable to pay 75 per cent per annum interest on arrears of rent. In the previous suit the plaintiff's predecessor alleged and the defendant denied that this term was binding upon the defendant. The defendant, in support of his denial, raises the very same contentions which he raises now and certain others. It was held that the term was valid and binding upon him as one of the terms of his tenancy.

In these circumstances, it matters nothing whether the decision was right or wrong and it matters nothing whether the error, if any, was an error on a point of fact or on a point of law. The matter directly and substantially in issue was a sensible and concrete question as to the rights of the parties and the conditions and terms of the defendant's tenancy. To decide it correctly it was necessary to find the facts and to apply the law. If the Munsif did not succeed in ascertaining the exact facts or in applying the law correctly, the remedy of the defendant, if he had a remedy, was to challenge the Munsif's decision in a superior Court. But S. 11, Civil P. C. and the principle which it embodies would be brought to nothing if it were held that it was open to him to litigate again the question of the validity of the terms as to interest, or his obligation to comply with it.

The arguments which have been addressed to us on behalf of the defendant are really three:

In the first place it is said that the Munsif's decision in the previous case was erroneous upon a pure question of law and cannot therefore conclude the matter. The idea seems to be that the matter directly and substantially in issue in the previous suit was a pure question of law and that the doctrine of res judicata would not apply, at all events if it could be made out that the cause of action in the present suit was different from the cause of action in the previous suit. I see nothing but misconception in this line of argument. In order to decide whether the terms of the defendant's tenancy include a valid and binding term to the effect that he should pay interest on arrears of rent at 75 per cent per annum in accordance with the kabuliat of 1880, the Munsif had to consider questions of law as well as questions of fact. But the matter which was directly and substantially in issue, and which was heard and finally decided, was not an abstract question of law. The Munsif decided that the landlord had a right to 75 per cent. per annum and that the tenant was bound to pay it as a term of his holding.

The second contention of the defendant was supported by a reference to the decision in Alimunissa v. Shama Charan (5). The contention is that since the decision in 1915 the law upon the question whether special and unusual terms of tenancy are binding upon an auction-purchaser without any mention in the sale proclamation has been altered by subsequent decisions of the Court, and that as the law has changed in the meantime, the previous decision no longer governs the rights of the parties. The case cited does certainly proceed upon the principle contended for. Maclean, C. J., reasoned thus:

"Cases must be decided upon the law as it stands when judgment is pronounced and not upon what it was at the date of a previous suit the law having been altered in the meantime. It has been conceded that if the law had been altered meanwhile by Statute, the objection (of res judicata) could not prevail. It is difficult to see why it should prevail because the law has been since determined to be otherwise by judicial decision.

In that case it may be noticed, a Full Bench decision had overruled a decision regarded as good law at the time of the previous suit.

Now in the present case I am by no means satisfied that there has been any change in the current of decisions comparable with the change which was considered in the case cited. But I am clearly of opinion that the reasoning which Maclean, C. J., and Holmwood, J., adopted in the case mentioned is erroneous. The legislature by statute, may alter the rights of parties and when it does so, it makes such provision as it thinks proper to prevent injustice. Courts of law are in no way authorized to alter the rights of parties. They profess, at all events, to ascertain the law, and if the binding character of a decision upon a concrete question as to the terms of a particular holding is to fluctuate with every alteration in the current of authority the Courts will become an instrument for the unsettlement of rights rather than for the ascertainment thereof. The principle relied upon is abhorrent to S. 11, Civil P. C. and to the general intention of the doctrine of res judicata. If authority be wanted for its rejection a very plain authority can be found in the case of Gowri Koer v. Audh Kuar (6).

The third point argued for the defendant is that while the previous decision may be conclusive as to the binding character upon the defendant of the stipulation in the kabuliat for interest at 75 per cent. per annum, it is open to the defendant to contend in this appeal that the stipulation, though binding, is a stipulation for a penalty and that it is accordingly open to the Court under S. 74, Contract Act, or the principle embodied therein, to refuse to give judgment for more than a reasonable compensation to the plaintiff for the defendant's failure to pay his rent when due.

It is not impossible that the stipulation in this kabuliat in the absence of evidence showing that 75 per cent per annum is a reasonable or usual rate of interest upon arrears of rent, might be regarded as a stipulation by way of penalty. It has been translated as follows:

In default of kist I shall pay interest at the rate of one anna per rupee per month with the arrears of rent.

I find, however, that this very question was raised in the previous suit and it is reasonably clear to me that the Munsif by his judgment overrules this contention. His view was that the parties were bound by the contract and that the plaintiff was entitled to get the interest claimed. I do not think therefore that this contention can succeed.

For these reasons I am of opinion, that the second appeal to this Court should be allowed, that the decision of the Additional District Judge should be set aside and the decision of the Munsif restored with costs in all the Courts.

It remains now to deal with the two questions formulated by the Division Bench.

These are:

(1) Whether an erroneous decision on a pure question of law operates as res judicata in a subsequent suit where the same question is raised.

(2) Whether the case of Anandameyee Dasi v. Saudamini Debi (4) has been correctly decided.

The second of these questions is a matter of considerable importance but as in my view it does not arise in the present case, I do not think that we ought to express our opinion upon it.

As regards the first question, I am not of opinion that any categorical answer can be given to the question as framed and I do not think that it would be wise for a Full Bench to attempt an exhaustive exposition of all the considerations which are relevant in determining whether a previous decision does or does not operate as res judicata. I think, however, that it may be useful, if it is not exactly necessary, to make the following observations:

(1) The question whether decision is correct or erroneous has no bearing upon the question whether it operates or does not operate as res judicata. The doctrine is that in certain circumstances the Court shall not try a suit or issue but shall deal with the matter on the footing that it is a matter no longer open to contest by reason of a previous decision. In these circumstances it must necessarily be wrong for a Court to try the suit or issue, come to its own conclusion thereon, consider whether the previous decision is right and give effect to it or not according as it conceives the previous decision to be right or wrong. To say, as a result of such disorderly procedure, that the previous decision was wrong and that it was wrong on a point of law, or on a pure point of law, and that therefore it may be disregarded, is an indefensible form of reasoning. For this purpose, it is not true that a point of law is always open to a party.

(2) In India, at all events, a party who takes a plea of res judicata has to show that the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in the former suit and also that it has been heard and finally decided. This phrase "matter directly and substantially in issue" has to be given a sensible and businesslike meaning, particularly in view of Ex. 4, S. 11, Civil P. C., which contains the expression "grounds of defence or attack." S. 11 of the Code says nothing about causes of action, a phrase which always requires careful handling. Nor does the section say anything about points or points of law, or pure points of law. As a rule parties do not join issue upon academic or abstract questions but upon matters of importance to themselves. The section requires that the doctrine be restricted to matters in issue and of these to matters which are directly as well as substantially in issue.

(3) Questions of law are of all kinds and cannot be dealt with as though they were all the same. Questions of procedure, questions affecting jurisdiction, questions of limitation, may all be questions of law. In such questions the rights of parties are not the only matter for consideration. The Court and the public have an interest. When plea of res judicata is raised with reference to such matters, it is at least a question whether special considerations do not apply.

(4) In any case in which it is found that the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in the former suit and has been heard and finally decided by such Court, the principle of res judicata is not to be ignored merely on the ground that the reasoning, whether in law or otherwise of the previous decision can be attacked on a particular point. On the other hand it is plain from the terms of S 11 of the Code that what is made conclusive between the parties is the decision of the Court and that the reasoning of the Court is not necessarily the same thing as its decision. The object of the doctrine of res judicata is not to fasten upon parties special principles of law as applicable to them inter se, but to ascertain their rights and the facts upon which these rights directly and substantially depend; and to prevent this ascertainment from becoming nugatory by precluding the parties from reopening or recontesting that which has been finally decided.

C. C. Ghose, J.—In this matter the question that has been referred to the Full Bench is as follows:

Whether, under S. 18, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, a Judge of this Court sitting in insolvency has power to stay proceedings pending in respect of the same debtor in a District Court.

The facts involved are as follows: The appellant, Sarat Chandra Pal, who is the debtor and who carried on business in Calcutta, made an application on 29th October 1927 to the District Judge of Hooghly to be adjudicated an insolvent. That application was made under the provisions of the Provincial Insolvency Act. On the application being made, the learned District Judge of Hooghly made an order for the appointment of an interim Receiver. The District Judge further directed that notices should be sent to the debtor's creditors and fixed 5th November 1927, for the hearing of the petition. This date was afterwards altered and ultimately the hearing was fixed for 26th November 1927. The respondents, Messrs. Barlow & Company, who are the creditors of the debtor, appeared before the District Judge on 26th November 1927 and applied for and obtained time to oppose the debtor's application. On 29th November 1927, they made an application to this Court in its insolvency jurisdiction against the debtor and obtained an order of adjudication. It appears that the debtor was indebted to the extent of about Rs. 76,000 to various creditors and that the debt due to the respondents alone amounted to something like Rs. 39,000 and further that almost all the creditors were residents of Calcutta.

The insolvent was served on 9th December 1927, with an office copy of the order of adjudication made by this Court bearing date 29th November 1927. The respondents, it appears, made an application to the District Judge of Hooghly for stay of the insolvency proceedings in the Hooghly Court and of the sale by the interim Receiver which the District Judge had ordered already; but the learned District Judge refused the application, and the sale by the interim Receiver took place on 3rd December 1927. On 6th December 1927, the Registrar in Insolvency of this Court made an order upon the debtor that he should appear and produce his books of account before him on 13th December 1927. The respondents thereafter obtained a rule from the learned Judge exercising the insolvency jurisdiction of this Court calling on the insolvent to show cause why the insolvency proceedings in the District Court of Hooghly should not be stayed. This rule came on for hearing before my learned brother Costello, J., who, by his order dated 12th March 1928, directed that all further proceedings in the Court of the District Judge of Hooghly in the insolvency case pending before him, being Insolvency case No. 79 of 1927, be stayed until the further orders of this Court. Against this order the insolvent preferred an appeal to this Court being Appeal No. 34 of 1928 and it is on the hearing of the said appeal before the learned Chief Justice and Page, J., that the present reference to a Full Bench has been made.

It appears that the present respondents preferred an appeal to this Court on its appellate side against the order of the District Judge refusing to make an order for stay of the proceedings under S. 36, Provincial Insolvency Act. That appeal was disposed of by a Division Bench of this Court on 13th August 1928, this Court holding that the order of the District Judge referred to above should be set aside and that all proceedings in the Hooghly Court in the matter of the insolvency of the debtor should be stayed.

Now the question whether under S. 18, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, a Judge of this Court sitting in insolvency has power to stay proceedings pending in respect of the same debtor in a District Court came up for consideration before my learned brother Buckland, J., in May 1925, in the matter of one Sashti Kinkar Banerji Buckland, J., stayed the proceedings in the District Court.

It may be desirable at this stage to set out the material sections in the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act.

Section 17 runs as follows :

On the making of an order of adjudication the property of the insolvent, wherever situate, shall vest in the Official Assignee and shall become divisible among his creditors, and thereafter, except as directed by this Act, no creditor to whom the insolvent is indebted in respect of any debt provable in insolvency shall, during the pendency of the insolvency proceedings, have any remedy against the property of the insolvent in respect of the debt or shall commence any suit or other legal proceeding except with the leave of the Court and on such terms as the Court may impose : provided that this section shall not affect the power of any secured creditor to realize or otherwise deal with his security in the same manner as he would have been entitled to realize or deal with it if this section had not been passed.

Section 18 runs as follows :

(1) The Court may, at any time after the making of an order of adjudication, stay any suit or other proceeding pending against the insolvent before any Judge or Judges of the Court or in any other Court subject to the superintendence of the Court ; (2) an order made under sub-S. (1) may be served by sending a copy thereof, under the seal of the Court, by post to the address for service of the plaintiff or other party prosecuting such suit or proceeding, and notice of such order shall be sent to the Court before which the suit or proceeding is pending (3) Any Court in which proceedings are pending against a debtor may on proof that an order of adjudication has been made against him under this Act, either stay the proceedings or allow them to continue on such terms as it may think just.

Section 22 runs as follows :

Where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Court that insolvency proceedings are pending in any other British Court whether within or without British India against the same debtor and that the property of the debtor can be more conveniently distributed by such other Court, the Court may annul the adjudication or may stay all proceedings thereon.

Buckland, J., in his judgment in the case of Sasti Kinkar Banerji observed as follows :

Section 18 has been specifically referred to, but I am by no means certain that the applicant need necessarily be confined to that section, for S. 90 provides that in proceedings under this Act the Court shall have the like powers and follow the like procedure as it has and follows in exercise of its ordinary original civil jurisdiction. Further, the Court which I am asked to deal with is as between this Court and the Court over which unquestionably this Court exercises superintendence one which is subordinate to this Court. The position therefore is not the same as that where the Court in which it is desired to stay proceedings is independent of this Court. In such a case it might possibly be open to the party desiring the stay to apply for an injunction as in the case of suits but that is not a matter I need pursue.

Buckland, J., then referred to the decision in the Bombay High Court in re Manick Chand (1), and observed that in his opinion this Court in insolvency had power to stay insolvency proceedings pending in another and subordinate Court. On the construction of the section itself Buckland, J., was of opinion that the words "other proceeding" should not be held ejusdem generis or analogous to a suit.

There was an appeal against the order of Buckland, J., and the same was heard by my learned brethren Greaves and Cuming, JJ., in August 1925. It appeared from the facts that the insolvent Sasti Kinkar Banerji was adjudicated as such by the District Judge of Birbhum on 6th August 1924, at the instance of a creditor. In March 1925, the same debtor was adjudicated an insolvent by this Court at the instance of another creditor. Greaves, J., agreed with Buckland, J., that the Birbhum Court was subject to the superintendence of this Court and that being so, the only question for consideration was whether the insolvency proceedings at Birbhum fell within the words "other proceeding" in S. 18. He held, not without hesitation, that the construction put by Buckland, J., was right. Cuming, J., agreed with Greaves, J.,

The matter raised in the present reference was further considered by the Bombay High Court in the case of In re. Naginlal Maganlal Jaichand (2). It was held therein by Taraporewala, J., that S. 18, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, did not empower the High Court in its insolvency jurisdiction to stay insolvency proceedings in respect of the same debtor pending in a District Court, the wording of that section being consistent only with the construction that "insolvency proceedings" are not included therein.

In my view, the judgment of the Bombay High Court in re Naginlal is clearly right and the judgment of Greaves, J., and Cuming, J., in the unreported case in appeal from original Order. No 67 of 1925 Ram Sankar Roy v. Harsooklas Chhogmull should be overruled. I am of opinion that the legislature in S. 18, Presidency Towns Ins. Act, had not in view the question of stay by this Court of insolvency proceedings pending in a District Court, inasmuch as other machinery had been provided therefor.

Before I proceed to deal with the sections in the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, I desire to refer to two sections in the Provincial Insolvency Act. S. 29, Provincial Insolvency Act, runs as follows :

Any Court in which a suit or other proceeding is pending against a debtor shall, on proof that an order of adjudication has been made against him under this Act either stay the proceeding or allow it to continue on such terms as such Court may impose. (Compare this with S. 3 of Sub-S. 18, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act).

The other section is S. 36, and it is as follows :

If in any case in which an order of adjudication has been made, it shall be proved to the Court by which such order was made that insolvency proceedings are pending in another Court against the same debtor and that the property of the debtor can be more conveniently distributed by such other Court the Court may annul the adjudication or stay all proceedings thereon.

If an application for stay is refused there is provision for an appeal to the High Court under S. 76 of the Act.

Section 29, Provincial Insolvency Act, follows S. 28 of that Act which deals with the question of the effect of an order of adjudication. Under S. 29, on the making of an order of adjudication the whole of the property of the insolvent vests in the Court or in a Receiver and becomes divisible among the creditors and thereafter no creditor of the insolvent can have, during the pendency of the insolvency proceedings, any remedy against the property of the insolvent in respect of the debt or commence any suit or other legal proceeding except with the leave of the Court and on such terms as the Court may impose, the Court referred to being the District Court acting under the Provincial Insolvency Act. S. 29 is ancillary to S. 28 and it is provided thereby that any Court in which a suit or other proceeding is pending should, on proof that an order of adjudication has been made under the Provincial Insolvency Act, either stay the proceeding or allow it to continue on such terms as the Court may think fit. It is clear from the words used in S. 29 that the "other proceeding" referred to therein is and must be a proceeding in the nature of a suit or a proceeding in a suit itself. Under S. 36, the District Court, when an order of adjudication has been made under the Provincial Insolvency Act, may, in cases where it is made clear that insolvency proceedings are pending in another Court against the same debtor and that the property of the debtor can be more conveniently distributed by such other Court, annul the adjudication or stay all proceedings thereon.

(1) A. I. R. 1922 Bom. 390=47 Bom. 275.

(2) A. I. R. 1925 Bom. 543=49 Bom 798.

Section 36, Provincial Insolvency Act has its counter part in S. 22, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, and the like powers are given to the "Courts" referred to in S. 3, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. S. 18, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act follows S. 17 where the question of the effect of an order of adjudication under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act is dealt with. It is provided therein that, on the making of an order of adjudication, the property of the insolvent wherever situate shall vest in the Official Assignee and shall become divisible among his creditors and that thereafter, except as directed by the Act, no creditor to whom the insolvent is indebted in respect of any debt provable in insolvency shall, during the pendency of the insolvency proceedings, have any remedy against the property of the insolvent in respect of the debt or shall commence any suit or other legal proceeding except with the leave of the Court and on such terms as the Court may impose. Then there follows the proviso quoted above and which again is in the same terms as sub-S. (6) of S. 28, Provincial Insolvency Act. S. 17, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act is in fact very similar to S. 28, Provincial Insolvency Act. S. 18, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, is ancillary to S. 17 and, in order to carry out that has already been indicated in S. 17, i. e., to ensure the proper administration and distribution of the insolvent's estate among the creditors, power is given by S. 18, sub-Cl. (1), to this Court in its insolvency jurisdiction to stay any suit or other proceedings pending against the insolvent before any Judge or Judges of the Court or in any other Court subject to the superintendence of the Court.

Construing therefore S. 18, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, in the light of what has immediately gone before, I think the wording is more consistent with the interpretation that "insolvency proceedings" are not included under that section and further that the expression "other proceedings" can only refer to proceedings in the nature of suits, execution or other legal process. I base my decision on the section itself and not on any such consideration as was referred to in the course of the argument before us namely that an insolvency proceeding initiated on the debtor's application for being adjudicated an insolvent can hardly be described as a proceeding against the insolvent.

I agree with the view taken by Taraporewala, J., as regards the meaning of the expression "other proceedings" and of the words "any other Court subject to the superintendence of the Court", and I have very little to add thereto.

I would, therefore, answer the reference to the Full Bench by saying that, under S. 18 Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, a Judge of this Court sitting in insolvency has no power to stay proceedings pending in respect of the same debtor in a District Court under the Provincial Insolvency Act.

Rankin, C. J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment about to be delivered by C. C. Ghose J., I agree with that judgment. I am of opinion that there is enough in the language of S. 18, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, and in the context of that section to show that it is addressed to the question of compelling persons with claims against the insolvent to prosecute their claims in the insolvency jurisdiction where this is the proper course and that the section is not addressed to the question of competing jurisdictions in insolvency.

Suhrawardy, J.—I agree.

B. B. Ghose, J.—I agree. In my opinion S. 18, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, refers only to a suit or other proceeding for enforcing a claim against the insolvent which may be adequately dealt with under the provisions of that Act, and not to proceedings under the Provincial Insolvency Act.

Mukherji, J.—I would give the same answer to the question and my reasons are practically the same as my learned brother C. C. Ghose, J., has given in his judgment.

Where Judge's view was that he was bound to treat the case on the footing that he was not hearing an appeal under Cl. (a), the question whether he should give leave to appeal to the Division Bench could not arise. Where the Judge dealt with the matter as though he had power under sub-S. (1); and having dealt with the matter as a review on the merits he dismissed the application, the order which he made cannot be said to be an order of the character contemplated by Cl. (1), S. 8. If it were anything else it would fall under Cl. (b), sub-S. (2), S. 8 of the Act. Where the Judge had treated this as though he had jurisdiction to make an order on review, from such order an appeal lies to the High Court under Cl. (b), and Division Bench has jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from an order of the character which the Judge passed. It cannot be said that it is necessary that the Division Bench should confine itself to a declaration that the Judge had no power to entertain an application for review of an order made by the Registrar or that it should leave the appellant to go back to the Registrar to have the order set aside or that it should send the case back to the Judge to be dealt with as an appeal. It is open to it to make the order which the Judge ought to have made. [P 790 C 2 ; P 791 C 2 ; P 792 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—It appears that one Sailendra Krishna Roy was adjudicated an insolvent in this Court on 9th August

1921. This case arose out of an application made to the Registrar in Insolvency by a firm called Nabin Chandra Ram Chandra Shaha, creditors of the insolvent for an examination of the appellant Kumar Sarat Kumar Roy under S. 36, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, upon certain matters. It appears that the appellant is the father-in-law of the insolvent. It appears further that on 25th January 1921 the insolvent purported to enter into a mortgage in favour of the appellant over certain properties in respect of a sum of 1½ lacs. It seems that on 20th December 1922 an application for examination of the appellant was made by the Official Assignee but was afterwards withdrawn. A second application was made by the respondent creditor Nabin Chandra Ram Chandra Shaha on 14th June 1923 and the appellant was examined before the Court under S. 36, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act between November 1923 and January 1924. In the meantime the appellant had brought a suit in a District Court against the Official Assignee and others to enforce his mortgage. That mortgage suit was decreed ex parte on the 20th September 1923. In February 1924 the Official Assignee brought a suit against the appellant to set aside that ex-parte decree on the ground, as I understand, of fraudulent suppression of processes. This suit, however, was dismissed on 28th February 1927, and at the time with which we are concerned, that is when the present application was made in April 1927, that decree of dismissal was under appeal to the High Court which has not yet disposed of the appeal.

The application with which we are now concerned is an application to examine the appellant further with reference to the sum of 1½ lacs of rupees alleged to have been lent by him to the insolvent and the application asks that five documents should be produced before the Court by the appellant at his examination. The application is based upon the ground that at the prior examination the creditor had not had sufficient opportunity to examine the appellant with reference to this sum which was really the sum comprised in the mortgage to the appellant. The Registrar made an order directing the appellant to attend at a given date for examination under the section. That order was made on 2nd

May 1927, but it was not served upon the appellant till 4th July 1927.

Thereupon, on the 20th July, the appellant applied to the learned Judge exercising insolvency jurisdiction on the original side for an order that the order made by the Registrar should be vacated and that he should be relieved from appearing before the Registrar pursuant to the said order. When the application to the learned Judge was made it was framed in somewhat neutral language by reason of the fact that a decision of this Court in the case of Rai Sukh Lal Karnani v. Official Assignee, Calcutta (1) had been given as to the nature of the proceeding by which such an order of the Registrar can be challenged before a Judge. In that case the learned Chief Justice Sir Lancelot Sanderson held that such an application to a Judge was not an appeal but a petition to set aside the order of the Registrar in Insolvency. Richardson, J., agreeing that such an application was not an appeal within sub-S. (2), S. 8, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, held that it was an application under Cl. 1 of that section for review of an ex-parte order.

In these circumstances the appellant moved the learned Judge but did not frame his application as a memorandum of appeal but framed it as I have stated. When the matter came before the learned Judge, it is quite clear that the case was not dealt with as being an appeal from the order of the Registrar and it is also clear that it was dealt with by the learned Judge on the basis of the view taken by Richardson, J., in a previous case, namely, that it was an application to review under sub-S. (1), S. 8. This can be seen not merely from the circumstance that the learned Judge was bound by the previous decision but from several other circumstances, one of which is that the learned Judge while acting on the decision expressed his doubt of its correctness; another is that he, while noticing that if the proceedings were an appeal he would have to deal with the question of limitation under S. 101, and sub-S. (5), S. 90 nevertheless did not deal with that question on the facts.

Moreover the learned Judge in the course of his judgment expressly stated :

I conceive that if this application is by way of review it is not sufficient to contend as though it were an appeal, that the order of the Registrar is one which should not have been made. A review and an appeal are proceedings of a different nature and the principles applicable to a review indicate that an application for a review cannot necessarily succeed upon the grounds upon which an appeal might be successful.

The learned Judge by his judgment dealt, subject to what I have already quoted, with the merits of the case. He came to the conclusion that on the merits the order of the Registrar should not be interfered with under sub-S. (1), S. 8. He appears also to have thought that if the examination should turn out to be unnecessary it would be possible for the Court to make an order by which the creditor would be mulcted in costs.

In these circumstances the appellant preferred an appeal to the Division Bench and upon that appeal the first question before the Division Bench was the question whether any right of appeal lay to the Court. I would have proceeded to deal with that question first but for the fact that the respondent's contention by his learned counsel, Mr Banerji, on this point depends to some extent on the question whether the decision in the case of Sukh Lal Karnani v Official Assignee (1) is right or wrong. I pass, therefore, to the question of the decision in that case. This is a matter which has been specifically referred as a question of law to this Full Bench and it has been referred in the following terms:

Whether an application to a learned Judge exercising insolvency jurisdiction on the original side for the discharge of an order made by the Registrar in Insolvency for the attendance of a witness under S. 36 of the Act is an appeal under Cl. (a), sub S. (2), S. 8, or is an application under sub-S. (1) of that section or is an application of another and what kind.

It may be observed that the order of the Division Bench referred the whole appeal to the Full Bench in addition to stating that question as a question of law.

The order made by the Registrar is made under the following statutory provisions: By S. 3 of the Act of 1909 the Court having jurisdiction in insolvency under this Act is this High Court and the phrase "the Court" when used in the statute means the Court exercising jurisdiction under this Act; in other words, the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal. Under S. 4 of the Act, all matters in respect of which jurisdiction is given by this Act shall be ordinarily transacted and disposed of by or under the direction of one of the Judges; but by S. 6, the Chief Justice may direct that in any matter in respect of which jurisdiction is given to the Court by this Act, an officer of the Court appointed by him in this behalf shall have all or any of the powers in this section mentioned. Then follows a very necessary and important provision:

and any order made or act done by such officer in the exercise of the said powers shall be deemed the order or act of the Court.

The powers which the Chief Justice is enabled to delegate to an officer include powers to make any order or exercise any jurisdiction which is prescribed as proper to be made or exercised in chambers, and by the rules of this Court the power to summon a witness and examine him under S. 36 of the Act is a power which is proper to be made or exercised in chambers. The terms of S. 36 of the Act are these that the Court may, on the application of the Official Assignee or of any creditor who has proved his debt, at any time after an order of adjudication has been made, summon before it the insolvent or any person known or suspected to have in his possession any property belonging to the insolvent or supposed to be indebted to the insolvent, or any person whom the Court may deem capable of giving information respecting the insolvent, his dealings or property; and the Court may require such person to produce any documents in his custody or power relating to the insolvent, his dealings or property.

The result of these various sections of this enactment and of the order made by the Chief Justice in 1915 is that the Registrar is the Court for the purpose of S. 36. In these circumstances, we have to consider what provision is made by the statute for challenging orders made by the Registrar when exercising the powers given to the Court under S. 36. That provision is to be found in S. 8 of the Act. S. 8 of the Act, contains two separate and contrasted provisions. The first provision is a provision for rehearing which has long had a place in the English statute from which most of the Act of 1919 has been borrowed.

The Court may review, rescind or vary any order made by it under its insolvency jurisdiction.

It was contended, I think, on behalf of the appellant that this provision would not apply to the Registrar because the Registrar was not the Court. I dissent from that proposition altogether. Just as the Registrar is the Court referred to in S. 36, so he is the Court referred to in sub-S. (1), S. 8. That is not because the Registrar in the ordinary way or on general principles is the Court but because S. 6 (1) of the statute has made him so as a matter of construction. I have no doubt, therefore, that that power is a power which is vested in the Registrar. I would further point out, that apart altogether from any statutory provision, in the absence of a provision to the contrary, a judicial officer who makes an ex-parte order imposes a burden on a person who is not present before him, and that when the person affected brings the matter to his notice, it is always open to him to undo the order on the ground that the original order was made on insufficient materials or that for other reason it should not have been made. I have no doubt, therefore, that one remedy of the appellant here was to go back to the Registrar under sub-S. (1), S. 8, or on the basis of the fact that the appellant was the subject of an ex-parte order, to get him to set aside that order by showing that it ought not to have been made.

Now, the provision in sub-S. (1), S. 8, is a provision of no narrow character. It is quite true that when a Court has decided a matter in the presence of all the parties it will not readily listen to the party who has lost, making an application that the matter be reopened and reheard. At the same time this consideration has no place in cases of ex-parte orders and it is well settled under the same words of the English section that the powers given to the Court from time to time to alter or modify its own orders is circumscribed by no narrow limits. The leading case is the case of In re Tobias & Co Ex-parte Tobias (2) where Mr. Justice Cane, a great authority on the Law of Bankruptcy, speaking of these very words [in my judgment, the verbal changes have no materiality for the present purpose] says this :

This section gives the Court a discretion of the widest and most far-reaching character, and when properly exercised it is so beneficial in its operation and so calculated to advance the ends of justice, that I think it ought not to be restrained by construing in any niggardly spirit. One general—although not invariable—rule has been laid down for guiding the Court in the exercise of its discretion under this section, viz.,—that the Court should not grant a rehearing where the only object of the applicant is to obtain another opportunity for appealing from the decision of the Judge, when he has let the time for appealing from the original decision go by. The universal practice of fixing a limit of time on the power to appeal is derived from the general maxim interest reipublice ut sit finis litium, and the maxim should not be extended beyond the limit of its utility. Where litigants have gone to trial and the Court has decided, between them, it is inexpedient that the defeated party should be allowed to reopen the litigation at any distance of time, when the position of the parties may have been materially affected by the lapse of time or the loss of material evidence. In such a case as this, however, where the refusal of the discharge operates as a punishment on the bankrupt, there can be no reason why the punishment should not be remitted at any distance of time, if it can be shown that the object of the punishment has been effected.

So that it must not be taken, so far as I am concerned, that the observation made by the learned Judge which I have already quoted is correct. It is not the case, in my judgment, that it is not sufficient to contend that the order of the Registrar is one which should not have been made. In my judgment, such an application, if made to the proper tribunal, would be an application which the Court would regard entirely on the merits remembering that it is necessary for the purpose of doing justice, particularly in cases of ex-parte orders. Now, that jurisdiction is clearly given to the same tribunal as made the order complained of. A case has been cited—the case of Re Maugham (3), where this has been laid down in England. In my judgment, the same meaning attaches to sub-S. (1), S. 8. It is contrary to the notion of a rehearing or of a review such as is contemplated in that sub-S. (1) that the application should be made to any tribunal except the tribunal that made the order. I do not mean to say that if an order is made by one Registrar his successor could not hear a motion to review. I do not mean to say that if an order is made by one Judge another Judge exercising the insolvency jurisdiction of the Court could not hear the review. But it must be made to the same tribunal and it never was intended to introduce a confusion by having an order reviewed by a Judge if it was made by the Registrar. The particular case in which it is necessary to have recourse to a higher tribunal than the Registrar in order (to use a neutral word), that his order may be revised is the matter dealt with by sub-S (2), S. 8. That is in contrast to the first sub-section by reason of the fact that the right of appeal is given not merely to persons who are parties to the original order but to any person aggrieved thereby, and it is an important principle in insolvency that persons may be aggrieved by an order to which they are not parties; and if they are, there is a right of appeal. In this sub-section the Act of 1909 departs in some respects from its original. It introduces an express provision that the right of appeal shall lie from an order made by an officer of the Court empowered under S. 6. It says that an appeal shall lie to the Judge and that no further appeal shall lie except by leave of that Court. I ask myself what reason can there be in a case where the Registrar under the authority conferred upon him in pursuance of S. 6, has exercised the power of the Court given by S 36 of the Act, to say that the right to approach the Judge was anything different from the right of appeal given by Cl. (a) of sub-S. (2), S. 8.

I am of opinion that by that clause it is clear that the Registrar and the Judge respectively are put in the position of an inferior and superior tribunal. It seems to me contrary to the intention of the enactment that a motion to a Judge to discharge an order of the Registrar should be deemed or taken to be in some other jurisdiction than the express jurisdiction under Cl. (2), sub-S. (a), S. 8 of the Act. For these reasons I find myself unable to agree in the opinion of the learned Sir Lancelot Sanderson, C. J., and Richardson, J., in the case of Rai Sukh Lal Karnani v. Official Assignee of Calcutta (1). The learned Chief Justice did not state what was the character of the application if it was not an appeal. The view taken by Richardson, J., is that it is open under sub-S. (1) to apply to the Judge to review an order of the Registrar. For the reasons I have given I am unable to accept this view. This answers the question which has been referred to the Full Bench by the Division Bench. In my opinion an application to the Judge exercising insolvency jurisdiction to discharge an order made by the Registrar for the attendance of a witness under S. 36 is an appeal under Cl. (1) of sub-S. (2) of S. 8.

I come now to deal with the question whether the Division Bench had any right to entertain an appeal from the order made by the learned Judge.

Two matters are involved in this question. It is quite clear that on the learned Judge's view he was bound to treat the case on the footing that he was not hearing an appeal under Cl. (a). On that view the question whether he should give leave to appeal to the Division Bench could not arise. The learned Judge dealt with the matter as though he had power under sub-S. 1, and having dealt with the matter as a review on the merits he dismissed the application. In my judgment the order which he made cannot be said to be an order of the character contemplated by Cl. (a), S. 8. If it were anything else it seems clear that it would fall under Cl. (b), sub-S. (2), S. 8 of the Act. He had treated this as though he had jurisdiction to make an order on review and from such order an appeal lies to this Court under Cl. (b). I am therefore of opinion that the Division Bench had jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from an order of the character which the learned Judge passed.

That being so, the next question is as to the correct way to deal with the appeal. The learned Judge, had he not been bound by the previous decision of the Division Bench, would have (and according to my view of the law should have) dealt with the application before him in this way. He should have said :

If this application is a request that I shall rehear the matter that has been dealt with by the Registrar I dismiss it with costs on the ground that I have no jurisdiction to entertain it. This matter, however, can be regarded as an appeal under Cl. (a), sub-S. (2), S. 8, from the Registrar. I will therefore enquire whether there is reasonable ground under S. 90, sub-S. (5) to extend the time for the appeal and if so I will hear the appeal upon its merits as an appeal.

Two questions, had he taken that course, would have arisen for decision. The first is whether the appellant has acted with due diligence in presenting his application to the Judge on 20th

July 1927 after being served with the order on the 4th of that month. In my judgment the correct answer to that question is that the appellant has exercised due diligence and the time under S. 101 must be extended in his favour.

The next question which the learned Judge would have had to put to himself and to decide was the question of the merits of the order made by the Registrar. In my opinion the correct answer to that question is that the order made by the Registrar is erroneous and oppressive. It is clear that the sole purpose of the examination asked for was a further enquiry into the matter of Rs. 1,50,000 loan upon the mortgage of 25th January 1921. As to that the creditor and it may be other creditors, were minded to make a case that no money had been lent, that the money which was made to appear as loan to the insolvent was really his own money and that the mortgage was a sham and fraud. That matter has been the subject of litigation since the year 1923. The mortgage suit has been decreed and the suit to set aside the decree has been dismissed and an appeal was pending from that decision in the ordinary way. Powers under S. 36 of the Act (Act 3 of 1909) are not to be used when parties are in litigation, as an extra method of discovery in addition to the ample facilities for discovery enjoyed by ordinary litigants under the Code of Civil Procedure. It has been held under a corresponding section of the English Act that while the trustee will be allowed to use the private examination section in order to make up his mind whether it is necessary to litigate or not to enable him to inform himself whether the circumstances in connexion with the debt were such as would entitle him to embark upon a litigation, once he has commenced litigation he must be content as a rule with the ordinary facilities for discovery and it is too late to urge that he should be allowed to cross-examine his opponent under the private examination section. I do not say that this principle can be regarded as a rigid rule, but it is a rule which has always to be borne in mind. I am bound to say that I have never heard of an examination in the exercise of the powers conferred under the private examination section when a mortgagee who is not bound to come into insolvency at all has brought his suit successfully to realize his security and the Official Assignee as a defendant in that suit has been taking further steps to get the decree set aside. It appears to me that this principle has been well settled in the English cases, Re: Franks Ex parte Gittings (4). In re Desportes (5) and in many unreported cases. In this case the examination was sought at the last stage of this litigation. It was sought upon a petition which mentions nothing about the state of the litigation. In my judgment the application for an order to examine the appellant should have been refused. I think therefore that if the learned Judge had not been bound by the decision of the case in Rai Sukh Lal Karnani v. Official Assignee (1), he would have, and I think he ought to have on a correct view of the law, entertained this application as an appeal, extended the time for the appeal and set aside the order of the Registrar with costs. I may mention in this connexion that one of the things which apparently weighed with the learned Judge was that if the examination turned out to be unnecessary the respondent before him would be mulcted in costs. The learned Judge appears to have mistaken. I would only refer to the case of Anshu Prokash Ghose. In re (6) where the principles governing costs under the private examination section in the insolvency and companies jurisdictions were examined.

The next question in these circumstances is what were the powers of the Division Bench. It appears to me that as the learned Judge made an order from which a right of appeal arose to the appellant, it was in the power of the Division Bench to make the order which in its opinion the learned Judge ought to have made. It was not, in my opinion, necessary that it should confine itself to a declaration that the learned Judge had no power to entertain an application for review of an order made by the Registrar or that it should leave the present appellant to go back to the Registrar to have the order set aside or that it should send the case back to the learned Judge to be dealt with as an appeal. I think that it was open to it to make the order which the learned Judge ought to have made namely that the order of the Registrar be set aside.

Mr. Banerji has pointed out that by the Appellate Side rules of this Court there is a provision in Rules 2 and 3 of Ch. 7 which says that if the question of law arises in an appeal from appellate decree the Court shall state the points and refer the appeal for the final decision of a Full Bench and if the question arises in an appeal from an original decree the question of law alone shall be referred and the Full Bench shall return the case with an expression of its opinion upon the points of law for final adjudication by the Division Court which referred it.

Now the present case does not seem to me to be within the classes contemplated by these two rules. These rules refer to the well-known first and second appeals. This is in one sense a second appeal though it is not a limited or special appeal. In another sense it is no doubt a first appeal or an appeal from an original order though it is not in any view an appeal from the original decree. It seems to me that in these circumstances the Division Bench was quite entitled to do what it did namely to act under the general language of R. 1, Ch. 7 of the Appellate Side Rules.

Whenever one Division Court shall differ from any other Division Court upon a point of law or usage having the force of law, the case shall be referred for decision to a Full Bench.

In my opinion it is open to this Full Bench to make the order which the Division Court should have made in addition to answering the question referred by it. I would in this case in addition to giving the answer which I have indicated to the question which has been referred to the Full Bench make an order that the order by the Registrar for the examination of the appellant under S. 36, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act be set aside with costs which will include the costs before the learned Judge the costs of the Division Court and the costs of this Court.

Civil Rule No. 1640 of 1927, Decided on 15th May 1928, against the order of 3rd Munsif, Contai, D/- 20th September 1927.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 21, Rr. 100 and 101—A person purchasing non-transferable occupancy holding in decree against tenant—Landlord obtaining decree against recorded tenant and attaching holding—Purchaser is not judgment-debtor within R. 100, but one in possession on his own account.

A non-transferable occupancy holding was purchased by a person in execution of a decree and obtained possession. It was subsequently attached by the landlord in execution of his decree against the recorded tenant for necessary rent.

Held: that the purchaser was not bound by the decree of the landlord, and he was not a judgment-debtor within the meaning of R. 100, O. 21. He was in possession of the property on his own account as required by R. 101; and so has right to proceed under R. 101, O. 21: A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 156, Foll: 3 P. L. J. 579, Dist: 2 P. L. J. 478, Diss. from. [P 794 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C., S. 47—Person other than judgment-debtor in possession of property sold in execution—Executing Court cannot decide upon his title.

Where a person other than judgment-debtor is in possession of the property sold, the executing Court has no jurisdiction to decide the question of his title, and the only remedy of the purchaser is a regular suit. [P 794 C 2]

Sarat Chandra Jana—for Opposite Parties.

Suhrawardy, J.—This is a revision application directed against the order of the Court below passed under O 21, R. 101, Civil P. C., restoring the opposite party in possession of the disputed property. The facts are that the opposite party Jharu Mandal claims to be the purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding in execution of a decree against the tenant. The landlord subsequently brought a suit for rent against the recorded tenant and obtained a decree and attached the holding. Jharu thereupon applied to deposit the amount of the decree in Court under S. 170, Ben. Ten. Act. His application finally came up for consideration before a Full Bench of this Court in Jharu Mandal v. Khetra

Mohun Bera (1). It was held that Jharu was neither a judgment-debtor nor a person whose interest was voidable on the sale, and therefore not entitled to make the deposit. Thereafter the petitioner obtained possession of the holding in suit through Court and thereby dispossessed the opposite party. The opposite party thereupon applied under O. 21, R. 100, to be restored to possession having been illegally dispossessed. The Court below has allowed his application and hence this rule.

It has been argued before us by the learned vakil for the petitioner that the opposite party being a transferee of a non-transferable occupancy holding is bound by the decree under which the petitioner purchased and as such he is not entitled to make an application under O. 21, R. 100. It is contended that the words "judgment-debtor" in O. 21, R. 100, include all persons of the character of the opposite party; and a great deal of argument has been advanced before us in support of the proposition that a purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding is a representative of the judgment-debtor under S. 47, Civil P. C., and as such he is one of the persons who come within the expression "judgment-debtor" as used in R. 100. But the real point in the case has been missed. The only question we are called upon to decide is as to whether the opposite party is a person who was in possession of the property on his own account or on account of some person other than the judgment-debtor. Under R. 97 where the holder of a decree for possession of immovable property or the purchaser of any such property sold in execution of a decree is resisted or obstructed by any person in obtaining possession of the property he may make an application to the Court complaining of such resistance or obstruction. The Court is to hold an enquiry and if it finds under R. 98 that resistance was offered by the judgment-debtor or by some other person at his instigation it shall direct that the applicant be put into possession of the property. Similarly under R. 100 any person may make an application to the Court complaining of dispossession by the purchaser of immovable property in execution of a decree, but the nature of the enquiry will be, as indicated in

R. 101, namely whether the person making the application was in possession of the property before dispossession on his own account or on account of some person other than the judgment-debtor. We have therefore to see in the present case if the applicant is a person who was holding the property on his own account. This view is in accord with that taken by this Court in Purna Chandra Kundu v. Monohini Devi (2), whether he has any right to the property or is a mere trespasser is beside the scope of the present enquiry. It must, however, be noted in this connexion that according to the finding of the Court below the opposite party has been in possession of this property from 1907 and there has been no investigation in this case as to whether this long possession created any title in him other than that of purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding.

A large number of cases has been cited before us in support of the contention that the word "judgment-debtor" in R. 100 includes persons in the position of the opposite party. Before examining those cases one important fact should be noted that when the opposite party attempted to deposit money under S. 170, Ben. Ten. Act, it was held that he was not the judgment-debtor nor a person whose interest was voidable on the sale. But when he makes an application under R. 100, O. 21, Civil P. C., he is supposed to be a judgment-debtor. This apparently leads to anomaly. "Judgment-debtor" has been defined in S. 2 (10), Civil P. C., as any person against whom a decree has been passed or an order capable of execution has been made. The opposite party in the present case does not clearly come within the definition as given in S. 2 (10) of the Code. But it is contended that as a representative of the judgment-debtor under S. 47, Civil P. C., he must be considered as a judgment-debtor under R. 100. The considerations which have induced the learned Judges in some of the cases to hold that such a person may be a representative within S. 47, Civil P. C. do not arise in this case for in the first place the question does not refer to execution, satisfaction or discharge of a decree; and in the second place the auction-purchaser is a third party and not the decree-holder. But there are two Patna cases which require special consideration. In Panchratan Koeri v. Ram Sahai Singh (3) it was held that the purchaser of the whole or part of an occupancy holding not transferable by custom is a representative of the judgment-debtor and entitled to object under S. 47, Civil P. C., to a sale of the holding in execution of a decree for rent. He is therefore not entitled to maintain proceedings under O. 21, R. 100. That was a case in which the decree-holder was the auction-purchaser. The learned Judges have not considered the real question that arises in such cases as to whether the purchaser there was a person who was holding the property on his own account within the meaning of R. 101. In Bhikhin Jha v. Brij Behary Singh (4) it was held that the words "judgment-debtor" in O. 21, R. 100 and 101, includes the representative of the judgment-debtor and all persons who are bound by a decree against the judgment-debtor and by a sale in execution of such decree, on the ground that the words "or representatives" in those rules had been omitted by oversight. I am not prepared to accept the reasoning; it seems to me to be of a speculative character. Once the Court started to supply words to the provisions of a statute on the ground that there was an omission by oversight the aim of the statute law to secure fixity of law would be frustrated and the Court would assume the function of the legislature.

(1) A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 934=54 Cal. 15.

(2) A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 156=53 Cal. 913.

Taking all the circumstances in the present case into consideration I have come to the conclusion that the opposite party in this case is a person who was in possession of the property before his dispossession by the petitioner on his own account and so was entitled to maintain an application under O. 21, R. 100, Civil P. C. In this view I would discharge this rule with costs, three gold mohurs.

Cammiade, J.—There can be no room for doubt that the words "judgment-debtor" in R. 100, O. 21, Civil P. C., cannot include persons other than the actual judgment-debtor—the person against whom a decree has been passed. If the words had any other meaning the words that precede them, namely, "where any person other than" would have no meaning. The matter is made perfectly clear by the provisions of the R. 101 which lay down that the Court may pass an order putting in possession any person making an application under S. 100 provided that that person is not the judgment-debtor and does not hold on the judgment-debtor's account. It is obvious that the executing Court can only execute a decree against the person against whom it has been passed. It has no jurisdiction to investigate the title of a third person and decide that the decree-holder has the right to recover possession against him. Even if the person in possession is a mere trespasser, it is not open to the executing Court to decide that that person has not title and to refuse to uphold the possession that he has. The law gives to the purchaser the right to bring a suit and that is the only remedy which the purchaser has if some person other than the judgment-debtor was in possession of the property. I therefore agree that this rule should be discharged.

Charusila Dasi—Defendant.

Original Civil Suit No. 28 of 1922,
Decided on 24th May 1928.

(a) Hindu Law—Will—Widow has no right to make will of moveable and immovable property inherited from her husband.

A Hindu widow has a right to the fullest enjoyment of the immovable and moveable property that she has inherited from her husband. She is entitled to dispose of the corpus of such property inter vivos for certain restricted purposes, although she may alienate her own interest in the property for the period of the subsistence of her widow's estate. She cannot, however, dispose of the corpus of such property by her will. So long as she remains in enjoyment of the estate she may spend, or accumulate or, otherwise dispose of the income that accrues therefrom as she chooses. If at her death, or when her widow's estate is otherwise determined, it appears that she had not already disposed of the income current or accumulated which she was entitled to enjoy while she was alive, such income "will follow the estate from which it arose," and will pass to the heirs of her husband: 41 All. 350 and 10 Bom. 478, Diss. from.; 17 Bom. 690; 31 Cal. 214; 23 Mad. 453; and 8 Mad. 290; Ref.

(b) Will—Construction—Meaning of "money."

Prima facie "money" means moneys in hand or receivable at call, but as "money" is a term of elastic construction, it will receive a wider or more restricted construction according to the context in which it is found and the intention of the testator to be collected from the will as a whole. Judgment.—The decision in this case involves the solution of the problem whether a Hindu widow can dispose by will of income of property that she has inherited from her husband. Two issues fall to be determined:

(i) Did the testatrix possess testamentary capacity to dispose of the property in suit under her will?

(ii) Did she dispose of such property under the will that she executed?

The first issue raises a question of law of some nicety, and of general interest to the Hindu community; the second issue depends on the construction of the will.

I have had the advantage of an exhaustive argument upon the relevant authorities, but in India there is a divergence of opinion upon this subject, and it cannot be pretended, I think, that in the Privy Council the views which have been expressed by the Judicial Committee from time to time are all consistent or can wholly be reconciled.

Indeed, in 1826, Lord Gifford is reported to have observed in Cossinauth Bysack v. Hurro Soondery Dossee (1):

that in the contest for the possession of this property, between her (i. e., a Hindu widow) and the relations of her husband, she is entitled to the possession of the property, but that she is only entitled to enjoy it according to the rights of a Hindu widow, which rights it appears to me to be absolutely impossible to define.

I am disposed to be less pessimistic: but I approach the consideration of the first issue with diffidence; for, as I understand the problem, the solution is to be found not by following a process of logic or applying general principles of jurisprudence, but in a true conception of the peculiar nature of a widow's estate in Hindu law.

In Profulla Kamini Roy v. Bhabani Nath Ray (2) I endeavoured to state what I understood to be the general nature of the estate that a Hindu widow possesses in property inherited from her husband, and I do not propose to repeat or refer to what I said in that case, except to observe that the case of Sree-ramulu v. Kristamma (3) has been overruled by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Vaidyanatha Sastri v. Sabitri Ammal (4). In considering issue 1 it is essential, I think, steadily to bear in mind that the estate of a Hindu widow is 'an anomalous estate which interrupts the normal course of succession, and that it has been created and tolerated by orthodox Hindus only because, as the Sage Birihaspati laid down in scripture and in the code of law, as well as in popular practice a wife is declared by the wise to be half the body of her husband, equally sharing the fruit of his pure and impure acts. Of him whose wife is not deceased half the body survives. How then should another take his property while half his person is alive?"

(1) [1826] Clarke's Rules & Orders (App.X) 91.

(2) A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 121=52 Cal. 1018.

But, as Jimuta Vahana explains, the wife must only enjoy her husband's estate after his demise. She is not entitled to make a gift, mortgage or sale of it.

Again, Katyayana lays down

Let the childless widow possessing unsullied the bed of her lord, and abiding with her venerable protector, enjoy with moderation the property until her death. After her let the heirs take it. (Dayabhaga, Ch. 11, 156). Abiding with her venerable protector, that is, her father-in-law, or others of her husband's family, let her enjoy her husband's estate during her life; and not, as with her separate property, make a gift, mortgage or sale of it at her pleasure (Dayabhaga, Ch. 11, 157.)

I desire to emphasize that the widow of a sonless Hindu was permitted to enjoy the usufruct of the property that she inherited from her husband solely for the maintenance of "half the body of her husband," and for the performance of such works of charity and religion as would tend to benefit her husband's soul; and not that thereby she should receive something in the nature of a gift to which she would possess an independent and unfettered title.

Now, the material facts are simple and undisputed. One Durga Prasanna Ghose, a wealthy Hindu inhabitant of Calcutta governed by the Bengal School of Hindu law, died on 4th July 1888, leaving him surviving two infant sons, Akshay Kumar Ghose and Dwijendra

(3) [1902] 26 Mad. 143=12 M. L. J. 197.

(4) [1917] 41 Mad. 75=38 M. L. J. 387=6 M. L. W. 542=42 I. C. 245=(1917) M. W. N. 658 (F.B.).

Kumar Ghose. By his will dated 25th June 1888 Durga Prasanna left all his property to his two sons absolutely.

On 26th March 1893 Dwijendra died intestate, and without issue, and upon his death his widow Srimati Priyatama Dasi became entitled to a widow's estate in the property left by her husband Dwijendra, which consisted of an undivided half share of the estate left by Durga Prasanna, the other half share belonging to Akshay. Disputes having arisen between them Akshay and Priyatama on 11th Kartik 1308 (corresponding with the 28th October 1901) executed an ekrarnama under which Priyatama granted to Akshay an ijara of certain immovable property, to an undivided half share of which she had succeeded on the death of Dwijendra, from 1st Kartik 1308 for the term of her natural life in consideration of a monthly rent of Rs. 1,250 payable within the first week of each Bengali month. In case of non-payment of the rent Akshay further agreed to pay interest thereon at 12 per cent per annum from the first day of the second week of each month until payment of the arrears was made. Akshay thus became entitled to the possession and management of the whole estate, and duly paid the said monthly sum of Rs. 1,250 to Priyatama until his death on 23rd November 1909. In due course letters of administration with the will of Akshay annexed were granted to his widow, the defendant. In the written statement it was alleged that on 6th July 1913 the defendant had adopted Debi Prasanna Ghose as a son to Akshay, but no evidence was led in support of this allegation at the trial, and no issue was raised in connexion with it. On 25th October 1919 (the 8th Kartik 1326) Priyatama Dasi died, having made a will on 7th September 1904 of which she appointed the plaintiff the sole executor and granted and devised to him "the whole of my properties and moneys of which I shall die possessed" upon certain trusts therein set out.

After the death of Akshay the defendant duly paid the rents due under the ijara to the end of Bhadra 1326 (17th September 1919). On 8th Kartik 1326, on which day Priyatama died, there were arrears of rent due and owing under the ijara for the month of Aswin which commenced on 18th September 1919, and for eight days in Kartik, and the present suit was brought to recover these sums and interest thereon as provided in the ijara, amounting in all to Rs. 1,979-2-5.

Issue 1, therefore, that arises is whether Priyatama was competent to dispose by will of the arrears of rent due under the ijara at Priyatama's death which represented income that had accrued from property which she had inherited as the widow of Dwijendra. Now, the answer, it seems to me, depends upon whether the sum in suit formed part of the stridhan of Priyatama, and that again depends upon what this term comprehends. For, if the sum in suit was Priyatama's stridhan, it is not and cannot be pretended that she was not entitled to it in her own absolute right, or that she was not at liberty to dispose of it either by a transfer inter vivos or under her will.

On the other hand, a will speaks from the death of the testator, and, I apprehend, it is opposed to Hindu practice and repugnant to Hindu law that a woman possessing a widow's estate should dispose by will of any property that she does not hold in her own absolute right. What, then, is stridhan or woman's property according to the Hindu law prevailing in Bengal?

Surely it is not confined to the "sixfold property of a woman" described by Manu and Katyayana: Dayabhaga, Ch. 4 (1) (4) for since various sorts of separate property of a woman have been thus propounded without any restriction of number, the number of six (as specified by Manu and others) is not definitely meant. But the texts of the sages merely intend an explanation of woman's separate property. That alone is her peculiar property, which she has power to give, sell, or use, independently of her husband's control.

Dayabhaga, Ch. 4, (1) (18); Mitakshara, Ch. 2 (11) (1) and Ch. 2 (11) (2). In the Mitakshara (Ch. 2, (11) (2)), it is stated that stridhan according "to Manu and the rest" includes also property which she may have acquired by inheritance, purchase, partition, seizure, or finding.

A consideration of the relevant texts and authorities leads to the conclusions that a widow's stridhan is not restricted to the sixfold denomination of Manu, but that the term must receive a wider construction, and means property which if undisposed of at her death will pass to her heirs and not those of her husband.

That this is so, I think, is apparent from the decision of the Privy Council in Brij Indar v. Rane Janki Koer (5).

Now, it is to be observed that in respect of property that has passed to a Hindu widow by inheritance the law as laid down in the text from Katyayana to which I have referred (Dayabhaga, Ch 11, l. 56) is inconsistent with that contained in the Mitakshara, Ch. 2 (11) (2). It is idle to speculate whether a widow's rights under the Benares school, according to a true view of this disputed passage in the Mitakshara, are different from those to which she is entitled in Bengal, for the subject is no longer open to discussion. As Lord Lindley has pointed out :

The law of inheritance in the case of women is left in great obscurity by the Mitakshara. The subject is dealt with in Ch. 2, S. 11 and has more than once been considered by this Board. The nature of a widow's estate was settled in two cases in Mt. Thakur Dayhee v. Rai Baluck Ram (6), and Bhugwandeon Doobey v. Myna Bae (7), and the nature of a daughter's estate was considered in Chottay Lal v. Chunno Lal (8). It was there decided that under the law of the Mitakshara a daughter's estate inherited from the father is a limited and restricted estate only, and not stridhan. Upon her death the next heirs of her father succeed thereto: Raja Chelikani v. Raja Chelikani (9).

In Bhugwandeon Doobey v. Myna Bae (7) Sir James Colville observed that the text of the Mitakshara, on which, as has already been shown, the appellant must mainly rely, is paragraph 2, S. 11, of Ch. 2, which includes "property which she may have acquired by inheritance" in the enumeration of women's peculiar property. These words make no distinction between moveable and immovable property; yet it is settled, beyond all question, as we have already stated, that the immovable property which a woman inherits from her husband cannot be disposed of by her, and does not pass as her stridhan. The legitimate inference from this seems to be that neither moveable nor immovable property inherited from her husband forms part of a woman's peculium or stridhan.

Again, later, his Lordship adds :

The preponderance of authority is certainly in favour of the proposition that, whether the widow has or has not the power to dispose of inherited movables, they as well as the immovable property, if not disposed of, pass on her death to the next heirs of the husband.

(9) [1902] 25 Mad. 678=29 I. A. 156=8 Sar. 286 (P. C.).

Now, it may be that a widow governed by a personal law other than that of the Bengal or the Benares schools has wider or different rights with respect to the disposition of property that she has inherited from her husband (ibid, p. 508). On the other hand, it may not be so : see Gadadhar v. Chandrabhaga Bai (10), Pandharinath v. Govind Shivram (11), Narasimha v. Venkutadri (12), Buchi v. Jagapathi (13). For the purposes of this case, however, it is unnecessary to decide the question, although it is not un-instructive to observe that the Bombay and Madras cases relating to a widow's right to property inherited from her husband do not appear to rely so much upon any peculiarity in the law in those Provinces as upon the general principles which affect and regulate the rights of widows governed by the Bengal and Benares schools : see Rivett Carnac v. Jivibai (14), Gadadhar v. Chandrabhaga Bai (10), and the Madras cases infra. Be that as it may, in Mt. Thakoor v. Rai Baluk Ram (6) Sir James Colville stated that

The result of the authorities seems to be, that although according to the law of the Western schools the widow may have a power of disposing of moveable property inherited from her husband, which she has not under the Law of Bengal, she is by the one law, as by the other, restricted from alienating any immovable property which she has so inherited; and that on her death the immovable property, and the moveable, if she has not otherwise disposed of it, pass to the next heirs of her husband : see also Macnaughten's Hindu Law (Edn. 1829) : Vol. 1, at p. 20).

It follows, therefore, that a Hindu widow has no power to dispose by will of the corpus of either moveable or immovable property inherited from her husband : Gadadhar v. Chandrabhaga Bai (10), Chamanlal v. Ganesh (15), Durga Nath Pramanik v. Chintamani Dassi (16), Narasimha v. Venkatadri (12), Durga Sundari Sen Gupta v. Ram Krishna Poddar (5). And the reason is well put, if I may be allowed to say so, by N. R. Chatterjea, J., in Durga Sundari's case (17) ;

A Hindu widow can also dispose of her stridhan property by will to the same extent as she can dispose of it during her life-time ; in other words the power of devise is co-extensive with the power of gift. The principle, however, upon which a transfer inter vivos by a Hindu widow with the consent of the nearest reversioners passes an absolute title to the transferee cannot apply when inherited properties are sought to be bequeathed by will. During her lifetime the widow may relinquish her estate in favour of the next male heir of her husband, the succession is thereupon accelerated, and the reversioner gets an absolute estate. A will, however, can operate only on death, and the interest of a Hindu widow in properties inherited by her ceases on her death, and there is thus nothing left upon which her will can operate. At the time when the will comes into operation she has no right whatever ; and she cannot by will dispose of what does not belong to her.

Now, upon what principle of Hindu law is a widow entitled to dispose by will of the income of such property ? I know of none ; indeed, to me it appears that to permit her to do so is to act in violation alike of Hindu law and practice.

Bearing in mind that the widow's estate passed to her for support, and not as a gift from her husband, it would, I think, appear to an orthodox Hindu inconceivable that she should be permitted to dispose after her death of property which she was only entitled to enjoy during her life.

The very question to be determined was put and answered in Kundrap Singh v. Mohon Lal Khan (18) which was decided by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in 1815. In that case the widow of a childless Hindu zemindar on the day before her death left a will by which she devised to a stranger inter alia all the property real and personal, with the profits accruing therefrom to which she had succeeded on the death of her husband, together with the profits which had accrued therefrom.

It was held that she was not at liberty to make a will affecting the landed and other property left by her husband, into the possession of which she came on his death, nor affecting the profits of it, nor affecting her own acquisitions made by means of the landed property to which she had succeeded, or by means of its profits. As, therefore, the gift or disposition by will of all three descriptions of property abovenamed (viz., landed property devolved on her from her husband, personal property, and her acquisitions made by means of the inherited estate, and its profits) is illegal, no part of that property goes to the donee.

This decision, in my opinion, is in consonance with the true conception of a widow's estate in Hindu law. Now, the source of what, with all due deference, I regard as the fallacious doctrine to be found in some of the cases, namely that the profits current or accumulated of property which a widow has inherited from her husband passed to her in her absolute proprietary right can be traced to the difficulty which the Courts experienced in placing a limit upon the proportion of the income which the widow reasonably might expend for her maintenance and charitable purposes. Eventually in Cossinath Bysack v. Hurro Soondery Dossee (1) and Hurrydass Dutt v. Uppoornath Dossee (19), it was held that the widow was entitled to a full right of enjoyment of such property for her life, and it is necessary to show that there is danger to the property from the mode in which the party in possession is dealing with it, in which case, and in such case only, the Court will interfere.

Accordingly, in 1868, when the question arose in Chundrabulee Debia v. Brody (20) as to whether a judgment-creditor of the widow or the heir of her husband was entitled to execute a decree for mesne profits that the widow had obtained before her death, Glover, J., observed that a Hindu widow with a life-interest in her deceased husband's estate would be entitled to make the fullest use of the usufruct of that estate : and it seems doubtful, under the late rulings of the Privy Council whether she could be in any way restrained however wasteful her expenditure so long as she kept within the limits of her income and made no attempt at alienation. If on the contrary she chooses to economize she can during her lifetime give away her savings to anyone she pleases ; but if she has left savings undisposed of at the time of her death these would form part of the estate and go with that estate to the next heir of her deceased husband.

His Lordship added that it was never contemplated that she should expend the produce of her estate wastefully or do more than support herself in a decent and proper manner : and that she should leave to her own relatives or convert into her own stridhan the accumulations she might have made appears to me opposed to every principle of Hindu law as applied to widows.

In 1874 a case of considerable importance in connexion with issue 1, was decided by the Privy Council, Gonda Koor v. Koor Oodey Singh (21). In that case a widow purchased property out of the accumulated income from her widow's estate, and left by her will "all the property which she had power to dispose of." It was held that on her death the property passed to her husband's heirs, Sir Robert Collier observing that it is true that she made a will in her son's favour, but it contains no specific gift of the property in question and might well have been intended to apply to any property of her own which may have belonged to her as her stridhan.

In 1875 in Mt. Bhagbutti Debi v. Bhola Nath Thakoor (22) the parties appeared to have been governed by the Mithila law, and the Privy Council decided that the widow took a life estate in the property in question, not as a widow but under a family arrangement. Sir Robert, Collier, however, observed that if she took the estate only of a Hindu widow one consequence, no doubt would be that she would be unable to alienate the profits or that at all events whatever she purchased out of them would be an increment to her husband's estate.

I think that in that case the rule was laid down too broadly, for a widow may dispose of the income of property inherited from her husband inter vivos; but for the purpose in hand that is immaterial.

In 1883 Isri Dutt Koer v. Hansbutti Koerain (23) was decided by the Privy Council, in which the question was whether two Hindu widows were entitled inter vivos to give to the daughter of one of them property purchased out of the income of property inherited from the husband. Sir Arthur Hobhouse observed that the question was argued at the Bar as though it were necessary to divide all the property of a widow into two classes; one being her stridhan and the other her husband's estate over which she has the widow's right and no more. But the very question is whether having regard to the widow's freedom in enjoying her husband's property and to her established right to alienate her own interest in it she has not a kind of property the nature of which must remain undecided till her disposal of it or her death.

His Lordship further observed that: to decide this question it is necessary to examine the authorities, which are by no means in accord. But their Lordships do not treat as authorities on this question the numerous cases cited at the Bar, to show that a widow's savings from her husband's estate are not her stridhan. If she made no attempt to dispose of them in her lifetime, there is no dispute but that they follow the estate from which they arose. The dispute arises when the widow, who might have spent the income as it accrued, has in fact saved it and afterwards attempts to alienate it.

His Lordship added that it was not: possible to lay down any sharp definition of the line which separates accretions to the husband's estate from income held in suspense in the hands of the widow, as to which she has not determined whether or no she will spend it: see also Sridhar Chattopadhyaya v. Kalipada Chuckerbutty (24); Bhagabati Koer v. Sahudra Koer (25)

Now, to my mind, it is not altogether clear what the Judicial Committee intended to convey by the last passage that I have cited. Their Lordships stated that they felt the force of Ainslie, J's reasoning on this point, and the relevant passage in Ainslie J's judgment appears to be:

that, if it is within a Hindu widow's power to dispose of the surplus profits from her husband's estate remaining after due provision has been made for the duties which the widow is bound to perform, it must be equally within her power to do so, whether she does it at once as the profits reach her, or whether she allows them to accumulate I can conceive of no reason for not allowing her to accumulate the necessary funds to buy it, (i. e., property), herself, and give it away. Indeed in this latter case, the reversioner has an advantage, for if the widow happens to die without disposing of the fund, or that into which it may be converted, it will come to him Such property never passes as stridhan to the heirs of the widow, but goes, if undisposed of by the widow in her lifetime, to the heirs of the husband The fact that unappropriated profits or properties purchased, and not disposed of in the widow's lifetime, do not pass as stridhan may be explained on the theory that when a widow has at her death left money accumulated or property purchased out of surplus profits, and not appropriated to any person during her life, it was her intention to add such money or properties to the estate, and to abstain from exercising her full rights over them: Hunsbutti Kerain v. Isri Dutt Koer (26).

I am of opinion that the Judicial Committee did not intend to lay down that:

income held in suspense in the hands of the widow as to which she has not determined whether or no she will spend it.

would on her death pass to the widow's heirs. Indeed, so to hold would be to render the judgment self-contradictory, for such a view is inconsistent with the decision of their Lordships that:

if she has made no attempt to dispose of them (i. e., the profits) in her lifetime, there is no dispute but that they follow the estate from which they arose.

In my opinion, the law to be collected from the authorities is to the following effect : that a Hindu widow has a right to the fullest enjoyment of the immovable and moveable property that she has inherited from her husband, but that, except in respect of moveables which, owing to their perishable nature cannot be enjoyed without being consumed, she is only entitled to dispose of the corpus of such property inter vivos for certain restricted purposes, although she may alienate her own interest in the property for the period of the subsistence of her widow's estate. She cannot, however, dispose of the corpus of such property by her will. Further, in fulfilment of the purpose for which the widow's estate was granted to her she is entitled to enjoy the usufruct of the property while she possesses a widow's estate ; and so long as she remains in enjoyment of the estate she may spend, or accumulate, or otherwise dispose of, the income that accrues therefrom as she chooses. Prima facie any income that she has not spent will pass on her death to her husband's heirs. But if during her lifetime she has so dealt with the unexpended income that the reasonable inference to be drawn from her acts is that she has disposed of it in a way that is inconsistent with an intention on her part to treat it as part of her husband's estate, such a disposition will be valid and binding upon the reversionary heirs of her husband. On the other hand, if at her death, or when her widow's estate otherwise is validly determined, it appears that she had not already disposed of the income current or accumulated which she was entitled to enjoy while she was alive, such income "will follow the estate from which it arose", and will pass to the heirs of her husband.

In other words, her capacity to dispose of such income is commensurate with her capacity to enjoy it. It follows that she is impotent to dispose of such income by will, for her will speaks from the time of her death, and when she purports by her will to dispose of the income the widow no longer is able to enjoy the property which passed to her for her maintenance as the "other half of her husband," and she is then incapable of enjoying the income, whether she had received it in her lifetime, or whether, as in the present case, she never had it in her possession while she was alive.

By merely making her will it is obvious that she did not dispose of the property inter vivos or during her lifetime, for she may revoke her will before her death, and it is in this sense, I think, that Sir Arthur Hobhouse referred to the income of her widow's estate as :

a kind of property the nature of which must remain undecided till her disposal of it or her death : (ibid, p. 334)

In Hunsburti Kerain v. Ishri Dutt Koer (26) Ainslie J., expressed a tentative opinion that, although accumulations of such income would not pass as stridhan, the widow might dispose of them under her will, but the learned Judge conceded that it would not be easy to reconcile such a view "with what he believed" to be the universal custom of "the country." I go further, for I would add that, in my opinion, so to hold would be to run counter also to the true conception of a widow's estate in Hindu law. I must refer now to two cases which appear to be direct authorities in opposition to the principles that I have endeavoured to explain. Sitaram v. Dulam Kunwar (27), and Rivett Carnac v. Jivibai (14). In Sitaram v. Dulam Kunwar (27) one of two widows jointly entitled to a widow's estate in property inherited from their husband, out of the income of the estate in her hands paid a sum of money due for Government revenue from the sons of the other widow and the sons' nephews. She afterwards obtained a decree against the persons for whose benefit the payment had been made, but died before the decree was satisfied. It was held that the heirs of the widow were entitled to execute the decree upon the ground that the right to realize this debt was "personal property (not necessarily stridhan)" of the widow who had obtained the decree. The decision in this case is in direct conflict with that in Chundrabulee Debia v. Brody (20), and with what I conceive to be the principles of Hindu law, and in my opinion, ought not to be followed. In Rivett Carnac v. Jivibai (14) the facts were not dissimilar from those in the present case, for the widow had orally agreed with one Kharya Bhana Dhunji that he should collect the rents of part of the property of which she possessed a widow's estate, and in consideration of receiving the right of collection Kharva agreed to make to the widow certain fixed monthly payments. At the time of the widow's death there were arrears due to the widow from Kharva under the said agreement, which Kharva after the widow's death paid to the husband's heir. It was held, however, that the arrears formed part of widow's estate. In that case, as in the present case, the widow ex-concessis had not disposed of the income in her lifetime, and with all due respect for the opinion of Sargent, C. J., and Farran, J, I think that it ought to have been held that the arrears fell into the husband's estate. Rivet Carnac v. Jivibai (14) has been animadverted upon by Beaman, J, in Ganpatrao v. Vaman Rao (28), and explained by Mookerjee, J., in Bhagabati Koer v. Sahudra Koer (25) upon the footing that the parties may have been governed by the Mayukha and the possession of Kharva was in law the possession of the widow whose agent Kharva was. But, with due deference, it surely can make no difference whether the arrears were deemed to have been received by the widow or not, for it was not pretended that she had disposed of them in her lifetime, and unless the decision can be supported under a system of law peculiar to the Bombay Presidency (which the learned Judges did not purport to apply, and which, as at present advised, I should hesitate to affirm) in my opinion that case was not decided in accordance with the general principles of Hindu law. I am, of course, aware of the decisions of the High Court of Madras, of which I think the leading case is Subramanian Chetti v. Arunachelam Chetti (29), in which it has been held that the income of property inherited by a widow from her husband is her stridhan upon the ground that whether as a matter of common-sense or of legal principle, but one view is possible, viz., that money so received is the absolute property of the woman descendible as such to her own heirs : see also Akkanna v. Venkayya (30), Sri Vikrama Deo v. Vikrama Deo (31), Parthas- arathy v. Venkatadri (32) ; see however, Ayiswaryanandaji v. Sivaji (33).

Again, in Akkanna v. Venkayya (30) it was laid down that the acquirer of property presumably intends to retain dominion over it, and in the case of a Hindu widow the presumption is none the less so when the fund with which the property is acquired is one which, though derived from her husband's property, was at her absolute disposal.

Now, the principles of law applicable to a Hindu widow's power of disposition may be different in Madras from those that prevail in the case of widows governed by the Dayabhaga or the Mitakshara (although it must not be understood that I am satisfied that any such difference exists), but if and in so far as the Madras decisions purport to lay down the above propositions as matters of general Hindu law, with all deference I venture to think that they do not correctly state the law of India.

In support of the first proposition two decisions of the Judicial Committee are relied on : Sorjeemoney Dossee v. Denobundoo Mullick (34) and Sowdamine Dossee v. Administrator-General of Bengal (35). In the first case it was held that the widow was "entitled absolutely in her own right" to certain accumulations of income that had accrued after her husband's death. It is clear, however, from the decisions of later Boards that the Judicial Committee have not regarded that decision as a statement of the general law binding upon them, and have resiled from it. Indeed, it has been pointed out that there were no questions in that case as to any conflicting rights between her heirs and the reversionary heirs of her husband, and their Lordships cannot, therefore, regard this case as a conclusive, or even a direct authority upon the question : per Sir Robert Collier in Gonda Koer v. Koer Oodey Singh (21)

while in Isri Dut v. Hansbutti Koerain (23) Sir Arthur Hobhouse observed that in Sorjeemoney Dasi's case (34)

all that was done, was to recognize her right to the full usufruct and control" of the accumulations : See also per Jackson, J., in Puddomonee Dossee v. Dwarkanath Biswas (36).

In Sowdaminee Dossee v. Administrator-General of Bengal (35), as pointed out by Lord Shand, in delivering the judgment of the Board, the circumstances in which she (i. e., the widow) obtained possession of this fund were very peculiar.

The widow had received the accumulations of the income that had accrued since her husband's death under a deed of arrangement by which a family dispute was settled. During the dispute the widow claimed this fund as her absolute property, and the deed of arrangement proceeded upon that footing, the question before the Judicial Committee being whether in the circumstances the fund was to be regarded as an accretion to the corpus of the husband's estate. Lord Shand stated that she claimed this income as her absolute property, and their Lordships can see nothing in the language of the deed of agreement, or in the transaction with Sham Churn Mullick, which can support the appellant's contention that she agreed to receive this income as capital in which she should acquire only the estate of a Hindu widow.

Their Lordships, therefore, held that the fund was received as income which, under the arrangement with Sham Churn Mullick, was her absolute property.

As I understand the decision in that case their Lordships were content to determine the issue that was before them, namely, whether the fund was to be treated as an accretion to the corpus of the husband's estate, or whether she received it as income to which under the deed of arrangement she obtained an absolute right : see Mt. Bhagbutti Dace v. Chowdry Bholanath Thakoor (22), and did not affect to determine any general principles relating to the power of disposition possessed by a widow under the Hindu law.

The second proposition, namely, that a Hindu widow must be presumed to intend to retain dominion over the income of property inherited from her husband follows as a corollary to the first, and in support of it reliance is placed upon the following dicta of Lord Phillimore in Raja of Ramnad v. Sundara Pandiyasami (37) :

Their Lordships think the answer to this is that a widow may so deal with the income of her husband's estate as to make it an accretion to the corpus. It may be that the presumption is the other way. A case has been cited to their Lordships which seems so to say. But at the outside it is a presumption and it is a question of fact to be determined, if there is any dispute, whether a widow has or has not so dealt with her property.

Reference appears to have been made in the course of the argument of counsel for the appellant to the case of Akhanna v. Venkayya (30), but at the hearing before the Judicial Committee the question that called for consideration was whether, having regard to the form of the pleadings and the course of the proceedings, the plaintiff was entitled to maintain the suit for arrears of income. In my opinion their Lordships did not pretend to consider, much less to decide, whether the proposition of law for which Akhanna v. Venkayya (30) had been cited was correct ; and it must not be taken that Lord Phillimore in that case intended to throw any doubt upon what I think now is clearly established, that the unexpended income derived from property inherited by a widow from her husband will follow the corpus, and on the death of the widow will descend to the husband's heirs, unless it is proved that during her lifetime the widow had disposed of it in such a way that the true inference from the facts is that she intended to treat it as though it were her own property. Naba Kishore v. Upendra Kishore Mandal (37) and cases cited supra.

As I apprehend the matter, however, the important circumstance to bear in mind in this connexion is not the nature of any presumption that may arise, but that the validity of a widow's dispositions is made to depend upon her intention to be inferred from the way in which she has treated the income. But if that be the test, (and in the present state of the authorities I am content to assume that it is) it is manifest that a widow does not receive the income as her own absolute property. For if she obtains an absolute proprietary title to the income and profits of the property as the heiress of her husband, how can her intention affect the course of succession or the validity of her dispositions ? If it is her stridhan it is her own absolute property with which she can deal as she chooses, and which, if undisposed of, at her death will descend to her heirs. Her intention is utterly immaterial, for the absolute title passed to her, not because of anything that she intended or did, but because she was the heiress of her husband. It is settled law, however, that if such unexpended income has not been disposed of by the widow in her lifetime it will follow the corpus of the estate, and descend, not to her heirs, but to the heirs of her husband, and that the validity of her dispositions inter vivos depends upon whether the true inference to be drawn from her treatment of the income is that she intended that the property should not form an accretion to her husband's estate. For these reasons it is clear, to my mind, that such income is not and cannot be her stridhan, and is not property to which by inheritance she obtained an absolute proprietary title. Bearing in mind what I regard as the cardinal factor in the situation, that a widow was intended to receive a right merely to enjoy the usufruct of her husband's property during the subsistence of her widow's estate, I am clearly of opinion that when she ceased to possess the capacity to enjoy the income she lost the power to dispose of it, and, as her will must needs speak from her death, that a Hindu widow is incompetent to dispose by will of the income derived from her husband's estate, whether such income had been received by her during her lifetime or had accrued due to her at the time of her death. It becomes unnecessary, therefore, to consider issue 2 whether the arrears of rent in suit passed under the terms of Priyatama's will to the plaintiff as her executor. But as the issue has been argued fully and strenuously it is desirable, I think, that I should state the opinion that I have formed upon it.

Now under the will Priyatama left to the plaintiff as the sole executor "the whole of my properties and moneys of which I shall die possessed." By a declaration of 7th September 1904, Priyatama had expressed the intention to deal with the said abovementioned properties, (i. e., certain immovable properties which this suit does not affect) and money including the said annual rent of Rs. 15,000 payable to me under the terms of the lease absolutely and independently of my husband's family, and so as to debar anyone after my death from claiming the said properties and moneys as reverting to the estate of my husband, and that I propose to and shall by will or deed dispose of the said properties and moneys in such manner as I shall consider proper.

At the commencement of her will, after specifically referring to the said properties and annual income and the declaration of 7th September 1904, Priyatama left "the whole of my properties and moneys of which I shall die possessed" to the executor of the will upon certain trusts.

Having regard to the provisions of the will it cannot, I think, reasonably be contended that the arrears of rent in suit formed part of the "properties" of the testatrix, but the question is, were the arrears "moneys" of which she died possessed? Now, "money" is a more comprehensive term than "cash," Sarojini v. Gnanendra (38). As long ago as 1725 it was held to mean "ready money and money due" and, having regard to the terms of the will then under consideration, to include arrears of rent, since these must be looked upon by all the rules of construction to be Mrs. Shelmer's money at the time of her death per Baron Gilbert in re Mary Shelmer's will (39).

The rule to be drawn from the authorities is that prima facie "money" means moneys in hand or receivable at call, but as "money" is a term of elastic connotation it will receive a wider or more restricted construction according to the context in which it is found, and the intention of the testator to be collected from the will as a whole: Rogers v. Thomas (40), Langdale v. Whitfeld (41), Collins v. Collins (42), Byrom v. Brandreth (43), Re Cadogan (44), in re Townley (45). In the present case, I have no doubt that Priyatama intended that the arrears of rent in suit should be included in the expression "moneys of which I shall die possessed," and that such arrears purported to pass under the will to the plaintiff as executor. But, as I hold that Priyatama was not competent to dispose by will of the sums in suit the claim fails, and the suit is dismissed with costs.

B. B. GHOSE AND BOSE, JJ.

Khatemannessa Bibi — Plaintiff—Appellant.

v.

Upendra Chandra Mandal and others — Defendants—Respondents.

Appeal No. 407 of 1926, Decided on 5th September 1928, from original order of Sub-Judge, Zillah Burdwan, D/- 20th August 1926.

(a) Civil P. C., S. 2(2) — Order limiting right to recover mesne profits—Order is of a nature of a decree and is appealable.

An order limiting the right of the decree-holder to recover mesne profits for a certain period is of the nature of a final decree as defined in S. 2 and is appealable as such : 23 All. 152 (P. C.), Foll. [P 804 C 2]

(b) Appeal—Competency—Appeal from preliminary order in execution — Execution subsequently dismissed—Appeal is still maintainable—Execution will proceed as per appellate judgment—Civil P. C., S. 97.

After the order limiting right of mesne profits and subsequent to the appeal of the decree-holder, the Judge proceeding with the execution required the decree holder to put in the Commissioner's fees for making enquiry according to the terms of his order. The decree-holder failed to put in the money and, therefore, the execution case was dismissed.

Held : that the mere fact that the Judge dismissed the application for execution subsequently would not debar the decree-holder from maintaining his appeal. If the appeal succeeds, the whole of the judgment of the lower Court goes and the execution will be proceeded with in accordance with the judgment of Court of appeal. P 804 C 2 ; P 805 C 1 Decree—Setting aside—Appellate decree being executed by lower Court — Executing Court from other materials finding that certain matters were not put before the appellate Court and so modifying the decree as the appellate Court would have passed if the matters were put before it—Executing Court's act was without jurisdiction — Proper course was review—Civil P. C., O. 47, R. 1.

The decree of the High Court ran thus : "It is ordered and decreed that the plaintiff do get khas possession against the tenant defendants, and it is further ordered and decreed that the plaintiff do realize mesne profits for three years prior to the institution of the suit, the amount to be determined in execution proceedings." The Judge upon other materials placed before him in execution proceedings found that the plaintiff had entered into a compromise with certain persons regarding certain lands and he came to the conclusion that as the compromise was not brought to the notice of the High Court, the High Court had made the decree as stated above.

Held : that no doubt, if the compromise had been brought to the notice of the High Court, the decree might have been made otherwise. But the Subordinate Judge had acted absolutely without jurisdiction in modifying the decree of the High Court in the way he thought that the High Court should have made its decree. If the defendant judgment-debtors had suffered in any way by reason of anything which the plaintiff had done and which was not brought to the notice of the High Court when the case was heard, the proper way was to have the decree amended either by way of review or by some other legal proceeding. The defendants not having done that, could not ask the Subordinate Judge to amend the decree of the High Court in the manner which the Subordinate Judge thought just and to execute the decree in that way. There was not ambiguity in the decree and the clear duty of the executing Court was to execute the decree as it stood. [P 805 C 1]

Gopendra Nath Das—for Appellant.Sitaram Banerji, Apurba Charan Mukherji and Urukram Das Chakravarti —for Respondents.B. B. Ghose, J.—In this appeal a preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the respondents that no appeal lies as the order of the Subordinate Judge was an interlocutory one. This question is settled by the decision of the Privy Council in Bhup Indar Bahadur Singh v. Bijai Bahadur Singh (1), where their Lordships held that an order limiting the right of the decree-holder to recover mesne profits for a certain period is of the nature of a final decree as defined in S. 2, Civil P. C., and is appealable as such. A second preliminary objection has been taken that after the order of the Subordinate Judge and subsequent to the appeal of the decree-holder preferred to this Court the Subordinate Judge required the decree-holder to put in the commissioner's fees for making enquiry according to the terms of his order. The decree-holder failed to put in the money and, therefore, the execution case was dismissed. As the execution case has been dismissed this appeal is incompetent. This objection does not commend itself to me. The decree-holder did not accept the decision of the Subordinate Judge on the points mentioned in his judgment and he did not want to proceed with the execution on the terms directed by the Subordinate Judge. If his appeal succeeds the mere fact that the Subordinate Judge dismissed the application for execution subsequently would not debar him from maintaining his appeal. If his appeal succeeds the whole of the judgment of the Subordinate Judge goes and the execution will be proceeded with in accordance with the judgment of this Court. This preliminary objection also fails.

The Subordinate Judge decided several questions in his judgment. It seems from the issues he framed and decided that he went behind the High Court decree. The decree of the High Court, with reference to which the appellant sought for ascertainment of mesne profits runs thus :

It is ordered and decreed that the plaintiff-appellant do get khas possession against the tenant defendants, and joint possession with the dar-patnidar defendants 32 and 39 viz., Makhan Chandra Mandal and Ishan Chandra Mandal to the extent of 12 annas and 16 gandas share of the land in dispute as in the plaint mentioned ; and it is further ordered and decreed that the plaintiff-appellant do realize mesne profits for three years prior to the institution of the suit, the amount to be determined in execution proceedings.

The Subordinate Judge upon other materials placed before him found that the plaintiff had entered into a compromise with certain persons regarding certain lands and he came to the conclusion that as the compromise was not brought to the notice of the High Court, the High Court had made the decree as I have stated above. The Subordinate Judge may be right in his conclusion. It may be that if the compromise had been brought to the notice of the High Court the decree might have been made otherwise. But the Subordinate Judge has acted absolutely without jurisdiction in modifying the decree of the High Court in the way he thought that the High Court should have made its decree. If the defendant judgment-debtors have suffered in any way by reason of anything which the plaintiff had done and which was not brought to the notice of the High Court when the case was heard, the proper way was to have the decree amended either by way of review or by some other legal proceeding. The defendants not having done that cannot ask the Subordinate Judge to amend the decree of the High Court in the manner which the Subordinate Judge thought just and to execute the decree in that way. There is no ambiguity in the decree and the clear duty of the executing Court was to execute the decree as it stands.

The Subordinate Judge has again fallen into an error in saying that there cannot be a joint decree for mesne profits of all the lands of the plaintiff but each set of the tenant defendants who are bound by the decree is liable for the profits of only those lands of the solenama that were held by them. The decree of the High Court does not make any such discrimination, and here again the Subordinate Judge's order is absolutely without jurisdiction.

There is a third point on which the Subordinate Judge has also fallen into an error, and it is in holding that the plaintiff decree-holder could not claim mesne profits exceeding Rs 901. This matter has been settled by this Court : see Bidyadhar Bachar v. Manindra Nath Das (2).

The Subordinate Judge is in error with regard to the heirs of defendant 30 Sitanath Muchi. It is admitted by both parties here that his heirs were brought on the record of the suit and they are bound by the decree made by the High Court.

The Subordinate Judge's order is set aside with regard to all these points stated above. The other questions decided by him are affirmed. The Commissioner should be directed to execute the decree of the High Court according to the view set forth above. In ascertaining mesne profits payable by the defendants for any lands to the decree-holder the Commissioner will of course enquire up to what date the defendants were in possession as trespassers of which particular lands as against the plaintiff decree-holder. If the tenants had given up possession to any person whose right the plaintiff had acknowledged even before the decree of the High Court either by giving up possession to such third persons or by paying rent to them, then the defendants would not be liable for mesne profits to the plaintiff over again for those lands. This is a matter for enquiry by the Commissioner subject to his finding being revised as usual by the Court. The case therefore is sent back to the Court of the Subordinate Judge for the appointment of a Commissioner for ascertaining mesne profits due to the decree-holder.

I cannot fail to observe that the decree-holder has made a very inflated claim, and if on account of that the Commissioner's enquiry is prolonged the Court will consider what costs the decree-holder would be liable to pay on account of this inflated claim.

The decree-holder is entitled to the costs of this appeal. The hearing-fee is assessed at five gold mohurs. Defendant 29 will not be liable for any costs.

RANKIN, C. J. AND C. C. GHOSE, J.

Enid Ivy Collins—Appellant.

v.

Walter George Collins—Respondent.

Appeal No. 9 of 1928, Decided on 1st May 1928, against a decree of Pearson, J. in the exercise of matrimonial jurisdiction in Suit No. 19 of 1927, D/- 21st December 1927.

Divorce Act, S. 10—Decree for judicial separation—Petition for divorce is not maintainable on the same facts.

Where a decree for judicial separation has been once obtained on the grounds of cruelty and adultery, a new petition asking for dissolution of marriage upon the same facts before the same Court armed with same jurisdiction is not maintainable. It would be not only contrary to the principle but inconvenient and in some cases highly unjust to permit a party to have two suits about the same matter: Green v. Green, (1873) 3 P. & D. 121; Mason v. Mason, (1883) 8 P. & D. 21; Fullerton v. Fullerton, (1922) 39 T. L. R. 46; Hall v. Hall, (1879) 48 L. J. P. 57; and Bland v. Bland, (1866) P. & D. 237; Dist. [P 808 C 1]

Ormond—for Appellant.

Rankin, C. J.—This is a wife's petition for dissolution of marriage brought on 18th July 1927. The learned Judge has dismissed the petition on the ground that on 1st June 1926 there was a previous petition by the wife against the husband whereby she sought and obtained a decree for judicial separation upon grounds of cruelty and adultery. That decree was granted to her on 17th August 1927. The present petition is founded upon the same acts of cruelty and adultery as founded the previous petition. The petitioner explains that she did not wish for a dissolution of marriage partly because she was a Roman Catholic and had scruples against divorce and partly because she desired to see whether her husband would take her back and also because she was able to get maintenance. She asked for a decree for judicial separation on the previous occasion though she was entitled by law to a decree for dissolution of marriage. It appears that these reasons no longer actuate the lady to the same extent. It appears further that she has been unable to obtain by process of execution maintenance or alimony from her husband. Accordingly she brings another petition on the same facts without alleging any new matrimonial offence committed subsequent to the decree for judicial separation and asks now for a decree for dissolution of the marriage. The learned Judge has ruled that without new matrimonial offences a new petition cannot be entertained in these circumstances.

Mr. Ormond for the appellant has brought to our notice that in Raydon on Divorce, 2nd edition, p. 133, it is said that after a successful suit for judicial separation irrespective of whether further offences were committed either before or since, a suit for dissolution of marriage may be brought, and it appears that in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 16, p. 498 a similar statement is made in an article of which the same learned author is one of the writers.

The authorities given for the petition so laid down are three, Green v. Green (1), Mason v. Mason (2) and Fullerton v. Fullerton (3); and reference has been made in this connexion to the case of Hall v. Hall (4). The learned Judge on going through these authorities has come to the conclusion that they do not support the proposition laid down, and upon going through these authorities and certain others, I am forced to the same conclusion.

The case-law upon this subject may be said to begin early. Before the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1856, the ecclesiastical Courts had no jurisdiction to grant divorce. That relief could only be obtained from the House of Lords. Accordingly one of the first questions raised on the new Act was whether a person who had brought a suit for the relief which was then possible before an ecclesiastical Court could after the passing of the new Act come to the Divorce Court and get relief under the new statute. That matter was passed upon in the case of Evans v.

Evans (5), and the case there was that a suit had been brought by a husband for divorce a mansa et thoro, in other words, for judicial separation on the ground of certain acts of adultery. That petition had been dismissed but an appeal was pending. In the meantime, after the new Act, he brought a suit for divorce and the question was whether the Court could entertain that suit. Lord Campbell and the Court over which he presided was of opinion that there was no estoppel that the former suit was for a different object but that here the suit was for a dissolution of the marriage before a tribunal armed with much larger powers and governed by different rules. The same class of case was dealt with in the case of Ciocci v. Ciocci (6). There a decree for divorce a mansa et thoro had been obtained in an ecclesiastical Court and the same party, namely, the wife brought a suit under the new Act for a judicial separation on the same ground. The Judge ordinary was of opinion that such a suit could not lie and he pointed out that a great violation of principle would be involved in putting a party twice on his trial on account of the same acts. He also pointed out that it could not be said in this case that the object of the suit was entirely different from that of the suit before the ecclesiastical Court. Those two cases are governed by the circumstance that under the Matrimonial Causes Act there was a new jurisdiction and a new remedy available to the petitioner.

Until that Act was passed adultery coupled with cruelty or desertion was not a cause of action for a decree of divorce but gave a much more limited right in ecclesiastical Courts. I now come to the case of Green v. Green (1), which is one of the cases upon which the petitioner relies. That was a case in which the Judge ordinary had to deal with the petition of a wife who had obtained a decree for judicial separation upon the ground of her husband's adultery. The wife afterwards instituted a suit for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery committed by the husband subsequently to the decree for judicial separation coupled with his cruelty to her during the cohabitation. Even in spite of the fact that the cause of action there included a new matrimonial offence subsequent to the decree

the Judge ordinary dealt with the matter as one of some difficulty. He came to the conclusion that the principle that a person cannot be vexed twice on the same facts was not applicable to such a case. He says:

The maxim that no one shall be twice vexed for the same cause is not in point, for the subject-matter of the two suits, as well as the remedies sought in them are different. The husband by his adultery subsequent to the former decree has committed a fresh matrimonial offence (for the decree of judicial separation is not to be treated as a license to commit adultery for the future) and for this offence, aggravated by the previous cruelty, the wife has had no redress.

He points out that cruelty condoned is revived by subsequent adultery. He also points out:

If she had obtained a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty she might afterwards have obtained a decree for subsequent adultery coupled with the cruelty already proved, and the fact that the respondent had previously been guilty of adultery would not have affected her position. It appears to me that the basis of that decision is the fact that there was a new matrimonial offence.

The same question came before the Court in the Court of appeal in 1883 in the case of Mason v. Mason (2) and Lindley, L. J., there says that the difficulty he had was removed by the authority of Green v. Green (1). That was a case where a husband had obtained a judicial separation. The wife continued to cohabit with the co-respondent. Then the husband petitioned for a dissolution of his marriage. In these circumstances it was thought that Green v. Green (1) was applicable and that the only question was the question of delay.

In 1866 the case of Bland v. Bland (7) came before the Judge ordinary where a wife had obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of the husband's cruelty and continued to live separate from him and the husband subsequently committed adultery, upon proof of such adultery, and of the decree for judicial separation, the Court made a decree nisi for the dissolution of the marriage.

Again in Fullerton v. Fullerton (3) the learned President acted upon the decision in Green v. Green (1) a case where a woman obtained a decree for judicial separation on the ground of adultery and afterwards applied for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of desertion prior to the petition for judicial separation and of adultery subsequent to the decree.

(5) 27 L. J. R. (n.s.), Pro & M. 57.

(6) 29 L. J. (n. s.) 60.

(7) [1866] P. & D. 237=15 W. R. 9=35 L.J. Mat. 104.

In these circumstances it appears to me that there is no authority for the proposition that upon the same facts before the same Court armed with the same jurisdiction the petitioner can present a new petition asking for a dissolution of the marriage. It appears to me that it would be not only contrary to the principle but inconvenient, and in some possible cases highly unjust to permit a party to have two suits about the same matter. One can imagine a case of a husband electing not to ask for a dissolution of marriage and then afterwards keeping in terrorism his right to ask for a dissolution of marriage. One can imagine a case in India or elsewhere where a matrimonial case might be presented to the Court in the form of petition for judicial separation in order that the parties might have a preliminary hearing of the evidence and then afterwards at a later stage present evidence on the same matter over and over again. In my judgment any such ruling as is asked for in this case would be opening the flood gates to practice which might be most inconvenient and objectionable.

In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed. No order is made as to costs as the respondent does not appear.

Although the entry relating to the rent settled is conclusive, any other entry, e. g., a person is tenant in possession through his tenants, is not irrebutable but shall be presumed to be correct until it is proved by evidence to be incorrect. [P 810 C 1]

(c) Bengal Alluvion and Diluvion Act—Plaintiff a cosharer and patnidar—Diarah proceedings taken as to accretions—Zemindar refusing to take settlement—Payment of malikana—Plaintiff recorded as tenant through sub-tenants—Plaintiff is entitled to claim accretions as appertaining to his patni tenures, but he cannot be compelled to take settlement of the accreted lands.

Plaintiffs were cosharers in a zemindari, and 16 annas patnidars under the zemindars. Certain lands had accreted to the zemindari, and diarah proceedings were taken by the Government for the purpose of the resumption and settlement of the accreted lands. The zemindars refused to take settlement of the accreted lands, and were granted malikana in respect thereof.

Page, J.—The plaintiffs are 7 annas and odd cosharers in a zemindari, and 16 annas putnidars under the zemindars. Certain lands have accreted to the Zemindari, and diarah proceedings were taken by the Government for the purpose of the resumption and settlement of the accreted lands, and the assessment thereof with revenue under Regulation 7 of 1822 and 1 of 1825, Act 31 of 1858, Act 9 of 1847, and Ch. 10, Ben. Ter. Act. The zemindars refused to take settlement of the accreted lands, and were granted malikana in respect thereof. The Government then took khas possession of the accretions, and in the Record-of-Rights the plaintiffs are recorded as the tenants of the separate diarah mahals Nos. 13618, 13116, which had been formed out of the accreted lands. Thereafter five certificates under the Public Demands Recovery Act (3 of 1913) were issued and notices were served upon the plaintiffs, for the recovery of arrears of rent and cesses alleged to be due from them as tenants of these diarah mahals under the Government. The plaintiffs under protest paid the amounts demanded under the certificates on 28th October, 1920, 26th March 1922 and 31st January 1924. On 21st July 1924 the plaintiffs brought the present suits for a declaration that they are not liable for the rent and cesses in respect of these two diarah mahals, and that the certificates were issued ultra vires and were null and void. The plaintiffs also sought to recover by way of refund the sums paid thereunder to the Government.

Three defences were raised by the Secretary of State for India :

(1) That the plaintiffs had failed to bring the present suit within six months of their petition denying liability under S. 9, Public Demands Recovery Act, and, therefore, under Ss. 34, 35 and 37 of the Act the suits were barred by limitation.

(2) That as the plaintiffs had failed to bring a suit within the time limited by S. 104H, Ben. Ten. Act the plaintiffs in the present suits were precluded under S. 104J and S. 111A from challenging the correctness of the entries in the Record-of-Rights to the effect that they were tenants of the diarah mahals under the Government and were liable to pay the rent, therein stated to be settled.

(3) That on the refusal of the zemindars to take settlement of the lands that had accreted to their zemindari the Government was entitled to treat the plaintiffs as tenants under Government of the new estates that had been created out of the accretions, and to recover rent and cesses in respect of the same from the plaintiffs.

The first contention on behalf of the defendant raised the question whether the only mode in which the validity of a certificate issued under the Public Demands Recovery Act, and the liability of the certificate debtor to pay the public demand thereunder can be challenged is by resorting to the machinery provided in the Act.

The general rule is that an affirmative statute giving a new right does not of itself and of necessity destroy a previously existing right. But it has that effect if the apparent intention of the legislature is that the two rights should not exist together : per Lord Cranworth, L. C., in O'Flaherty v. Mc. Dowell (1)

Whether the new remedy is exclusive or cumulative in each case will depend upon the true construction of the statute under consideration.

Now it is to be observed that in S. 37 the legislature, when limiting the common law right of the subject to seek relief in a Court of law, refers to "a certificate duly filed under this Act," and in my opinion, it is a condition precedent to the issue of a valid certificate that the "public demand" should be due and payable by the certificate debtor, and if at the time when the certificate is signed by the certificate officer there is no "public demand" due from the certificate debtor the certificate is ultra vires, and all the proceedings founded upon it are null and void. The ruling of the Judicial Committee in Balkissen Das v. Simpson (2) relating to the cognate provisions of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act (11 of 1859) is applicable to the Public Demands Recovery Act: see Janakdhari Lal v. Gossain Lal (3), Nandan Missir v. Harak Narain (4), Protap Chandra v. Secy. of State (5), Dhirendra Krishna v. Mohendra (6). In Balkissen Das v. Simpson (2) Lord Watson, in delivering the judgment of the Board, observed that the Act does not sanction and by plain implication forbids the sale of any estate which is not at the time in arrear of Government revenue. But the chief and substantial objection upon which the appellants' plaint is based is that at the time when their 5 annas share of the village Shahzadpur was sold there were no arrears of revenue due by them in respect of it. The result is that the whole of the proceedings of the Collector with a view to the sale of the 5 annas share were beyond his jurisdiction, and are not entitled to the protection given by the Act in cases where the sale is authorized, although it may be attended with some irregularity or illegality: ibid p. 842, Mutsaddi Mian v. Mahomed Idris (7) ; Mahomed Jan v. Gunga Bishun (8).

The issue to be determined, therefore, is whether the arrears and cesses in suit were due from the plaintiffs at the time when the certificates were issued. The defendant's second contention is that under Ss. 104 (J) and 111A, Ben. Ten. Act, the plaintiffs are precluded from asserting in the present suits that they are not liable as tenants to pay the rent settled and cesses in respect of the two diarah mahals as they have failed to challenge the entries to that effect in the Record-of-Rights as provided by the Act.

The answer to that contention is that under S. 104 (J), although the entry relating to the rent settled is conclusive, any other entry is not irrebutable but shall be presumed to be correct until it is proved by evidence to be incorrect. S. 103B (3), Priyanath Basu v. Tara Chand (9), Uma Charan v. Laksmi Narayan (10).

Now, the entries in the Record-of-Rights that the plaintiffs are tenants of the two diarah mahals and are in possession of the same through sub-tenants clearly are rebutted by the following facts found by the lower appellate Court, that: no settlement was or could under the law be offered to them as patnidars and that the plaintiffs were not in possession of the diarah mahals, and refused to take settlement thereof.

Nevertheless, the third contention of the defendant is that, notwithstanding the refusal of the plaintiffs to become tenants under the Government, after the zemindars had declined to take settlement of the lands that had accreted to their zemindari, the Government was entitled to treat the plaintiffs as tenants under Government and to claim rents and cesses from the plaintiffs in respect of the two diarah mahals. In my opinion this contention is ill founded. No doubt, in the circumstances the plaintiffs under the law were entitled to claim these accreted lands as appertaining to their patni tenure, but to contend that the Government could compel them to take settlement of the accreted lands even against their will is to advance a proposition opposed to good sense and justice, and for which, I apprehend, there is no justification in law.

In the present case it is not pretended that the plaintiffs have taken possession of the lands in suit, or that they have entered into any agreement to take statement of the lands from Government, and, in my opinion, at the time when the certificates were issued there was no "public demand" due from the plaintiffs; the certificates were ultra vires the certificate officer, and all the proceedings founded upon the certificates were null and void.

I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the declarations for which they pray and as the claim for a refund of the arrears and cesses that were paid under protest is in substance one for money had and received by the Secretary of State to their use Art. 62, Sch. 1, Lim. Act (9 of 1908) is applicable, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the sums paid under protest, except the amount of the payment on 28th October 1920, which was not made within three years of the filing of the suit. The decrees of the lower appellate Court will be set aside, and a decree in the above sense passed in favour of the plaintiffs with costs in all the Courts.

Cuming, J.—In the suit out of which this appeal has arisen the plaintiff sued for a declaration of her title and recovery of khas possession with mesne profits of two plots of land in area some nine bighas. Her case was that these two plots of land originally formed two chakran holdings. These chakran holdings were resumed in the year 1905 and on resumption were settled with one Badal Roy. It may be here noted that the plaintiff herself purchased the mehal in 1908. Badal Roy was unable to get possession with the result that the plaintiff brought two suits with regard to these plots of land Nos. 645 and 646 of 1911 and obtained in these two suits two ex-parte decrees. According to her she then took possession and settled some of the land with defendant 1. Thereafter further trouble arose and in proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., decisions were given which were against the plaintiff. Hence this suit.

(9) A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 341.

(10) A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 214.

The defence was that the plaintiff had no title, and that the defendants held the land under one Makhan Lal Mukerji also known as Janai Babu.

The trial Court framed a number of issues. All the issues were found in favour of the plaintiff and the suit was decreed. On appeal to the District Court the case was remanded for the determination of some further issues which had not been determined by the trial Court. The case then again came before the District Court with the findings of the Court of the first instance. On the issues that had been sent down to that Court for determination, the District Court dismissed the appeal. The learned Subordinate Judge held that the only evidence that the lands were chakran were two decrees and the proceedings held in execution thereunder. He found that these two decrees had been obtained by fraud and that the whole of the execution proceedings were also fraudulent, processes both in the suits and in the execution proceedings having been suppressed. But he held that three years had elapsed since the defendants knew of these decrees and hence they were barred from disputing the validity of these decrees. On this finding he dismissed the appeal. The defendants have appealed to this Court.

Mr. Mitter who appears for the appellants has put forward two contentions first that the defendants can plead that the decrees were obtained by fraud and need not sue to have them set aside; and secondly, that the defendants in defence are entitled to challenge the correctness of the decrees even though a suit to set them aside is time barred.

Now S. 44, Evidence Act, provides that Any party to a suit or other proceeding may show that any judgment, order or decree which is relevant under Ss. 40, 41 or 42, and which has been proved by the adverse party was delivered by a Court not competent to deliver it, or was obtained by fraud or collusion.

The present decrees are relevant under S. 40 and hence come under S. 44. They were put in as pieces of evidence. The defendants have shown that they were obtained by fraud and hence the Court cannot rely upon them. S. 44, Evidence Act, will be found discussed at great length by Banerji, J., with his usual clearness and lucidity in the case of Rajib Panda v. Lakhan Sendh Mahapatra (1) and it would not be possible for me to add anything to the learned Judge's remark. No doubt the defendants cannot now bring a suit to set aside those decrees, but they still can in defence contend that they were obtained by fraud and it is not necessary for them to bring a suit to set them aside. The Limitation Act applies to the bringing of suits and not to defences: see Mahadev Narayan v. Sadashiv Keshav (2) with special reference to p. 52 (of 45 Bom.) There is, therefore, in this case no evidence that the lands in question were chakran lands, it being found by the lower appellate Court that these decrees were obtained by fraud and hence their evidentiary value is nil. The plaintiff is, therefore, not entitled to eject the defendants on the ground put forward in the plaint, namely, that they held chakran lands.

The plaintiff-respondent contends that she is entitled at any rate to a declaration of her title to the lands in dispute. She would seem to contend that so far as her title is concerned that title has been admitted by the defendants. It is somewhat difficult to discover whether the defendants did at any time during the suit admit the title of the plaintiff to the lands in dispute. Certainly in their written statement they would seem to have put forward the case that the lands in suit did not belong to the plaintiff but belonged to the Janai Babus. In his statement, however, of the defendants' case when it was first on appeal before the District Court, the learned Judge there summed up the defendants' case:

The defendant contended that the decrees in Suits Nos. 645 and 646 of 1911 were fraudulently obtained; that no summonses were served in those suits but that they were fraudulently suppressed and that the proceedings in execution also were suppressed; on the merits they urged.

(1) [1900] 27 Cal. 11=3 C.W.N. 660.

(2) A.I.R. 1921 Bom. 257=45 Bom. 45.

that they were not service tenants but were ordinary tenants paying money rents and that they have acquired the right of occupancy so their possession was not liable to be vacated.

This may or may not be the impression of the learned Judge who heard the appeal, arrived at as to what was the defendants' case as made before him. When, however, the case came back again after remand the defendants appear to have once more contended that the plaintiff had no title. In the statement of the cases of the parties in the last Court of appeal the defendant's case was stated as follows :

On the defendant's appeal it was contended first that the Courts below have held that the plaintiff has not been able to prove her title or possession. It may be that the defendant after the issues sent down on remand had been decided in their favour went back to the former position that the plaintiff had no title. In another portion of the learned Judge's judgment he seems to have held that the lands lie within the patni mehal purchased by the plaintiff, but that does not show that these formed the alleged chakran holdings. In conclusion he states that these decrees and proceedings stand good and that plaintiff has proved her title and possession within the period of limitation on the strength of these which it is too late now to question.

Therefore, he apparently held that the plaintiff's title had been proved by means of these decrees which we have now found, are valueless as evidence having been obtained by fraud. It does not seem to us that the question of title has really been satisfactorily dealt with by the lower appellate Court. We think it will be more satisfactory if this question of title be gone into by the lower appellate Court. We, therefore, send back the case to the lower appellate Court to determine the question on the evidence now on the record as to whether the plaintiff has or has not proved her title to the lands in suit. Neither party will be allowed to adduce any further evidence.

With regard to costs, the appellants will be entitled to their costs before this Court, but the costs of the lower Courts will abide the determination by the lower appellate Court. If the plaintiff succeeds on the question of establishment of her title the parties will each be entitled to one-half of the costs, but if the plaintiff fails in proving her title and her suit is dismissed entirely the defendants will be entitled to all the costs incurred by them in the lower Courts.

Mukherji, J.—This appeal is directed against an order passed by the Second Subordinate Judge of Hooghly on 5th and 28th May 1925. By this order the learned Subordinate Judge allowed an appeal that had been preferred to his Court by a defendant in a suit which had been decreed ex parte and after setting aside the judgment and decree of the trial Court remanded the suit for further trial upon certain terms and conditions. The plaintiffs have now preferred this appeal. It appears that after several adjournments granted to the defendant on applications made by him for that purpose and upon the condition that he would pay the costs of those dates the case was eventually fixed for 26th February 1924. On that day the plaintiffs were ready but the defendant again put in an application asking for an adjournment on the ground that he had been attacked with pox and that, therefore, he was unable to appear in Court on that day. An order for adjournment was made on condition that the defendant would pay adjournment costs, Rs. 15; but on the said costs not being paid the case was taken up, certain witnesses for the plaintiffs were examined and the learned Munsif decreed the suit ex parte on the evidence that was before him. From this decree an appeal was preferred on behalf of the defendant and in this appeal the learned Subordinate Judge, being of opinion that on 26th February 1924 the defendant was prevented by sufficient cause from appearing in Court inasmuch as he had been attacked with pox and in that view holding that the adjournment asked for on behalf of the defendant should have been granted, passed the order to which I have referred. The plaintiffs, as I have already stated, have thereupon preferred the present appeal to this Court.

In support of this appeal two grounds have been urged on behalf of the appellants. The first ground is to the effect that on an appeal preferred from the ex-parte decree that was passed in this case the Subordinate Judge was not entitled to go into the question as to whether the defendant was prevented by sufficient cause from appearing in Court on the day the case was taken up. His argument in substance is that this is a matter which properly comes within the purview of proceedings taken under O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C., and inasmuch as the defendant did not resort to that remedy it was not open to him to urge at the hearing of the appeal that he had preferred, that he was prevented by some sufficient cause from appearing when the suit was called on for hearing and that, therefore, the learned Subordinate Judge was wrong in passing the order that he did in the present case. In support of this contention reliance has been placed on behalf of the appellants upon a passage which is to be found in the case of Jonardan Doley v. Ram Dhone Singh (1). That passage occurs in the order of reference made by Banerjee and Rampini, JJ., referring certain questions for consideration to a Full Bench of this Court and the passage runs in these words:

Upon the record, as it stands, the ex-parte decree may be wholly unassailable, but, if the defendant has an opportunity (which he was prevented from having owing to some sufficient cause) of placing on the record evidence which he could have adduced to substantiate his defence, no such decree should have been passed. The remedy in such a case cannot be by way of appeal which must ordinarily proceed upon the record as it stands. The proper remedy must be the one provided by S. 108, Civil P. C.

In my opinion, the passage relied upon by the learned vakil on behalf of the appellants is obiter. Apart from authorities it seems to me to be perfectly clear that when a suit has been decided ex parte the remedy by way of appeal from the ex-parte decree as well as the remedy by way of application under O. 9, R. 13 are both open to the persons against whom the decision was passed. It is true that if he avails of the remedy by way of application under O. 9, R. 13 he is in a position of greater advantage than he would be if he preferred an appeal from the ex-parte decree itself. This would be by reason of the fact that he would be able to establish by adducing evidence that he was unable to appear owing to circumstances over which he had no control, whereas if he prefers an appeal from the ex-parte decree itself the Court would have to proceed upon the record as it stands and to determine upon the materials that are on the record whether the application for adjournment was rightly granted or not. The question as to whether the order refusing the application for adjournment was rightly passed or not is, in my opinion, somewhat different from the question as to whether the absenting party was prevented by sufficient cause from not appearing in the course of the proceedings. The two no doubt are inter-related but the considerations are not quite the same. Reliance has in the next place been placed upon the decision of the Allahabad High Court in the case of Hummi v. Azizuddin (2). The decision taken as a whole no doubt does support the contention which the appellants have put forward but the facts of that case are entirely different from those of the present case, one distinguishing feature being that in that case an application under O. 9, R. 13, to set aside the ex-parte decree and to have a rehearing was as a matter of fact dismissed and it was after that the question again arose at the hearing of the appeal. A decision of the Burma High Court has also been referred to, namely, the case of

(1) [1896] 23 Cal. 738 (F.B.).

(2) [1917] 39 All. 143=36 I. C. 277=14 A. L. J. 1226.

Raj Chandra Dhar v. K. D. O. C. Ray (3). Now, with the utmost respect for the learned Judges who decided the case in Hummi v. Azizuddin (2) and the case in Raj Chandra Dhar v. K. D. O. C. Ray (3), I must say that if they intended to lay down as a broad proposition that in a case in which an ex-parte decree has been passed and the aggrieved party has not availed of the remedy by way of an application under O. 9, R. 13, he is precluded from raising the question of propriety of the refusal to adjourn his case in the appeal which he prefers from the ex-parte decree itself, I am unable to agree in the view which the learned Judges had taken in the case. There is a decision of the Madras High Court in the case of Sadhu Krishna Ayyar v. Kuppan Ayyangar (4), where the contrary view has been taken. There is, therefore, in my opinion, no substance in the first contention that has been urged on behalf of the appellants.

The appellants' second contention is that inasmuch as evidence had been taken and a decision on the merits had been passed it was not open to the learned Subordinate Judge to make an order of remand in the form that he did. It is said that the remand has been made in the form prescribed under O. 41, R. 23, Civil P. C., and that the said rule has no application to the circumstances of the case before us. This undoubtedly is so, but as has been pointed out in the case of Ghuznavi v. Allahabad Bank Ltd. (5) and Jethalal Girdhar v. Varajlal Bhaishankar (6), the Court is entitled to make an order of remand of this description under the provisions of S. 151, Civil P. C. It is now too late to contend that the powers of an appellate Court as regards remand are restricted to the cases specified in O. 41, R. 23, Civil P. C. It has been argued that inasmuch as the aggrieved party could have availed of the remedy under O. 9, R. 13, it was not open to the Court to make an order under S. 151 because the inherent power of the Court has got to be exercised subject to the provisions of the Code and only in such case with regard to which no provision has been made by the Code itself. Now S. 151 says:

(3) A. I. R. 1924 Rang. 137=2 Rang. 108.

(4) [1907] 30 Mad. 54=16 M. L. J. 479.

(5) [1917] 44 Cal. 929=26 C. L. J. 49=41 I. C. 598=21 C. W. N. 877.

(6) A. I. R. 1922 Bom. 267=16 Bom. 184.

Nothing in this Code shall be deemed to limit or otherwise affect the inherent power of the Court to make such orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice or to prevent abuse of the process of the Court.

If the defendant was entitled to raise the question of the propriety of the adjournment in the appeal that he preferred from the ex-parte decree and if that Court came to be of opinion that the adjournment should have been granted, then in my opinion, the only sort of order that could properly be passed by that Court would be an order setting aside the decree passed by the trial Court and remanding the case for retrial. This is the order which the lower appellate Court has passed. The Code does not appear to have made any express provision for a case of this nature. I am of opinion that no grounds have been made out why we should interfere with it.

In this view of the matter the order passed by the learned Subordinate Judge seems to be right and this appeal should be dismissed. Having regard, however, to the dilatoriness on the part of the respondents in the conduct of the proceedings in the Court below I am of opinion that no order should be made for the costs of this appeal in their favour.

Report by Sessions Judge.—Under S. 338, Criminal P. C., I transmit the record of the case noted below * to be laid before the High Court with the following report :

On the 5th December 1927 a peon of the civil Court (P. W. 1) went to execute a warrant of attachment of moveable property, Ex. 1, issued by the Munsif, 2nd Court, Khulna, against one Ahmed Sheik, judgment-debtor, who intimates his liability to pay the decretal amount, On this the peon attached four bullocks, two carts, a bedstead and a chair on the identification of P. W. 2, gomsata of the decree-holder. The peon and his party then removed the attached property to the river ghat some 7—8 rasis from the house of the judgment-debtor. Then Ahmed Sheik, Adiladdi Sheik, Kushai Sheik, Gani Sheik, the present petitioners, and some other persons came to the Ghat, one of them pushed Nani Gopal, P. W. 2 and they then took away all the property which had been attached. The peon in due course made a complaint to the Munsif, the proceedings were instituted in the criminal Court, as a result of which the four petitioners named above have been convicted under Ss. 183 and 147, I. P. C. and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 50 each or in default to suffer 1½ months rigorous imprisonment each.

At the time of the trial a number of defences were set up on behalf of the accused. In the first place the fact of attachment was denied in toto, and it was stated that P. W. 2 and some other men came to the house of the judgment-debtor before dawn, and were opposed and went away without effecting any attachment, it was also contended that the attachment made by the peon was not a legal attachment and that the peon had no legal justification for removing the attached property from the bari of the judgment-debtor, and hence no offences were committed in taking away the property from his custody. The lower Court has disbelieved the story of the accused regarding attempt at the stealthy removal before dawn, and has also held that the attachment effected by the peon was legal. I agree with the findings on these matters. I have no doubt from the evidence adduced that the facts as stated by the witnesses for the prosecution are true and that the property was removed to the river ghat after attachment and taken away from there forcibly by the accused party, including the present petitioners. As regards the fact of actual seizure in pursuance of the attachment, the evidence of the P. Ws. shows clearly that the peon actually touched some of the property attached, and distinctly pointed out the rest of the property stating that he was attaching it under the warrant. The evidence also proves satisfactorily that all the property was removed to the river ghat, and these facts are sufficient to prove attachment by actual seizure within the meaning of O. 21, R. 43, Civil P. C. I do not think, however, that the removal of the property from the bari of the judgment-debtor was a legal removal and it is for this reason that I consider it necessary to refer this case to the High Court and to recommend that the convictions under Ss. 183 and 147, I. P. C., should be set aside.

The lower Court has held that the removal of the attached property was not in accordance with the Rules issued by the Hon'ble High Court for the attachment of the moveable property. These rules are to be found under R. 93, p. 31, Ch. 1 of the High Court's General Rules and Circular orders (Civil). The first rule framed under main R. 93 is that :

the attaching officer shall give the debtor, or, in his absence any present adult member of his family, the option of having the attached property kept on his premises or in some other place in the village, on condition that a suitable place for its safe custody be provided by him.

In the present case no evidence has been offered on behalf of the prosecution to show that any such option was given to the judgment-debtor who admittedly was present, and indeed the evidence indicates that such option was not given. In such circumstances it must, I think, be held that the removal of the property from the bari was illegal. It has been argued on behalf of the opposite party at the hearing of this motion that the rules framed under main R. 93 cannot be treated as having the force of law, and that the particular rule in question is inconsistent with the provisions of O. 21, R. 43. The provisions of the latter order and rule are that the attaching officer shall keep the property in his own custody or in the custody of one of his subordinates, and it does seem that there is some inconsistency between this and the rule quoted above. I think, however, that the rules framed under R. 93 of the High Court Rules and Circular orders must be treated as framed by the High Court under the provisions of Ss 122 and 128, Civil P. C., and as superseding the directions of O. 21, R. 43. It appears that the rules framed under R. 93 were originally framed by the Local Government under the old Code of the Civil Procedure and the ruling reported in re Reference under Stamp Act (1) indicates that those rules must be treated as still in force until new rules are framed under the new Code of Civil Procedure of 1908. Rule 93 has recently been amended by C. O. No. 7 of 1926 which directed that for the words "the rules framed by the Local Government" the words "the following rules" should be substituted. This amendment seems to me to indicate that "the following rules" under R. 93 have been adopted by the High Court and that they must be treated as having the force of law. It has been pointed out on behalf of the opposite party that in the instruction given in the beginning of vol. 1 of the High Court's General Rules and Circular orders (Civil) it is said that all rules having the force of law are now issued as "Rules" i. e., every separate rule or set of rules is issued under the title "Rule No.", while general instructions for the guidance of judicial officers are ordinarily issued as "circular orders" under the title "Circular Order No.". It is further pointed out that the R. 93 and the amendment thereunder have been issued as circular orders, and consequently that they cannot be treated as having the force of law. There seems to be some force in this contention, but as the rules under R. 93 were originally framed by the Local Government and published in the Calcutta Gazette, I think that they must be held to have had the force of law, and that the rules as they at present exist cannot be considered to have any less force. If this view is correct then it seems to me that the removal of the property by the civil Court peon, without leaving any option to the judgment-debtor to provide safe custody for the property must be considered as illegal, and consequently that the subsequent taking back of the property by the present petitioners cannot be held to constitute any offence under Ss. 183 and 147, I. P. C., and S. 99, I. P. C., would not operate as a bar to the exercise of the right of private defence of the property.

I cannot say that on the merits the present petitioners have much claim to consideration, in view of the high-handed way in which they acted and of the main defence set up, which I believe to be false. As the question involved seems, however, one of some importance, I consider it necessary to refer the matter to the Hon'ble High Court and to recommend that if my view is correct that the rules framed under R. 93 must be regarded as having the force of law, the convictions and sentences of the accused in this case should be set aside.

Judgment.—We have caused enquiries to be made and it appears that R. 93 on p 31, Ch 1 of the High Court's General Rules and Circular Orders (Civil), as now amended, was made by the High Court and sanctioned by the Government of India under S 107 of the Government of India Act. It would, therefore, follow that this rule has now the force of law. In that view of the matter, we think that the reasons given by the learned Sessions Judge of Khulna in his letter of reference are sound and we therefore accept the Reference, set aside the conviction and the sentences referred to therein and direct that the fines, if paid, be refunded.

It cannot be too constantly or too emphatically stated that if a vakil leaves his money business to be conducted by his clerk, he is responsible for what the clerk does for purposes of civil liability. Sircar, Mritunjoy Chatterji and Roma Prosad Mookerjee—for the Vakil.

Prafulla Chandra Ghose—for Appellant in First Appeal No. 264 of 1924.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case a complaint was made to the Court informally by a letter dated 25th August 1927, from a lady who was appellant in a certain first appeal. It appears that the first appeal was ultimately dismissed because there was a sum of Rs. 200 for paper book costs in connexion, more particularly, with the B list which had not been paid after time had been given upon various occasions. A very substantial amount of over Rs. 1,200 was paid into Court, but owing to the failure after many opportunities to pay in a further sum of about Rs. 200 the appeal was ultimately dismissed for default by a Division Bench. That having taken place, the complaint to which I have referred was addressed to this Court on 25th August 1927, and the main purposes of the complaint were two. One was to say that the appeal had been dismissed without any notice to or demand from the appellant and although sufficient funds were placed with the vakil to meet his fees and other incidental expenses It may be noticed there that there is no question of the lady's stating that money had been paid to be deposited which had, in fact, not been deposited. The second element of complaint was that a sum of Rs. 624 had been withdrawn from the Court and no portion of the money had been returned to the appellant.

Now, that complaint having been lodged just before the long vacation a further complaint this time submitted by a vakil Babu Prafulla Chandra Ghose dated 14th December 1927, was sent to this Court by a letter. That letter refers to previous communications asking for an inquiry and goes on to ask that the Registrar should let the learned vakil know "the result of your enquiry into the matter." It further goes on to make a series of further charges and a series of further statements apparently by way of supplement to what had been made to the Court some months ago.

It is quite obvious that whatever observation or criticism these representations may be justly subject to, it was not possible for this Court to pass the matter over without taking proper steps both in the interest of the Court itself and in the interest of the learned vakil. It is of course quite unreasonable and absurd that a letter which is sent to know the result of an enquiry should go on to make a whole lot of new charges and in that respect this letter of December is thoroughly unreasonable and improper. It contains moreover a certain amount of indication that charges are made with too great lightness, because in one instance a charge is made that Rs. 170 was not paid to a certain learned pleader of this Court without any steps being taken to make certain there is any foundation for the charge.

It is extremely difficult to deal with complaints of this character without, on the one hand, omitting to enquire into matters which require to be investigated and without, on the other hand, being unfair to the learned vakil concerned. However, the Full Court thought it right to issue a rule calling upon the learned vakil to give his explanation on certain definite matters set forth in the rule, those matters being taken from the record of the case and the representations of the party complaining.

The learned vakil has very conveniently submitted his explanation first of all, in a written form and, secondly, by learned counsel Mr Sircar. It appears from his explanation first that there is no material before us at present which leads us to think that there is any prima facie case against this vakil of having received money for the purposes of depositing it in Court and having failed to deposit the same. Indeed, that charge is contrary to the case made by the lady herself when she applied to the Court to restore the appeal; and although that fact may not be conclusive against her, the position is, in my judgment, that we are not now presented with a substantial or reasonable case of that character which requires any further investigation. If the complainant still wishes to press any charge of that sort, she will do it at arm's length between party and party according as she is advised. There is nothing to require the Court to take of its own motion any further steps with respect to that.

The second matter is this : it refers to a sum of Rs. 621 which was withdrawn from the Court. Now, it appears that the cheque by which that money was repaid was a cheque made out to the learned vakil but that his name was written not by himself by way of endorsement on the cheque; and we now find that that was done by the clerk of the vakil who appears to have kept the money making a profession or pretence that he was keeping it in deposit with himself in order that it might be returned when the lady and her am-mukhtears were prepared to give a joint receipt. We are now told by the learned vakil that on discovery of this clerk's conduct he was immediately dismissed and we are further told that when he was dismissed his master was unable to obtain from him the account book which it was his duty to keep and which would show the transactions had by him on behalf of his master. That certainly is a statement of which, if true would put the learned vakil in a very awkward position when he comes to give a detailed explanation to the Court. We have no reason to think that that statement made in that way is untrue. I can only wish for myself that that matter had been fully and carefully stated in the original letter of explanation which was sent by the learned vakil on 21st September.

It cannot be too constantly or too emphatically stated that if a learned vakil leaves his money business to be conducted by his clerk he is responsible for what the clerk does for purposes of civil liability. At the same time if a learned vakil is deceived by his clerk or if his clerk does acts in fraud of him then of course it would not be right to hold that the learned vakil himself is guilty of professional misconduct. In the present case it would appear that the explanation which has been tendered to this Court is full. It would not appear that it is open to this Court or necessary for this Court to institute any further enquiry as to the matters dealt with in this explanation. In my judgment, therefore, these proceedings have brought the Court to this position that, while the appellant may in this matter, if she likes, take steps civil or criminal against the clerk or even should she be so advised against the learned vakil, this Court in its disciplinary jurisdiction has received an explanation which no longer makes it any part of the duty of this Court of its own motion to prosecute this matter further as a matter of professional misconduct. The explanation has been received and so far as this Court of its own motion is concerned, that is an end of the matter. It is not necessary that we should issue a further rule on the vakil. On the other hand, nothing has been said by us which can prevent the appellant from taking further steps if she is so advised.

Civil Rule No. 546-S of 1928, D/- 6th July 1928, in Appeal No. 809 of 1925 from appellate decree of Additional District Judge, Tipperah.

 Letters Patent (Calcutta), Cl 15 (Amended in 1927)—Condition of certificate is attached to a judgment of single Judge only—Right of appeal on difference of a Bench being deleted, no appeal lies from refusal to grant a certificate in such a case.*

A second appeal came up for hearing before two Judges of the High Court on 9th February 1928. The Judges differed in their opinion and the case was disposed of under S. 98 (2) instead of being referred to in pursuance of the proviso to S. 93, Civil P. C. The amendment to Cl. 15, Letters Patent, came into force on 14th January 1928. Application for certificate under the amended clause was refused. An appeal having been preferred against this order,

Held: that certificate is a condition attached by the amending Letters Patent only to the case of a judgment of a single Judge and the right of appeal given in the case of a difference of opinion where the Judges are equally divided is dealt with in the amended Letters Patent by being deleted altogether. No appeal therefore lay from the refusal to grant such a certificate. [P 820 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—In this case, the plaintiffs who are the applicants before us brought their suit on 25th November 1919. A second appeal was preferred to this Court in 1922 and, by the decree in that appeal, the case was remanded to the lower appellate Court which came to its decision on 3rd December 1924. From that decision, a second appeal was filed again to this Court on 6th March 1925. This was heard on 9th February 1928 by my learned brethren Cuming and Mukerji, J, who differed in opinion. Cuming, J, took the view that the appeal should be dismissed; Mukerji, J., took the view that the appeal should be allowed. Very unfortunately, instead of acting under the proviso to S. 98, Civil P. C., whereby the matter on which they differed could have been referred to one or more Judges of the Court, the procedure followed by that Bench was that the decree of the lower Court was declared to be confirmed under the opening words of sub-S. (2), S. 98.

After the second appeal had been brought to this Court in 1925, but before the hearing, the amending Letters Patent, which came into force on 14th January 1928, were passed. In these circumstances, the plaintiffs who had failed in their appeal presented to this Court a Letters Patent Appeal from the decision of the Division Bench and that appeal has been ordered to be accepted and registered, subject to any objection that may be taken by the respondents at the hearing of the appeal as regards its competency. In addition to presenting the Letters Patent appeal, however, the plaintiffs presented another appeal. It appears that, on 24th February 1928, they applied to Cuming, J, purporting to act under the amended Letters Patent for a certificate that the case was a fit one to be taken on appeal and the learned Judge refused that certificate on the same day. Thereupon, the plaintiffs presented an appeal from that order of refusal and, on that appeal being presented, a rule (546-S of 1928) was issued calling upon the respondents to show cause why that appeal should not be admitted. That is the only rule before us as regards this case.

Now, when the matter is examined, it is found to stand in this way: By the Letters Patent as they stood before the recent amendment, a provision was made by Cl 15 for an appeal, first of all, from the judgment in certain cases of one Judge of the said High Court or of one Judge of any Division Court pursuant to S. 13, High Courts Act:

and, in the second place, from the judgment in certain cases of two or more Judges of the said High Court or of such Division Court whenever such Judges are equally divided in opinion and do not amount in number to a majority of the whole of the Judges of the said High Court at the time being.

By the amending Letters Patent, Cl 15 is dealt with in this way: For that clause, an amended clause is substituted and, when the amended clause is examined, it appears that, as regards the first matter, namely, the judgment of a single Judge, it is provided first, that no appeal shall lie from a judgment in the exercise of the jurisdiction to hear appeals from appellate decrees but to that there is an exception, viz., that an appeal shall lie in such a case where the Judge who passed the judgment declares that the case is a fit one for appeal.

As regards the second of the two matters which I have mentioned as being dealt with by Cl. 15 as it originally stood, namely, an appeal from the judgment of a Division Bench of two or more Judges where the Judges are equally divided in opinion, the amendment made by the amending Letters Patent is to omit that provision altogether. Upon that state of facts in the circumstances of the present case, it appears that various questions arise. But one question which does not arise in any circumstances is the question of there being any necessity to have a certificate as a condition of bringing a Letters Patent appeal. That certificate is a condition attached by the amending Letters Patent only to the case of a judgment of a single Judge and the right of appeal given in the case of a difference of opinion where the Judges are equally divided is dealt with in the amended Letters Patent by being deleted altogether. In that view, it is clear that, whether or not Cuming, J., refused the certificate on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to give one or on any other ground, his decision was, in fact, right because there was no jurisdiction to give such a certificate and no such certificate could have operated anything. In this view, it appears to me that the present appeal from the refusal to give such a certificate must come to nothing and that the present rule calling upon the respondents to show cause why this appeal should not be admitted must be discharged. There is no question in such a case of granting a certificate; still less of any appeal from the refusal to grant such a certificate.

It remains to make quite clear that, when the appeal which has been registered against the decree dismissing the second appeal comes on for hearing, the question whether the effect of the amending Letters Patent is to take away the right of appeal which formerly would have existed will be disposed of by the Court. As regards that question, it is a special question and is not an easy question. It is entirely a separate question from the question which has been argued in the other rule (545-S of 1928) in which we have reserved judgment. In my opinion, it is more correct to allow that question to be determined in due course at the decision of the appeal. In fact, we have no right to dispose of that second appeal here and now without consent of parties and, in any case, learned advocate for the plaintiffs prefers that the question of his clients' right of appeal should be determined under the existing order when their appeal comes on for hearing and not now.

The only other question that remains is the question of costs of this rule. It is perhaps unfortunate for the parties that we have required this matter to be argued twice. But it is a new question and, in my judgment, it is not a case in which we ought to make either party pay costs. There will be no order as to costs. The rule will be discharged.

In the matter of S, a Vakil.

Civil Rule No. 915 of 1928, Decided on 15th August 1928.

* * Letters Patent (Calcutta), Cl. 10—Pleader accepting client's vakalatnama and papers but not filing the appeal—No specific agreement exempting him from liability in case of non-payment of fees—Pleader also not subsequently trying to file an application to get extension of time—Pleader's action amounts to not ordinary negligence but to grave professional misconduct—Legal Practitioner's Act, S. 13.

P came to Calcutta being desirous of presenting a second appeal. The vakil was at that time absent from Calcutta and P approached his clerk. Before P left Calcutta, the vakil who had returned had himself prepared the memorandum of appeal and P had signed and handed over a vakalatnama. P made certain payment before he left Calcutta in respect of the appeal, but he had not paid the whole of the sum. No specific agreement exempting the vakil from liability in case of non payment was entered into. The vakil subsequently left for the mufasil, relying upon instructions given by him to his clerk to file the appeal when the balance of the sum due had been paid by P. The vakil took no further trouble in the matter. On his return to Calcutta he made enquiries of his clerk and was informed by his clerk that the appeal had been filed although as a matter of fact it was not filed. Shortly afterwards he left Calcutta again having given his clerk instructions to arrange for some one to argue the appeal if it came up for he ring. The vakil knew nothing of the clerk's deception until he returned on the second occasion to Calcutta. At this time, the negligence, trickery and lies of his clerk were made fully known to him. The vakil agreed to move an application under S. 5, Lim. Act, and a draft memorandum of appeal and a draft affidavit of the clerk were prepared. But they were not actually filed. All other papers in the case were subsequently returned to P.

Held : that the vakil had accepted P's vakalatnama and had promised to file the appeal. It was not an ordinary case of negligence. It was in itself grave professional misconduct and a complete disregard of the client's interest.

Rankin, C. J.—Prasanna Kumar Sen, in May of this year, presented in person a petition to this Court complaining of the conduct of S, a vakil of this Court. By an order dated 28th May 1928, a rule was issued calling upon the vakil to submit to this Court an explanation of his conduct in respect of the matters complained of. At the hearing of this rule it was on 17th July 1928 ordered by the Court that a rule should issue calling on the vakil to show cause why he should not be suspended from practice or otherwise dealt with for professional misconduct : (1) in failing to file the second appeal, Prasanna Kumar Sen v. Hiralal Roy Choudhury and (2) in failing thereafter to make proper explanation to the Court of the circumstances with reference to such failure in order that time might be extended for the filing of the said second appeal. This rule was issued under the powers conferred by Cl. 10, Letters Patent 1865, which empowers the Court to remove or suspend from practice on reasonable cause any advocate; vakil or attorney.

In November 1927, the petitioner came to Calcutta being desirous of presenting two second appeals. The vakil was at that time absent from Calcutta and the petitioner approached his clerk, one Nando Lal Sarkar. The vakil having returned to Calcutta soon afterwards, the petitioner saw him upon the matter of the two proposed appeals. As regards one appeal, the vakil got Dr. Nares Chandra Sen Gupta to look into the papers and to draw up the memorandum of appeal. This appeal was duly filed and later on was duly admitted, Dr. Sen Gupta having argued it successfully under O 41, R 11. The other appeal is the matter with which this rule is more particularly concerned. The proposed respondents were Hiralal Roy Chaudhury and others. Before the petitioner left Calcutta on or about 19th December 1927, the vakil himself had prepared the memorandum of appeal and the petitioner had signed and handed over a vakalatnama.

Nothing in this case turns upon any question of payments made by the petitioner to the vakil. It is quite clear that the vakil was not acting out of charity and fully intended to be paid for his services. The petitioner made certain payments before he left Calcutta in respect of both appeals. He says that for the first appeal he paid in all Rs 33 and for the second appeal Rs 30, but he had not paid the whole of these sums by the time he left Calcutta. After the petitioner had left for his home he wrote a letter on 16th January 1928 to the vakil's clerk complaining that he had not been given any information about the numbers of the two appeals or copies of the grounds or accounts. He assured the clerk that he would do his best to get the necessary money and expressed a wish that the dates of hearing in the two appeals might be close together. On 8th February the clerk wrote informing the petitioner that the number of his appeal was 2513. This refers to the first of these two appeals which had in fact been filed on 19th November. On 15th March this appeal was admitted under O. 41 and the vakil's clerk wrote to the petitioner asking him to send money for service of notices upon the respondents and Dr. Sen Gupta's fee. The petitioner on 21st March wrote to the vakil saying that he was unable to pay Dr. Sen Gupta's fee and complaining that the clerk had not sent him any accounts of expenses and had not given him the number of the second of these two appeals, namely, the one against Hiralal Chaudhury. He enquired what was the number and what was to be the date of hearing of this appeal. By that time the latest date for filing this appeal had long gone by, namely the 15th February 1928. The reply to this is a letter from the clerk to the petitioner whereby the petitioner is told that this last-mentioned appeal was second appeal No 2860 and that it had been dismissed summarily. The clerk refused to send copies of documents unless money was forthcoming and pressed for Rs 28 for service of notices in the other appeal which had been admitted. The petitioner on 18th April wrote to the clerk complaining that he had been given no information as to whether there was any remedy by review or otherwise against the dismissal of the appeal against Hiralal Chaudhury and no information as to the pleader who appeared in the case or the reason for which the appeal was not admitted. Complaint was also made that no accounts had been given to the petitioner for the sums of money which he had paid. On 20th April the clerk wrote in reply to the petitioner that the vakil had been present, that there was no chance of a review and that the rejection of the appeal could not be helped. It was also stated that it had been argued by the son-in-law of the Judge who heard it. Demand was at the same time made for Rs 8 for the other appeal and also for the vakil's fees. There is another letter on the following day (21st April) from the clerk to the petitioner. This letter makes out that the vakil has been very much displeased at the petitioner's complaints and apparent lack of confidence. It says that the appeal which was dismissed was argued before a certain Judge of this Court and that the petitioner was represented by a relative of that Judge. It calls upon the petitioner to make further payments.

In these circumstances the petitioner not unnaturally became highly dissatisfied and suspicious and came to Calcutta. He there learnt that no appeal had ever been filed in the case against Hiralal Chaudhury and he went to another vakil to see what could be done in the circumstances. The clerk wrote to his master requesting him to come to Calcutta at once and before the end of the month S. returned.

The case for the respondent vakil is that he has very little practice in the High Court, but that he has extensive landed properties in the Rajshahi and Pabna Districts over which he had been having considerable trouble involving his presence and personal supervision; that on account of this he was obliged to be in the mufassil for substantial periods, going there before the payment of the January kist and staying on till the payment of the March kist of Government revenue. It is admitted that he took from the petitioner the papers and the vakalatnama for the proposed appeal in the case against Hiralal Chaudhury. He says that he left Calcutta on 18th November 1927 and that before leaving Calcutta he had himself drawn up the grounds of appeal and had received Rs 20 for costs in that connexion; that when he left Calcutta he left instructions with his clerk to file the two appeals on getting the requisite costs from the petitioner. Leaving the matter thus, the vakil, according to his own case, left for the mufassil, relying apparently upon instructions given by him to his clerk to file the appeals when the balance of the sum due had been paid by the petitioner. From that point onwards it does not appear that the vakil took any further trouble in the matter and he did not return to Calcutta until the first week in March. He states that he then made enquiries of his clerk and was informed by his clerk that both the appeals had been filed; that shortly afterwards he left Calcutta again having given his clerk instructions to arrange for some one to argue the second of the two appeals if it came up for hearing under O. 41, R. 11 during his absence; that he returned to Calcutta about the end of April and was told by the clerk that the second of the two appeals had not been filed, and that the clerk had been falsely representing to him and to the petitioner that it had been filed and dismissed.

The petitioner says that the vakil himself had written him a letter dated 20th April, but I find that this is not proved. I further accept the statement of the vakil that his clerk had in March informed him that the appeal had been filed and that he knew nothing of the clerk's deception until he returned to Calcutta at the end of April 1928. At this time, however, it is clear that the negligence, trickery and lies of his clerk were made fully known to him. The petitioner complains that the vakil at first agreed to apply for extension of the period of limitation and to make an affidavit for that purpose, but that he afterwards refused to file any such petition. The petitioner says he could get no other vakil of the High Court to do this for him, that he was asked to take back his papers and Rs. 30 but refused to do this and that in these circumstances he was obliged to apply to the Court in person.

The vakil's case, on the other hand, is that he consulted Dr. Sen Gupta and that Dr. Sen Gupta drew up a draft affidavit to be sworn by the clerk for the purpose of obtaining an extension of time. That draft affidavit is in evidence, having been produced by the vakil. In para 3 it states that the appeal in the case against Hiralal Chaudhury was not immediately filed as the money paid by the appellant was not sufficient to cover all the expenses; that when the vakil left Calcutta he left instructions with the clerk to arrange for all his work, including the filing of the appeal in time; that the clerk's wife fell seriously ill at the time, so that the clerk had to leave Calcutta suddenly and in great mental distress, without making any arrangements for all the cases, and had to stay away from Calcutta; and that in the midst of the worry and trouble the fact that the petitioner's case had to be filed escaped the clerk's memory. The draft affidavit goes on to say that the clerk discovered his mistake on receiving a letter from the petitioner, but was filled with so much fear on account of his failure of duty that he did not venture to tell the petitioner or his master what had happened. It also states that when his master was informed of the true state of affairs, the clerk was instructed by him to make over the papers to the client to take such action as he thought fit.

The respondent vakil in his affidavit says that when he learnt the true state of affairs, he informed the other vakil to whom the petitioner had gone in his absence, that he would himself move an application under S. 5, Lim. Act, with an affidavit of his clerk in support of the application; that he informed the petitioner that this was all that he could now do for the petitioner under the circumstances, that the petitioner asked him to explain the affidavit in Bengali, that, after hearing it, the petitioner said that he was not agreeable to file an affidavit in these terms; and that on the next day the petitioner asked for his papers and was given back the papers without being required to sign a receipt as he said that he was unable to write. The petitioner's case is that he has never received his papers back. The draft memorandum of appeal and the draft affidavit of the clerk were certainly not given to the petitioner because they were produced before this Court by the vakil, but on the evidence in this case I do not think it would be safe or right to hold as against the vakil that he had retained the other papers in the case.

It appears to me, however, that on the vakil's own showing he has been guilty of grave misconduct. I find it amply proved that he undertook before he left Calcutta to file both the appeals. I am not at all impressed by the suggestion that this undertaking was in any way conditional upon the payment of further money by the petitioner. The affidavit of the vakil discloses defective notions on his part as to his responsibility for his clerk's monetary transactions with his clients and a statement in para 17 of the vakil's second affidavit appears to me to be particularly wrong and disingenuous:

I say further that the client had apparently specially entrusted my clerk with the business of looking after the cases and that my clerk carried on the entire correspondence with him on his own responsibility and without my knowledge.

In my judgment the petitioner has established conclusively that before he left Calcutta, in November 1927, the vakil had accepted his vakalatnama and undertaken his case. He had promised to file the appeal in the case against Hiralal Chaudhury and had never at any time made a stipulation that unless the petitioner supplied him with a particular sum of money he would not act for the petitioner. Instead of doing his duty by the petitioner in these circumstances the vakil left Calcutta for several months, leaving everything to his clerk a person obviously of the lowest instincts and utterly unfit to be trusted in any matter of importance. I cannot find that the vakil took any steps to enquire what the clerk was doing, whether the appeal was filed, and whether the petitioner had paid more money or not. He says that in March he asked the clerk whether the appeal had been admitted, but even on his return to Calcutta he did nothing more. In the meantime apparently the clerk was conducting correspondence with the petitioner after his own fashion.

This is in my judgment no ordinary case of negligence. It is in itself grave professional misconduct and a complete disregard of the client's interest. Persons who are admitted to practice in this Court cannot be allowed to share in a valuable monopoly and at the same time to neglect their duties in a manner so unconscionable.

I regret to say that my view of this vakil's conduct, when he discovered the consequence of his own unparalleled neglect of duty, is that it was neither frank as regards the Court, nor just to the petitioner. An affidavit is drafted which consists of nothing but shabby and absurd excuses made upon the footing that the petitioner was partly to blame for not making further payments and that the clerk was partly excused by domestic troubles. In his second affidavit the vakil says that the statements made in paras. 6 and 7 of the affidavit of the clerk were based upon statements made by his clerk which he believed to be true. This statement I do not accept, and I am clearly of opinion that the petitioner has proved that because he would not identify himself with this thoroughly treacherous and disingenuous document, the vakil would have nothing more to do with the petitioner. In my judgment the petitioner was entirely in the right to refuse to be any party to an application made to the Court after this manner. I cannot too strongly condemn the contention that the vakil was making any reasonable endeavour to retrieve his client's case or to accept the responsibility for the loss suffered by his client by the vakil's neglect of duty.

Mr. A. N. Chaudhury on behalf of the vakil, while admitting that his client is plainly guilty of professional negligence, has urged us to hold that the case is not one which calls for an order suspending the vakil from practice. I regret to say that I cannot take this view. It is most necessary that conduct such as is disclosed in this case should be visited with severity, and the most lenient order which it is open to us to make is that S be suspended from practice in this Court for a period of six months from to-day.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for rent. The plaintiffs are the appellants to this Court. It would appear that the suit was brought by a manager under the Court of Wards on behalf of a number of persons. It would further appear that the suit was actually decided by the Subordinate Judge in appeal on 9th January 1925. On 11th January 1925, that is, before the appeal was filed in this Court which was done on 23rd March 1925, one of these disqualified proprietors, Durga Prosad Sen Gupta, died. No attempt was made to bring his heirs on the record before the appeal was filed; and the appeal was filed in his name by the manager although at the time he was actually dead. An application was made on 9th November 1925, for the substitution of his heirs. This application was rejected. The position, therefore, is that one of the co-sharer landlords is not an appellant in this appeal. The suit being a suit for rent the appeal in its present form is incompetent. The appeal, therefore, stands dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—This appeal is by the plaintiff in a suit for redemption of a mortgage bond by way of conditional sale. The mortgage was executed on 23rd November 1905 by one Ananda Chandra De, and the plaintiff has acquired Ananda's interest under a kobala. The first Court decreed the plaintiff's suit, ordering that the plaintiff shall recover possession on payment into Court within seven days of the decree the sum of Rs. 700 which is the amount for which the property was mortgaged. The Court of appeal below reversed the decree of the first Court. Its findings were that the transaction was not a mortgage but an out-and-out sale, and that the plaintiff had acquired no title under his kobala which was not a bona fide deed. The learned Subordinate Judge's ground for holding that the deed which expressly states that it is a mortgage by way of conditional sale is an out-and-out sale, is that the word "bikrita" which means "sold" had been written in one part of the document and had been penned through prior to registration. From the fact that the word "bikrita" had been written in the document even though it had been penned through, the learned Subordinate Judge thought himself justified in saying that the transaction was an out-and-out sale. The learned Subordinate Judge has also treated as good evidence, with regard to the intention of the parties, various statements made by witnesses on the side of the defendants. The learned Subordinate Judge was clearly in error in admitting evidence on the question of the intention of the parties when that intention is clearly expressed in the deed. The finding by the learned Subordinate Judge that the plaintiff had acquired no title and that his deed is not bona fide is not based on anything more than his finding immediately above to the effect that he is not satisfied that the plaintiff had paid anything to Ananda. It is perfectly immaterial whether the plaintiff had paid anything to Ananda or not. It is open to Ananda to make a gift to the plaintiff if he so chose, and the plaintiff is Ananda's grandson-in-law.

It has also been urged on behalf of the respondents that there are two other grounds on which the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge may be supported. It is contended that according to the terms of the deed executed by Ananda, the mortgage should be turned into an out-and-out sale on the expiry of six years from the date of the execution of the deed. Such a clause in the mortgage is to be expected in a mortgage by way of conditional sale. In fact if reference is made to S. 58, T. P. Act, it will be found that it is when such a clause exists in the deed or when such other clauses there mentioned, with which we are not concerned, exist that the transaction is a mortgage by way of conditional sale. It has also been urged that on the expiry of six years the mortgagee defendant executed the kabuliyat in favour of the landlord, the date of that kabuliyat being a little over 12 years prior to the institution of the suit. The contention is that the mortgagee by executing a kabuliyat dispossessed the mortgagor and acquired title by adverse possession for more than 12 years. There is no force whatever in this contention. The mortgagee could not dispossess the mortgagor.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed, the judgment and decree of the learned Subordinate Judge are set aside and those of the Munsif are restored with costs in this Court and in the Court of appeal below.

Cuming, J.—In the suit out of which this appeal arises the plaintiffs sought for a declaration of title to and for a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from taking sand from the bed of the river Tumni. Their case briefly was that a certain property was sold for arrears of rent in 1886. One Fulkumari Debi who was a dar-patnidar under patni deposited the amount due and obtained possession of the patni as girbidar under S. 13 Regn. 8, 1819, on 29th September 1886. The plaintiffs' case was that by various transfers and devolutions the girbi right and interest had passed to her and that she was in possession of the patni. The main contention of the defendants was that they had taken a lease of the underground coal and other minerals from the zemindar, Maharaja of Burdwan, and also from the patnidars in 1918; and, therefore, they had a right to the sand. They denied the plaintiff's girbi or possession and alleged that the plaintiffs were not girbidars but were merely benamdars of the patnidars who were their lessors. The trial Court found that the plaintiffs were in possession of the patni interest of the mouza Joalbhanga as girbidars, that they were not benamdars and that the defendants had no right to the sand as against the plaintiffs; it, therefore, decreed the suit. The defendants appealed to the District Court and that Court dismissed the appeal. The Court held that the plaintiffs were not benamdars and the defendants had no right to the sand of the river Tumni.

The learned advocate for the appellants has argued four points. First, it is argued that the Court below has erred in law as to the legal rights of the girbidars as contemplated under S. 13, Regn. 8, 1819. Secondly, it is said that on a proper and legal construction of the Indenture of 1918 the Courts below ought to have held that the appellants are entitled to the sand in dispute. Thirdly, it is said that the Courts below have erred in law in thinking that the plaintiffs are not bound by the terms of the said Indenture of 1918. Lastly, it is said that on the case made in the plaint and on the findings arrived at by the Courts below they ought to have held that the plaintiffs cannot maintain the present suit specially in the absence of the patnidars. This last ground namely the maintainability of the suit in the absence of proper party, was not pressed. The last three other grounds really in effect depend on the decision of the question as to what are the rights of a girbidar. A girbidar may be said to be creations of S. 13, Regn. 8, 1819 and the material portion of that section is to be found in clause 4 of that section where it begins with the words:

But shall be considered as a loan made to the proprietor of the tenure preserved from sale by such means and the taluk so preserved shall be the security to the person or persons making the advance who shall be considered to have a lien thereupon in the same manner as if the loan had been made upon mortgage; and he or they shall be entitled on applying for the same to obtain immediate possession of the tenure of the defaulter in order to recover the amount so advanced from any profits belonging thereto.

I may say, as far as I can see, these are more or less the rights of a usufructuary mortgagee and this view is supported by the decision of this Court in the case of Boistub Churn Bhudro v. Tara Chand Banerji (1), where the learned Judges remarked that the position of girbidars was substantially the same as that of a mortgagee in possession under a usufructuary mortgage. Mr. Bose has referred us to three other cases, Lala Bharub Chandra Karpur v. Lalit Mohun Singh (2), Ram Jiban v. Taj-ud-din (3) and Jakhomull Mehera v. Saroda Prasad Dey (4). He admits that these last three decisions throw no light on the problem with which we are now concerned. As I have stated before it seems to be quite clear that the position of the girbidars is the same as that of a usufructuary mortgagee in possession; and that the patnidar is not entitled to disturb his possession by granting a lease to other persons, and lease so granted is not in any way binding on the girbidars. These contentions are, therefore, decided against the appellants.

The last argument by Mr. Bose on behalf of the appellants is "what is the nature of sand." Mr. Bose seems to contend that sand being a mineral patnidars had no right to the sand and the girbidars also had no right to the sand. He seems to contend that the right to the sand belongs to the zemindar who has joined in granting him a lease. The zemindar apparently was one of the grantors of the lease to the defendants. The original lease by which the patni was created has not been produced and in its absence it is impossible to say what right the zemindar reserved for himself and what rights he demised to the patnidars. In the absence of this lease it is impossible to decide this point. Mr. Bose further argues that under O. 41, R. 7, Civil P. C., he should be allowed to put in some additional evidence. The additional evidence in question is a judgment of a certain suit and it is dated 13th May 1927. This is a suit apparently brought by the patnidars for a declaration that the money due for arrears of rent has been paid and for recovery of possession. No copy of this judgment has been served on the respondents and we are not prepared at this stage to allow that evidence to be placed before us.

The result, therefore, is that this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Appeal No. 536 of 1928, Decided on 16th August 1928, from judgment of Sess. Judge, Bakarganj.

Criminal P. C., S. 293—Jury's verdict agreeing with whatever opinion the Judge might form—Jury sent again for consideration—Returning verdict of guilty—Judge not agreeing with the verdict but accepting it—Retrial ordered.

The jury returned a verdict that they agreed with whatever opinion the Sessions Judge might form. The jury was sent back to bring in a proper verdict after consideration. The jury returned within a short time with a verdict of guilty. The Judge convicted the accused although he did not agree with the verdict.

Held: that the jury apparently abdicated their functions in favour of the Judge and did not consider the case at all. The conviction and sentence should be set aside and retrial ordered. [P 828 C 1]

Judgment.—In this case the accused were tried under S. 328, and 304, I. P. C., before the learned Sessions Judge of Bakarganj and a jury. After the learned Judge had charged the jury it appears that the jury retired at 4-10 p. m. and returned at 4-25. When they returned, the verdict of the jury was given as follows:

Q. Are you unanimous? A. Yes.

Q. What is your verdict? A. We agree with whatever opinion you may form (hujurer je rai amader).

The jury were accordingly directed at 4-26 p. m. to go back and bring in a proper verdict after consideration of the evidence. They came back at 4-35 p. m. and on being questioned they said that they found all the three accused not guilty under S. 304 and by a majority of 4 to 1 found all the three accused. Montajuddi, Abdul Barik and Akram Ali, guilty under S. 328, I. P. C. In this state of the record it is impossible not to feel that the jury did not properly consider the case at all. The jury, as has been pointed out in several cases, are the only persons who can pronounce a definite opinion on the guilt or otherwise of the accused who are tried before them. In this case they apparently abdicated their functions in favour of the Judge. No doubt, the Judge very properly sent them back, but it does not appear from the time occupied by the jury in their second deliberation that they properly considered the case and brought in a genuine verdict. We are confirmed in this because of what the learned Judge has said himself in his finding and sentence, namely; "I accept this verdict although I do not agree with it." There is, therefore, all the more reason why this matter should be further considered by the learned Sessions Judge and a fresh jury.

The result is that the verdict of the jury is set aside and with it the conviction and the sentence, and the matter must go back to the learned Sessions Judge for retrial before him and a fresh jury.

Civil Rule No. 848 of 1928, Decided on 30th July 1928, from order of Dist. Judge, 24-Pargannas, in Misc. Appeal No. 92, of 1928, D/- 10th May 1928

Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 90—Auction-purchaser is not a person whose interests are affected by the sale and cannot apply under the rule.

An auction purchaser is not a person whose interests are affected by the sale but is a person who acquires interest in the property sold by the sale and he has no locus standi to make an application under O. 21, R. 90: 3 P.L.J. 516, Rel. on; 38 M. Hira Lal Chakravarty—for Petitioner Amtika Pada Choudhury and Bhabesh Narayan Bose—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—The rule arises out of an application made by the auction purchaser who is the opposite party to the rule under O. 21, R. 91, Civil P. C., to set aside a sale on the ground that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property sold. The case made by the opposite party is that the property purchased by him was wrongly described in the sale proclamation. The wrong description is said to have consisted in (i) overstatement of the area: (ii) mention of the existence of a pucca privy on the land which really does not exist. It is said that if the auction-purchaser had not been misled in these two particulars he would not have purchased the property in question.

The Munsiff dismissed the application being of opinion that O 21, R 91 of the Code has no application to the present case and that the remedy of the purchaser was by a suit.

An appeal was taken against this order to the District Judge of 24 Pargannas.

The learned District Judge held that O. 21, R. 91 did not apply to the present case and stated that this point was conceded before him on behalf of the purchaser. But the learned District Judge remanded the case to the Court of first instance for a decision of the question whether there has been a material irregularity and whether the applicant has suffered substantial injury. The learned District Judge held, following the decision of the Madras and Allahabad High Courts and dissenting from the view taken in the Patna High Court, that an application under O. 21, R. 90 could be made by an auction-purchaser as he is a person whose "interests are affected by the sale" within the meaning of the said rule.

This rule was obtained for revision of the order of the learned District Judge directing a remand and the main ground on which this rule was issued was that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain an application under O. 21, R. 90, at the instance of the auction-purchaser and consequently the learned District Judge having held that O. 21, R. 91, did not apply was not right in remanding the case on the footing that the application of the auction-purchaser could be treated as one under O. 21, R. 90.

It has been held on the highest authority that an auction-purchaser could not apply to set aside a sale under S. 311, Civil P. C., 1882, for S. 311 was limited "to the decree-holder or any person whose immovable property has been sold" which an auction purchaser was not: see Brij Mohan Thakur v. Uma Nath (1).

In the present Code of 1908 the words are: "Any person whose interests are affected by the sale" may apply to set aside the sale under O. 21, R. 90. Can an auction-purchaser be regarded as such a person? I think not; for the interest here contemplated must refer to an interest not "created by the sale" but affected by the sale. It is the sale to the auction purchaser which is to affect the interests and therefore the interest must have existed before the sale which affects that interest. It is true that if I contrast the language of O 21, R. 89 I find that R. 89 contemplates an application by persons either owning the property sold in execution or holding an interest therein by virtue of a title acquired before such sale. It is improbable as has been pointed out in Abdul Aziz v. Tafizuddin (2) that the divergence of language between O. 21, R. 90 and R. 89 is accidental. It is true that the words "persons whose interests are affected by the sale" are of wider import than the words of the Code of 1882, viz., "person whose immovable property has been sold." The latter expression was construed to mean "any person whose interests were affected by the sale" by a Full Bench of this Court in the case of Asmutennessa Begum v. Asrag Ali (3) and the legislature has adopted those words in the Code of 1908. It is necessary to look into the previous history of the legislation in order to determine whether the legislature intended to make such a violent departure from the provisions of the Code of 1882 so as to include an auction-purchaser within the expression "person whose interests are affected by the 'sale.'" With great respect to the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court I do not think the reference to the previous decision of the Judicial Committee in Brij Mohan

Thakur v. Uma Nath Choudhury (1) relating to the corresponding provision under the Code of 1882 is irrelevant in the present controversy. see: Ravinandan v. Jagannath (4) (Walsh J., p 484). The legislature must be taken to have knowledge of the decision of the Judicial Committee in Brij Mohan Thakur v. Uma Nath Choudhury (1). What was there to prevent them from using the word "the auction purchaser" in O. 21, R. 90 after the word "decree holder" if it was their intention to nullify the effect of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Brij Mohan Thakur v. Umanath Choudhury (1).

Walsh, J, in the case referred to above observed as follows: The question whether an auction-purchaser is entitled to apply, depends on the question whether he is included in the expression "a person whose interests are affected by the sale." It is necessary to observe that this expression was not contained in the corresponding provisions which was in force up to 1908, and up to that date the auction-purchaser could not apply but could bring a suit. It follows, therefore, that for the purpose of determining this question the cases decided before 1908, or decided after 1908, with reference to proceedings which had begun before 1900, bearing upon the question whether auction purchasers could apply or could properly bring a suit, are wholly irrelevant, and for my part, I decline to look at them. Unfortunately I find them still cited as though they were relevant and authoritative, in text books dealing with the law under this rule and they have been cited as authorities in one decision from which I feel compelled to differ.

These observations of the learned Judge show a disregard of the accepted canons of the construction of statutes. They are inconsistent with following accepted rules of construction laid down by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the recent case of Abdur Rakim v. Mahomed Barkat Ali (5). Their Lordships say:

It is a sound rule of interpretation to take the words of a statute as they stand and to interpret them ordinarily without any reference to the previous state of the law on the subject or the English law on which it is founded: but

(1) [1893] 20 Cal. 8=19 I. A. 154=6 Sar. 245 (P.C.).

(2) [1915] 19 C. W. N. 326=23 I. C. 839.

(3) [1888] 15 Cal. 488 (F.B.).

(4) A. I. R. 1925 All. 459=47 All. 479.

(5) A. I. R. 1928 P. C. 16=55 Cal. 519=55 I. A. 96 (P.C.).

when it is contended that the legislature intended by any particular amendment to make substantial changes in the pre-existing law it is impossible to arrive at a conclusion without considering what the law was previously to the particular enactment and to see whether the words used in the statute can be taken to effect the change that is suggested as intended.

In this view it was not only not irrelevant but it was essential to consider the terms of the corresponding provision in the Code of 1882 and further how that provision was interpreted in the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The learned Judges of the Madras High Court would interpret the words "interests" to mean "interests" in the property acquired at the sale: see Gopala Krishnayya v Sanjeeva Reddy (6). It is difficult to understand how a person's interest can be affected by the sale unless those interests in the property sold existed prior to sale.

I think that the Patna High Court has taken the correct view in holding that the word "interests" in O. 21, R. 90 must refer to interests existing prior to the sale: see Ketra Mohan v. Dilwar (7).

The auction purchaser is not in my opinion, a person whose interests are affected by the sale but is a person who acquired an interest in the property sold by the sale and he has no locus standi to make an application under O. 21, R. 90. The learned District Judge was not right in sending the case back to the Court of first instance for treating the application as one under O. 21, R. 90. The result is that the order of the learned District Judge is set aside and the application of the opposite party under O. 21, R. 91 is dismissed. If there has been fraud and misrepresentation which induced the opposite party to bid at the sale and pay a larger price he has his remedy by suit. The rule is made absolute, but in the circumstances of the present case there will be no order as to costs.

Upendra Kumar Roy—for Appellants.
Jogesh Chandra Roy and Sasadhar Roy (Sr.)—for Respondents.

Cuming, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for partition. The case of the plaintiffs was that many years ago some seven persons of whom the plaintiffs represented, three took a lease of a large area of land within certain boundaries from the Maharaja of Tipperah. The parties remained in possession of distinct portions of the land by private arrangement for the sake of convenience, but that there was no regular partition of the demised land. Now, they asked that the land should be partitioned. The case of the defendants was that the lands had all along been partitioned. Now, it appears that the actual amount of the lands purported to be demised by the patta granted by the Maharaja was some 32 kanis of land. It is apparently the case of both the parties that some 12 kanis out of the demised land was sold and that they remained in possession of the remaining 20 kanis, settlement operations had since taken place and the parties were found to be in possession of some 17½ acres of land being roughly 52 kanis. As far as I can see it is the case of both the parties and certainly of the defendants that the land demised by the patta is covered by certain daga Nos. 870, 871, 879, 882, 884, 885, 887, 1326 1336, that these lands measure as

(6) [1920] 33 M. L. J. 228=11 M. L. W. 184
=55 I. C. 333=(1920) M. W. N. 152.

(7) [1918] 3 Pat. L. J. 516=46 I. C. 614=5
Pat. L. W. 151.

I have stated 17.12 acres. There was a further case with regard to the schedule kha land with which we are not now concerned.

The trial Court found that there had been no previous partition of the lands covered by schedule ka and ordered that a partition should be made of it. With regard to the schedule kha land he ordered that the plaintiff's claim should be dismissed.

Both the parties appealed to the District Court—the plaintiff with regard to the schedule kha land and the defendant with regard to the schedule ka land. The learned Judge dismissed the appeal of the plaintiffs regarding the schedule kha land and allowed the appeal of the defendants so far as the schedule ka land was concerned. He held that there had been a previous partition of this land and hence he dismissed the plaintiffs' suit totally.

The plaintiffs have appealed to this Court and they contend that the learned Judge has made out for the defendants a case which is different from that set up by the defendants in their pleadings. There the case of the defendants was that the schedule ka land was covered by the original patta, while the learned Judge seems to think that the schedule ka land comprises 'not only the land of the original patta but also some land which he calls the excess land and has made a new case that there was reclamation outside the boundaries of the lands covered by the patta to which the parties lay exclusive claim by adverse possession.

Looking at the judgment of the learned District Judge it seems to me that there is substance in this contention of the appellants. The learned Judge has found at p. 8 of the paper-book that in respect of schedule ka lands a partition has been made and that the two parties are in possession respectively of the land falling to the allotment of each.

At p. 7 of the paper-book he has found that there was a regular partition of such of the lands demised as were then fit for cultivation. Now, the schedule ka land included all the land covered by the patta which had been brought under cultivation and, therefore, obviously included something more than the land which was partitioned before 1912. Therefore it is quite clear that the whole of the lands of Schedule ka, were not partitioned in 1912. This, I think, is quite clear from the learned Judge's own finding that what was partitioned at that time were the lands brought under cultivation. It does not seem to be anyone's case that there was no further reclamation after the year 1912. The remaining land apparently would remain ejmali. Any further reclamation of this ejmali land would obviously be for the benefit of all the co-sharers.

Mr. Jogesh Chandra Roy who appears for the respondents contended that the appeal must fail on this finding of fact, as there had been a partition of some of the land there could not be a partition of the whole land as was sought for by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, he contended, could only sue for a partition of these lands which had not been partitioned before 1912. In support of this contention he refers to the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Abdul Wahab Khan v. Tilakdhari Lal (1). This decision, no doubt, supports the contention of the respondents that the plaintiffs cannot succeed in the suit as now framed because it has been found as a fact that some of the lands included in this suit have already been partitioned. In the case before the Privy Council their Lordships ordered that the suit should be dismissed and further added that this would be without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to sue for partition of the lands which are admittedly still undivided. We think, therefore, the proper order in this case would be that the order of the District Judge should be set aside and the case should be sent back to the first Court to determine what lands had been partitioned before 1912, and these lands should be separated from the other and the partition of the remainder will be effected. If, of course, it cannot be determined what lands were partitioned before 1912 then the plaintiffs' suit has to be dismissed.

Costs of this appeal will form part of the costs in the suit, and costs in the suit will abide the result.

It will be open to the parties to adduce any further evidence that they may desire to adduce.

Mukerji, J.—I agree.

Appeal No. 2013 of 1925, Decided on 9th February 1928, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Zillah Murshidabad, D/- 27th April 1925.

(a) Bengal Municipal Act 3 of 1884, S. 85 (a)—Test for making a person liable to assessment for an occupation of "a holding" is the mode of user and not the length of occupation—Occupation by a servant must be ancillary to his duties.

Occupation of a holding in order to render a person amenable to a personal tax imposed upon "persons occupying holdings" under S. 85 (a) connotes actual possession by the person liable to be assessed or by his servant or agent in furtherance of the duties which such servant or agent was engaged to perform for the assessee. Such possession must be beneficial to the assessee, it must be intended that the possession should be continuous and not merely casual or intermittent, and the assessee or joint assessee of the holding must be entitled to the exclusive use and enjoyment of the holding as of right and not on sufferance free from interference from outsiders and without the user and enjoyment being subject to a paramount right of regulation or control by the party who put them in possession or any other person: per *Denman, C. Peary Mohan Chatterjee—for Appellant.

Rupendra Kumar Mitter and Byomkesh Basu—for Respondent

Page, J.—The issue raised in this appeal involves the construction of the term "persons occupying holdings" in S. 85 (a), Bengal Municipal Act 3 of 1884. The appellant is the Headmaster of the English High School at Jangipur. From October 1921—23 he resided in a boarding house or hostel for students adjoining the school buildings, but the school building and the hostel for the purposes of the Bengal Municipal Act are, and are to be treated as, separate holdings. The hostel belongs to the School Committee, and its internal affairs are managed by a Superintendent. Persons who are accepted as boarders are entitled to reside in the hostel only if, and so long as they conform to the rules and regulations of the institution. The hostel exists primarily for students, but the appellant obtained permission to reside therein as a boarder upon the usual terms, and became entitled to occupy a seat or bed in one of the rooms on the upper storey and to partake of the meals supplied in the hostel for an inclusive charge of Rs. 7-8-0 per month.

The appellant, however, was not entitled to the use of any particular seat or bed, and so long as he was given a seat in any one of the rooms on the upper storey he was liable to have his seat changed from time to time as the superintendent might direct or the exigencies of the hostel might require.

In these circumstances an assessment was made upon the appellant under S. 85 (a) Bengal Municipal Act, and the amount of the tax was realized by the issue of distress warrants. The appellant thereupon brought the present suit to recover inter alia the amount of the tax that had been levied upon him. The trial Court decreed the suit, holding that the assessment upon the appellant was illegal, but the lower appellate Court reversed the decree of the trial Court and dismissed the suit. From the decree of the lower appellate Court the appellant has preferred the present appeal.

The material sections of the Act are, S. 85 (a) The Commissioners may, from time to time . . . impose within the limits of the municipality one or other or both of the following taxes: (a) a tax upon persons occupying holdings within the municipality according to their circumstances and property within the municipality; provided that the amount assessed upon any person in respect of the occupation of any holding shall not be more than Rs. 84 per annum; or (b) a rate on the annual value of holdings situated within the municipality. S. 6 (3) "holding" means land held under one title or agreement, and surrounded by one set of boundaries; provided that where two or more adjoining holdings form part and parcel of the site or premises of a dwelling house, manufactory, warehouse or place of trade or business, such holdings shall be deemed to be one holding for the purposes of this Act other than those mentioned in Cl. (a), S. 85.

(4) "House" includes any hut, shop, warehouse or building;

(5) "immovable property" and "land" include (besides land) benefits arising out of land, houses, things attached to the earth, or permanently fastened to anything attached to the earth.

The issue to be determined is whether the appellant is a person occupying a holding within S. 85 (a), Bengal Municipal Act. Two contentions have been raised in support of the appeal.

The learned vakil on behalf of the appellant urged that the occupation of the appellant was that of a servant or agent of the School Committee, and that the hostel was being occupied by the School Committee, and not by the appellant. Ambika Churn v. Satish Chandra (2), Govinda Chandra v. Kailash Chandra (2).

(1) [1899] 2 C. W. N. 639.

(2) [1915] 15 C. L. J. 689 = 15 I.C. 909.

In my opinion this contention is ill-founded. The appellant was not residing in the hostel because he was required to do so for the better performance of his duties as the headmaster of the school. Indeed, the hostel was not intended to be a boarding house for the master; but for the students, and it was only after obtaining the permission of the Secretary of the School Committee that the appellant was allowed to reside in the hostel at all. Now the governing principle is that in order to constitute an occupation as a servant, it must be an occupation ancillary to the performance of the duties which the occupier has engaged to perform: per Mellor, J. in Smith v. Seghill (3), Fox v. Dalby (4), Clifton College v. Thompson (5), Charterhouse School v. Gayle (6).

The first contention, therefore, raised on behalf of the appellant fails.

It was further contended that in the circumstances the appellant by residing in the hostel did not "occupy a holding" within S. 85 (a), Bengal Municipal Act.

Now, "occupier" and "occupation" are not defined in the Act, but, in my opinion occupation of a holding in order to render a person amenable to a personal tax imposed upon "persons occupying holdings" under S. 85 (a) connotes actual possession by the person liable to be assessed, or by his servant or agent in furtherance of the duties which such servant or agent has engaged to perform for the assessee. Such possession must be beneficial to the assessee; it must be intended that the possession should be continuous and not merely casual or intermittent, and the assessee or joint assessee of the holding must be entitled to the exclusive use and enjoyment of the holding as of right and not on sufferance; free from interference from outsiders, and without the user and enjoyment being subject to a paramount right of regulation or control by the party who put them in possession or any other person. It is not essential, however, that the possession should be permanent in the sense that the assessee should be entitled to the exclusive use and enjoyment of the holding for a definite term or a certain period, for a tenant-at-will is, until the will be determined an occupier: per Denman, C. J., in re Chelsea Waterworks (7).

and it would be a confusion of ideas to say that it (that is, a liability to determination) interferes with the exclusive possession any more than a right of re-entry on the part of a landlord in certain given events, could be said to interfere in any way with the right of a tenant during the time he is holding. He is in beneficial occupation for a term, though that term is limited by certain contingencies which may possibly determine his interest at an earlier period: per Lord Hatherley in Cory v. Bristol (8).

In other words, it is the mode of user and not the length of the term, that determines whether or not the occupation is such that the person occupying the holding is liable to assessment. Further it is to be observed that exclusive user and enjoyment is not the same thing as exclusive occupation, for a lodger in a house, although he has the exclusive use of rooms in the house, in the sense that nobody else is to be there, and though his goods are stowed there, yet he is not in exclusive occupation in that sense, because the landlord is there for the purpose of being able as landlords commonly do in the case of lodgings, to have his own servants to look after the house and the furniture, and has retained to himself the occupation, though he has agreed to give the exclusive enjoyment of the occupation to the lodger. Such a lodger could not bring ejectment or trespass quare clausum fregit the maintenance of the action depending on the possession, and he is not rateable: per Blackburn, J. in Allan v. Liverpool (9);

and although a person may be entitled to the exclusive enjoyment of a holding that is so also where a guest in an inn, or a lodger in a house, has a separate apartment, or where a passenger in a ship has a separate cabin; in which case it is clear that the possession remains in the innkeeper, lodging-house keeper, or ship-owner: per Hill, J., in Smith v. St. Michael's Cambridge (10), Smith v. Lambeth (11), Curzon v. Westminster Corporation (12).

Now, in determining the question whether the occupation of a holding is such that it renders the occupier liable to a personal tax imposed under S. 85 (a) regard must be had to the circumstances of each case, for it is the intention of the parties which has to be looked at; it is not the words only that are to be regarded. The whole of the circumstances must be taken into consideration. It is the substance of the transaction rather than the form that determines the question whether such an exclusive occupation exists as will make the property rateable: per Lopes, L. J., in Rochdale Canal Co. v. Brewster (13), Lord Bute v. Grindall (14), The Queen v. Lady Emily Ponsonby (15), R. v. St. Pancras (16), Cory v. Bristol (8), Bradley v. Baylis (17), Holywell Union v. Halkyn Dist. Mines Co. (18), Liverpool Corporation v. Chorley (19), Jalpaiguri Municipality v. Jalpaiguri Tea Co. Ltd. (20).

In my opinion, however, there cannot be separate occupiers of separate parts of one and the same holding assessable to the tax in respect of the portions that they respectively occupy, for the term "holding" in S. 85 (a) does not mean or include "part of a holding" Ss. 6 (3) (4) (5); although, no doubt, there may be more persons than one in joint occupation of a holding, in which case each of the joint occupiers, is, or may be, amenable to the tax according to his circumstances and property within the municipality: Jalpaiguri Municipality v. Jalpaiguri Tea Co., (20) and R. v. Paynton (21).

Reliance was placed by the respondent on S. 15 (iii), but S. 85 and S. 15 do not relate to the same subject-matter. In enacting S. 15 the legislature was not concerned with the incidence of taxation, but with the qualifications for the electoral franchise, and in S. 15 (iii), where the words "occupies a holding or part of a holding" occur, the legislature were prescribing the qualifications of one class of electors, upon the supposition that persons who had passed one of the tests therein set out, and were occupying a holding or a part of a holding rated at not less than a certain sum, probably were possessed of sufficient perspicacity and intelligence to exercise the electoral franchise in a reasonable way. In S. 85 the legislature were concerned with the imposition of taxation, and the term "holding" in that section, in my opinion bears the meaning attributed to it in S. 6 (3) viz:

land held under one title or agreement and surrounded by one set of boundaries: Shah Hamed Hossain v. Patna Municipality (22), and does not and cannot reasonably be construed to mean or include a part of a holding. Now, applying the texts that I have endeavoured to explain to the facts of the present case, in my opinion, it is clear that the appellant did not "occupy a holding" within S. 85 (a), for it cannot reasonably be contended that he was in occupation of the hostel, and further, his right to the use and enjoyment of a seat or bed on the upper storey of the hostel was not such occupation as would render him liable to assessment under S. 85 (a).

For these reasons the appeal will be allowed with costs, the decree of the lower appellate Court will be discharged, and the decree of the trial Court restored. The appellant is entitled also to his costs in the lower appellate Court.

Gopendra Nath Das—for Respondents.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by one Nilkanta Ghosal who sought to execute a decree against the respondents which was obtained by his deceased wife Kanchan Barani Debi. The lady brought the suit against the respondents in which the decree was obtained, and it appears that the respondents took the plea that the lady was the benamidar of the present appellant. In that suit the appellant evidently for the purpose of preventing the suit being dismissed on the ground of its being brought by a benamidar (as the law then understood was that a benamidar could not sue for recovery of possession of landed property) gave evidence that the lady was the real owner. Kanchan Barani died after having left a will and in her will she stated that the property in question was her husband's property and as she had no interest in it her heirs would not succeed to it. After her death her husband as executor of the will of Kanchan Barani took out probate. He applied for execution of the decree on the allegation that he was the real owner of the property and Kanchan Barani his late wife, was his only benamidar. The Subordinate Judge was doubtful whether a true owner could execute a decree which was obtained by another person as benamidar. I do not see that there is any difficulty in holding that the true owner can execute such a decree. If one really considers what a benami transaction is and what the position of the benamidar is there should be no difficulty. It is well settled that the benamidar is a mere name, and as it has been called, a mere mask. Behind the name of the fictitious owner there is the real owner and also behind the mask is the person who is the real owner of the property. That being so I do not see that there is anything which prevents the person behind the mask to take off the mask and to appear in proper person before the Court. The principle is supported by the case of Abdul Kureem v Chukhun (1) decided in 1879. This case was no doubt dissented from, as pointed by the learned advocate for the respondents, in Palaniappa Chettiar v. Subramania Chettiar (2). But with great respect to the learned Judges the reasons stated by them do not commend themselves to me. I prefer to follow the case of our own Court. There is no reason therefore why a true owner cannot execute a decree obtained in the name of his benamidar.

The learned advocate for the respondents contends that the question whether the appellant is the true owner or not cannot be decided under S. 47, Civil P.C., by the executing Court. His argument might have required consideration if there was dispute between the person who was alleged to be the benamidar and the person who alleges himself to be the true owner. But when the judgment-debtor raises the question that the person who seeks to execute the decree was not the true owner, I do not see why that question cannot be decided under S. 47, Civil P. C.

It is next argued on behalf of the respondents that the Subordinate Judge was right in his view of the fact that the lady was the real owner of the property for which she obtained the decree. The Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the lady made the statement in her will under some misapprehension. This is an assumption which the Subordinate Judge was not entitled to make without any evidence. It is quite clear that the appellant stated in the suit itself that the lady was the real owner in order to avoid the suit being dismissed on that ground. The money for acquiring the property came undisputedly from his fund and there is no reason why he should not be considered to be the true owner. The appellant therefore is entitled to execute the decree in his right. He was also entitled to execute the decree as executor of the will of his wife. The Subordinate Judge held that he could do so. But there is no reason why his right to execute the decree should be restricted by stating that he should report to the Court which granted the probate or to the Collector and pay additional Court-fee. It is not the duty of the Subordinate

Judge to collect probate duty with regard to the will of any person. It is the duty of the probate Court and the revenue authority under the Succession Act. The Subordinate Judge is therefore wrong in limiting the right of the appellant to execute the decree as executor under the will as he has done.

The order therefore of the Subordinate Judge is set aside and the case sent back to that Court for allowing the appellant to execute the decree in any capacity he likes. This judgment will govern both the appeals.

The appellant is entitled to the costs of these appeals, but he will not be entitled to the costs of the preparation of the paper-book as unnecessary papers were printed. The hearing-fee is assessed at five gold mohurs for the two appeals together.

The cross-objection is dismissed without costs.

Civil Revn. No. 1296 of 1927, Decided on 13th December 1927, from order of Commr. of Income-tax, Bengal, D/- 4th May 1927.

Income-tax Act (1922), S. 66 (3)—Commissioner must, besides question of law, state necessary facts also.

In cases of reference, under S. 66 it is the duty of the Commissioner of Income-tax to find all the relevant facts. ion of the Court. The application made to the Commissioner of Income-tax appears to have raised in a somewhat complicated and contentious form various questions which apparently include allegations of fact which the Commissioner of Income-tax disputes and which overlap to some extent; but the real question for determination is whether the assessee is entitled to be treated for income-tax purposes as a Hindu undivided family. The Commissioner of Income-tax is of opinion that they are not so entitled and that they must be treated as an unregistered firm. We direct that the present Rule be made absolute on that question, namely, whether or not the assessee is entitled to be treated for income-tax purposes as a Hindu undivided family. That is the sole question which we require the Commissioner of Income-tax to state for our opinion.

I desire to point out that in these cases it is the duty of the Commissioner of Income-tax to find all the relevant facts. When a case stated comes before this Court, the Court expects to find all such facts stated in the letter of reference as would enable the Court to decide the question referred to it. It is quite true that the Commissioner of Income-tax is required also to give his opinion. He is not merely required to state the questions of law and give his opinion; he is required above all things to state the facts upon which the questions of law must be decided. I trust, therefore, that when this matter comes before the Court again there will be such findings of fact as will enable the Court to apply the law.

The Rule is made absolute in the sense which I have stated.

Chief Revenue Authority of Bengal—Respondent.

Appeal No. 33 of 1927, Decided on 15th July 1927, from original order of Pearson, J.

* Income-tax Act (7 of 1918), S. 26—An application under S. 26 made more than a year from the date of original demand but within a year from the revised order of assessment is within time.

The word "demand" covers a case of enhancement by the Commissioner under S. 22 or by a Chief Revenue Authority under S. 23 or under S. 24 where the Collector or the Commissioner orders a man to pay double the rate. It applies to a determination of a sum or extra sum to be payable by the assessee in such manner as to bind the assessee. [P 839 C 2]

A notice of demand under S. 26 was made on 25th March 1920. The order of assessment was revised on 2nd December 1921. On 31st May 1922 the assessee applied to the Collector to correct the mistakes in connexion with assessment.

Held: that the application was within time. [P 839 C 2]

S. C. Bose and Satish Bose—for Appellant.

B. L. Mitter and S. M. Bose—for Respondent.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from a decision of my learned brother Pearson, J., upon certain questions stated for the opinion of the Court under S. 51, Income-tax Act, 1918. The assessee in this case complained of the amount at which they had been assessed for excess profits duty and they applied to this Court and obtained an order in the nature of mandamus directing the Chief Revenue Authority to state certain questions for the opinion of the Court. The Chief Revenue Authority has stated those questions. In the result it appears that it is necessary for this Court to give its opinion upon the first of the questions so stated. That question is thus framed:

Whether the time prescribed by S. 26, Act 7, of 1918 is to be reckoned from the original demand or from the making of the revised assessment whereby refund was ordered on revision of assessment revised by the Board on 2nd December 1921.

That question becomes more or less intelligible on consideration of the following facts: The assessee were engaged in three different places including Serajgunj in the District of Pabna in the business of jute. The year for which they were being assessed was the year 1919-20 and on 15th March 1920 a notice of demand was served upon them for income-tax at a certain figure. On 25th March 1920 a notice of demand was served upon them for excess profits duty. According to that notice of demand it would appear that they had to pay in respect of excess profits duty the substantial sum of

Rs. 8,384 which they, pending subsequent proceedings, paid. Now, against the assessment to income-tax they appealed to the Commissioner under S. 21, Income-tax Act, 1918. They persuaded the Commissioner that for the previous year in question they had made no profit and to use the language of S. 22, Income-tax Act, he cancelled the assessment. As regards the assessment to excess profits duty the petitioners lodged a petition with the Chief Revenue Authority as required by the Excess Profits Duty Act.

Upon this matter coming before the Chief Revenue Authority that authority took the view, differing from the view that the Commissioner had taken in dealing with the income-tax assessment that the profits had been calculated on the wrong accounting period, that they ought not to have been calculated on Sambat 1975 but either Sambat 1974 or else for the ordinary financial year ending with the 31st March 1919. They remitted the matter on this question of the excess profits duty to the Commissioner. He remitted it to the Collector. The Collector had a report made to him by the assessor and it then appears that the Collector heard the parties, heard what they had to say upon the assessor's report and came to the conclusion that the profits for the purpose amounted to Rs. 77,000. The assesseees say that they got no opportunity of examining the assessor's report, but the statement of the case made to the Court by the member of the Board of Revenue is to the contrary. The matter went to the Commissioner. He estimated and held that the profits were Rs. 49,397. Then the matter went to the Chief Revenue Authority by an application which was dealt with on 2nd December 1921. The Chief Revenue Authority came to the conclusion that the figure at which the Commissioner had arrived was the correct figure and accordingly on that basis out of Rs. 8,384 which had been paid on the original assessment, a refund to the assesseees was due of Rs. 1,419 and that refund was made. The order of the Commissioner cancelling the assessee's assessment to income-tax and directing a refund of the money paid in that respect was never interfered with and ultimately the assesseees obtained refund of all that they had paid for income-tax and they were therefore in the position that, while under S. 19, Income-tax Act, 1918 this might be adjusted upon the actual figures at the end of the year of assessment, the assesseees have no grievance in respect of income-tax. Their grievance has reference to excess profits duty. They say that on going into the assessor's report on the basis of which the Chief Revenue Authority assessed them to excess profits duty on the basis of profits of Rs. 49,397 they discovered that there were three palpable mistakes. In one case by a slip of pen the figure 1 has come before the figure 5 making a difference of Rs. 10,000. It is said also that when you look at the assessor's report you find that he has taken the closing stock as part of the income for the year. In other words, they say upon an inspection of the assessor's report that it contains obvious and undoubted mistakes. Now, on none of the affidavits in this matter and (we are assured by Mr. Bose for the assesseees) in no affidavits before any revenue authority have these allegations as to these palpable mistakes been disputed.

In these circumstances, the assesseees sought a remedy. They applied first of all to the Collector on 31st May 1922 and they asked him to exercise his powers under S. 26 of the Act to correct the mistakes. The words of that section which has been applied to excess profits duty, are these :

The Collector may, at any time within one year from the date of any demand made upon an assessee, rectify any mistake in connexion therewith which has been brought to his notice by such assessee and make a refund to such assessee in respect thereof.

The Collector held that the period of "one year from the date of any demand" refers to the notice of demand to be served under S. 20 of the Act. In this case the only notice under S. 20 was the original demand which was served in March 1920. The Chief Revenue Authority did not deal with this matter until the 2nd December 1921, that is to say, 18 months or more after the original demand. The Collector says, however, that as regards any mistake in that order he cannot entertain an application because it is more than one year from March 1920. That is the first question and indeed in the end the only question before us.

The learned Judge on the original side has agreed with the Collector and his view is shortly this :

I think that the demand mentioned in S. 26 has reference to the demand in the prescribed form referred to in S. 20. Consequently I would answer the question in para. 25 (a) of the petition by saying that the time under S. 26 must be reckoned from the original demand in March 1920, the only demand there has been.

Now, when we come to consider the question in this Court it is very properly conceded by the learned Advocate-General that in the circumstances of this case the order made by the Chief Revenue Authority on 2nd December 1921 was a "demand" within the meaning of S. 26, Income-tax Act, 1918. I have no doubt myself that that is so upon a consideration of the relevant sections. The ordinary section dealing with an original demand is S. 18. It says that if the Collector is satisfied that a return is correct and complete he shall assess the sum payable by the assessee. If he has reason to believe that the return is correct and incomplete then he may require the assessee to attend, and, after examining any account and hearing evidence, he shall by an order in writing determine the total income of the assessee for the previous year, and assess the sum payable by the assessee for the year in which the return is made on the basis of such determination. By S. 19, where in a subsequent year a return has been made and the actual receipts for the then previous year are known it is provided that the difference between the actual profits and the profits upon which income-tax has been paid the year before shall be taken into account and the difference shall be paid by or refunded to the assessee as the case may be. There is a provision in the case of death or insolvency which enables an immediate adjustment to be had in the meantime. S. 20 says that when the Collector has determined a sum to be payable either under S. 18 or S. 19 he shall serve on the assessee a notice of demand. The assessee objecting to the amount to which he has been assessed under S. 18 or to an adjustment under S. 19 may appeal to the Commissioner. The petition shall ordinarily be presented within 30 days of "receipt of the notice of demand." The Commissioner shall pass such order thereon whether by way of confirmation, rejection, enhancement or cancellation of the assessment or the adjustment or otherwise and fixing such time for payment as he thinks fit. The Chief Revenue Authority acting under S. 23 may make an order enhancing the sum payable but not without hearing the assessee. By S. 24 the Collector or the Commissioner, if they are satisfied that the assessee has concealed particulars of his income, may direct the assessee to pay double the rate on the difference between the true sum and the sum which has been put forward. Now, bearing in mind these provisions of the Act, the question is: When we come to S. 26 and find the words "from the date of any demand made upon an assessee" are we to read that as meaning "from the date of receipt of any notice of demand under S. 20?" In my judgment, that is not the meaning of the phrase. We have to identify the demand in connexion with which the alleged mistake occurred. The word "demand" would cover a case of enhancement by the Commissioner under S. 22, or by the Chief Revenue Authority under S. 23. It would cover a case under S. 24 where the Collector or the Commissioner orders a man to pay double the rate. It seems to me looking to the terms of sub-S. 2, S. 21, that when the statute means to say "from the receipt of the notice of demand" it says so and that the word "demand" in S. 26 applies to a determination of a sum or extra sum to be payable by the assessee in such manner as to bind the assessee. Therefore, in my judgment, the learned Advocate-General has rightly conceded that the order of the Chief Revenue Authority was demand. That demand was made on 2nd December 1921 and it appears that the Collector within one year from that date has a power to deal with the objections.

It seems to me that in this case the other questions which have been referred to us do not arise and need not be dealt with, and as the questions marked (b), (c) and (d) are no longer pressed we confine ourselves to the first question. In my opinion, this matter must be disposed of on the basis that at the time the application was made to the Collector the application was in time, and we should answer question (a) accordingly.

The applicant is entitled to his costs of this appeal and before Pearson, J., and the costs reserved by C. C. Ghose, J., on 9th July 1925.

Appeal No. 66 of 1927, Decided on 2nd January 1928, from original order of Buckland, J., in Insolvency Case No. 196 of 1926, D/- 20th April 1927.

(a) Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, S. 9 (e)—Attachment in execution of award is not one in execution of a decree.

Attachment in execution of an award is not attachment in the execution of a decree within the meaning of S. 9 (e) for the purpose of creating an act of insolvency: Re. Bankruptcy Notice, (1907) 1 K. B. 478, Ref. [P 841 C 1]

(b) Arbitration Act, S. 15—Award.

An award is a decree for the purpose of enforcing that award only. [P 841 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from an order setting aside an adjudication in insolvency. The adjudication order itself is dated 23rd November 1926 and the petition upon which that order was pronounced was filed on 13th September of that year. The petitioning creditor was the firm of Lachmi Narain Ramchunder and the act of insolvency alleged was that the debtor had suffered his one-third share in a certain property, No. 18, Machua Bazar Street, to be attached for a period of 21 days in execution of a certain award. It appears that on 6th May of that year an award had been given by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce against the debtor for a sum of Rs 15,250. This award was filed in this Court on 12th May and at the time the insolvency petition was presented an attachment had been subsisting since 20th May, by virtue of the provisions of the Indian Arbitration Act, namely, the provision of S. 15 which says that an award on a submission, on being filed shall be enforceable as if it were a decree of the Court. In that petition the petitioning creditors claimed that by the reason of the attachment subsisting for more than 21 days there was an act of insolvency. The learned Judge has dealt with this application on another footing. It appears that this attachment was ultimately set aside by this Court upon a petition presented in a claim case. It appears that by consent it was accepted by the Court that the debtor had no attachable interest, he being a mere member of a Mitakshara family without any ascertainable share. It is conceded by Mr. Sircar that the proposition is not sound in law and that there was an attachable interest in this property at the time it was attached. The question on which the learned Judge proceeded was that the Court in execution having set aside the attachment on the basis that it was an attachment which never ought to have been made can that attachment be the basis of an act of insolvency? On that question I have not made up my mind and I desire to say nothing. But the second question seems to me to be reasonably plain and the proper way to look at the matter is this: that if in attachment an execution of an award be an act of insolvency then it is an act which can be utilized within three months by any other person bringing an insolvency petition against the debtor. It does not matter what the petitioning creditors's debt is; so long as the petition was within three months, the act of insolvency would be a good foundation for an adjudication. When we come to look at the words of S. 9, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, we find that the words are these; they are words which have to be given a strict construction. I do not mean a narrow construction, but they are not words which are to be amplified upon any notion of convenience:

If any of this property has been sold or attached for a period of not less than twenty-one days in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money.

Let us test this case on the assumption that another creditor altogether is bringing a petition for an adjudication order in insolvency. He gets to know that within three months a person not himself has obtained an award against the alleged debtor and that there was a proceeding in which an attachment had taken place to enforce that award. Could it be said in favour of such petitioning creditor that the words "in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money" had been satisfied? It seems to me quite impossible to say that. It is true enough that for the purpose of enforcing an award you may treat the award as though it were a judgment and, therefore, you may apply to it all the provisions of O. 21 and various other provisions. It is another thing altogether to say that something which is not a decree must be taken to be a decree with the result that a man is to commit an act of insolvency so that he is to be adjudicated upon a petition presented, it may be by some one who has no concern with the award at all. In my judgment the only way to deal with this matter is to deal with it in the same spirit as in the case to which we have been referred in Re Bankruptcy Notice (1). The words "in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money" cannot be extended by analogy. They must be extended, if at all, by the legislature and we cannot hold that there has been an act of insolvency when the definition given by the legislature has not been complied with. It may be said that in this case the petitioning creditor's debt is in fact the same debt over again. But as I have pointed out we cannot treat an award as a decree except for the purpose of enforcing that award. It seems to me that it is a circumstance of no importance that the petitioning creditor's debt in this case is the same debt all over again. The position must be same whatever the petitioning creditor's debt is and it is not true to say that it is a mere enforcement of this award which is being sought. It is not, therefore, true to say of the award that it is a decree for the purpose of creating an act of insolvency. I think, therefore, that on this ground this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

C. C. Ghose, J.—I agree.

Judgment.—There is no substance in S. A. Nos. 968, 970, 979 and 980 of 1926 and they must be dismissed with costs.

As regards the other appeals, it is argued on behalf of the appellant that the procedure adopted by the lower appellate Court is not in conformity with the direction given in Ss 30 and 32 Ben. Ten. Act. The suits are for enhancement of rent on the ground of additional area under S. 52 and of rise in the price of food-crops under S. 30 (b), Ben. Ten. Act. In 1916 after the publication of the record-of-rights applications were made by the plaintiff under S 105, Ben. Ten. Act, for enhancement of rent under S 52 and also under S. 30 (b). Those applications were withdrawn so that on the authority of the Full Bench decision, Purnu Chandra v. Narendra Nath (1), the same matter cannot form the subject of subsequent suits. The trial Court in view of the Full Bench decision held that the plaintiff's claim for enhancement under S 52 must be disallowed in view of S. 109, Ben. Ten. Act. But with regard to her claim under S. 30, it was of opinion that it was not affected by S. 109, Ben. Ten. Act. After a consideration of the evidence in the cases it came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to enhancement at 3 annas per rupee under S. 30 (b). Both parties appealed. The plaintiff's appeals were dismissed by the lower appellate Court, but the defendant's appeals were allowed as the learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that in the circumstances of the cases no enhancement should be granted under S. 30. The learned Subordinate Judge says that under S. 32, Ben. Ten. Act, the Court is required to compare the average prices during the 10 years immediately preceding the institution of the suit with the average prices during any other convenient ten years. But as he thinks that the ten years immediately preceding the institution of the suit which was in 1923, included the period of the Great War during which the prices were abnormally high, he holds that S. 32, cannot be properly applied to the case. The Munsif compared the prices during the periods from 1903 to 1912 and 1913 to 1922 and came to the conclusion which he embodied in his decree. We are not quite sure that the learned Subordinate Judge is not right in saying that the comparison between the two periods mentioned by the Munsif was not the proper method of arriving at a finding as to what should be the just increment of rent to be paid by the tenants. But the learned Judge seems to be under the impression that the periods which the law requires him to compare must be consecutive periods; that is ten years immediately before the institution of the suit and ten years immediately before that period. But the law does not say so.

Under S. 32 (a), the Court shall compare the average prices during the decennial period immediately preceding the institution of the suit with the average prices during such other decennial period as to it may appear equitable and practicable. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that the decennial period before the institution of the suit should not be adopted due to the abnormal state of things during a portion of that period. He therefore compares the prices prevalent in the period from 1918 to 1922 with those prevalent during the preceding period from 1913 to 1917 and finds that the increase would be like four to six pias a rupee—an increase which in his opinion is very small. We quite see the reason of the view of the learned Subordinate Judge that the decennial period immediately preceding the institution of the suit should not form the basis of calculation. But S. 32 (c) gives the option to the Court to take any shorter periods if in its opinion it is not practicable to take the decennial periods prescribed in Cl. (a). The learned Subordinate Judge has acted undoubtedly under S. 32 (c); but the error which he is said to have committed is that he has compared the period of five years immediately before the institution of the suit with the period immediately before those five years but has not compared the period immediately before the institution of the suit with any other period during the currency of the tenancy in which the normal state of things prevailed. Then the Subordinate Judge has referred to certain evidence in the case and observed that according to the plaintiff's own witnesses the rents paid by the defendants are the highest in the locality. After making this observation he records his finding in these words:

So taking into consideration the fact that the increase will be very small, if granted, and the other circumstances noted above, I think that no enhancement should be granted even under S. 32 (c).

What he seems to mean is that even after he had compared shorter periods as provided by S. 32 (c) the increase would be so small that in conjunction with the other circumstances such as higher rent paid by the defendants, there should be no enhancement granted under S. 32.

The learned advocate for the defendants argues, firstly, that the present applications of the plaintiff are barred under S. 109, Ben. Ten. Act; and though the Courts below have taken a different view he submits that it is wrong and that he is entitled to support on this ground the decree of the lower appellate Court. It is argued that the subject-matter of the applications under S. 105, is the same as the subject-matter of the present suits; in other words in the applications under S. 105, Ben. Ten. Act, the plaintiff prayed for enhancement of rent under S. 30 and the same claim is made in the present suits. Accordingly the subject-matter of the two proceedings is the same and the suits must be held barred by S. 109, Ben. Ten. Act. The expression "subject-matter" is used in the Full Bench case of Purna Prasad v. Narendra Nath (1) but S. 109, uses the word "matter". It says that a civil Court shall not entertain any application or suit concerning any matter which is or has already been the subject of an application made under S. 105. We take it that the expression subject-matter used in the Full Bench case is used in the same sense in which the word "matter" has been used in S. 109. Now the matter which was before the Court in proceedings under S. 105, was the right of the plaintiff to claim enhancement owing to rise in the price of food crops during the period of ten years preceding 1916 as compared with that in any period of ten years preceding that period. In the present suit the matter involved is whether there has been a rise in the price of the food crops during the ten years preceding 1923 as compared with any other period of ten years. The two proceedings are therefore not the same and S. 109 is no bar to the present suits.

It is next argued on behalf of the respondents that the conclusion of the learned Judge as embodied in his findings is conclusive on a question of fact and as such should not be disturbed by this Court; and that, moreover, the order passed by him was one under S. 35, Ben. Ten. Act, which gives it a discretion in granting or refusing an enhancement in consideration of particular circumstances in these cases and this Court should not interfere with such discretion in second appeals. As far as the bare statement of the law is concerned, the respondents' contention must be right. But in the present cases the learned Subordinate Judge has based his conclusion on two facts. The first is that if the enhancement is granted, the increase will be very small; and the second is that the rents paid by the defendants are higher than the prevailing rate of rent. As his conclusion is based upon these grounds, if one of these grounds is found to be incorrect in law the conclusion of the lower appellate Court should not be considered as a finding of fact. Now the learned Subordinate Judge has come to the conclusion that the increase if granted would be very small on a comparison of the prices prevailing during the five years (1917 to 1922) with those during the five years 1913 to 1917—a period during which according to him the prices were abnormally high. As we have said that there is nothing in the law to prevent the Court to compare the period immediately before the suit with any other period during the currency of tenancy, what the learned Judge should have done was to compare the period from 1918 to 1922 with any other period before 1914. This the learned Judge has not done. If he had done that and had come to the conclusion that the increase would be so small that no enhancement should be granted he would have been justified in refusing enhancement of rent. As he has not done so, we are constrained to send the cases back for the purpose of such comparison and arriving at such conclusion on the same as he thinks proper. If after making the comparison and taking into consideration the evidence and all the circumstances of the case he comes to the conclusion that there should be no increase under S. 35, he is entitled to express his opinion in clear language, namely, by stating that any enhancement will be under the circumstances of the case unfair or unreasonable.

We accordingly set aside the decrees of the lower appellate Court, and send the cases back to that Court for a rehearing of the appeal in the light of the observation made. Costs will abide the result.

Appeal No. 177 of 1927, Decided on 7th September 1928, from order of Dist. Judge, 24 Parganas, D/ 3rd January 1927.

Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 42 (1) (a) —Insolvent's, assets not of requisite value—There must be a finding that insolvent was not responsible for the deficiency.

Merely stating in the order that there is nothing in the report of the Receiver to stand in the way of the insolvent's discharge is not sufficient. The Judge must be satisfied that the assets were not of the requisite value from circumstances for which the insolvent could not be held to be justly responsible. The order is not legal in absence of such finding.

Judgment—In this case an order of discharge was made by the learned Judge of the insolvent by his order dated 3rd January 1927. It seems that the creditors 1 and 2 asked for time on various occasions to file their objection. But they did not file their objection on 3rd January 1927 nor did they give any indication to the Court as to the reason why they were opposing the final discharge. The creditor who is the appellant before us states that he could not file his objection to the final discharge before the Receiver had submitted his report. This report was submitted on 17th December 1926, a few days before the Court closed for the Christmas vacation, and it reopened on 3rd January. It is stated on behalf of the creditor that within this short time he could not make any enquiry on which he could base his petition for objection. This argument does not seem to be very convincing because the Receiver's report is such a short document that within the course of the 5 or 6 days that the Court remained open before the Christmas vacation he ought to have been in a position to prefer any objection or at least to indicate, as the Court said, the reason why he opposed the final discharge. But there is another serious defect in the order of the learned Judge under S. 42 (1) (a), Provincial Insolvency Act. The Court is bound to refuse to grant an absolute order of discharge under S. 42 unless the insolvent's assets were of value equal to 8 annas in the rupee on the amount of his unsecured liabilities (as it was in this case), unless the insolvent satisfies the Court with regard to certain matters stated in that clause. In the order of the learned Judge it is only stated that there was nothing in the report of the Receiver to stand in the way of the insolvent's discharge. That is not sufficient. The Judge must be satisfied that the assets were not of the requisite value from circumstances for which the insolvent could not be held to be justly responsible. There is no such finding.

This order therefore does not satisfy the provisions of the law and should, therefore, be set aside and the matter is sent back to the learned Judge. The creditors if they choose are allowed to file their objection. The learned Judge will hear their objection and then dispose of the matter according to law. The creditors may raise any objection to the final discharge but on no ground would they be entitled to delay the hearing of the matter.

There will be no order as to costs in this appeal.

Appeal No 79 of 1927 Decided on 3rd February 1928, from original decree of Pearson, J., D/- 9th May 1927.

* Civil P. C., O. 32, R. 3—Suit against a minor—Absence of appointment of guardian ad litem—Decree is a nullity as against him—Though mere absence of recording of formal order of appointment does not vitiate proceedings, where minor had good defence but no such defence is raised and guardian's interest is adverse, the proceedings may be vitiated.

Appointment of a guardian ad litem of a minor in a suit against him being quite incumbent, a decree against him without appointment of such a guardian ad litem is a nullity as against him.

No doubt mere absence of formal recording of such an order of appointment would not vitiate the proceedings when the Court has by its action given its sanction to the appearance of a person as such guardian; but the case is otherwise when the minor having a good defence to make, no such defence was made by the guardian and the interest of the natural guardian was adverse to that of the minor.

B. C. Mitter and S. C. Ghose—for Appellant.

S. N. Bannerjee and H. C. Majumdar—for Respondents.

Rankin, C. J.—The appellant, Shaik Abdul Karim was defendant in a suit brought by the plaintiff Thakurdas Thakur to set aside a sale of certain property held in execution of a decree dated 6th June 1922 passed by the Small Cause Court. The plaintiff in the Small Cause Court suit was the respondent. Haji Meah Mahomed and he brought his suit against Sulhamoyee Dasi, mother of Thakurdas Thakur who was at that time a minor and against the minor himself. The suit was brought for the recovery of the balance of sum Rs. 2,000 which was the subject-matter of a document dated 23rd January 1919.

It appears that the father of the minor was one Ramlal who died in 1903. He left a son Kanai by a wife who had predeceased him, and Thakurdas Thakur was not at that time born. Sudhamoyee, however, after his death gave birth to a posthumous son and under the will of Ramlal his property went to his two sons. A partition suit was brought in 1910 and as a result of that certain premises now in question No. 3/1 Marcus Square were allotted to the plaintiff. This process was complete in the year 1911. In these circumstances, the mother Sudhamoyee being apparently in need of money obtained advances from Haji Meah Mahomed in 1918 and early in 1919. Apparently the first advance was of Rs. 300, the second was of Rs. 100 and at the time of the document of 23rd January 1919 a further sum of Rs. 1,600 was advanced.

Now the document in question which was registered is in the form of a receipt and it is signed by Sudhamoyee without any further description than that she was the widow of Ramlal. The receipt purports to be a receipt for Rs. 2,000 on the term that the sum would be paid by deduction of Rs. 20 each month out of the rent payable by Haji Meah Mahomed for No. 3, Marcus Square the rent of which would not be enhanced until repayment of the full sum. It provided

If before payment of the said amount received Government acquire the land Haji Meah Mahomed will be entitled to be paid his money in the first instance from the compensation to be paid.

There are two characters which Sudhamoyee might be thought to be exercising in granting this receipt. She was the executor of her husbands' will and she was the natural guardian of Thakurdas. She did not at this time obtain any order from the District Court under the Guardians and Wards Act making her a certificated guardian. Some time after this transaction, namely, on 14th September 1919, Sudhamoyee applied on the original side of this Court and obtained an order appointing her guardian of the person and property of Thakurdas and by that order obtained authority to execute a new lease of the premises to certain other lessees. A lease was sanctioned and a certain amount of money was obtained thereby. At the time of obtaining the sanction of this lease no information was given to the Court about the transaction previously made with Haji Meah Mahomed. As a result of the second transaction it appears that the new lessee brought a suit against Haji Meah Mohamed for ejectment. The actual documents showing the result of that suit are not in evidence but there is certain evidence on the record from which it would appear that that suit was compromised, Haji Meah Mohamed going out of possession of the premises on receipt of Rs. 800. I should rather gather that in consideration of his vacating the premises he got a promise of Rs. 800 which afterwards he brought a suit upon.

In this position Haji Meah Mahomed commenced the suit in the Small Cause Court with which we are now concerned. The plaint in that suit is before us and it appears that the cause-title of that suit describes the defendants thus:

Sudhamoyee Dabe widow of late Ramlal Thakur and Thakurdas Thakur, a minor by his mother and certificated guardian, the said defendant 1.

I observe that this plaint is signed by a pleader. How any pleader should be so ignorant as to suppose that this is the proper way to bring a suit against a minor and how any Court can conduct its business, if with a plain notice that no guardian ad-litem has been appointed, it issues summons upon people for no better reason than that their names are put in the cause-title in this way, I do not profess to know. I would rather suppose that it is advisable that the authorities should take some steps either to make sure that pleaders of a less degree of ignorance are entrusted with the necessary work or that at all events they have more difficulty in getting processes of the Court issued without any proper scrutiny. However incredible it may appear the plaintiffs' pleader having put down the defendants' names in this way, the case seems to have gone on just as if it was a suit between persons who were sui juris. The plaintiffs' cause of action was thus described. He averred that on the 23rd day of January 1919 he was a tenant of a piece of land, that land belonged to the minor and that he was a tenant under an arrangement with defendant 1 as mother and natural and certificated guardian of the minor. Then he set out that the defendants meaning the mother and the minor took from him a sum of Rs. 2,000 as an advance without interest towards the rent of the said piece of land agreeing to repay the same at Rs. 20 per month from the monthly rent on the understanding not to eject him so long as the entire amount was not liquidated. Then he said that the defendants had on the 1st October leased out the land to a third party who had ejected him. Accordingly the plaintiff's claim is that he has to receive from the defendants a sum of Rs. 1,880 still due as balance of the said advance which the defendants having broken the said arrangement are liable to refund. He claims a decree against defendant 1, that is to say, the mother personally and against the estate of the minor.

Now that plaint having been filed on 31st March 1922 the summonses were served on the 20th April; a certain pleader Mr. Ghose entered appearance and asked for two weeks' time to file power and a detailed written statement. It seems that at the time he went before the Court the minor Thakurdas was with him; but there does not seem to be any reason to suppose that what he did then was in any way out of order. At all events the Court gave him time. Thereafter nothing seems to have happened except that the pleader saw the minor from time to time more than once. He appears to have gone to the house where the defendants were living but he did not succeed in having any conversation with the mother. The minor told on behalf of his mother that the claim was true, that they had had the money and that they really could not dispute the debt. In giving these instructions through her son to the pleader, I do not suppose for one moment that there is no evidence to suggest that the lady was actuated by anything worse than honesty and common sense. I do not think it is reasonable to impute to her that she was trying to get an improper decree which should have been passed against herself, passed against the minor's estate in order that her own interest might be safe-guarded at the expense of the boy. As a matter of fact, any careful computation of her own interest would probably have shown her that she as much as the boy was interested in resisting, if possible, a decree against the minor's property and relegating the plaintiff, if possible to a mere personal decree against herself. However, that being the view that was taken, it appears that on the 9th May another adjournment was given. On 6th June 1922 the plaintiff with his pleader was present and there was no appearance for the defendants. Accordingly, after taking the evidence of the plaintiffs' gomasta the learned Chief Judge decreed the suit ex parte against both the defendants. The amount of the decree was also to be levied out of the estate of the minor in the hands of the lady. Thereafter the decree was transferred to the original side and the property which appears to have been subject to more than one mortgage was sold subject to these mortgages and a sum of Rs. 500 was obtained towards satisfaction of Haji Meah Mahomads' decree. The purchaser at that sale was the present appellant. Upon that the present suit was brought by Thakurdas Thakur who had attained majority on 16th May 1924. He brought this suit in March 1925 to set aside that sale altogether and for a declaration that the Small Cause Courts' decree was null and void and inoperative against him.

The learned Judge has decreed his suit. He has treated the decree as a nullity and set aside the sale. He has proceeded mainly upon the ground that the mother's interest in the Small Cause Court suit was adverse to the minor. We have to decide if the learned Judge was right.

With reference to the document of 23rd January 1919, the mother, as I have already mentioned, might be regarded as executrix of the father or as natural guardian of her son. Mr. S. N. Banerjee for the respondent has contended that as this transaction was some 16 years after the testator's death and many years after the partition of 1911, it was entered into when the estate of the testator was really in the hands of the beneficiaries and the lady had not at that time the character of an executrix. He says further that if one looks at the document one finds nothing in that to constitute a claim on her behalf to be the executor. He contends further that if she be regarded as an executor then the transaction is simply this that she has borrowed certain money for the benefit of her trust and that she alone is liable in law on any promise to repay that money. It may of course be the duty and the power of an executor to pledge or sell the assets in order to obtain money, but it is not contended that there is in this document any security to Haji Meah Mahomad which in the present circumstances can be enforced. Therefore he says—and he quotes authority for the proposition—that the claim, if the lady be regarded as executrix, was a claim against herself and that there was no claim against the minor or against his estate. The line of cases upon which he relies contains such well-known cases as Farhall v. Farhall (1). The whole law on the subject may be found summarized in Leake on contracts at p. 1265. If, again, the lady be looked at as the natural guardian of the minor's property then it may be that being free from the restrictions imposed by the Guardians and Wards Act, she would have power to mortgage the property in a proper course of administration or for necessity. But again it does not appear that there is any such mortgage or sale of the minor's property entered into by this document. He contends that if the plaintiff has to recover on contract the only defendant against whom he can shape a case of that sort would be the mother herself.

Sir Benod Mitter, on the contrary, has contended that, while he does not dispute the doctrine of Farhall v. Farhall (1), if you find that an executor or a guardian is managing a property on behalf of a minor then those acts if properly done will bind his beneficial interest and he says that this instrument of 23rd January 1919 should be looked at really as a lease by the mother of the property belonging to the son. It is a lease on the term that certain rents should be paid in advance, and, therefore, when the lender sues to recover his advance he is entitled to have recourse not merely to the lady herself but also to the son's estate; for the present purpose it is not actually necessary that this Court should decide that question but I have no doubt that it is a serious question and that to this suit the minor had a defence of a very substantial character. I doubt exceedingly whether on that document or on any facts that have been brought out in this case there was any cause of action against the minor. However, for the present purpose it is not necessary to do more than to say that it is not a case to which no reasonable defence applies. I entirely agree with Sir Benode Mitter when he says that in a case of this sort it is no use paying any attention to a purely imaginary defence. One has to find out as best as he can whether there was any really substantial defence with a real prospect of success. In my judgment, the present case is one in which there was such a defence. That being so what has happened in this case? It is quite true that on the face of the plaint the plaintiff was claiming that the mother should represent the infant. It is quite true that the vakil who acted in the matter was acting on behalf of both. Whether he did or did not have a properly executed power has in the circumstances of this case no importance. What happened was that he got a fortnight's time to put in a defence. There was a further adjournment and no appearance and the Court decreed the suit in such a way as to show that it was present to the minds of the Court that it was dealing with the estate of an infant as well as with the liability of Sudhamoyee Dasi.

The first question, therefore, which arises is, putting aside for the moment the question of adverse interest, whether this case is within the doctrine of the well-known case of Walran v. Banke Behari Prasad Singh (2) decided by the Privy Council. In my opinion this case is very far indeed from Walran's case (2) apart altogether from any question of adverse interest. In that case there had been a suit. There had been various appearances by the mother as in the character of guardian of the infants. It is true that on the day of hearing no appearance was made and that actually at the trial no fight was put up on the infant's behalf. The Privy Council in dealing with the matter was of opinion that the infants were effectively represented in that suit by their mother and with the sanction of the Court. "There is nothing to suggest" say their Lordships, that their interests were not duly protected. The only defects which can be pointed out are that no formal order appointing the mother of the now plaintiffs to be their guardian ad litem is shown to have been drawn up, and that it is not definitely shown that any attempt was made to serve the summons in the former suit upon the infants personally, or upon their mother, a pardanashin lady, before serving it upon Gajadhar, the only adult male member and the karta of the family. It has not been shown that the alleged irregularities caused any prejudice to the present plaintiffs; nor indeed could there well be any, since it has been found that the original debt was one for which the present plaintiffs were liable.

Now, the present case is not a case in which I am prepared to say that there is nothing to suggest that the interest of Thakur Das was not duly protected. It is not a case in which I am now satisfied that the claim against Thakur Das was a claim to which there was no answer. It is one thing, when all that is wrong with the proceeding that a formal order which should have been recorded has not been recorded, to give validity to the proceeding. It is another thing altogether when you have a case in which there appears to have been substantial defence and that defence was never raised at all. In my judgment, were we to hold in this case that the rule in Walian v. Banke Behari Prashad Singh (2) covered a case of this sort we would be opening the door to fraud and malpractice and opening it very wide.

(1) [1872] 7 Ch. 128=41 L. J. Ch. 146=20 W. R. 157=25 T. T. 685

The next question which arises is the question whether or not the mother was a person disqualified from being a guardian by reason of adverse interest. The learned Judge on the original side has treated this matter as too obvious for argument and has said that the contrary was not really contended before him. He says:

It was to the mother's interest to saddle on to the son's estate what was prima facie upon the face of the document a personal liability of her own.

Sir Benod Mitter has very properly pointed out that while in a sense it is true that if no judgment went against the son's estate she would remain solely liable upon a decree against herself, nevertheless if you look at the realities of the position as disclosed at all events by the lady's petition to this Court for appointment as certificated guardian you will find that the son's property was the only source of maintenance and support belonging to either of them. Accordingly Sir Benod points out with great force that if this lady's interests are to determine the matter a calculation of her interest would probably show that the best thing in the world for her would be to defeat the Small Cause Court suit as against Thakurdas and allow it to end merely in a personal judgment against herself which could not be executed against her personally and to pay which she had no assets. It would, he points out, have done her very little harm to have a judgment against herself. Had this case arisen for decision upon this question I would have had some difficulty in holding upon such grounds that there was not an adverse interest. Prima facie the interest was adverse and prima facie it is to the interest of a person even if he has no assets either to escape a personal judgment or to get some one else to share with him the burden of the money to be paid. It is in this case not necessary to proceed upon this ground and I would desire in particular to guard myself against holding that in any case where a guardian ad litem is appointed by a Court the person afterwards by showing adverse interest can get a right to treat the decree as a nullity. I doubt extremely whether the case of Rashid-un-nisa v. Mahomad Ismail Khan (3), which is relied upon for that proposition really goes so far and I am not to be taken as subscribing to everything that is said in the case of Sellappa Goundan v. Masa Naiken (4). But it is clear enough that in a case like this where there was no appointment by the Court at all an adverse interest would introduce an element that would make it impossible to apply the doctrine in Walian's case (2). That proposition was not disputed and I believe that to be right.

On the whole it appears to me that the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judge is right and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs payable to the plaintiff.

The cross-objections are dismissed without costs.

Appeal No. 1816 of 1925, Decided on 3rd May 1928, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Zillah Dinajpur, D/- 8th April 1925.

(a) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 87—Abandonment—Mortgage of a non-transferable occupancy holding—Mortgagee subsequently foreclosing and getting possession—This amounts to abandonment.

There can be no distinction between a sale of a whole holding and a mortgage of the whole holding where the mortgagee has foreclosed and been given possession by the Court. In the case of a non-transferable occupancy holding, such a transfer amounts to abandonment such as entitles the landlord to re-enter. Anything short of showing that the interest of the tenant has ceased will not entitle landlord to re-enter. The mere fact that the tenant is allowed to live in the house after delivery of possession does not affect the principle : 42 Cal. 172, Expl. & Rel. on. [P 849 C 2 ; P 850 C 1]

(b) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 87—Abandonment—Transfer of a part only or not by way of sale—Landlord cannot recover possession in the absence of abandonment.

Where the transfer is of a part only or not by way of sale, the landlord, though he has not consented, is not ordinarily entitled to recover possession of the holding unless there has been (inter alia) an abandonment within the meaning of this section 42 Cal. 172, Foll. [P 849 C 2]

(c) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 87—Suit for ejectment on the ground of abandonment—Mortgagee obtaining possession by foreclosure—Mortgagee must prove that inference of abandonment should not be drawn.

Where in a suit for ejectment on the ground of abandonment by the original tenant, it is shown that the defendant is mortgagee who had foreclosed and taken possession of the holding, the burden of proof is on the mortgagee to show why the inference of abandonment should not be drawn. [P 850 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—This is a suit by a zemindar against certain defendants who are now the appellants before us. But about the lands in Sch. 2 for which the lower appellate Court has given the plaintiff a decree, no question arises here. The question that arises is with regard to the lands of Sch. 1 to the plaint, and it appears that those lands were originally covered by a non-transferable occupancy holding of which the tenant was one Beng Mandal. It further appears that this tenant Beng Mandal in 1907 granted a mortgage over this holding to the defendants. It also appears that the defendants sued and obtained a foreclosure decree and that in 1914 and later on in 1921 they obtained symbolical delivery of possession through Court. Some question has been raised as to the delivery of possession in 1921. But there was delivery of possession in 1921 as appears from the document which the learned lower appellate Court relied on. In these circumstances the question arises whether or not there was an abandonment of the tenancy by Beng Mandal some time prior to January 1922 when the plaintiff instituted his suit. On that question it appears to me that our first resort should be to what is laid down by the Full Bench in the case of Dayamoyi v. Annoda Mohan Roy (1), and the principle that is there laid down is this that where the transfer is a sale of the whole holding, the landlord, in the absence of his consent, is ordinarily entitled to enter on the holding ; and the first question is whether there is any difference in the case between a sale of the whole holding and the case of a person who has granted a mortgage where the mortgagee has subsequently foreclosed and been given possession by the Court. In my opinion there can be no distinction between those two cases. The present is not mere case of mortgage any longer. Accordingly it seems to me that we must apply the principle that ordinarily in these circumstances the Court will directly infer that there has been an abandonment such as entitles the landlord to re-enter. It appears from the statement of the principle given by the Full Bench that this inference of law—while it is an inference of law on the same lines as those laid down by S. 87, Ben. Ten. Act—is not of itself a direct application of that section. The statement goes on to say that where the transfer is of a part only of the holding, or not by way of sale, the landlord, though he has not consented, is not ordinarily entitled to recover possession of the holding unless there has been (inter alia) an abandonment within the meaning of the section.

Applying those principles what appears in the present case is this : Taking the matter as in 1921 when for the second time delivery of possession obtained from the Court, it appears that for about a year after that Beng Mandal himself was allowed to remain in the house or homestead. He appears to have died in about a year's time. Secondly, the question arises as regards certain of the lands of the holding that had been sublet by Beng Mandal to tenants. As regards them, the delivery of possession would immediately put those tenants in the position of having attorned to the defendants. Thirdly, the question arises as to whether or not any of the lands which Beng Mandal used to cultivate continued to be cultivated either by him or by his sons or heirs. On that point the Courts have differed. The learned Subordinate Judge has taken the view that it is not proved to his satisfaction that after the delivery of possession in 1921 Beng Mandal was in possession of any other land of the jote at all. It appears also from the Munsif's judgment that what seems to have happened was that Beng Mandal hung on in the house until he died and that his sons and heirs removed here and there at other places, and in these circumstances we must take that finding of fact to be that it is not proved that Beng Mandal was in possession of any of the other lands.

It remains, therefore, as a special matter for consideration in this case to take note of the fact that the tenant was allowed to go on till he died in a space of about a year in the house. One has to ask oneself whether that is a circumstance that would remove this case as a matter of law from the ordinary category. In my judgment that would not be sufficient in itself to show that Beng Mandal who had mortgaged, who had been foreclosed, who had allowed symbolical possession to be obtained against him was still professing or intending to discharge his responsibility to the zemindar treating himself as responsible for the rent. I see no reason because of that fact which is readily explained by the permission of the defendants to say that the ordinary inference of abandonment should not be drawn. In that view of the case the learned Subordinate Judge is right in putting the burden upon the defendants. Once it is shown that they are mortgagees who have foreclosed and taken possession I think that the burden of proof is on the defendants to show why the inference of abandonment should not be drawn; and as they have not managed to show that there was any occupation of the lands it seems to me that the learned Subordinate Judge's judgment should be upheld.

Mr. Dwarka Nath Chakravarti as part of his argument endeavoured to maintain, if I rightly understood him, that in this case the plaintiff could succeed against the defendants short of showing that the interest of the original tenant Beng Mandal had come to an end. I see no reason to alter my opinion or to change what I have said in the case of Ramesh

Chandra v. Daiba Charan (2). It was contended that under Dayamayi's case (1) because a transfer was valid between the transferor and the transferee therefore when the landlord came to sue the transferee on the ground that he was a mere trespasser and had no title, the trespasser was in this position that he could not assert any title and still could not deny that the whole of the tenant's title had vested in himself and therefore had left the transferor. It is said that in these circumstances the transferee could not set up juiterti of the transferor.

With the greatest possible respect I dissent from that principle. It seems to me to be a perversion of the true principle. If the landlord can say to the transferee "you have got no title" the transferee can resort to the landlord upon that basis; and it is for the landlord to show that he has an immediate right to possession; hence I am wholly unable to see that short of showing abandonment a suit of that character can succeed at all.

In this case, therefore, I think that under Dayamayi's case (1) the zemindar succeeds in showing abandonment, and I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

I do not think that it would be reasonable at all to send the matter back for any further investigation. It seems to me reasonably clear that the Subordinate Judge took a view upon which the principles of law which I have endeavoured to state are applicable.

This appeal is dismissed with costs.

Plaintiff sued for return of Rs. 500 deposited with defendant 1 and the father of defendant 2. Plaintiff's suit was dismissed on the ground of limitation. In a suit for partition which was instituted by the mother of defendant 2 as his next friend a written statement was put in by defendant 1 in which he admitted this deposit by the plaintiff. In the partition suit the matter was referred to arbitration and an award was made on 10th September 1924 by which the liability of defendants 1 and 2 was declared in equal shares with regard to whatever was the deposit made by the plaintiff. That award was accepted by a petition to which both defendant 1 and the mother of defendant 2 were parties.

Held: that the written statement coupled with the award and joint petition amounted to a promise by defendant 1 to pay the debt.

Judgment.—This rule was issued on the opposite party who are defendants 1 and 2 in the suit to show cause why the judgment and decree of the Small Cause Court at Dacca dismissing the suit of the plaintiff who is the petitioner before me should not be set aside. It appears that plaintiff deposited the sum of Rs. 500 with her relations who are defendant 1 and the father of defendant 2. The defendants refused to return this money and this has given rise to the cause of action for the suit. The Small Cause Court Judge found on the evidence that plaintiff had deposited the money in question with defendant 1 and the father of defendant 2 but dismissed plaintiff's suit on the ground of limitation. It appears that in a suit for partition which was instituted by the mother of defendant 2 as his next friend a written statement was put in by defendant 1 in which he admitted this deposit by the plaintiff. In the partition suit the matter was referred to arbitration and an award was made on 10th September 1924 by which the liabilities of defendants 1 and 2 were declared in equal shares with regard to whatever was the deposit made by the plaintiff. The amount of the deposit was not stated in the award. That award was accepted by a joint petition to which both defendant 1 and the mother of defendant 2 who is said to be his lawful guardian were parties. So far as the liability of defendant 1 is concerned it seems to be clear that the written statement which was put in by defendant 1 coupled with the award and the petition of 11th September 1924 amount to a promise to pay the debt which was due to plaintiff by reason of the deposit. The suit was instituted within three years from the date of the joint petition which was put in on 11th September 1924. Consequently limitation could be saved if Art. 60, Lim. Act was held to apply. Article 60 is the proper article applicable seeing that plaintiff's own case is that this was money which was deposited with defendant 1 and father of defendant 2 under the agreement that this money was payable on demand by her. So far as defendant 1 is concerned, as I have already said, limitation is saved by reason of the acknowledgment made in the written statement and the subsequent joint petition of 11th September 1924. The decree of the Small Cause Court Judge in so far as it dismissed plaintiff's suit, in its entirety must be set aside. There will be a decree against defendant 1 for the sum of Rs. 250 (Rupees two hundred and fifty only) with interest at six per cent. per annum from the date of the demand in Magh 1333 up to the date of realization.

It remains to notice the argument of the learned advocate for the petitioner that the suit should also be decreed against defendant 2. It appears that defendant 2 is an infant. There was a demand for this debt during the lifetime of his father Madhu Majhi. The father is said to have died six or seven years prior to the institution of the suit and it was not open to the guardian of the infant to make a promise within the meaning of S 25, Contract Act as according to the findings of the learned Subordinate Judge the debt of the plaintiff was barred by the Statute of Limitation. It is said, however, that this petition of 11th September 1924 was put in at a time when the claim had not become barred by the Statute of Limitation. It appears to me that the petition standing by itself taken with the award is not a proper acknowledgment within the meaning of S 19 read with S. 21, Limitation Act. The sum showing the liability of defendant 2 is not mentioned. It is true that in that award the present plaintiff was not a party but it is not necessary in view of the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Maniram Seth v. Seth Rupchand (1), that the acknowledgment should be made in a document to which the plaintiff need be a party. However that may be, it appears to me that the acknowledgment was not the proper acknowledgment as it did not state the amount of liability in respect of which the guardian of the defendant acknowledged the liability of defendant 2.

In these circumstances the suit will be dismissed so far as the liability of defendant 2 is concerned. There will be a decree, as I have already said, against defendant 1 for a sum of Rs 250 (Rupees two hundred and fifty only) with interest at six per cent. per annum. The rule is made absolute to this extent. There will be no order as to costs.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of khas possession of some lands on a declaration of the plaintiffs' title thereto. It appears that the lands in dispute in the present case are included within a bigger area which formed the subject-matter of a previous litigation in the year 1889. The suit between the parties in the year 1889 was compromised and a decree was made therein in accordance with the petition of compromise that was filed. By that decree of compromise it was decreed that the lands consisting of plots Ka, Kha, Ga, Gha and Una lying just on the west of plot No 1 as shown in Gangesh Babu the Commissioner's map that was prepared in the case and which was found to belong to one Rajamuddi Sheikh were to be divided in the proportion of 11 and 8 and the 11/19ths share lying on the east was to go to the plaintiffs and the remaining 8/19ths share to go to the defendants. In the year 1902 there was another litigation between the parties relating to a small plot of land and in that litigation there was a Commissioner appointed who relaid the map prepared by Gangesh Babu in the first litigation namely of the year 1889. According to the plaintiffs in the present case the lands in dispute lie within their 11/19ths share of the subject-matter in dispute in the litigation of 1889 while according to the defence the disputed lands lie not within the 'plaintiffs' share but within the share of the defendants. A Pleader, Babu Abinash Chandra Mukerjee, was appointed a Commissioner in the suit which has given rise to the present appeal. Abinash Babu relaid the western boundary of plot No. 1 in the map prepared by Ganesh Babu and the Court of first instance accepted the map prepared by Abinash Babu and on the basis of Abinash Babu's map came to the conclusion that the lands in dispute were included within the defendants' share and not within the share of the plaintiffs and on that finding the trial Judge dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. On appeal, the lower appellate Court reversed the decision of the trial Judge and holding that Ganesh Babu had committed a mistake when measuring Rajamuddi's land came to the conclusion that the lands in dispute fell within the share of the plaintiffs and on that finding allowed the appeal and decreed the plaintiffs' suit. Defendants 1 and 3 have appealed to this Court.

The principal contention on behalf of the appellants before us has been that the lower appellate Court was not justified in law in going behind the compromise decree whereby the land lying just on the west of plot No. 1 as shown in Gangesh Babu's map was divided in the proportion of 11 and 8 between the parties. This contention is, in our opinion well founded and should prevail. In the decree that was made in the suit of 1889 it was directed that the land that was to be divided between the parties in the proportion of 11 and 8 was the land lying just on the west of plot No. 1 as depicted on Gangesh Babu's map. It is true that in the decree it was also stated that plot No 1 was the land of Rajamuddi. But there is nothing in the decree to show that the land was just on the west of Rajamuddi's land, was to be divided between the parties in the proportion of 11 and 8. That being so, if the compromise decree in the litigation of the year 1889 is to be given effect to, the lands lying just on the west of plot No. 1 as shown in Gangesh Babu's map must be held to have been the land that was directed to be divided between the parties. Whether Gangesh Babu had made any mistake in plotting plot No. 1 in his map was not a question which could be legitimately gone into in the present litigation. The compromise decree was based on Gangesh Babu's map and no matter whether the map of Gangesh Babu wherein he showed where the western boundary of plot No. 1 was, was right or wrong, the lower appellate Court ought to have proceeded in determining the case on the basis of that map of Gangesh Babu. This map prepared by Gangesh Babu has been relaid in the present litigation by a pleader Commissioner as observed before and this pleader Commissioner has in his map depicted the western boundary of plot No 1 in the map of Gangesh Babu. It appears that no exception was taken to this work of relaying as done by Babu Abinash and if Abinash Babu's map showing in it the western boundary of plot No 1 as it is to be found in the map prepared by Gangesh Babu is accepted as correct there can be no dispute that the disputed property would fall within the share of the defendants and not the share of the plaintiffs. We are, therefore, of opinion that the lower appellate Court ought to have proceeded to determine the case on the basis of the map as prepared by Gangesh Babu which was the basis of the compromise decree in the litigation of 1889 and that the learned Additional District Judge was wrong in law when he went behind the compromise decree and proceeded to consider the question whether Gangesh Babu had committed any mistake when measuring the land of Rajamuddi.

In view of the aforesaid observations the appeal must be allowed, the decree of the lower appellate Court set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored. The appellants will be entitled to their costs in all Courts.

Judgment—In this matter three pleaders of Rajshahi Judge's Court have been called upon under S. 13, Legal Practitioners Act to show cause why they should not be dealt with under S. 14 of the Act. We have heard the learned Senior Government Pleader and Mr. A. N. Choudhury, counsel, who appeared on behalf of the pleaders. In the present case we do not propose to pass any sentence or take any action under S. 14, Legal Practitioners Act, our reasons being—first, that no untoward result followed from the act of the pleaders as has been admitted by the learned District Magistrate. The work of the Court was not hampered and it appears that the notice or manifesto signed by the pleaders did not have any appreciable effect in the locality. The learned Magistrate was willing to drop the proceedings if the pleaders admitted that their action had been wrong and he has referred this matter to us for the purpose of vindicating the principle involved; secondly, there is no evidence of the publication of the manifesto. It may be presumed that it was published; but then there is nothing on the record to show whether it was published and the extent to which it was published. Thirdly, that the pleaders who signed the manifesto are three out of more than one hundred pleaders practising in the Judge's Court at Rajshahi. They do not seem to occupy such an influential position as to persuade the litigants not to appear in Court as is clear from the fact that there was no stoppage of work of the Courts on that day.

Though in the circumstances of this particular case we are not inclined to take any action we express our strong disapproval of the conduct of the pleaders concerned. A legal practitioner, as any other person, has a right to entertain political opinions which may or may not be acceptable to the authorities. But having obtained license to practice in Courts, if he acts inconsistently with the position which he has obtained by virtue of the license granted to him, he abuses it and brings himself within the four corners of the Legal Practitioners Act. This was the view taken in Emperor v. Rajani Kanta Bose (1), Shankar Ganesh Dahir v. Secretary of State (2). It seems that the warning given by this Court in Rajani Kanta's case has had no effect. Though in the circumstances of this case we refrain from taking any action it must be understood as a rule that the action of legal practitioners counselling the public not to attend Court and thereby interfering with the administration of justice is one which cannot be lightly dealt with. With these remarks we direct that no further action be taken in this matter.

Appeal No. 102 of 1925, Decided on 23rd January 1928, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Bankura, D/- 9th September 1924.

(a) Practice—New plea making further evidence necessary, cannot be allowed in second appeal.

A point, which is never put forward in either of the lower Courts or even in the grounds of appeal, cannot be allowed to be taken up for the first time in second appeal when it necessitates the case to be remanded in order that further evidence should be adduced. [P 855 C 1]

Per Mukerji, J.—The only material difference as between an entry relevant under S. 34, and one relevant under S. 32, Cl. (2), is that in the former case the person who made the entry may be available as a witness, while in the latter case he is not. Such entries, no matter whether they are relevant under one or the other section are not to be considered as alone sufficient to charge any person with liability: 28 Bom. 294; 10 Bom. L. C. C. Biswas, K. C. Ghose and Sukumar Dey—for Appellants.

Brojo Lal Chakravarti and Sarat Kumar Mitter—for Respondent.

Cuming, J.—The facts of the case out of which this appeal has arisen are briefly these. The landlord applied under S 105, Ben Ten Act for the enhancement of the rent of a certain tenure. In the Record-of-Rights the tenancy had been described as a permanent non-mukurari tenure bearing a jam of Rs 16 8 7. The defence was that it was a mokurari tenure and the rent was not liable to be enhanced. The first Court held that the presumption under S 50, B T. Act which the defendants had succeeded in establishing had been rebutted.

The Court fixed Rs 55 8-0 as the rent of the tenancy. The lower appellate Court upheld this decision.

The first point that has been urged by the appellant is that if he can prove that he has held at the same rate of rent for 20 years it will be presumed not only that he had held at the same rate of rent but that the tenancy was in existence at the time of the permanent settlement and hence the principles of S. 6, Ben. Ten. Act apply and that the Court should have applied these principles.

The simple answer to this contention is that it was never put forward in either of the lower Courts or even in the grounds of appeal to this Court. If the appellant succeeded in the contention the case might have to be remanded in order that further evidence should be adduced. We are not prepared to allow the point to be taken for the first time in second appeal more specially as it finds no place even in the grounds of appeal to this Court. The next point which has been contended is that the hudabandi papers on which the lower Courts have relied are not admissible in evidence to rebut the presumption under S 50, Ben. Ten. Act having regard to the provisions of S. 34, Evidence Act. The appellant's main reliance is placed on a decision reported in Aktowli v. Tarak Nath (1). Now S. 34, Evidence Act, states that books of accounts regularly kept in the ordinary course of business are relevant whenever they refer to a matter into which the Court has to inquire but such statement shall not alone be sufficient evidence to charge a person with liability.

Now S 34 does not make books of accounts inadmissible unless corroborated. It states distinctly that such books are admissible but not sufficient by themselves to charge any person with liability. Even though they are uncorroborated they are still evidence. It is not correct to say that such books are inadmissible. They are admissible. It is not therefore correct to say that such books of accounts are inadmissible unless corroborated if required to charge a person with liability. It would be more correct to say that though admissible they do not establish the facts required to be proved i.e., that a person owed a certain sum of money, unless corroborated.

In the case on which the appellant has relied Aktowli v. Tarak Nath (1), Mukerji, J., seems to have held that in that case the jamabandi papers were improperly admitted in evidence. Presumably it was held though this is not quite clear that they were inadmissible because not corroborated by virtue of S 34, Evidence Act.

But S. 34 does not make such books inadmissible if not corroborated. It makes them admissible but provides that by themselves they are not sufficient to charge with liability. If I understand that decision rightly it would appear to be held that such books uncorroborated cannot be used to rebut the presumption under S. 20, Ben Ten. Act.

But in the concluding portion of the judgment the learned Judge remarks that it was pointed out in the case of Ram-pyarabai v. Balaji (2), that if a statement is admissible under S. 32, corroboration would not be needed in terms of S 34

(1) [1912] 16 C. L. J. 328=17 I. C. 266=17 C. W. N. 774.

(2) [1904] 28 Bom. 294=6 Bom. T. R. 50 and that that view was accepted by this Court in Dukha Mandal v. Grant (3). If that be so then the decision does not support the view the appellant would have us take. In the case of Umed Ali v. Khajeh Habibulla (4), it seems to have been held that if the talub-baki papers were admissible under S. 32 (2) it was unnecessary to consider whether they were relevant under S. 34.

In the case of Dukha Mandal v. W. M. Grant (3), it seems to have been held that if the entries were admissible either under S. 32 or S. 34 no corroborating evidence was necessary and that they could be used to show variation in the rent.

In the case of Jonab Biswas v. Siva Kumari Debi (5), it seems to have been held that there were not the necessary elements to bring the papers within S. 32 and that, therefore, they were admissible only under S. 34 and in that case they required corroboration.

There is another case to be also considered, an unreported case being appeal from appellate decree No 3631 of 1914 decided by D Chatterji and Beachcroft, JJ. In that case it was held that these jama-wasil-baki papers could be used to rebut a presumption under S. 50 because they do not by themselves charge any person with liability.

The general trend of the authorities would seem to be that if the papers are admissible under S. 32, S. 34 has no application. There is further authority for the proposition that they do not of themselves charge a person with liability if used merely to rebut the presumption under S. 50.

For the purposes of this appeal these authorities are sufficient for the proposition that these papers are admissible in evidence to rebut the presumption under S. 50.

The next question which has been urged in appeal is that these entries do not rebut the presumption under S. 50. The question is whether these entries do show an alteration in the rate of rent. The particular entry on which the plaintiff-respondent relied to prove the alteration in the rate of rent is an entry in the jama-wasil-baki papers of 1210 and a hudabandi of 1201. These are the documents or evidence that have been produced to show any change of rent. We have carefully considered these documents and we are not prepared to say that on a proper construction of these documents any change in the rate of rent has been proved for the simple reason that it is not possible to say exactly what these documents really mean.

In the document of 1201 we find the following entry against this tenancy.

Jama including cesses Rs. 19. Less Rs. 3 and balance jama Rs. 16. Total jama Rs. 16. What the sum of Rs. 3 deducted is, it is impossible to say. Equally is it impossible to say how much of the jama is rent and how much cesses. That being so the document of 1201 does not show clearly what was the jama then. There is the same difficulty in dealing with the papers of 1210. Against this particular tenancy is entered, detail of Panchak Rs. 14. Total jama Rs. 14. Balance jama Rs. 14. Excess after taking accounts Rs. 1-8-0. Full jama Rs. 15-8-0.

The figure for the full jama Rs. 15-8-0 is sicca rupee and equivalent to Rs. 16-8-10 the present jama. So in 1210 the rent apparently was the same as it is now.

The respondent would contend that the papers show that the rent has increased from Rs. 14 to Rs. 15-8-0. I cannot say that it does.

The total jama is shown as Rs. 14 and the full jama as Rs. 15-8-0. What is the distinction between total and full jama I do not understand nor do I understand what is meant by "excess after accounts" which sum added to Rs. 14 make up Rs. 15-8-0.

All I can say is that it is not clear what these documents mean and that they cannot be construed as proving that there has been any change in the rate of rent. The result is that the appeal must succeed and the plaintiffs' claim for enhanced rent be entirely dismissed with costs in all Courts.

Mukherji, J.—I agree and desire to add a few words.

Section 43, Act 2 of 1855 was as follows:

Books proved to have been kept in the course of business shall be admissible as corroborative and not as independent proof of the facts therein stated.

In S. 34, Act 1 of 1872 the words "regularly kept" are substituted for the words "proved to have been regularly kept," and in the illustration to the section the word used is "shows" and not "proves." It is apparent, therefore, that the law embodied in S. 34, Act 1 of 1872 is not quite the same that was contained in S. 13, Act 2 of 1855, and this seems to be conceded on all hands. The expressions "corroborative evidence," "independent evidence" and substantive evidence" that are found in many of the reported decisions bearing upon S. 34, Act 1 of 1872 are somewhat out of place in view of the wording of that section and have but been handed down to us from the words "corroborative" and "independent" that appeared in S. 13 of the old Act and those words as well as the word "substantive" that were used in the decisions thereunder. The present Act deals, amongst others, with the relevancy of evidence and in some instances with its probative value.

The plain words of S. 34 indicate that the section deals with all entries in books of accounts regularly kept in the course of business, in the first place, making them relevant whenever they refer to a matter into which the Court has to enquire, and next, providing that when such entries are sought to be used as statements for a particular purpose, namely to charge any person with liability, they shall not alone be sufficient evidence for that purpose. S. 32, Cl. (2) makes relevant a statement, consisting of an entry made by a person who is not a witness before this Court, in books, not necessarily books of account but, kept in the ordinary course of business. A book of account may be one of such books, and where an entry appears in a book of account it comes both under S. 32, Cl. (2) and S. 34. The Illustration to S. 34 makes it plain that if the book of account is regularly kept in the course of business, the entry will be relevant notwithstanding that the person who made the entry has not been examined to prove the truth of the transaction to which the entry relates and notwithstanding that he is available as a witness. The only material difference as between an entry relevant under S. 34 and one relevant under S. 32, Cl. (2) is that in the former case the person who made the entry may be available as a witness while in the latter case he is not. I find it very difficult to appreciate on what ground the legislature could intend to exempt entries relevant under S. 32, Cl. (2) from the disability that it imposed on entries relevant under S. 34 by the second part of that section, and personally I have always felt inclined to take the view that such entries, no matter whether they are relevant under one section or under the other, are not to be considered as alone sufficient to charge any person with liability. The other view, however, namely, that the latter part of S. 34 applies only to such entries which are relevant only under S. 34 and not under S. 32, Cl. (2) is backed by the high authority of Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J., in the case of Ram Pyarabai v. Balaji Shridhar (2), and has been accepted as correct in other cases (e.g., Daji Abaji Khare v. Govind Narayan Bapat (6), Dukha Mandal v. W. N. Grant (3), Aktowli v. Tarak Nath Ghose (1), and it is perhaps too late to contest it. If this other view is adopted it should be held that it was intended by the legislature that where the maker of the entry is available as a witness the entry alone will not be sufficient proof to charge a person with liability but, where the maker is not available as a witness but the entry is relevant by reason of one or other of the conditions mentioned in the opening paragraph of S. 32 being present, there is no statutory obligation to look for anything else to found the liability.

Personally I entertain grave doubts as to whether this could have been the intention of the legislature or if it was, it would not have been declared in much clearer terms. Fortunately, however, in practice we seldom come across a case in which the entry which comes under S. 32, Cl. (2) is really sought to be used alone to charge any person with liability. The present case, in my opinion, is certainly not one of that description. The ekwal hudabandi papers of 1201 and the jama-wasil-baki papers of 1210, upon which reliance has been placed on behalf of the plaintiff in the present case, in my judgment, have not been used alone to charge the defendant with the liability to pay enhanced rent. They have been used to rebut the presumption which the defendant claims under S. 50, Ben. Ten. Act, and quoting the words of Markby, J., in the case of Belatt Khan v. Rash Behary Mookherjee (7) where jama-wasil-baki papers were used for a similar purpose, I may say :

I do not consider that it can be said that these documents have been used alone in order to charge the defendants with the liability that has been imposed on him. He is charged with the rent of the land by reason of its occupation by him, that rent being considered to be a fair and equitable rent for the land occupied and what these documents have been used for is not to charge him with the liability but to answer the claim which he set up to exemption from what would be the ordinary liability of a tenant. It, therefore, seems to me that those documents have not been used in this case as alone sufficient to charge him with that liability in the sense in which those words are used in S. 31, Evidence Act.

The decision of Markby, J., was dissented from by Prinsep and Bose, JJ., in Surnomoyi v. Jahur Muhammad Nasyo (8). It should, however, be noted that in Belatt Khan v. Rash Behary (7), there were, in fact, other materials on the record in support of those papers, and as regards the view of Markby, J., as to the nature and scope of the use of the papers when the presumption of fixity of rent is sought to be rebutted by them, it does not appear to have been dissented from in the other decision referred to above. This view of Markby, J., has been adopted in recent times in this Court in the case of Nirod Krishna Ghose v. Prodhot Kumar Tagore (9) where the learned Judges D Chatterjee and Beachcroft, JJ. said :

It is not right to say that these papers have the effect of imposing any liability upon the tenants. Their effect is to rebut the presumption under S. 50, Ben. Ten. Act by showing that previous to the 20 years for which uniform payment of rent has been shown, there was realization of different rates of rent. The liability to enhancement is imposed not by these papers but by the law which in the absence of the presumption under S. 50 or upon a rebuttal of that presumption, imposes a liability to enhancement on tenants.

So also in the case of Dukha Mandal v. Grant (3), Harington, J., and Caspersz, J., concurring said that by the jamabandi papers that were similarly used in that case it was not sought to impose a particular liability on any person, but it was only sought to show what the nature of the tenancy was.

I am aware that in Aktowli v. Tarak Nath Ghose (1), the learned Judges of this Court suggested that a wider meaning should be given to the latter part of S. 34 and that though the papers may not directly impose the liability they ultimately lead to that result and they treated the decision in Surnomoyi v. Jahur Muhammad Nasyo (8) as supporting their view. With the utmost respect to the learned Judges I should venture to say that though the point may have arisen in the case of Surnomoyi v. Jahur Muhammad Nasyo (8), it does not appear to have been decided in that case; and there is, indeed, very little authority in support of this view. Moreover this view if I may say so, ignores the word "alone" which appears in the section and to which effect must be given. I should say also that the case of Jonab Biswas v. Siva Kumari Devi (5) upon which reliance was placed on behalf of the appellants, in this connexion, in my opinion does not touch this question.

The fact that ekjai hudabandi papers and the jama-wasil-baki papers on which the plaintiff relies in the present case are relevant under S. 32, Cl. (2), does not, if the latter part of S. 34 does not apply, mean that they should necessarily, in any event, be regarded as conclusive of the truth of the entries contained in them. The evidentiary value of such entries when they are sought to be used against the tenant has got to be carefully appraised, the entries themselves being scrutinized with care and the circumstances under which they were made being carefully considered. The occasions on which they have, without corroboration, been implicitly relied on against the tenants are few and far between. The reason why they find this disfavour is that they are made behind the back of the tenants and they put the tenants entirely at the mercy of the zamindar or his agents. When, however, there is nothing to suggest that they were made with a motive and all the circumstances point to their having been made in the ordinary course of business, the chances of their accuracy and of the transactions to which they relate being true are considerably enhanced. It depends therefore on all the circumstances of any particular case whether, used for a purpose such as the present, they would require corroboration or not for their acceptance.

It is unnecessary, however, to discuss the probative value of the papers now before us because I am clearly of opinion that taking them at their face value, they fail to establish, with any degree of certainty, either that the defendant's tenancy came into existence after the permanent settlement or that there was realization of rent at any time since then at a rate different from what the defendant has now been paying for about a century and a quarter.

Civil Rule No. 179 of 1928, Decided on 17th July 1928, from Appellate Decree of Sub-Judge, Mymensingh, D/- 22nd November 1927, in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 115 of 1927

Bengal Ten. Act, S. 153, Expl. — Irregularity due to fraud or negligence also is covered by Explanation.

The question whether the proceedings in publishing or conducting the sale were regular or not would fall within the Explanation, whether that irregularity was due to fraud or negligence or for any other reason: 32 Cal. 957 (F. B.), Deemed nullified by Expl.; 16 C. L. J. 542 and 18 C. W. N. 1266, Dist.: Chatterjee, J., in 22 C. L. J. 244, Diss. from: A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 633, Foll. [P 860 C 2]

Radhabinod Pal and Jitendra Mohan Banerjee—for Petitioner

Gunada Charan Sen, Annada Charan Karkoon and Sachindra Kumar Roy—for Opposite Parties.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This rule was obtained by the judgment-debtor in a decree for rent which was obtained by the opposite party for less than Rs. 50. The holding of the petitioner was sold for Rs. 34 and it was purchased by the decree-holder. The sale took place in the year 1916. The application for setting aside the sale was made in the year 1926. It was alleged that the petitioner was kept from the knowledge of his right to make the application for setting aside the sale by the fraud of the opposite party and, therefore, the petitioner was entitled to extension of time for making the application under S. 18, Lim. Act. It was alleged that the sale was vitiated on the ground of non-service of process and fraud and inadequacy of price. It was opposed by some only of the opposite parties. The points argued before the Munsiff were (1) whether the application was barred by limitation, (2) whether the sale was liable to be set aside on account of suppression of process of attachment and sale proclamation or for irregularities in publishing and conducting the same or on account of fraud, (3) whether the sale was bad for inadequacy of price. The learned Munsiff held that the petitioner was entitled to the benefit of S. 18, Lim. Act and, therefore, the application was not barred by limitation. The learned Munsiff next dealt with the question as to the irregularities and his findings are expressed in these words :

To my mind notices under O. 21, R. 66, Civil P. C., were all suppressed and not served. The absence of such notices is a material irregularity vitiating the sale. The proclamation of sale is blank. It does not contain the name of the place, the date of sale and the amount of the decree nor the value of the land to be sold. Everything was done in a hurry. The provisions of O. 21, R. 66 were not at all complied with. These irregularities in publishing the sale are material irregularities vitiating the sale. To my mind the proclamation of sale was also suppressed with fraudulent motive.

He then found that Darbesh Sarkar the Tahsildar of the landlord was after all these lands and seemed to have been a party to the fraud with a sinister motive to get hold of the land; and he found afterwards that it was this Darbesh who took settlement from the landlord of the lands in question after the auction sale and he himself personally was eager to get hold of the lands. Upon these findings the sale was set aside. On appeal by the decree-holder the Subordinate Judge held that the application was barred by limitation and in that view the Subordinate Judge did not deal with the other questions relating to the irregularities mentioned by the Munsiff in his judgment. A second appeal was preferred against the decision of the Subordinate Judge by the petitioner which was dismissed on the preliminary objection taken by the opposite party. In the alternative the petitioner obtained this Rule.

The only ground that has been urged before us is that there was no appeal from the decision of the Munsiff to the Subordinate Judge having regard to the provisions of S. 153, Ben Ten. Act. The Munsiff we are told was empowered to deal with these matters finally under the provisions of S. 153, Ben. Ten Act, and, therefore, no appeal lay. It was contended on behalf of the opposite party that as the Munsiff found that there was fraud an appeal to the Subordinate Judge was competent, and in support of this contention the opposite party relies upon the Full Bench case of Kali Mandal v. Ramsarbaswa Chakravarti (1). In that case the question put to the Full Bench was whether an appeal lay from an order setting aside a sale or declining to set aside a sale in execution of a decree for rent, as there was no appeal from the decree in the suit on account of the prohibition contained in S 153, Ben Ten. Act. Maclean, C. J., in his judgment in that case in answer to the question put to the Full Bench relied upon the opinion expressed by himself in the previous case of Ganga Charan v. Sashi Bhusan (2). In the earlier case of Ganga Charan v. Sashi Bhusan (2) as well as in the later case the question was whether the sale was vitiated on the ground of irregularity in publishing or conducting the sale. Maclean, C. J., was of opinion that in deciding this the Court has to go into the question of conflicting title. As he put the matter in the case of Ganga Charan v. Sashi Bhusan (2):

The opposite party says: This is my land because the sale to me is a good sale. The petitioner says: It is my land because the sale to you is a bad one; and that was the question which was decided by the order which was in appeal to the Additional District Judge.

The opinion of the Full Bench that the regularity of proceedings in publishing or conducting a sale was a question of conflicting title was superseded by the legislature. The Explanation added to S 153 makes it clear that the regularity of the proceedings in publishing or conducting the sale in execution of a decree for arrears of rent is not a question relating to title to land or to some interest in land as between parties having conflicting claims thereto. The learned advocate for the opposite party relies upon the opinion expressed in some cases that the Full Bench decision aforesaid has been affected by this Explanation only partially, so that where the question of fraud is raised the Full Bench decision retains its force. I may, however, point out that no question of fraud was at all discussed in any of the judgments in the Full Bench case. The question related to the regularity of the proceedings in publishing or conducting the sale. If that is nullified by the Explanation added to S 153, to my mind the whole effect of the Full Bench case of Kali Mandal v. Ramsarbaswa (1), has been nullified by the legislature. I would further venture to state that the regularity of the proceedings in publishing or conducting a sale does not necessarily exclude the question of fraud. The irregularity in the proceedings may be for non-publication of the notices or any material error, which may be due to fraud, negligence or simple inadvertence. How is the Court to differentiate between these? The fact is established that the requisite notices were not served. It is only by mere inference in the majority of cases that the Court can come to any conclusion that service was not made with fraudulent motive or that it was due to sheer negligence on the part of the decree-holder or his men.

In this particular case the Munsiff found that the Tehsildar of the landlord did not serve the notices with fraudulent motive for his own interest in order to get the property himself after purchasing it for his master, the landlord. Will there be difference as regards the right of appeal on account of the fraud of a servant of the decree-holder for his own purpose or on account of the fraud of the decree-holder himself? I think not. It can not reasonably be contended in my judgment that if a third party commits a fraud with regard to the sale of certain properties the effect should be the same as if the fraud was committed by the decree-holder himself. To hold that there should be an appeal if the fraud is brought home to the decree-holder, and if the fraud was due to the act of a third person say of the peon there should be no appeal, seems to me also illogical. As a matter of fact it is often very difficult to discover where proper notices were not served whether it was on account of fraud or negligence. Therefore the real question in my judgment is whether the proceedings in publishing or conducting the sale were regular or not would fall within the Explanation, whether that irregularity was due to fraud or negligence or for any other reason. The Explanation says "A question as to the regularity etc.," which in my opinion includes every ground affecting the regularity.

It is urged on behalf of the opposite party that there has been a conflict of decisions in this matter and, therefore, the question should be referred to a Full Bench. The only case in which this question of fraud directly arose is the case of Nobin Chandra v. Bepin Chandra Roy (3). There the learned Judges composing the Bench were divided in opinion and I respectfully disagree with the opinion expressed by Chatterjea, J., where he observed that the effect of the Full Bench case in Kali Mandal v. Ramsarbaswa (1), has been only partially nullified by the Explanation attached to S 153, Ben. Ten. Act. It seems to me that by adding the explanation the legislature only declared what the law was and as I have already stated it entirely nullifies the effect of the Full Bench case. Although there are observations to the same effect in the cases of Beni Madhab Roy v. Bisseswar Bharati (4) and Arjun Das v. Gunendra Nath Basu (5), it should be noted that those were not cases relating to fraud in publishing or conducting a sale. Those cases therefore are no authority for the proposition put forward by Mr. Sen for the opposite party. The previous cases have been discussed in a recent judgment by Mukherji J., in the cases of Maharaja Bahadur Singh v. Karan Mar (6), where the learned Judge expressed a strong dissent from the view that where there is fraud alleged or found in publishing or conducting a sale there is an appeal in such a case as this. I entirely agree with the opinion expressed by that learned Judge. Under the circumstance a reference to the Full Bench is not called for.

I therefore hold that in the present case there was no appeal against the order of the Munsiff to the Subordinate Judge and that appeal was heard without jurisdiction. The Rule is made absolute. The judgment and order of the Subordinate Judge are set aside and those of the

* (a) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 15—Trial Court passing decree for costs severally—Appellate Court giving a joint decree—Application for execution made by one of the joint decree-holders for his share only and entertained by the Court keeps alive the entire decree.

Decree for costs was made severally in favour of defendants by the trial Court and jointly by the appellate Court against the plaintiffs. In 1917 within three years of the date of decree, defendants separately applied for execution of the decree for their separate interest. Within three years after the above execution they again applied for execution of decree severally. In 1923 only one of them made an application for execution. In 1924 they made a joint application for execution of the decree.

Held: that although the Civil P. C. does not permit an application for execution as made in 1917, 1920 and 1923, the applications so made, being accepted by the Court and order made for execution after service of notice on the parties, they were effective in keeping alive the entire decree: 1 All. 231; 4 All. 72, Diss. from: 15 W. B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the judgment-debtors against the order of the District Judge affirming the decision of the Munsiff rejecting their application that the execution of the decree is barred by limitation.

The only question in this case is whether an application made by one of two joint decree-holders for execution of the joint-decree with reference to his share of the interest awarded to him under the decree keeps alive the decree for subsequent execution. In this case the decree for costs was made by the trial Court severally in favour of the respondents. The judgment-debtors who were the plaintiffs in that case appealed and on their appeal, the appellate Court awarded costs to the respondents in this case jointly. In 1917 within three years of the date of the decree both the two sets of decree-holders separately applied for execution of the decree to the extent of what each considered to be his separate interest. It does not appear that any objection was taken on behalf of the judgment-debtors, nor did the Court proceed under O 21, R 17 or reject the application on the ground that such application was not maintainable. Within three years after that execution both sets of decree-holders again applied for execution of the decree severally. In 1923 only one set of decree-holders made an application for execution. In 1924 the same decree-holders presented a fresh application for execution of the decree apparently for their share or what they considered to be their share in the decree. The other decree-holder was subsequently allowed to be joined in the application and the application proceeded as if made by both sets of decree-holders.

The objection now is that under O 21, R 15 any one or more of joint decree-holders are allowed to apply for execution of the whole decree for the benefit of them all; and it is contended that the Code does not provide for an application for execution by a joint decree-holder of a share of the decree. It is urged therefore that the applications made from 1917 downwards were not applications in accordance with law, and, therefore, the present application in 1924 for execution of the decree was barred by limitation. As the learned District Judge has observed the decisions of the several High Courts on that question are not uniform. The Allahabad Court has held that such an application is not in accordance with law, and, therefore, does not keep alive the decree: see Ram Autar v. Ajudhia Singh (1) and Collector of Shahjampur v. Raja Jugannath Singh (2). On the other hand it was held by this Court in the case of Koylas Nath Ghose v. Nitya Shama Dasse (3), that although the application for such execution is irregular and ineffectual for the purpose of execution, if made bona fide under a misapprehension of the law, it may be regarded as a proceeding which keeps the decree alive. Similarly it was held in the case of P. P. Kuthath Haji v. Bavotti Haji (4), that although the Civil Procedure Code does not allow one of several decree-holders to apply for partial execution of a joint decree, yet an application by one of such decree-holders for execution of the decree in respect of so much of the relief granted to all, as he considers appertains to him individually, may keep in force the decree as being an application according to law.

Under such circumstances I think we must follow the decision of this Court and hold that although the Civil Procedure Code does not permit an application so made being accepted by the Court and order made for execution after service of notice on the parties were effective in keeping alive the decree. Further in the present case the principle laid down in the case of Mungul Pershad Dicit v. Griya Kant Lahiri (5) would apply. The view apparently taken by the Munsiff that the judgment-debtors not having raised an objection to the legality of the order made by the Court in the previous execution proceeding are not precluded from raising the question of limitation now does not appear to be supported by any reason or authority. The case which the Munsiff purports to follow has been misread by him. The application of 1923 should be held to have kept alive the entire decree.

The appeal is therefore dismissed. There will be no order for costs in this appeal, under the circumstance.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from an order made under S. 476, Criminal P. C., directing a complaint to be made. The complaint is for an offence under S. 193, I. P. C., i. e., complaint for giving false evidence. It appears that the appellant was the first witness for prosecution in a case in which 14 persons were charged with rioting and arson in connexion with some char lands and it would seem that in the course of his deposition he made contradictory statements and that upon that basis the order complained of has been made. The formal complaint sets out different passages and leaves the matter there with a request to take necessary steps. When we look at the order-sheet of the learned Sessions Judge we find that this order was made on the application of the Public Prosecutor. It seems to have been a fact that the present appellant did his best to say by way of explanation that he was tired and confused and that he did not contradict himself out of malice or wilfully. It does seem to me that to prosecute people because they give evidence which is contradictory, merely on the basis of that contradiction, is a very doubtful procedure.

In the present case the learned Sessions Judge has taken no pains to do what he is ordered to do by S. 476. I look in vain for any recorded finding to the effect that "it is expedient in the interests of justice that an enquiry should be made" into the offence in this case. In my judgment as the learned Sessions Judge has not recorded that finding I do not feel it incumbent on me to assume that he properly considered this matter and came to a right conclusion. In my judgment the case is not one which appears to me from a mere existence of contradiction to require in the interests of justice that an enquiry should be made. I would allow the appeal and set aside the order directing a complaint to be made.

Mallik, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of prices of some articles alleged to have been supplied by the plaintiffs to defendants 1 and 2 on the allegation that defendant 2 who had taken the goods from the shop of the plaintiffs had acted as an agent of defendant 1. The Court of first instance gave a decree against defendant 2 alone holding that defendant 2 had not acted as an agent of defendant 1. On appeal by the plaintiffs the lower appellate Court found that defendant 2 by whom the goods had been taken from the plaintiffs' shop was a servant of defendant 1 and in a way it found also that the goods which had been taken from the shop of the plaintiffs had been received by defendant 1 and had been dealt with by him and on these facts the lower appellate Court gave a decree against defendant 1 alone on the ground that defendant 2 had acted as an agent of defendant 1. Defendant 1 has appealed to this Court.

There were two points urged before us on behalf of the appellant. The first one was that the lower appellate Court was wrong in law in inferring from the facts found by it that defendant 2 was an agent of defendant 1 for the purpose of the purchase. We are unable to agree with the learned advocate for the appellant in this view of the matter. The lower appellate Court has held that defendant 2 was a servant of defendant 1 and it is an undeniable fact that the goods were actually taken from the plaintiffs' shop by defendant 2. The lower appellate Court, as I have said before, found in a way that the goods taken from the shop of the plaintiffs by defendant 2 were received by defendant 1 and dealt with by him. These facts, in our opinion, were sufficient for an inference in law that defendant 2 was an agent of defendant 1. The learned advocate contended that the findings to the effect that the goods supplied by the plaintiffs found their way to defendant 1, and were dealt with by him were unsupported by any evidence. The evidence which the learned Additional District Judge has discussed in connexion with this matter may not have been sufficient for the findings arrived at by him on the point. But it cannot be said that these findings are based on no evidence at all and unless it can be said that the findings are based on no evidence we cannot, in second appeal, interfere with them.

The other point that was taken by the learned advocate for the appellant was that the lower appellate Court having in a way disbelieved the plaintiffs' case of an express authority by defendant 1 to defendant 2 ought not to have made defendant 1 liable on a case of implied authority. But the pleading of the plaintiffs, as it is to be found in the plaint, would show that the plaintiffs did not confine their case to a case of express authority only. The plaint, as we read it, may be taken to include a case of express authority as well as a case of implied authority. Our attention was drawn to the fact that some of the plaintiffs in their evidence deposed only to a case of express authority. But that would not, in my opinion, exclude them from setting up a case of implied authority if a case of implied authority could be made out from the facts and circumstances and other evidence appearing in this case.

Both the points that were taken before us on behalf of the appellant, therefore, fail and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Suit No. 1181 of 1925, Decided on 21st November 1927.

Calcutta High Court Original Side Rules—O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C., is applied by analogy—But R. 13 does not prevent Court in case of negligence from restoring suit on proper terms.

It is the general practice on the original side to follow the analogy of R. 13, O. 9, on general principles of justice. No doubt, as a rule, the case will not be restored unless there be sufficient cause for the party not being ready to go on with the case when the case comes before the Court. But on the original side at all events the terms of R. 13 do not prevent the Court where there is an element of negligence from restoring the suit upon proper terms. A. I. R. 1928 Cal. 772, Appl. [P 864 C 1]

Judgment.—In this matter I passed an order on 8th November that the ex parte decree of 2nd May should be set aside. The order has not yet been completed, and I have been asked to reconsider it on further argument. It is argued that Art 164, Lim. Act, concludes the matter, for that article provides a limitation period of 30 days for an application by a defendant to set aside a decree passed ex parte, the time from which the period begins to run being either the date of the decree or, where summons has not been duly served, the time when the applicant has knowledge of the decree. It is said that in the circumstances of this case the period of limitation should commence from the date of the decree; that there is no question in the present case as regards the due service of the writ of summons, and it is only in the latter case that the period of limitation commences to run from the time when the applicant has knowledge of the decree.

But on the other hand it is contended that Art. 164 does not apply in this case, because it would only apply to cases of applications under the Civil Procedure Code. It is then contended that this is not an application under O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C. and in support of that contention the case of Banerjee v. Suhrawardy (1) is referred to. The applicant argues that that case is no authority in the present circumstances, for there the question was as to the defendants' rights where no appearance had yet been entered, according to the procedure prevailing on the original side : whereas in the present case appearance had been entered, and all preliminary steps taken to make the suit ripe for hearing. The argument therefore is that that case only shows that O. 9, R. 13, is not exhaustive : there may be cases to which O. 9, R. 13, does not apply, and it does not cover such circumstances where that procedure is inapplicable. I have read the judgment of Rankin, C. J. in that case with attention, and although it is of course correct to say that that judgement is to be taken relative to the facts in that case, it appears to me that the reasoning is applicable also to the present circumstances. In the present case the failure to appear was a matter concerned with the procedure peculiar to the original side of this Court under its rules, in which the applicant's attorney was possibly negligent or not as diligent as he might have been, with the result that the decree was made ex parte. I will only refer to the passage from the judgment of the Chief Justice which I consider makes the reasoning there applicable also to the present case. He says :

I am unable to hold that the exact words of R. 13, O. 9, are to be applied on the footing that they are directly applicable under the rules of the original side and that they are exhaustive. It has been the general practice on the original side to follow the analogy of R. 13, O. 9, on general principles of justice. As a rule, the case will not be restored unless there be sufficient cause for the party not being ready to go on with the case when the case came before the Court. But on the original side at all events the terms of R. 13 do not prevent the Court where there is an element of negligence from restoring the suit upon proper terms.

The present circumstances are such as to enable the Court to act upon its discretion apart from the specific provision of Art. 164, Lim. Act. It is here no question of using inherent jurisdiction to override a statutory provision : it is not statutory provision specifically applicable to the circumstances of this case.

I will just add one word. In my previous judgment I attributed a certain carelessness to the Court office. This is so far to be minimised by the fact (since ascertained) that the error in the suit number as appearing in the list was due at any rate primarily to the fact that the requisition to place the suit in the prospective list, signed by the plaintiff's attorney itself was headed by that error in the suit number.

The result is that the order already made will stand including the order for costs. The costs of the present application will be costs in the cause.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the decree-holder against the order of the Additional District Judge of 24 parganas, affirming an order by the Munsif refusing the application of the decree-holder for setting aside a sale. The short history of the case is that the decree-holder brought a suit against the judgment-debtors in order to establish his niskar right to 7½ bighas of land in which the judgment-debtors were alleged to have a tenancy right. That suit declaring the lakheraj right of the decree-holder was decreed as against the judgment-debtor. A certain sum of money was allowed to the decree-holder for costs. In execution of the decree for costs the decree-holder purported to sell the interest of the judgment-debtors in the property in question, that is to say the tenancy under the decree-holder's lakheraj interest. In the schedule annexed to the execution petition the property was described as the darbust hakuk of the judgment-debtors under the petty niskar No. 488. The learned Munsif found that it was obvious that the words "tenancy right of the judgment-debtors in petty niskar 488" were omitted and there was no doubt that the omission was accidental. The learned Munsif was of opinion, and there is no reason why that opinion should not be held to be absolutely right, that it was absurd to suppose that the decree-holder wanted to attach and put up to sale his own niskar property. The auction purchaser took the attitude in the trial Court that he had purchased the niskar interest of the judgment-debtors, and in the view that the judgment-debtors had no niskar interest the Munsif held that the decree-holder has suffered no loss and, therefore, his application should not be granted. It seems that if in his opinion the decree-holder was liable to suffer loss he would have interfered under the provisions of S. 151, Civil P. C. From his order dismissing the application the decree-holder appealed to the District Judge. On appeal the learned Judge was not satisfied with the reasons given for the alleged mistake having occurred. He held that the petition was verified by the decree-holder himself and he should be bound by it. The investigation into title did not come within the scope of the appeal before him. The learned Judge also held that the application which purported to have been made under S. 47, Civil P. C. was barred under Art. 166, Lim. Act. In that view he dismissed the application.

With regard to the question of limitation it is sufficient for me to observe that an application under S. 47, Civil P. C. falls within Art. 181, Lim. Act and not under Art. 166, of the Act. although in the result the applicant asked for setting aside the sale

From the judgment of the learned Judge the decree-holder has preferred this appeal. A preliminary objection has been taken by the respondents that there is no second appeal. The appellant contends that the application falls within S. 47, Civil P. C., and so the order has the effect of a decree and there is a second appeal. It is contended on behalf of the respondents that the auction-purchaser in this case being a third party S. 47 has no application. This matter has been settled by the Privy Council in the case of Prasanna Kumar Sanyal v. Kali Das Sanyal (1), that where a question has arisen as to execution, discharge or satisfaction of a decree between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed the fact that the purchaser who is no party to the suit is interested in the result has never been held a bar to the application of the section. This position has been re-affirmed by their Lordships in the case of Ganapathy Mudaliar v. Krishnamachariar (2) where their Lordships referred to the case of Prasanna Kumar Sanyal. S. 47, therefore applies even if a third party is the auction-purchaser where the application falls within the provisions of that section

(1) [1892] 19 Cal. 683=19 I. A. 166=6 Sar. 209 (P.C.).

It is next contended on behalf of the auction-purchaser respondent that the application is not one falling under S. 47 of the Code. I do not think that there is any substance in that contention. If the sale is set aside it would be a matter relating to the execution of the decree and the decree-holder would have to begin a fresh if he desires to execute the decree. If it is not set aside then the decree will have to be satisfied. It is in my opinion an application relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree and a matter like this falls within the provisions of this section.

It has further been argued on behalf of the auction-purchaser respondent that if the decree-holder desires to set aside the sale on the ground of mistake he ought to bring a suit for it and not proceed by way of application. In my opinion where the question relates to the matter of execution of a decree and if it is alleged that by mistake the property which was sought to be sold was not sold but some other property belonging to the decree-holder himself, was put up for sale that matter should be decided in the suit itself and in the execution proceedings and not by a separate suit. As authority for this proposition the observation of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Thakur Berhma v. Jiban Ram Marwari (3) at p. 43 (of I A. Ed.) may be cited. Their Lordships say:

If by mistake a wrong property was attached and an order made to sell it, the only course open to the decree-holder on the discovery of the mistake was to commence the proceeding over again:

see also Ramabhadra v. Kadiriyasami (4).

The whole question, therefore, is whether there was a mistake and secondly, whether the decree-holder is entitled to the relief sought for, that is, to set aside the sale on the ground of such mistake. The learned advocate for the auction-purchaser respondent argued that the District Judge on appeal seemed to find that there was no mistake, but the learned Judge did not say so. His opinion is stated in this way. "I am not satisfied with the reasons for the alleged mistake having occurred." What the learned Judge meant by that expression it is difficult to understand. What the decree-holder alleged was that he told the pleader what property was to be sold and that was taken down by his clerk, as it appears, in Bengali. The decree-holder certainly could not have intended to sell his own property as the learned Munsif pertinently observes. The evidence has been read over to us and there is no reason to suppose that the decree-holder intentionally wanted to put up to sale what might very well be construed his own lakheraj property. There is no doubt in my opinion that the description of the property sought to be sold was given by mistake in the application. It is not necessary to pursue the question whether the mistake was of the decree-holder or of the pleader's clerk who wrote out the petition for execution. It is necessary here to mention that apparently the decree-holder was unacquainted with the Bengali script as he signed his name in Urdu. But, however that may be, as I have already stated there cannot be any doubt whatsoever that the decree-holder did not want to put up his own property to sale.

That being so the next thing is to enquire whether the Court can give any relief. It cannot be disputed that mistake is a good ground for relief in cases of sale inter vivos, and I do not see any principle why if mistake is proved relief cannot be given in the case of a sale held through the intervention of the Court. There are instances where sales have been set aside on the ground of mistake. One of these cases I have already cited, the case of Thakur Berhma v. Jiban Ram Marwari (3). In my opinion therefore the Court should give relief to the decree-holder on the ground of mistake.

It has, however, been argued on behalf of the auction-purchaser that the learned Munsif was right in holding that no harm has been done to the decree-holder by reason of the alleged mistake. I put distinctly to the learned advocate of the auction-purchaser whether he would be satisfied with the declaration that he has purchased the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtors whatever it is. The learned advocate could not take upon himself to make any admission on behalf of his client. That shows that the auction-purchaser means trouble, that is he wants to dispute the right of the decree-holder to the niskar title in the property as also his right to recover any rent on account of the tenancy which he really intended to sell. That being so the view of the learned Munsif that there has been no injury done to the decree-holder by reason of the mistake cannot be supported.

In my judgment the proper order in this case should be to set aside the sale and to allow the auction-purchaser the refund of the entire purchase money with interest from the date of the deposit upto this date at the rate of six per cent per annum. The appeal is therefore, decreed, the orders of both the Courts below set aside and the sale held in execution of the decree of the decree-holder is set aside. The decree-holder will be entitled if he so desires to proceed with the execution of the decree according to law. The interest decreed to the auction-purchaser will be payable by the decree-holder.

Having regard to the attitude of the auction-purchaser respondent throughout he must be made liable for the costs of these proceedings. If he had acted in a straightforward manner the proper order which I should have thought was to make the decree-holder liable for all costs. But in the present circumstances the auction-purchaser must be liable for costs, especially as one of the auction-purchasers is the clerk of the very pleader on account of whose mistake this unfortunate circumstance has taken place.

The appellants are entitled to their costs in all Courts. We assess the hearing-fee at three gold mohurs.

The application is allowed without costs and the persons will be added as parties respondents to the appeal as prayed.

Appeal No. 1796 of 1925, Decided on 15th May 1928, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Cachar, D/- 4th March 1925

tors annually—Non-election of directors for a particular year—Directors of previous years continuing—Suit by a share-holder for declaring the acts of the directors as void—Such a suit cannot lie as no legal right or character of share-holder is denied—Such a declaration should be refused also in Court's discretion—No meeting for electing directors having been held, old directors continue—Companies Act S. 86.

The directors of a company were elected in 1921. According to the Articles of Association of the company the directors were to be elected annually. A general meeting was convened on the 22nd June 1922 at which among other things it was proposed to elect new directors. Before the election of the directors was completed the meeting came to an end and there was no general meeting for election of directors. The old directors continued to act. A suit was brought for a declaration that the directors elected in 1921 were no longer the directors of the company and that all acts done by them were illegal and void.

Held: that the plaintiff did not claim to be entitled to any legal character or to any right as to any property which had been denied. A declaratory suit was not maintainable under the provisions of S. 42 : 39 Cal. 704 and A.I.R. 1916 P. C. 78, Rel. on. [P 869 C 2]

Held further: that even assuming that such a suit was maintainable, the effect would be that there would be no directors of the company to carry on the business of the company. Such declaration ought not to be made by the Court in the exercise of its discretion.

Held further: that the general meeting not being held in which the directors are to be elected, the directors elected at the previous general meeting would continue in office.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by defendant 2 one of the directors of a limited company at Cachar. The suit out of which this appeal arises was by one of the share-holders. The learned Judge states the facts as follows: There is an Insurance Company with a registered office at Silchar. This company has a capital of over a lakh of Rupees, and according to the opinion of the learned Judge everything does not appear to have gone on well with this company and internal faction has been causing a good deal of trouble. The directors of the company were elected in 1921. According to the Articles of Association of the company the directors are to be elected annually. A general meeting was convened on 22nd June 1922 at which among other things it was proposed to elect new directors. Before the election of the directors was completed the meeting came to an end and, therefore, there was no general meeting for election of directors. The old directors apparently continued to act, and the present suit was brought for a declaration that the directors elected in 1921 were no longer the directors of the company and that all acts done by them were illegal and void. The Subordinate Judge made the declaration asked for. The defendants appealed and the learned Judge has affirmed the decision of the Subordinate Judge.

The first question that arises in this case is whether such a suit for declaration is maintainable under the provisions of S. 42, Specific Relief Act. There cannot be any doubt that in order to obtain a declaratory decree the plaintiff must bring his suit within the provisions of S. 42, Specific Relief Act. With regard to the question of declaratory decree it is useful to refer to the observations of Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J., in the case of Deokali Koer v Kedar Nath (1). At p. 708, the learned Chief Justice says with reference to S. 42, Specific Relief Act as follows :

It is in this section (apart from particular legislative sanction) that the law as to merely declaratory decrees applicable in the circumstances of this case is now to be found. The terms of the section are not a precise reproduction of the provision contained in the Act of 1859 and the English law ; in one direction they are more comprehensive, in another more limited. It is a common tradition that the section was designed to be a substantial reproduction of the Scotch action of Declarator, but whether this be so or not is of no great moment. We have to be guided by its provisions as they are expressed. The section does not sanction every form of declaration, but only a declaration that the plaintiff is "entitled to any legal character or to any right as to any property"; it is the disregard of this that accounts for the multifarious and at times, eccentric declarations which find a place in Indian plaints. If the Courts were astute as I think they should be to see the plaints presented conformed to the terms of S. 42, the difficulties that are to be found in this class of cases, would no longer arise. Nor would plaintiffs be unduly hampered if the provisions of S. 42 were enforced, for it would be easy to frame a declaration in such terms as would comply with the provisions of the section where the claim was one within its policy.

Sir Lawrence Jenkins when a member of the Judicial Committee again observed in delivering the Judgment of the Judicial Committee in Sheo Parson Singh v. Ram Nandan Prasad (2), at p. 97 (of 43 I. A.) as follows :

The Court's power to make a declaration without more is derived from S. 42, Specific Relief Act, and regard must therefore be had to its precise terms.

After reciting the terms of S. 42 the judgment goes on :

A plaintiff coming under this section must therefore be entitled to a legal character or to a right as to property. Can these plaintiffs predicate this of themselves ?

It is hardly necessary to point out that in this case the plaintiff does not claim to be entitled to any legal character or to any right as to any property which has been denied by the defendants. It follows therefore that such a declaratory suit is not maintainable under the provisions of S. 42, Specific Relief Act, and as there is no other special legislative sanction such a suit would not in my opinion be at all tenable.

The next question is, even assuming that such a suit was maintainable, should such declaration be made by the Court in the exercise of its discretion. It need hardly be pointed out that S. 42 provides that the Court may in its discretion make a declaration with regard to certain matters. What would be the effect of such a declaration as the present even if the plaintiff was entitled to ask for it ? The effect would be that, the directors who were acting as such would be declared to be no directors at all. In effect there would be no directors of the company to carry on the business of the company. The learned Judge says in one part of his judgment that a company may go in without directors. No doubt it may be in certain special cases, but in such a case the company itself must determine that it should have no directors ; but some other agency should carry on the business of the company. In this case the company has not so determined ; and therefore assuming that the Court may have jurisdiction to make such a declaration, in my judgment such declaration ought not to be made in the exercise of its discretion. I may refer to the observations of Viscount Finlay in the case of Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. British Bank for Foreign Trade Ltd. (3), at p. 445, where his Lordship stated that jurisdiction to give a declaratory judgment should be exercised, sparingly, with great care and jealousy, and with extreme caution, citing authorities for each of these statements.

(3) [1921] A. C. 483.

With regard to the merits, the Articles of Association provided that the directors should be elected annually at a general meeting. It follows, therefore, that so long as the general meeting is not held in which the directors are to be elected the directors elected at the previous general meeting would continue in office. It is contended by the learned advocate for the respondent that according to the true interpretation of the articles the directors would hold office only for one year from the date of their appointment, and if no general meeting is held at the lapse of one year the directors would automatically vacate their office and the company would go on without any directors at all. I am unable to accept this contention of the learned advocate as it seems to me that it would be unreasonable to hold that this is the true meaning of the Articles of Association.

On all these grounds I am of opinion that the judgment and decree of both the Courts below should be discharged and the plaintiff's suit dismissed with costs in all the Courts.

A suit by an auction-purchaser at a revenue sale under S. 80 to recover possession of the purchased property is governed not by Art. 121 but by Art. 142 or 144, and the fact that symbolical possession was obtained is a good defence so far as any defaulting proprietor was concerned if the suit is brought within 12 years from such possession: 44 Cal. 412, Appl.

Rankin, C. J.—These are four appeals from a judgment and decree of my learned brother Roy, J. sitting on second appeal. The plaintiff on 3rd December 1921 brought a number of suits asking for ejection of the several defendants in respect of 8 annas share from certain plots. Five of the suits were decreed and from that appeals were taken by the several defendants to the lower appellate Court who dismissed the appeals. In this Court Roy, J., remanded the cases to the lower appellate Court with a direction that that Court should allow the parties an opportunity to produce further evidence on certain points and should rehear the cases. It appears that the plots in question belonged in equal shares to two taluks one of which is numbered 54720. This taluk was sold to one Prokas Chandra Shaha on 22nd September 1909 for default of payment of revenue under the Assam Land and Revenue Regulations (Regn. 1 of 1886)

The 60th day after that date was 21st November 1909. But the sale certificate dated 6th January 1910, states that the sale was confirmed on 3rd December 1909 that is, exactly within 12 years from the date of the institution of these suits. The auction-purchaser Prokas some three years afterwards sold to certain other defendants or their predecessors-in-title who in 1913 gave patni of some plots including the plots in suit to one Dianut Ram Saha who sold the patni to the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed by his plaint that the various defendants were setting up fictitious titles. It appears, however, that certain previous owners of the taluk had granted several patnis and five of these patnis were set up by the defendants in the suits the defendants' cases being that they were in occupation of the plots from which it was sought to evict them under valid patnis. It appears that these defendants refused to apply for a local investigation and the first Court held that in the absence of local investigation and in the absence of any effective evidence there is nothing to show the boundaries of their patnis. It was not proved that the defendants' alleged patnis covered the suit lands. This was the conclusion come to in the suits which the first Court decreed. In the other suits and as regards any other lands than the land for which the decree was passed the first Court on the finding that certain patnis set up by the defendants did cover the suit lands, dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. It is not evident to me that the plaintiff can be supposed to have desired in this suit brought in 1921 to set aside or annul any encumbrance under the sale 12 years before. The first Court entertained no such case and acted upon no such assumption and finding that the defendants' patni in certain cases covered the suit lands dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

One of the defences set up in the trial Court was the defence of limitation and that was dealt with on the basis of the sale-certificate; the learned Munsif finding that 3rd December 1909 was given as the date when the sale became conclusive adopted that date. He did not deal with the difficulties which undoubtedly arise under the regulation by S. 80 under which a revenue sale is final if no application has been preferred to set aside the sale on the 60th day from the date of sale.

From that decree an appeal was taken by the defendants in the present case and from the grounds of appeal it would appear that the plea of limitation was again raised by the defendants. At the hearing of the appeal it would clearly appear from the judgment that the plaintiffs' title as purchaser was not contested but that the appellants asked that the case should be remanded for a local investigation upon the question of boundary. The learned Subordinate Judge rightly held that this prayer came too late and he dismissed the appeals having dealt only with this question of local investigation.

Upon second appeal to this High Court two grounds appear to have been taken. One was the question of limitation which had not been argued in the lower appellate Court. Now, as to that it is clear enough that if from the plaintiff's own case or from his pleadings or from the admitted or proved facts it could be seen that the plaintiff's suits were statute barred, it would be the duty of the Court in second appeal to entertain even for the first time the question of limitation; but it is tolerably obvious that it would be in ordinary circumstances entirely wrong upon a suggestion that further investigation would disclose facts which would show that the plaintiff is time barred to grant a remand upon this ground in second appeal. Now the point which is taken in this High Court was that on the admitted dates the sale became final on 21st November 1909 and that accordingly the plaintiff's suit was time barred. If that be the only question then it does seem to me on the authority of Jitendra Kumar Pal v. Mohendra Chandra (1), that the statement in the sale-certificate would not be final and conclusive for the present purpose; and on that basis the only question to consider is whether or not there was some reason to suppose that there had been an application to set aside the sale which extended the time under S. 80, of the Regulation. It appeared however, on this point being taken for the first time in second appeal that there is in evidence the circumstance that symbolical delivery of possession was given to Prokas the auction purchaser, on 19th January 1910 and it is reasonably clear on the doctrine of the case of Mohim Chandra v. Pyari Lal

(1) [1915] 24 C.L.J. 62=37 I. C. 239.

Das (2), that that would be a good answer so far as the auction-purchaser was concerned against any defaulting proprietor.

Now the learned Judge has rejected the contention that this is a good answer against the defaulting proprietors but he has done so on the ground that in the present case Prokash has been held to be in some extent, at all events, a benamidar for one Dianat Ram Sarma who was himself one of the defaulting proprietors; and he has apparently held that the doctrine in the case cited above does not apply except where the purchaser is a stranger. On that ground he has apparently rejected the date of delivery of symbolical possession as a material date in this case. This introduces the second point taken by the learned Judge as a good point against the plaintiff. On the footing that Prokas when he purchased was a benamidar for one of the defaulting proprietors the learned Judge appears to have held that a defaulting proprietor purchasing at a revenue sale although he paid the full purchase money remains still a co-sharer with his previous co-sharers the other defaulting proprietors. He appears to have held that, that being so, he merely stands in this position that he can only bring a suit for partition as against them. This point, however, was not defended or maintained by Mr. Sen in this Court. I do not understand that there is any doctrine which prevents a defaulting proprietor being a purchaser at a revenue sale and this is not a case where it has been found against the plaintiff that the default and the sale were fraudulently procured by one defaulting proprietor so that when he purchased, the law in view of his fraud, would regard him as a trustee of all his previous co-owners.

The first question to be decided is the question of limitation. On that question it appears to me on the facts of this case that Art. 121, Lim. Act, has nothing to do with the matter. This is not a suit to annul incumbrances and so far as the particular cases which were decreed are concerned they were decreed upon the basis that the suit lands were not shown to be comprised in any of the patnis set up by the defendants. That being so the question is a question either under Art. 142 or 144; probably if the ruling of Mohim

Chandra Choudhury's case (2) be right Art. 142. In each of these four cases now before us the persons whose eviction is sought that is, the contesting defendants, were themselves defaulting proprietors. If that be so the symbolical possession as against them is, in my opinion, equivalent to actual possession and the plaintiff's suit having been brought within 12 years of that date was brought in time.

There remains only one other argument which the learned advocate for the respondent raises and that is this. He contends that although the contesting defendants were defaulting proprietors and although they have been found to have no patni right in the suit lands nevertheless they may at the time of delivery of the symbolical possession have been in occupation of the suit lands not qua proprietors but claiming right under the one or other of their patnis and that in that state of affairs symbolical possession would not avail as against them to save the plaintiffs' suit. I have great difficulty in seeing how the law involved in this contention can be right. But it is quite clear that this is a case which was not proved and not, I think, imagined at the time the suit was tried. It is a new and speculative case never advanced before, and it is quite wrong, in my opinion, in second appeal where the point was not taken in the lower Court to allow an investigation of a case so very different from anything that was dealt with at the time. In my judgment it would be entirely wrong to interfere with the findings of the Courts below in a case of this character.

Upon the question whether or not Prokas Chandra Saha should have been held to be a benamidar for Dianat Ram Saha I can only say that if that question were open to me I should find singularly little evidence but in my view of the law this element makes no difference whatever in the present cases.

In the circumstances it seems to me that these Letters Patent appeals should be allowed with costs, the decrees of the learned Judge should be set aside and the second appeals to this Court should be dismissed with costs in each case.

Criminal Revn. No 426 of 1928, Decided on 22nd May 1928.

* Penal Code, S. 486—Use of another firm's bottles innocently and according to common practice — No conviction under S. 486 can stand.

The complainant and the accused were soda-water manufacturers, and each had special bottles of his own firm. It was a common practice of the place that water-manufacturing firms used bottles indiscriminately, i. e., bottles of one firm were sent by customers to another firm for being filled with mineral water. Accordingly the accused's firm used bottles of the complainant's firm.

Held : that as there was no intention to do anything harmful within the meaning of S. 486, conviction under that section could not be valid.

Langford James, Charu Chandra Biswas, Manindra Kumar Bose and Prafulla Chandra Chakravarty—for Petitioner.

Judgment—In this case the petitioner who is the proprietor of the well-known firm of Soda-water manufacturers called Byron & Co. has been convicted under Ss. 483 and 486, I. P. C., and 6 and 7, Merchandise Marks Act. The short facts involved in this case are as follows: It appears that the complainant James Wright who is connected with a firm called Rose and Thistle has introduced into the market soda-water supplied in bottles with a "frosted appearance bearing the letters "R and T Ltd." at the bottom of the bottles. These bottles have a special paper label bearing the words "Rose and Thistle Ltd. Frosted Soda." These bottles have a capsule called crown cork. It appears that in Calcutta there is a common practice for various kinds of bottles to be used by different mineral water manufacturing firms indiscriminately, that is to say, customers send in indiscriminately Byron's bottles to Rose and Thistle in order that the bottles may be filled with soda-water or other waters and Rose and Thistle bottles to Messrs. Byron & Co., for a like purpose. The complainant says that the accused in this case has no right whatsoever to fill his bottles. The accused has stated before the Magistrate that he has no intention of filling the complainant's bottles but that inasmuch as these bottles are brought in by coolies and sent to the manufacturers in order that they may be filled in it is not possible for him to prevent what has happened in this case. The Magistrate observes that the complainant's manager admits that he has given orders in their factory that outsider's bottles will not be accepted; but he finds it difficult to get the order carried out owing to the fact that the men cannot read English and that the bottles are brought in indiscriminately. In these circumstances the complainant complained before the Magistrate in respect of the user of his bottles by Messrs. Byron & Co.

The Magistrate has found that the design of the bottle of the complainant described as a bottle with a "frosted appearance" has been registered under the Patents and Designs Act, that the label is also registered under the said Act, but he states that the bottle itself is part of the complainant's trade-mark and he has accordingly gone into the case on that footing and has found that the accused has been guilty of counterfeiting the complainant's trade-mark and further that he has been selling goods with a mark i. e., with counterfeit trade-mark and has thereby rendered himself punishable under Ss. 483 and 486, I. P. C.

It is not necessary for us to refer to the sections in the Merchandise Marks Act because those sections follow closely the provisions of the Indian Penal Code in that behalf.

The first question is whether the accused is guilty of having committed an offence punishable under S 483, I. P. C. The two ingredients mentioned in the section itself are, first, that there should be a trade-mark and, secondly, that there should have been a counterfeiting of the trade-mark.

Mr. James' first contention is that the design of the bottle being registered under the Patents and Designs Act, it is not a trade-mark because, having regard to the language used in the Patents and Designs Act, a design registered under the Patents and Designs Act cannot be a trade-mark as defined in S. 478, I. P. C. Secondly Mr. James contends that even assuming that the design of the bottle itself is a trade-mark there is no counterfeiting in this case having regard to the definition of the word "counterfeit" in S. 28, I. P. C. Thirdly Mr James's contention is that having regard to the findings of fact arrived at by the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate it is quite clear that what has happened has been done innocently.

So far as the last point is concerned it is abundantly clear from the judgment of the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate that he has found practically, if not in so many words, that there was no intention to do anything harmful within the meaning of S. 486, I. P. C., and that all that has happened has so happened in the usual course of business in this trade in Calcutta. It is not clear why the accused should be deprived of the benefit of the findings of fact arrived at by the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate when considering the words specified in S. 486, I. P. C. In our opinion it is clear that the accused has acted innocently within the meaning of S. 486 and that that being so the conviction and sentence under S. 486, I. P. C., must be set aside.

So far as the conviction under S. 483 is concerned, there is a good deal to be said in favour of the view that the bottle itself, frosted though it be, cannot be considered a trade-mark. At any rate, there is sufficient doubt on the facts of this case which would entitle us to give the benefit of the doubt to the accused. There is also considerable force in the contention that having regard to the language of S. 28, I. P. C., the case cannot properly be brought within the four corners of S. 483, I. P. C. In that view of the matter the conviction and sentence under S. 483, I. P. C., must be set aside.

It follows from what has been stated above that the conviction under the corresponding sections, namely, Ss. 6 and 7, Merchandise Marks Act must also be set aside.

The fine, if paid, will be refunded.

Judgment.—The only question that has been canvassed in this case is with regard to the validity of the tender of rent made by the defendants. The plaintiffs brought a suit for rent on the basis of a kabuliati executed before the Bengal Tenancy Act came into force in which interest on arrears of rent was stipulated at one anna per rupee per month. The plaintiffs claimed interest at half-anna per rupee and damages and costs. The only defence with which we are now concerned is that the rent was sent to the plaintiffs by money orders which were refused and, therefore, they are not entitled to claim interest. The trial Court held that the tenders were not good and allowed the plaintiffs' claim in full and half-costs. Defendants 3 and 4 appealed and the learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the tenders were good and effective and dismissed the plaintiffs' claim for interest allowing him a decree for the rent and cesses claimed.

The plaintiffs have appealed and it is contended on their behalf that on the facts found by the Courts below the tender must be held to be illegal and inoperative. It has been found and it must be accepted as a fact, that the defendants remitted rents even before they actually became due to the plaintiffs by money orders which were refused; but afterwards the defendant neither deposited the money in Court under S. 61, Ben. Ten. Act, nor paid the admitted amount in Court after the institution of the suit. As a matter of fact it was not deposited until after the decision of the trial Court when execution was taken out. The requisites of a valid tender have been considered in many cases and have been explicitly laid down in text books. One of the requisites of a valid tender is that the party making the tender must always be ready to fulfil the obligation whenever called upon; or, as it is otherwise expressed a tender in order to be valid must be kept good, in accordance with the requirements of the law. Now the plea of legal and valid tender must not only allege that the defendant is still ready but must be accompanied by payment into Court. Leake on Contract, 7th Edition, p 645. The law of tender has been partly borrowed into the Indian Contract Act from the English law and that portion of it which has not been incorporated in the Indian law should be applied as embodying rules of justice, equity and good conscience. Under O. 22, R. 3, of the Rules under the English Judicature Act a plea of tender is not to be received in Court unless accompanied by payment in Court. The same view has been taken in this country in Abdul Rahman v. Nur Mahommad (1). Under O. 24, Civil P. C, 1908, in order to stop running of interest it is necessary for the defendant to deposit the amount admitted by him in Court. In the present case by not depositing the amount in Court, the defendants have not only rendered themselves incompetent to raise the plea of valid tender but have forfeited their right to remission of interest under O. 24, Civil P. C.

In answer to the appellants' case on this point the learned advocate for the respondents has relied upon the Full Bench decision of this Court in Kripa Sindhu Mukherji v. Annola Sundari Devi (2). That case has no bearing upon the question in controversy in the present case. Before the Full Bench decision it was held that a tender of rent under the Bengal Tenancy Act must be followed by a deposit under S. 61 of the Act. The Full Bench disagreed with this view and held that a tender in order to be legal and valid need not be followed by deposit under S. 61, Ben. Ten. Act. But it did not consider the further question as to whether under the law it is necessary in order to render a tender effective to deposit the money in Court at the institution of the suit. In the Full Bench case in fact the money was tendered several times to the plaintiffs, his pleader and Naib and ultimately when it was refused it was deposited in Court before the institution of the suit. On these facts the Court held that it was a valid tender which was kept good as shown by the conduct of the tenant and it should stop the running of interest from the date of the tender.

Apart from the considerations which apply to the present case with reference to the law of tender, there is a particular section in the Bengal Tenancy Act which deals with the procedure to be followed where a tenant in a suit for rent admits a certain amount to be due to the landlord. S. 150 says when a defendant admits that money is due from him to the plaintiff on account of rent but pleads that the amount claimed is in excess of the amount due, the Court shall refuse to take cognizance of the plea unless the defendant pays into Court the amount so admitted to be due. This provision of the law was not apparently brought to the notice of the Courts below. As in the present case the defendants admitted that the actual rent fixed under the kabuliati was due from them to the plaintiffs and they not having deposited that amount in Court, the Court ought to have under the law refused to take cognizance of the plea that the amount claimed was in excess of the amount which was actually due to the landlords. That the law as laid down in S. 150, Ben. Ten. Act, is applicable to cases where the defendant admits that money is due from him to the plaintiff on account of rent has been held in several cases. Banarashi Pershad v. Makhan Roy (3). The Patna High Court in Kesho Prasad Singh v. Triloke Nath Tewari (4), has taken a wider view of the application of the section. In this view also the defendants' plea of tender must be rejected. In our opinion this appeal must succeed. The respondents ask us to remand the case to the lower appellate Court in order to determine the question what amount of interest the plaintiffs are entitled to claim from the defendants under the contract. This is a question which we find from the judgment of the lower appellate Court was not raised before that Court. The only contentions of the defendants were that the tender was a valid tender and that the Munsif should not have allowed interest, damages and costs to the plaintiffs presumably on the ground that the tender was valid. We have looked into the judgment of the trial Court and we do not think that it would be necessary to remand the case for consideration of the question now raised before us by the respondents.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Court below set aside and that of the trial Court restored. But as this litigation has been occasioned by the unreasonable refusal by the plaintiffs of the rent sent to them by money order, we direct that the plaintiffs should bear their own costs throughout.

Appeal No 1717 of 1925, Decided on 9th May 1928, from appellate decree of 1st Sub-Judge, Dacca, D¹ 27 April 1925.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 87—Part of holding sold in 1908—Subsequent partition in 1919 between cosharers of taluk—Portion sold falling to share of plaintiffs—Plaintiff suing in 1922 to eject purchaser—Purchaser cannot be ejected as he is not trespasser—Suit is also barred as adverse possession began in 1908 and not at the date of partition.

A holding consisting of six plots belonged to 1. Out of these six plots, three were sold in 1908 to C. Subsequently in 1919 there was a partition between the cosharers of the taluk and the three plots purchased by C were allotted to plaintiffs. In 1922 plaintiffs brought a suit to eject C, alleging that he was a trespasser on the land.

Held: that the landlords had no right to eject C because A had not abandoned the holding which would give the landlords the right to khas possession. The act of partition among the landlords without concurrence of the tenant had surely the effect of dividing the holding so as to give the plaintiffs right to recover their share of the rent which had been fixed on the portion allotted to their shares, but that did not confer a new right upon the plaintiffs to bring ejection against C who was not liable to be ejected previous to partition: 2. Pat. L. J., 225, Foll. [P 877 C 2]

Held: further that the act of the landlords effecting the partition cannot be held to be a trespass by the defendants. Trespass must be considered to have commenced when A sold three plots, that is in 1908. [P 877 C 2]

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal on behalf of the plaintiffs in an action in ejection on the ground that defendant 1 has purchased a portion of a non-transferable occupancy holding which originally belonged to one Azimuddin Bepari as appertaining to estate No 8376. The Subordinate Judge has found that the original jote of Azimuddin consisted of six plots of land. Out of these, three plots were sold by Azimuddin in 1908 to one Kinu Mundle. These three plots were again purchased by defendant 1 in 1913. The plaintiffs had one ganda share in the taluk No 8376. There was a partition of the taluk among the cosharers under the Estates Partition Act; and the portion of the holding consisting of the three plots which defendant 1 had purchased was allotted to the share of the plaintiffs by virtue of the partition. The plaintiffs brought this suit in November 1922 on the allegation that defendant 1 was a trespasser on the land and that they were entitled to eject him on that ground. The Munsif decreed the suit. On appeal by defendant 1, the Subordinate Judge has reversed the decision of the Munsif and dismissed the suit of the plaintiffs. The Subordinate Judge held that Azimuddin was in possession of a portion of the holding and that being so, the plaintiffs had no right to seek ejection as against the defendants. Evidently the learned Subordinate Judge was referring to the case of Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (1). The learned Judge further held that the defendants were in adverse possession of the limited interest of a tenant for more than 12 years. Upon these two grounds he has dismissed the plaintiffs' suit for khas possession.

It is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs here that the decision of the Subordinate Judge is erroneous. The ground stated shortly is that before the partition in 1919, the landlords had no right to sue in ejectment, because the original tenant was in possession of a portion of the holding. The defendants, however, had no right as against the landlords to remain in possession. After the partition a portion of the holding which was in possession of the defendants became a new holding under the provisions of S. 81, Estates Partition Act, and when the plaintiffs became entitled by reason of the partition to have the new holding, they found that the land was in possession of a trespasser and not the original tenant, Azimuddin, and, therefore, they have the right to eject the trespasser. It is further argued that to hold otherwise would have this effect, that if Azimuddin transfers the remaining portion of his holding which has now been allotted to different co-sharers, then every one of the co-sharers would have the right to eject the transferees from different portions of the holding. The effect would be that notwithstanding the separation of the original holding into different parts by which different holdings were created, an artificial link would remain which would still bind the different new holdings together; and as this anomalous position is unreasonable, the plain and simple position should be accepted that as the plaintiffs find the trespasser in possession of the holding of which they are the sole landlords they can bring ejectment. The answer to this is that the Bengal Tenancy Act is not free from anomalies and to find one consistent rule to govern all circumstances would probably be an unprofitable task. To my mind, the answer to Dr. Sen Gupta's argument is this. When the transfer was made of a portion of the holding in 1908 by the original tenant Azimuddin, the landlords had no right to eject the transferee or the old tenant, because the old tenant had not abandoned the holding which would give the landlords the right to khas possession. The act of partition among the landlords without concurrence of the tenant had surely the effect of dividing the holding so as to give the plaintiffs right to recover their shares of the rent which had been fixed on the portion allotted to their shares of the taluk. But that cannot be said to confer a new right upon the plaintiffs to bring ejectment against the defendants who were not liable to be ejected previous to partition: or in other words, if it was held that before the partition Azimuddin continued as a tenant with regard to the entire holding, by that partition it cannot be said that Azimuddin had abandoned the new holding so as to convert the transferee into a trespasser. I am fortified in the view I take by the observations made by Chamier, C. J. in the case of Suraj Deo Narayan Singh v. Patchi Narayan Singh (2), to which our attention was drawn by the learned advocate for the respondents. The observations no doubt were obiter having regard to the finding in that case that there was a usage proved which justified the transfer. But still I think respect is due to the observations made there; and as I fully agree with the reasons of the learned Chief Justice, I should prefer to follow him.

There is one other point which I think I should deal with. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that the defendants were in adverse possession of the limited interest for more than 12 years. Dr. Nareh Chandra Sen Gupta argues that this finding is wrong, because the plaintiffs had no notice of the trespass. Now, if the defendant is considered to be a trespasser, when did the trespass begin? I do not think the trespass should be held to begin in 1919 when the partition was effected. The act of the landlords effecting the partition cannot be held to be a trespass by the defendants. Trespass must be considered to have commenced when Azimuddin sold these three plots, that is in 1908. Therefore if the plaintiffs take their stand on the ground that defendant 1 is a trespasser, then it must be held that defendant 1 has been a trespasser from 1908 in respect of the limited interest of a tenant. Plaintiff cannot base his claim on the ground that he had no notice.

On all these grounds, I am of opinion that the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge should be confirmed and this appeal dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—This is a reference under the Court-fees Act. The facts which have given rise to this reference may be briefly stated as follows: The plaintiff, who is the appellant before this Court, filed a suit for partition in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Asansole. There was a preliminary decree and ultimately there was a final decree on 30th July 1926, and the plaintiff-appellant, was awarded the costs of commission as against certain of the defendants. His costs of the commission were, however, not embodied in the decree. These costs amounted to Rs. 1573-5-9. Against that order amending the decree the defendants now respondents, moved the Subordinate Judge on 21st December 1927 rescinding his previous order of 4th June 1927 so far as it related to the costs of the commission. He then directed that the direction of payment of costs of the commission to the plaintiff be deleted from the decree. Against this decree as finally amended the plaintiff has preferred the present appeal in which this question of Court-fees arises. The suit out of which this appeal arises was a partition suit and the question of Court-fees with reference to such suits is determined by the provisions of Sch. 2, Art. 17. Sch. 2, Art. 17, Cl. (6), Court-fees Act, reads as follows:

Plaint or memorandum of appeal in each of the following suits:

VI. Every other suit where it is not possible to estimate at a money value the subject-matter in dispute, and which is not otherwise provided for by this Act.

It has been held in several cases in this Court and the position now taken is firmly established, that a suit for partition of a joint property is, with reference to the matter of Court-fees, governed by
Sch. 2, Art. 17, Cl. (6), Court-fees Act.
References may be made in this connexion to the case of Bidhata Rai v. Ram Cha- ritar Rai (1) and to the later case of Rajani Kanta Bag v. Rajabala Dasi (2).

It has been contended by the learned vakil for the appellant that as a partition suit has been held to fall within Art. 17
the only question which has to be considered is as to whether the memorandum of appeal in the present case arises out of a suit for partition for if it does he is liable to pay Court-fees of Rs. 15 as is provided for in this article. There are two cases one of the Madras Court and the other of the Patna Court which have to be considered in this connexion. It may be noticed that in both cases the appeals did not arise out of suits for partition but they arose out of the decisions in money suits and the article which governs such cases would be Sch. 1, Art. 1, Court-fees Act. It is true that some of the observations made in those cases are somewhat general. For instance in the Madras case reported In re Makki
(3) the question was whether when apart from, and independently of, any other reliefs which an appellant seeks in an appeal from a decree, he seeks distinct relief on the ground that by the decree under appeal the costs of the parties in the proceedings which terminated with the decree have not been properly assessed or apportioned, should the value of such distinct relief be reckoned as part of the subject-matter in dispute for the purposes of Sch. 1, Court-fees Act or should the said value be excluded from computation? and the answer to the question was that as the appellant had made the costs the subject-matter of the dispute and, therefore, the Court-fee stamp is leviable. Similarly in the case of T. K. Rowlinson v. Lachmi Narayan Jha
(4), the question was what is the correct Court-fee when relief is sought with regard to costs independently of the result of the main contests between the parties and the answer was

when the appeal against costs is distinct and separate from other parts of the appeals, Court-fees must be paid ad-valorem on the costs decreed.

There the question arose in the case of appeals or cross-objections in suits for redemption or foreclosure, when the amount declared by the Court to be due at the date of the decree could be ascertained by reference to the judgment and decree. These cases, therefore, do not bear directly on the present question.

The present case seems to be clearly governed by the plain language of Art. 17, Sch. 2, Cl. (6) and the moment it is shown, as has been shown in this case, that the memorandum of appeal arises in the suit where it is not possible to estimate the money value of the subject-matter in dispute and which is not otherwise provided for by the Act the plaintiff can claim that the Court-fees payable are Rs. 15. So far as this Court is concerned it has always been recognized that in appeals against decrees from partition suits the proper Court-fees payable are Rs. 10 and this has been raised to Rs. 15 by the amendment of 1922. It does not matter whether the ground of attack is with reference to the allotment of specific portion of immovable or movable property or the ground of attack is the question of costs. Suppose in a partition suit a sum of money has been awarded to one of the parties as owelty money and the party against whom the payment of the owelty money has been directed is aggrieved by such a decree then he is entitled to prefer an appeal to this Court; and it can hardly be said that in such a case although the matter arises in a partition suit the Court-fees leviable would be the amount of the owelty money which forms the subject-matter of the complaint in the appeal.

I do not see how the question of costs can depend on any different footing. If, for instance, the plaintiff in the present case had appealed against a portion of the partition decree which was unfavourable to him and in addition had appealed against the order of costs it could not be contended that he was bound to pay in addition to Rs. 15 as provided for by Art. 17 an ad valorem Court-fee on the specified amount of costs which has been disallowed against him.

I think, therefore, the proper Court-fee payable is Rs. 15.

Order.—The complaint that is made in this case is that the petitioner was not afforded an opportunity of adducing evidence under S. 137, Criminal P. C. We have examined the record and it appears to us that the position was this. A conditional order was made under S. 133, Criminal P. C. The opposite party, who is represented by Mr. Chatterji, appeared before the Magistrate and denied the existence of any public right in respect of the water-course in question. Thereupon the Magistrate directed him to adduce evidence in support of his case. The petitioner urges that he understood that he was to adduce evidence in support of his case relevant to an enquiry under S. 137-A and that not until the enquiry under S. 139-A was concluded could he be expected or required to produce evidence relevant to an enquiry under S. 137. As far as the sections go, the petitioner would seem to be right in his contention. In that view of the matter, inasmuch as no specific opportunity was given to the petitioner to adduce evidence under S. 137, Criminal P. C., the order complained of must be set aside and the matter must go back to the Magistrate for an enquiry as laid down in Ch. 10, Criminal P. C.

Nasim Ali—for Appellants.Brojo Lal Chakravarti, Rishindra
Nath Sarcar and Kali Sankar Sarkar—for Respondents.Suhrawardy, J—This appeal is by the defendant in a suit for rent in respect of a holding in which the plaintiff claimed rent for a period of four years at the old rate and further claimed enhancement of rent on the ground that in consequence of improvement made at his cost there had been an increase in the productive power of the land. The trial Court held that the value of the land had increased on account of certain improvements made by the plaintiff but that he was not entitled to claim enhanced rent on the ground that the defendant succeeded in raising the presumption in his favour under S. 50 (2), Ben.
Ten. Act. The plaintiff appealed and the learned Additional District Judgeheld that in this particular case the tenant was not entitled to the presumption under S. 50 (2), Ben. Ten. Act, though he had proved payment of rent at a uniform rate for a period of more than 20 years. The reasoning adopted by the learned Judge is this : In 1890 this Jote along with another was sold in execution of a rent decree by the plaintiff and purchased by the defendant ; in the sale proclamation the property sold was described as a jote ; a jote ordinarily means an occupancy holding ; and an occupancy holding is under the law a holding the rent of which is liable to be enhanced ; the defendant having purchased the property as a jote must accept that position and cannot now turn round and say that he is a raiyat at fixed rate. In other words the learned Judge, though he has not used that expression is of opinion that from the description of the property in the proclamation of sale under which he has purchased it, he is estopped from pleading that the right he purchased was anything different from the right of an occupancy holding. This view, in my opinion, is clearly erroneous. It has been conceded before us by the learned vakil for the respondent, and in my opinion rightly that no question of estoppel arises in this case. The holding was described as a jote in the sale proclamation by the plaintiff and the defendant has purchased the interest of the defaulting tenants whatever that was. The decree-holder may in a proper case be bound by the description given by him in the sale proclamation but to my knowledge no case has gone to the extent of holding that because the purchaser purchased the property described in a particular way in the sale proclamation, he cannot claim a higher or different right which the judgment-debtor actually had and which the purchaser had really purchased.Now, with regard to the assumption made by the learned Judge that the term “jote” ordinarily means occupancy holding, there is high authority to hold that it is not so. In Midnapore Zemin- dary Co. v. Naresh Narayan Singh (1) the Judicial Committee observed :Jote is a general term and it is not necessarily equivalent to a “raiayati jote.”(1) A. I. R. 1922 Ro. C. 241=48 Cal. 460=48
I. A. 49 (P. C.).

The same view was taken in this Court in Rajani Kanta v. Yusuf Ali (2) and Nawab Ali v. Hemanta Kumari (3). These cases have been attempted to be distinguished on the ground that the holdings referred to in them consisted of more than one hundred bighas and therefore, the presumption under the law was that they were tenures. The interpretation of the term "jote" in those cases does not seem to have been affected by the fact that the holdings under consideration were more than 100 bighas. After holding that the term "jote" did not necessarily mean a raiyati holding the Courts proceeded to determine the nature of the tenancy in those cases and having found that the area was over 100 bighas they allowed the presumption of law to be raised in favour of their being tenures.

Even if the interest sold in 1890 were that of a raiyati at fixed rate one would not expect any other description of the land except what was given in the sale proclamation, namely, that it was a jote. If "jote" means a holding in its general sense as it ordinarily does, the interest of a raiyat at a fixed rate will also be called a jote and it is too much to expect from the landlord that in the sale proclamation he would admit that the jote he was selling was held by the last tenant at a rent fixed in perpetuity. The mere description of the property sold in 1890 as a jote-right does not in my opinion support the case of the plaintiff even if the defendant is held bound by it. It is still open to the Court to investigate as to what was sold and what was purchased by the defendant.

The lower appellate Court has observed and it seems that its decision was to a great extent influenced by the view he took of the law, that a raiyat at a fixed rent or rate of rent cannot be an occupancy raiyat, though an occupancy raiyat by a subsequent grant can acquire the status of a raiyat at fixed rent. This is not the law as at present settled by the recent decisions of this Court. In the case of Dulhin Gulab Koer v. Balla Kurmi (4) decided by a Bench of five Judges it was held that the settlement officer was right in giving effect to the presumption that the raiyats meaning ordinary raiyats were holding at fixed rates of rent and in recording them as raiyats holding at fixed rates. The learned Judges agreed with the observations made by Ameer Ali, J., in the case at the stage at which the case was before the Division Bench; and one of the observations made by that learned Judge will be found at p. 749 of the report :

Any raiyat, therefore, by whatever name he may be called if he pleads and proves the particular state of facts provided in S. 50 is entitled to its benefit.

The last word upon the subject has been said in the case of Sarveswar Patra v. Bejoy Chand Mahatab (5) in which it was held that the raiyat holding land at a fixed rent may acquire a right of occupancy and claim protected interest under S. 160, Ben. Ten. Act. Richardson, J., went into the history of the law on the subject and came to the conclusion that there is nothing in the law to prevent a raiyat at fixed rate acquiring a right of occupancy in other words both the rights may be combined in the same person. Nor does the law make it impossible for an occupancy raiyat to obtain the right of a raiyat at fixed rate. These decisions and the other pronouncements on this subject in various cases of this Court created a class of raiyats not enumerated in S. 4, Ben. Ten. Act., namely, occupancy raiyats holding at a fixed rent or rate of rent. Whether an occupancy raiyat who is proved to have held at a fixed rent or rate of rent from the time of the Permanent Settlement may be elevated to the status of a raiyat at fixed rate is not for our present purpose to discuss. But it cannot be disputed that the law recognizes a raiyat with such rights. In the proviso to S. 37, Cl. (4), Act 11, 1859, one of the protected interests described in the section is that of a raiyat having a right of occupancy at a fixed rent. Reference may also be made in this connexion to the decision in Lakshmi Charan Shaha v. Hamid Ali (6) where the same view has been taken.

The learned Judge in support of his view has referred to several cases which apparently have no bearing on the point under discussion. In Jagalandhu Shaha

v. Magnamayi Dasi (7), the case was not governed by the Bengal Tenancy Act, but was decided upon the general principles of law. In that case the tenants succeeded in proving uniform payment of rent for a period of 40 years. The learned Judges held that without further proof of the origin and nature of the tenancy it would not be possible as a matter of law to draw an inference from this fact alone that at the inception of the tenancy the rent was fixed in perpetuity because the forbearance of the landlord in suing the tenant for a period of 40 years might be due to various reasons not inconsistent with the tenancy being an ordinary one. In Guru Charan Nandi v. Sarab Ali (8) there is a clear finding that the tenancy was created 40 years before the institution of the suit and, therefore no presumption could be drawn from the fact of uniform payment of rent for that period. The learned Judge has also referred to two cases from 26 C. W. N. one being the case of Bamandas Vidyasagar v. Shadhu Munshi (9) and the other Prosunna Kumar Sen v. Durga Charan (10). I fail to see that these cases have any connexion with the point involved in the present case. It was held in those cases that where the Record-of-Rights have been finally published the tenant is precluded by S. 115, Ben. Ten. Act, from claiming presumption under S. 50 of that Act. The case before us is not based on the Record of Rights and there is no presumption one way or the other arising from it.

It has been contended before us that the finding of the lower appellate Court that the presumption under S. 50, Ben. Ten. Act, has been rebutted by the sale certificate in this case is a finding of fact. I am unable to agree with this contention. It seems to me to be arguing in a vicious circle. The Judge held that the defendant was bound by the description of the holding as a jote in the sale-certificate and then he said that the production of the sale-certificate rebutted the presumption under S. 50 inasmuch as the sale certificate describes the holding sold as a jote.

(10) A. I. R. 1922 Cal. 146=49 Cal. 919=26 C. W. N. 947.

The result of a careful consideration of the facts of this case and of the law is that the defendant though he may be an occupancy raiyat is still entitled to claim the presumption under S. 50, Ben. Ten. Act, and since he has proved in this case that he has paid rent at a uniform rate for more than 20 years he is entitled to such presumption and the question which has been put in the judgment of the learned Judge namely, whether in consequence of the description of the holding as an ordinary jote in 1890 in the defendant's title-deed, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the presumption under S. 50, Ben. Ten. Act., must be answered in the affirmative.

In the above view this appeal is allowed. The judgment of the lower appellate Court is set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored with costs in all Courts.

* (a) Adverse possession—Claimant must have actual possession as against the person entitled to possession—Real tenant executing a sham kabulyat in favour of a third person—Actual possession with the real tenant with knowledge of sham kabulyatdar and continuing in possession as owner—No title by adverse possession can be claimed.

The question of adverse possession is a question of fact and the claim can only arise when a party remains in possession as against the party who held actually the rights to possession. If a real tenant executes a sham kabulyat in favour of a third person, but to continue to be in actual possession, as he was before the kabulyat was executed with the knowledge that it was his property of which he was in possession and that the kabulyat was a sham transaction, the third person cannot claim title by adverse possession. Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for establishment of title and recovery of khas possession of five plots of land A B C D and E described in the plaint said to be appertaining to the plaintiff's tenancy of 2½ bighas bearing a rental of Rs. 2-8-0 under the defendants and standing in the name of Ram Sona Dassi. Both the Courts below have allowed the plaintiff's claim with reference to four plots A C D and E and dismissed the suit so far as it related to plot B. The present appeal by the plaintiffs is accordingly confined to plot B which is a cutcheri bari. The plaintiff's case is that all the five plots in suit were purchased by Ram Sona Dassi (the plaintiff's predecessor) from Bagdi, the original holder of the tenancy, in 1261 B. S. Under the defendant who is the zemindar there was a putnidar by the name of Sristidhar Mondal who took a lease from the plaintiff's predecessor of plot B and had his cutchery bari. Thereafter Sristidhar's successor-in-interest in the putni Rama Nath Burman executed a registered kabuliyat in respect of plots A and B in 1301 in favour of the plaintiff's predecessor and was in possession by payment of rent till he was dispossessed by the defendants in 1908. The plaintiff thereafter obtained a decree against Rama Nath for arrears of rent under the lease and purchased it at auction in execution of rent decree on 3rd November 1914. It further appears that the plaintiff's predecessor brought a suit against Sristidhar for rent of plot B but it was dismissed and the decree of dismissal was upheld by the High Court in second appeal. The defendants are the purchasers of the zemindari interest of the property in suit in a revenue sale and subsequently they obtained by purchase the putni right of Rama Nath in the estate, and took possession of the land in suit on 11th January 1908.

Now as to the plaintiff's title to this property, it has been found by the Courts below that the kobala under which the plaintiff's predecessor Ram Sona is alleged to have purchased among other properties the land in suit from Padu Bagdi was not a genuine document. This finding has not been challenged before us. The position therefore is that the plaintiff has no title to this property. The substantial question which has been ably argued by Mr Chakrabarty on behalf of the plaintiffs is that though he has no title to the land in suit he has by adverse possession against the persons who was entitled to khas possession of the property, obtained a good title to it. This contention is based on the fact that in 1301 the putnidar Rama Nath executed a kabuliyat in favour of the plaintiff's predecessor in respect of the land in suit though actually it belonged to him on that date and remained in possession thereof till 1314 B. S. or 1908 as a tenant under the plaintiffs; and therefore, according to the principle of the decision of the Judicial Committee in the Secy. of State v. Krishna Mani Gupta (1), the plaintiff obtained a good title by adverse possession as against Rama Nath himself. It may be noted at the start that this case was not made out in the Courts below and there is no sufficient discussion of the evidence bearing upon this point. It is a question which is not free from consideration of facts and it is difficult for us in second appeal to appreciate its true bearing on the facts of this case. But as it has been placed before us as a question of law on the facts found in the case it is necessary to examine it closely. If the case as set up by the plaintiff namely that in 1301 Rama Nath had the title to the land in suit but he executed a kabuliyat in favour of the plaintiff alleging plaintiff's possession therein and treating himself as a tenant in respect thereof and remained in possession of it as a tenant under the plaintiff for a period of more than 12 years by payment of rent, is proved the plaintiff is undoubtedly entitled to succeed on the principle of Krishna Mani Gupta's case (1). But the findings of the lower appellate Court do not support the plaintiff's case as put before it. With regard to the kabuliyat executed by Rama Nath in favour of the plaintiffs, the learned Subordinate Judge in the appellate Court makes the following observation:

If we accept Rama Nath's said kabuliyat as a genuine and bona fide document, we find that the plaintiff's case is proved to be true in respect of all the sub-plots. There are, however, sufficient reasons for finding that Rama Nath's said kabuliyat was executed under exceptional circumstances and does not support the plaintiff's case in respect of plot B. Haran Bose (predecessor-in-interest of the plaintiff) was practically in Rama Nath's employ and it was not unlikely that such a kabuliyat was obtained under registration at the instance of an Am-muktear.

Later on after discussing some evidence on the point and referring to the judgment in a suit which was brought by Rama Nath against the defendants for recovery of the plots A and B in which Rama Nath succeeded in obtaining a decree in respect to plot A but his claim with respect to plot B was dismissed, the learned Judge observes thus.

The said judgment shows under what exceptional circumstances Rama Nath's kabuliyat might have been executed and there is nothing in the present suit to suggest a contrary state of things.

In the judgment in that case it was found that the story that Sristidar (the former putnidar) had taken settlement of the land from Haran was not true and that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that Rama Nath continued to pay rent to Haran after execution of the kabuliyat in 1301 till his rights were sold away in 1911; and as regards the kabuliyat of 1301 after Haran Bose had lost his rent suit against Sristidhar there was a litigation between Rama Nath and Sristidhar for years about this putni and that the kabuliyat was executed about the time of litigation and so it was not impossible that Rama Nath executed the kabuliyat at the time in order to get the help of Haran Bose, an influential tenant and the son of a former ijaradar of the mahal. These are the findings in the previous case upon which the Subordinate Judge relied and the observation made by him that Haran Bose was a servant of Rama Nath and the kabuliyat and registration of it were procured at the instance of the Am-muktear sufficiently establishes the basis upon which the learned Subordinate Judge has practically found that the kabuliyat was not a bona fide document. He has further gone on to consider the nature of the suit brought by Rama Nath against the defendants for recovery of this plot of land and plot A. He observed that that case, though it was brought in the name of Rama Nath, the plaintiff in the present case was really the plaintiff in that case and accordingly he was of opinion that the decision in that case operated as res judicata against the plaintiff who though not a party in form was the real plaintiff; and if that decision did not operate as res judicata it would certainly be very good evidence against the plaintiff. This opinion as expressed by the learned Subordinate Judge is supported by authority but it is not necessary to discuss it as the present case can be disposed of on the findings of fact arrived at by him namely that the kabuliyat of 1301 on which the plaintiff bases his claim for adverse possession against Rama Nath was not a bona fide document. There is further no finding in this case that Rama Nath continued to occupy the land as the plaintiff's tenant or ever paid rent to the plaintiff in respect of it. The question of adverse possession is a question of fact and the claim can only arise when a party remained in possession as against the party who had actually the right to possession. If the kabuliyat of 1301 was brought about for some purpose with the collusion of Rama Nath and the plaintiff's predecessor Haran Basu, the plaintiff's possession under it will not be adverse as against Rama Nath who remained in actual possession as he was before the kabuliyat was executed, with the knowledge that it was his property of which he was in possession and that the kabuliyat was a sham transaction. The title claimed by adverse possession must fail. It has been found that the plaintiff has no title by purchase to this land; as it is found that he acquired no title by adverse possession the plaintiff's suit must fail.

The learned Subordinate Judge has also held that the plaintiff's suit is barred by limitation. The defendant obtained possession of this land in January 1908 and the present suit was brought in April 1920. The learned vakil for the appellants argues that time runs not from the date of the defendants' possession but from the date of his purchase of Rama Nath's interest on which date he acquired the right to possession of the land in suit and for this view he relies upon the well-known principle that possession against a tenant or a lessee is not necessarily adverse as against the landlord or lessor. But this principle only applies where the landlord or the lessor has title to the land and the right to immediate possession, if impediments in the shape of a lease or tenancy disappears. In the present case the plaintiff on his own showing was a trespasser or in constructive possession of the land in suit through his tenant Rama Nath—whether under a temporary or a permanent lease it makes no difference, when in such a case the tenant holding the land under a trespasser is dispossessed, the dispossession would affect the tenant and the landlord also under whom he was holding, and it is more so when the rightful owner dispossesses the tenant and takes possession of the property which really belongs to him. In any view of the matter the plaintiff's suit must be taken to be barred by limitation, and as a trespasser he cannot claim that dispossession of Rama Nath by the defendant in 1903 did not affect his interest which at that moment he had none.

On all these grounds we are of opinion that there is no merit in this appeal and it must be dismissed with costs.

The defendant has filed cross-objections in this appeal in respect of plots other than plot B. But we are told that the defendants had filed a separate appeal in respect of those plots which was dismissed by this Court under O. 41, R. 11 Civil P. C. The cross objections therefore cannot be heard. They are dismissed without costs.

Letters Patent Appeal No. 2299 of 1925, Decided on 17th May 1928, from decision of Mitter, J., D/- 26th January 1928.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 48—S. 48 applies even if the holding is not co-extensive—Under-riyat of a part of holding agreeing to pay to riyat higher than 150% of the rent of whole holding—Riyat cannot recover more than 150% if under-riyat offers to pay 150%.

Section 43 is not limited only to cases where the holdings are absolutely co-extensive, and if the under-riyat of a part of a holding offers in Court to pay as much rent as would equal the amount of rent paid by the riyat for the total holding plus fifty per cent. of that, the riyat cannot recover more than that amount in spite of an agreement between the under-riyat and himself to pay rent at a higher rate. Rankin, C. J.—This is a Letters Patent Appeal from a decision of my learned brother Mr. Mitter, J., sitting in second appeal. The suit was brought by the plaintiff against the present appellant for rent. The position is this. The plaintiff is a riyat who, for a holding of two plots, pay a rental of Rs. 9-8-0. He has let one of those two plots to the defendant appellant who is an under-riyat and he has let that at a rent of Rs. 32-0-0 per annum. The tenant-defendant's contention is that, under S. 48, Ben. Ten. Act, the plaintiff cannot recover the rent at the rate claimed. He says that, although there has been let to him only a part of the plaintiff's holding, nevertheless the plaintiff cannot, under S. 48, Ben. Ten. Act, recover more than the total rent which he pays for his total holding plus 50 per cent. on that. In other words, the defendant's contention is that Rs. 14-4-0 is the maximum amount which the plaintiff can claim from him. That contention has been negatived by the lower appellate Court and by Mitter, J., on second appeal, the view taken being that S. 48, Ben. Ten. Act does not apply at all except in a case where the riyat's holding and the under-riyat's holding are co-extensive. Now, it is quite clear that, as a matter of common-sense and as a matter of presumed intention of the legislature with reference to the mischief of the section, the view taken by these learned Judges involves a certain paradox. I do not say that this consideration is conclusive, but it is, certainly paradoxical to be told, that if the plaintiff had let both these two plots to the defendant, the utmost he could have got by way of rent from the defendant is Rs. 14-4-0, but because, of these two plots, he has let only one to the defendant, he can for that one recover as much as Rs 32. We have, therefore, to see whether it is really true that S. 48, Ben. Ten. Act, must be read as limited to cases where the holdings are absolutely co extensive.

Now, the authority which has been cited to us on behalf of the appellant is the case of Nim Chand Saha v. Joy Chandra Nath (1). That was a case where the raiyat held land under a lease and by this lease certain classes of land were specified and certain rates of rent were prescribed for certain classes of land. A part of that land, he let out to the defendant, the under raiyat, and the under-raiyat's contention was that, as it was ascertainable which class of land had been sublet, the utmost that under S. 48, Ben Ten. Act could be claimed would be 50 per cent in excess of the amount of the raiyat's rent which was referable upon apportionment to the land which he had sublet to the defendant. With that contention the Court had to deal. In an ordinary case, it would be too plain for argument that S. 48 could not be applied by a mere rule of three; in other words, on the assumption that all lands of a tenancy are of equal value. But the case before the Court was more reasonable than that because there the tenant prayed in aid the circumstance that his land could be shown to be of a certain class and the plaintiff under his lease was paying so much rent for every bigha of that certain class. The learned Judges Harington and Mookerjee, JJ., were not faced with the question which is presented by the case before us. It was not suggested that it would be of any service to the defendant there to offer to pay as much rent as would equal the amount of rent paid by the raiyat for the total holding plus 50 per cent of that. What the learned Judges were struggling with was the contention that, in the special circumstances of that case, the class of land being known, the amount paid by the plaintiff with respect to the defendant's land could be taken as ascertainable. The learned Judges there said that that argument was based on a fallacy. They then say:

It cannot be affirmed that the raiyat pays so much rent for any particular parcel. No doubt, for the purposes of the assessment of the aggregate rent certain rates were taken as the basis of the calculation by the superior landlord. Nevertheless the raiyat holds the entire lands of the holding for the aggregate amount; and then they go on to point out that the whole rent issues out of every part of the land demised. Having given that which if taken by itself, is an accurate and adequate statement of the law, the learned Judges said:

In our opinion, S. 48, applies to cases in which the land held by the raiyat is co-extensive with the land held by the under-raiyat. The section was never intended to apply to cases of the class now before us.

That case was followed by Digambur Chatterjee and Chapman, JJ. in an unreported case Second Appeal No. 2539, of 1911 (Akram Ali v. Anwar Ali) decided in this Court on 22nd April 1914. We do not find that this latter case differed in any way from the case already dealt with. There, too, there was no question of the tenant being content to pay $1\frac{1}{2}$ times the rent paid by his landlord for the whole of the landlord's holding. But in Second Appeal No 3310 of 1915, (Netitulla Akanda v. Badri Bepari), decided in this Court on 15th August 1917 by Teunon and Shamsul Huda, JJ., a case arose presenting exactly the same feature as it presented in this case, and there the learned Judges pointed out that the decision of Harington and Mookerjee, JJ., in Nim Chandra v Joy Chandra (1) was perfectly right if it was understood with reference to the facts with which they had to deal, but that, if it was taken that only where the two plots were absolutely co-extensive was the section to be applied at all, that would be a construction which would defeat the policy of the legislature. It seems to me that that case is exactly on all fours with the present case and I agree entirely with the judgment which was given therein. This is what was said:

In applying the case reported in Nim Chandra v Joy Chandra (1) to a case such as this, the learned District Judge has fallen into an error, and to hold that S. 48 applies and can be applied only where the whole of the raiyat's holding is sublet would be to defeat the policy and intention of the legislature. In the case cited, as a matter of fact, the rent for the whole holding was Rs. 21-4-0. The plaintiff claimed in respect of the portion sublet a rent of Rs. 14. To have applied in that case the principle for which the appellants before us now contend would have been to decree a rent higher than the rent claimed.

Reference is made in the judgment of Nim Chand's case (1) at p. 843 to certain observations of Geidt, J., in the case of Akhil Chandra Biswas v. Amjad Ali, (Second Appeal No. 415 of 1903). We have sent for that judgment and have perused it and there is nothing in that judgment which militates against the view which I have expressed. There is a great deal in that judgment which shows that you cannot apply S 48, Ben. Ten. Act, by assuming that all lands are of equal value and proceeding upon a simple rule of three. The truth is that the proposition that rent issues from every part of the land demised and the proposition that lands are of different quality are insufficient to base a conclusion to the effect that S 48, can only apply where the two holdings are co-extensive. These considerations affords no objection to applying S. 48 in the way which is contended for by the appellant in the present case. Accordingly, I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

The result is that the decrees of the learned Judge of this Court and of the lower appellate Court are set aside and the decree of the Court of first instance is restored. The defendant must have his costs in the lower appellate Court, in the second appeal to this Court and in the appeal before us.

It was contended before us that the rent in this case was not a money rent, but on this point, the decision of the learned Judge of this Court in second appeal is I think clearly right.

C. C. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal against a decision of my learned brother Mr. Page, J., by which he dismissed the plaintiffs' suit in the circumstances hereinafter mentioned. The suit was instituted on 23rd March 1923, and the plaint as it stood, was filed against five defendants, namely, Chagan Lal, Sohan Lal, Kanya Lal, Rukmani and Mathu a Bai. Shortly stated, the plaintiffs' allegations were these: They stated that there was a dwelling house in Bhawalpore in the Punjab in which they were interested as part owners and that the said house had been sold by the defendant Chagan Lal acting for himself and as the constituted attorney of the other defendants by several conveyances in the months of March and April 1920. They further alleged that the sales were effected without the consent and knowledge of the plaintiffs or any of them and that Chagan Lal had realized a sum of Rs. 19,476. They stated also that they were entitled to one-third of the sum of Rs. 19,476, that is to say, to the sum of Rs. 6,492. In the prayer portion of the plaint, the reliefs prayed for were as follows: For leave under Cl. 12, Letters Patent to institute the suit in this Court, for a decree for the said sum of Rs. 6,492; if necessary, for a declaration of the shares of the parties in the sale proceeds of the said house and premises and for a direction upon the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs their share of the said sale proceeds, and if necessary, for an account by and under the direction of this Court of the dealings of the defendants of the moneys realized by them from the said sales and for a direction upon them to pay to the plaintiffs whatever might be found to be due to them on the taking of such accounts. In their written statement the defendants Chagan Lal and Kanya Lal stated that the suit as framed was one for lands outside the jurisdiction of this Court and was not maintainable. They further denied that the plaintiffs had any title to the said house.

It appeared that some time in May 1926, an order was made by my learned brother Buckland, J., when he was sitting on the original side of this Court, to the effect that the plaintiffs' application for issue of a commission of which notice had been given should stand to trial, that at the hearing of the suit the plea as to jurisdiction taken by the defendants should be heard and decided first, that such plea would be decided on the basis of the plaint having regard to the contention of the defendant Chagan Lal and Kanya Lal that the plaintiffs had no title to the house and premises in Bhawalpore in the Punjab and that, in the event of the plea of jurisdiction being decided in favour of the plaintiffs, the application for issue of a commission was to be brought on before the Judge hearing the case. This order, as stated above, was made on 18th May 1926. The suit came on for hearing before Page, J., on 2nd March 1927. when Sircar who appeared on behalf of the plaintiffs intimated to the Court that his clients were not willing to proceed against defendants 3, 4 and 5. Defendants 3, 4 and 5 were thereupon dismissed from the suit the necessary orders as to their costs being made at the same time. The case thereafter proceeded as against the two remaining defendants who were residents in Calcutta, namely, Chagan Lal and Sohan Lal.

When the appeal came on for hearing before us this morning, Mr Sircar on behalf of the appellants stated that, so far as defendant 2, Sohan Lal, was concerned, the matter had been settled with him and that he was to be dismissed from the suit and the appeal and that, so far as his costs in the first Court were concerned, the order made by that Court was not to be disturbed but, so far as his costs on appeal in this Court were concerned, one counsel's fee was to be allowed. Upon this statement being made by Mr Sircar and upon an order being made as prayed for, counsel for Sohan Lal retired. Thereupon, there was only defendant-respondent 1 left and that is Chagan Lal for whom Mr. N N. Bose, with Mr. S K Dutt (Advocate) appears.

Now, it appears from the judgment of the learned Judge that two points taken before him, (1) that, having regard to the allegations in the plaint, there was a suit for land and that no portion of the land being situate within the jurisdiction of this Court, the suit was entertainable, and (2) that having regard to the decision of the Court of appeal in the case of Hadjee Ismail Hadjee bub v. Hadjee Mahomed Hadjee Jo (1), and it appearing that all the defendants were not dwelling or carrying on business within the jurisdiction of this Court, the present suit was not maintainable.

Page, J., held, on an exhaustive review of the cases relating to what is a suit for land, that the present suit was not a suit for land and he thereupon negatived the first contention raised on behalf of Chagan Lal. As regards the second of the two contentions referred to above, he held, on a consideration of the facts of this case as appearing from the plaint, that this case was covered by authority, namely the case reported in Hadjee Ismail v. Hadjee Mahomed (1), and that, inasmuch as all the defendants were not dwelling or carrying on business within the jurisdiction of the Court, the present suit could not be maintained at the instance of the plaintiffs. The learned Judge thereupon dismissed the entire suit.

On appeal before us it has been contended by learned counsel for the appellants that on the facts of the present case it can be distinguished from the case reported in Hadjee Ismail v. Hadjee Mahomed (1), in this way, namely, that whereas in that case the account prayed for could not be taken and the case finally determined because of the fact that all the defendants were residents outside the jurisdiction of this Court and that, therefore, the suit could not possibly be maintained, in the present case the plaintiffs proceeded on the footing that a tort had been committed, namely, that there had been a wrongful conversion of the property in which they were interested without their knowledge and assent and that, in law, the plaintiffs were entitled to proceed against one tort-feasor or against all the tort-feasors jointly. In this case one of the tort-feasors, namely, Chagan Lal i.e., the person who had sold the property for himself and acting as the attorney of some of the other parties interested in the property, was dwelling, or residing within the jurisdiction of this Court, and that, therefore, the suit could properly be maintained in this Court. Mr. N. N. Bose on behalf of the respondent Chagan Lal argues that the case is covered by authority, namely, the case reported in Hadjee Ismail v. Hadjee Mahomed (1), and further that his client does not admit that the plaintiffs had any share whatsoever in the property in Bhawalpore referred to in the plaint and that, both on law and on facts, the suit could not be maintained in this Court.

So far as the last point is concerned, that is dependent upon an investigation of facts and this investigation has not yet been held. But for the purposes of this appeal, we must proceed upon this footing, namely, whether, it being conceded that no part of the cause of action had arisen within the jurisdiction of this Court, the suit is maintainable in this Court because of the fact that one of the tort-feasors, namely, the defendant Chagan Lal, is residing within the jurisdiction of this Court. Now, the case has been decided on demurrer and the matters referred to in Buckland, J's. order of 18th May 1926, have not been gone into. The position, therefore, is that the case has been decided in the Court of first instance on the footing that what is stated in the plaint must be taken to be correct. Now, it is stated in the plaint that the sale of the house in Bhawalpore was an unauthorized sale so far as the plaintiffs were concerned. It is, therefore, clear that the suit is one in tort and, if it is a suit in tort, it is elementary that the suit can be maintained at the option of the plaintiffs against one tort-feasor or against the entire body of tort-feasors. It is, therefore, not a case in which it was essential that all the defendants who had been originally made parties should be before the Court at the time the suit is heard; in other words, in my view, the case is different from the case reported in 13 B. L. R. 91. The facts in that case were as follows: The plaintiff sued H, resident in Bombay but carrying on business by his agent in Calcutta and others resident in Bombay, to set aside a release of his interest in a certain property in Bombay. The plaintiff prayed also for inventory and accounts. The learned

Chief Justice held that the real object of the suit was that an account might be taken of the property and the share of the plaintiff ascertained and provision made for his recovering it. The greater portion of the property was immovable property in Bombay. It was held that full and complete relief could not be given to the plaintiff in the absence of any of the defendants there and that the suit could not be maintained in the absence of leave under Cl. 12, Letters Patent, as the whole of the cause of action had not arisen in Calcutta. Therefore, so far as the present appeal is concerned, speaking for myself, I should be inclined to allow it because the question that is raised in the plaint is one whether or not there had been a conversion by Chagan Lal, who is resident in Calcutta, of the property in which the plaintiffs were interested and there is nothing in law to prevent the institution of a suit in the present circumstances against a tort-feasor who was resident within the jurisdiction of this Court.

Mr. Bose has, however, argued that in this case also having regard to the prayers in the plaint the question of accounts would have to be gone into. I express no opinion on the matter at the present moment but it is curious that if that was the view taken by the defendant Chagan Lal, he should not have raised the matter at the time when the other defendants were dismissed from the suit. I do not, however, wish to say anything which will preclude Mr. Bose's client from raising the questions relating to the plaintiffs' title to the property and to the other matters referred to in his written statement. They are questions which it will be open to the defendant Chagan Lal, to raise, if so advised, at a subsequent stage of the suit.

The result, therefore, is that, in my opinion, the present appeal should be allowed with costs and the case sent back to the Court of first instance for trial upon the issues arising on the pleadings. All earlier costs will follow the event.

Buckland, J.—A suit against several defendants all of whom are necessary for the determination of the questions which have to be decided in the suit must be distinguished from a suit against several defendants in which all the defendants are not necessary for the purpose of giving the plaintiff the relief which he prays and against any one or more of whom it is open to the plaintiff at his option to proceed. The case of Hadjee Ismail v. Hadjee Mahomed (1) was a case of the former description. Defendant 1 in that case was a resident of Bombay and was carrying on business by his gomastha in Calcutta. But for that, as I understand the case, there was no ground upon which the Court could possibly be asked to hold that it had jurisdiction. From the judgment of the learned Chief Justice, it appears that the learned counsel for the respondent suggested that the suit should be abandoned against the parties other than defendant 1, but as the learned Chief Justice pointed out, in order to set aside the release against defendant 1, that course could not be allowed because merely to set aside the release in a suit against defendant 1 would leave all the material questions to be decided in another suit. The real object of the suit is that an account may be taken of the property left by the deceased and the share of the plaintiff ascertained and provision made for his receiving it.

The present appeal has been argued upon the footing that the suit as framed is a suit for damages for conversion in which it is open to the plaintiffs to proceed against any one or more of the joint tort-feasors as they may elect. They elected to proceed against five but eventually proceeded against two—those two who reside in Calcutta. Though the suit was dismissed in the circumstances stated by my learned brother against the other defendants, nevertheless the learned Judge has held that, upon the authority cited, this Court has no jurisdiction. In my judgment, the case cited has no application in the circumstances, treating the suit as one for conversion.

The matter, however, has not been argued from this standpoint on behalf of the respondent. The argument on behalf of the respondent is that this is not a suit for damages for conversion as stated by the learned counsel for the appellants but that it is a suit to which the five persons who originally were made defendants to the suit are necessary parties. If this is a correct view to take of the situation, then the point, which the learned Judge has decided could not arise because, on 2nd March when the suit came on for hearing and the plaintiffs by their counsel stated that they would not proceed against defendants 3, 4 and 5, it would have been open to the learned counsel on behalf of defendants 1 and 2 then and there to have made a protest and pointed out that, if that course were adopted, the suit was not properly constituted and could not proceed. As I read the minutes, that point was never taken and, on behalf of the defendants 1 and 2 the course adopted on behalf of the plaintiffs was acquiesced in. Had the matter been discussed before the learned Judge, I cannot conceive that there would not have been some reference to it in the minutes and the learned Judge must have dealt with it in his judgment because, as I have endeavoured to point out, it goes to the root of the whole case and arises before any question of jurisdiction has to be decided. Mr. N. N. Bose for the respondent has assured us that the point was taken. I must, however, for the present purpose, treat the suit as though it were, as apparently the learned Judge did and as Mr. Sircar argues it is a suit for damages for conversion and, in that view, I agree that the appeal must succeed.

As regards the point taken on behalf of the respondent, it is not, as it appears to me, an answer to this appeal. It is a point, however, which notwithstanding the matters which I have pointed out, we have been assured was taken. In the circumstances, I agree that the defendant will be entitled to object that, on the plaint as framed, the suit is not properly constituted and that the plaintiffs cannot succeed. But, on the question of law, treating this suit as a suit for damages for conversion in which the plaintiffs have proceeded eventually exclusively against one of the tort-feasors, I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned Judge cannot be sustained and the appeal must be allowed and the suit sent back for trial as my learned brother has directed.

defendants 2 and 4 against the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of Bakarganj, affirming the decision of the Munsiff. The suit out of which this appeal arises was for ejectment of the heirs of a deceased tenant and their transferees on the allegation that the tenancy was a non-transferable occupancy holding and with regard to another piece of land it was an under-raiyati which the heirs of the original tenant Dwarka have abandoned. The heirs are Rabi and Kanai of whom Rabi alone has been made a party to this suit. Evidently Kanai's interestwill not be affected in any way and persons setting up the title of Kanai cannot be affected by any decree in this suit.It is, however, necessary to examine the decision of the Subordinate Judge. Dwarka died in Kartik 1320. It is said that the sons of Dwarka left the village in Falgun 1324. The plaintiff took settlement from the landlord in Baisak 1325 and is alleged to have taken possession. He next alleged that he was dispossessed in 1330 by the present defendants. What the Subordinate Judge finds is that the present defendants got a sub-lease from Rabi and Kanai dated 16th Ashar 1325 and purported to hold possession under them.
Two days after Rabi and Kanai sold 15 annas of their interest to defendant 2. The question is whether these transactions amount to abandonment. It is hardly necessary to point out that the inference from facts found as to whether there was abandonment or not is a question of law. Can it be said that because the sons of the original tenant had left the village after the death of their father for three months (that is from Falgun to Baisak) there was abandonment which entitled the landlord to settle the land with the plaintiff? The very statement of the facts shows the absurdity of that contention, nor can it be said that till Ashar the sons of Dwarka had at all abandoned the land. Some period must elapse from the date of leaving the village by the occupancy raiyat before it can be definitely stated that he has abandoned his holding. The period in this case is absurdly short. Then in Ashar 1325 the sublease given in favour of defendant 4 shows that those persons did not intend to abandon the holding but wanted to retain a grip upon the property by granting a sublease. The granting of the sublease cannot be considered to be a transfer of the tenancy in question nor can the selling the 15 annas of the interest in the property. The proposition has now been finally settled by the Full Bench case of Daya Mohan v.
Ananda Mohan Roy (1). It cannot therefore be said that the tenants have actually abandoned the land. Apart from the question of one of the heirs of Dwarka who would undoubtedly be a tenant having been left out of the suit there is no abandonment by the tenant.(A) [1926] 42 Cal. 172=20 C. L. J. 52=27 I. C.

The appeal therefore will be decreed. The judgments and decrees of the Courts below are set aside and the suit of the plaintiff dismissed with costs in all Courts. The plaintiff's title to receive rent for the holding will not be affected by this judgment.

Judgment—This is an appeal by defendant 1. The plaintiff sued the defendants in ejectment on the ground that he had taken a settlement of the land in question from the landlord who had purchased the holding in execution of his own rent decree. The plea of the defendant shortly stated was that he had obtained a decree in execution of a mortgage created on the holding by the previous tenant and after enforcing his mortgage he obtained a decree and purchased the property in question. He cannot therefore be ousted by the plaintiff. The plaintiff's suit was decreed by the lower appellate Court. Defendant 1 appealed to this Court and on the previous hearing a Division Bench sent down an issue for trial on the question whether or not the landlord had knowledge of the circumstance more than one year before the date of the application under S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act for service of notice. The notice was served by the landlord after the institution of the suit out of which this appeal arises. The application was admittedly made more than a year after the date of the sale. The notice can only annul the incumbrance in favour of defendant 1 if the necessary step was taken within one year from the date on which the purchaser in execution of the rent decree had first notice of the incumbrance. The purchaser in execution of the rent decree as already stated in this case was the landlord. The Subordinate Judge has sent his finding to this Court on the issue on which his finding was required. He observed that defendant 1 has entirely failed to discharge the onus that was upon him to show that the landlord purchaser had knowledge of the incumbrance more than a year from the date of notice.

It has been contended on behalf of the defendant-appellant that the finding ought to have been in his favour, because there is absolutely no evidence on behalf of the plaintiff that the purchaser had no notice of the incumbrance previous to one year of his application for service of notice. His contention is that the Subordinate Judge has misplaced the onus of proof, and having done so he has dealt with the evidence adduced on behalf of the defendant and has come to the conclusion that the defendant has failed to discharge the burden of proof, upon him. The Subordinate Judge relied upon the case decided by Patna High Court and reported in Nand Kishore v. Kameshwar Singh (1) in support of his view that in every case falling within S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act it is for the incumbrancer to show that the purchaser had knowledge of the incumbrance in order to establish the fact that there has been no annulment of the incumbrance on proper service of notice. In our view the learned Subordinate Judge has misread the case which he relies upon in support of his view. That was a case in which a mortgagee sued for possession as plaintiff and the auction-purchaser pleaded that the incumbrance had been annulled by due service of notice. In order to succeed in that case the plaintiff was bound to prove that he had a subsisting right and in that view the learned Judges held that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that the incumbrance which he claimed was not annulled by proper and legal notice. In our opinion it cannot be laid down as a general rule of law that the burden of proof is on the incumbrancer to show in every case that the purchaser had knowledge of the incumbrance more than one year before his application to the Collector for service of notice for annulment of the incumbrance. The mere reading of the section in our view displaces such a contention. The section provides that the purchaser may within one year from the date of the sale or the date on which he first has notice of the incumbrance whichever is later, present to the Collector an application in writing requesting him to serve on the incumbrancer a notice declaring that the incumbrance is annulled. Who is to show that the date when he has first notice of the incumbrance is later than the date of the sale? Obviously it must be the purchaser who makes the application for annulling the incumbrance. It is the purchaser who seeks the extension of one year's time for presenting the application to the Collector upon that ground and certainly he is to prove the fact in order to claim the extended period in his favour.

It is, however, contended on behalf of the respondents that in this case apart from the question of onus the evidence shows that the purchaser had knowledge of the incumbrance within a year of the presentation of his application. This evidence is said to have been given by a gomastha of the landlord. The Subordinate Judge has observed that defendant 1 admits that he never went to the house of the landlord. It is not necessary for the incumbrancer to go to the house of the landlord in order to give him notice. But it is for the landlord/purchaser to give evidence that he was not aware of the incumbrance within the time specified. There being no evidence given by him to that effect we must hold that the incumbrance has not been proved to have been annulled according to law.

The result therefore is that this appeal must be decreed, the judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court set aside, and the decree made by the trial Court restored with costs in all Courts.

Surendra Nath Guha and Durgendrup Krishan Dutt—for Appellants

Sarat Chandra Bose and Narendra Krishna Bose—for Respondents.

Mukherji, J.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit for establishment of plaintiffs' nishkar right to and for possession of 4½ bighas of land which is described in Sch. Ka to the plaint. The plaintiffs' case was that the land in suit was their ancestral nishkar, that they and predecessors possessed the same for more than 100 years in nishkar right as well as right by adverse possession, that they and their predecessors had paid road-cess and submitted road-cess returns to the Bankura Collectorate till 1905. when the Collector directed them to pay the cesses to the zemindars, but the latter refused to take the cesses only and insisted on the plaintiffs taking a jamai settlement and that the plaintiffs refused to do so. The defendants resisted the claim by alleging that they had been holding the lands from the time of their father for a period of over 25 years as tenants under the said zemindars and on payment of rent to them.

The trial Court dismissed the suit, but the lower appellate Court on appeal by the plaintiff reversed that decision and decreed the suit. The defendants have preferred this appeal.

The District Judge found that the documents on which the defendant relied in order to show their tenancy right to the land either did not relate to it or were not reliable, having been created for the purposes of the case, and that the entry in the Record-of-Rights was of little value, its presumptive value having been rebutted by the plaintiffs' evidence. He found, on the other hand, on a consideration of the cess challans and certain other documents adduced in evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs to which it is not necessary to refer specifically, that the plaintiffs' father held some land in nishkar right in the mouzah. He found, however, that in support of the plaintiffs' title by nishkar right in respect of the two plots of which the land Sch. Ka consists, there was no documentary evidence in respect of plot 1, and the only documentary evidence that there was as regards plot 2 were a sale-certificate (Ex. 9) and two kabulas (Exs. 6 and 7) relating to adjoining lands. He found also that the oral evidence of possession of the land of Sch. Ka that was adduced on the side of the plaintiffs was immensely superior to that adduced on the side of the defendants. On the oral evidence coupled with the said documents Exs. 6, 7 and 9, he held that the defendants' evidence of possession of plot 1 was not to be accepted. This process of reasoning he came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had succeeded in proving possession of both plots without payment of rent and this he inferred that the plaintiffs' nishkar right to both the plots entitled the plaintiffs a decree declaring nishkar right and for recovery of possession.

The appellants contend that the documents Exs. 6, 7 and 9 are not admissible in evidence, and that the findings of the District Judge are vitiated as being based on them. It may be mentioned here that the landlords not being parties to the suit a declaration of nishkar right of very little use to the plaintiff and the finding of the Judge on the question of adverse possession could be held not having been affected by the said documents to which the appellants have taken exception the decree of the Judge could have been upheld to the extent declaring the plaintiffs' title without determination of its precise character and of giving him khas possession. But as it is, the findings on the question of nishkar right as well as on the question of adverse possession, as already indicated, rest partly at any rate, on the said documents and it, therefore, becomes necessary to consider the question of their admissibility.

Exhibit 9 is a sale-certificate in respect of an adjoining land. In it plot 1 of Sch. Ka is said to lie on the boundary of the lands to which it relates and the said plot is described as plaintiffs' nishkar. The Munsif whose signature the document bears may be and has rightly been presumed to be dead. The learned Judge is of opinion that the document is admissible under S. 32, Cl. (2) and also S. 35, Evidence Act. He held that under O 21, R. 66, Civil P. C., a duty is upon the Court to specify as fairly and accurately as possible the property transferred in the sale-proclamation and as a description of the property as given in the sale-certificate is a copy of that contained in the sale-proclamation, the entry of boundaries is to be regarded as having been made by the Munsif in the ordinary course of business and in the discharge of his official duty and the said entry, therefore, comes under S. 32, Cl. Evidence Act. He held also that the

had been a sale-certificate is an entry made notice. Public record by a public servant in the discharge of his duty and, therefore, had a sales under S. 35, Evidence Act, learned J. The learned Judge, in my opinion, proof was entirely misunderstood the meaning of the incun both these sections. Under S. 32, not annul) applying that part of the clause In our op is relevant, the statement must be a gene made by a person in the ordinary proofurse of business, or, if it is an entry, it ever must be an entry made by a person in le books kept in the ordinary course of business or in the discharge of his professional duty. Here there is no question of an entry in any book nor is the statement in the sale-proclamation or in the sale-certificate as regards the boundaries of the land covered by them in any sense a statement of the Munsif. It is only a statement of the parties, unless there is a variance between the parties on the point, in which case it may be taken as an entry embodying a decision which may come under some other section of the Evidence Act; but there is nothing to indicate in the present case that the Munsif was ever called upon to decide as to what was the real boundary, and so the statement does not amount to a decision. Equally inapplicable is S. 35. A sale-certificate is not "a public or other official book, register or record" and is much the same as a certificate of guardianship which has been held not to answer the description: Satis Chunder v. Mohendro Lal (1), Hara Kumar De v. Jogendra Krishna Ray (2) and Gunja Kuar v. Albakh Pande (3). Recitals even in a judgment not inter partes, of a relevant fact is not admissible under S. 35: Seethapati Rao v. Rokkam Venkanna (4).

As regards the kabalas, Exs. 6 and 7, the learned Judge is of opinion that the recitals of boundaries therein are admissible under S. 32, Cl. (3), Evidence Act, the executants thereof being dead. Before us their admissibility is sought to be justified also under Ss 11, 13 and 157, Evidence Act. It will be necessary, therefore, to deal with all the four sections referred to above.

Section 11 is very widely worded but the illustrations, as has been often pointed ted out, do not go beyond cases familiar to the English Law of Evidence and it has been always held that an extensive meaning was not in the mind of the Legislature; per West, J. in R. v. Parbhudas (5), Queen-Empress v. Vajiram (6) and per Mookerjee, J., in Emperor v. Panchu Das (7). As a general rule, this section is controlled by S. 32 where the evidence consists of statements of persons who are dead: and the test whether such statement is relevant, under this section though not relevant under S. 32 is this: it is admissible under S. 11 when it is altogether immaterial whether what was said was true or false but highly material that it was said: Sethna v. Mahomed Shirazi (8). Judged by this test the statement is inadmissible under S. 11, and though there are some cases of this Court which decided to the contrary the more recent decisions are not in favour of that contrary view. As regards S. 13 both my learned brother and myself have in our judgment in the case of Brigendra Kishore v. Mohim Chandra (9) expressed our views as to the precise scope of that section. That view has since been endorsed by other learned Judges of this Court and in that view recitals of boundaries in documents evidencing transactions relating to adjoining lands cannot possibly be admitted under that section. As has been pointed out in a later decision of this Court in the case of Ketabuddin v. Nafar Chandra (10) such recitals are not admissible either under S. 11 or under S. 13.

As regards the admissibility of these recitals under S. 32, Cl. (3) there is a clear conflict of opinion so far as this Court is concerned as has been pointed out in the case last cited above. It will serve no useful purpose to discuss at length the long line of cases in which it has been held that such recitals are admissible, but I cannot help pointing out that the judgment of Couch, C. J., in Rajah Leelanund Singh v. Lakhputee Thakoorain (11) upon which the Bombay High Court purported to rely in earliest case of that Court, v. z., the case of Nin- ganwa v. Bharmappa (12) which decided in favour of the admissibility of these recitals on the ground that they are against the proprietary or pecuniary interest of the maker thereof, was not a case of recitals of boundaries of any adjoining land but it was the case of a statement contained in a sannad relating to the land itself. The principle that was laid down in that case was that if as a whole it is against the interest of proprietary right of its author, such parts of it as are in his favour cannot be rejected. With all respect to the learned Judges who decided the case of Ningawa v. Bharmappa (12) I find it extremely difficult to extend the principle of Rajah Jeelanund Singh v. Iakhputee Thakoorain (11) to the case of recitals of boundaries unless with the aid of the principle in the leading case of Higham v. Ridgway (13) and I am extremely doubtful if the legislature at all intended to incorporate Higham v. Ridgway (13) in its entirety in S. 32, Evidence Act. I am inclined to take the view that Higham v. Ridgway (13) was taken by the Indian legislature only as illustrative of what is meant by the expression "ordinary course of business" as used in Cl. (2) of that section. These cases form the foundation of the line of cases which are in favour of admissibility of such recitals. In view of the opinion that I hold it would probably have been necessary for us to make a reference to a Full Bench but there is one clear decision at least of this Court to the contrary, and I think I am free to follow it as I agree entirely with what has been said in it; I mean the case of Pramatha Nath v. Krishna Chandra (14). I hold accordingly that the recitals are not admissible under S. 32, Cl. (3).

As regards S. 157, I fail to understand how that section can be invoked to let in statements made by somebody else as evidence for the purpose of corroboration of a witness examined in the case and if the case of Ketabuddin v. Nafar Chandra Pattak (10) meant to lay down that it can be so invoked I have no hesitation in respectfully dissenting from it.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the recitals contained in Exs. 6 and 7 were wrongly admitted in evidence.

The result is that the appeal will be allowed and the case will be sent back to the lower appellate Court to re-hear and dispose of the appeal to that Court after excluding the document Exs 6, 7 and 9.

Costs of this appeal will abide the result.

Cuming, J.—I agree.
